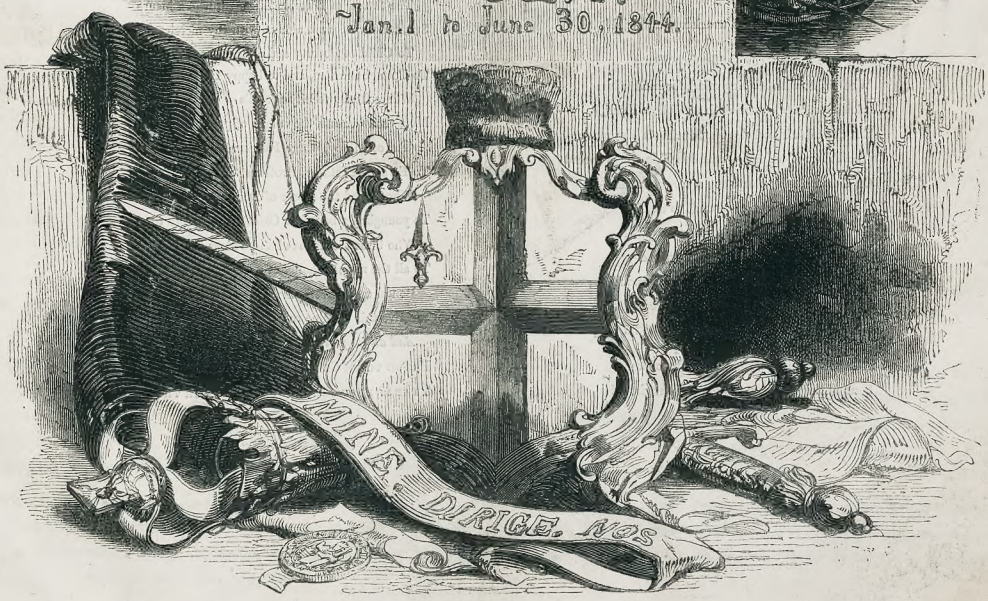
THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

VOL. 4.

Jan. 1 to June 30, 1844.



LONDON.

PUBLISHED BY WILLIAM LITTLE, 198, STRAND.

1844.

DEDICATION.

To Statesman, proud of Senatorial fame,—
To Orator, Historian, Judge, and Seer,
To Patriot,—living with a holy name,—
To laurell'd Poet,—who the crown may claim
Which Genius gives her gifted ones to wear;
To Manhood noble, and to Beauty rare!
To the high dwellers by a dazzling Throne!
To the proud Peers and Princes gathered there!
To all who high Nobility may own!
To mitred Bishops and to Churchmen grave
Inspir'd Priest or village Pastor mild,
To all who labor human souls to save
In this world's maze so wearisome and wild!

To the pale Student, by the lambent flame
Who sighs, with lab'ring mind, for hidden lore
To cloistered Sage,—who doth not follow Fame,
But the calm knowledge that enchants him more;
To the Prince-Merchant,—with his Ship-wings spread
On distant flight, o'er many a surging main;—
And to the humbler Trader, wont to tread
By lowlier paths, tho' still intent on gain!
To Sons of Science!—to the factory Band
Working vast treasures from the loom and mine;
To the rough Farmer who,—with rugged hand,—
Guides the sharp plough—or rears the fat'ning kine!

To the bold Soldier, train'd for paths of war,
Sons of the sounding cannon and the glaive!
To the bluff Sailor,—off by Neptune's car,
Strong as his mast and dashing as his wave!
To those who mount Fame's ladder by the Pen
Or paint their way, amid the arts of Peace,
Author and Artist;—and those bay-crown'd men
Who Music's prison'd beauties can release
From Instruments endow'd with wondrous sound;
Pouring wild streams of harmony along,
Or scatt'ring more melodious sweets around
In all the dreamy tenderness of Song!—

To Artizan and Peasant: yes to all
The throng of Humble Life—(to whom insure Sweet Heav'n! such aids as with thy mercies fall!)
To Child of Poverty and all the Poor!
To Cottage inmates, and to happy Homes
Where family felicity prevails
More than beneath the weight of princely domes
(For often Joy, where Fashion lingereth, fails!)
To Fathers, Mothers, Brothers, Sisters, all
Who thread the mazes of Domestic Life,
To youngling's bound in Childhood's happy thralls—
Who bless the husband and endear the Wife!
To all the mighty family of Man
Bound up in Brotherhood!—with Love elate
We give this Volume to peruse or scan
And all its picture-Treasures dedicate;
PROUD TO BE CERTAIN,—LET WHAT MAY BEFAL—THAT IT HAS FOOD AND PLEASURE FOR THEM ALL!

THE GETTY CENTER LIBRARY

TO VOL. IV.

WITH each succeeding volume of our pictured register of the world's history, the pleasure with which we greet our readers becomes more enduring and refined; and while we delight in the gratification of a companionship grown sweeter and more familiar by prolonged intercourse, we look forward with a freshened hope, and backward with a pleasant recollection—whetted by the vanity of watching how the tide of our little ocean has been swelling onward, not towards a profitless and barren beach, but over caves of treasure and sands of gold. We are proud of the riches of Art and Literature that have been gathered upon our pages, and we are glad to see that motley crew, the Public, committing themselves cheerfully to our vessel, and sailing pleasantly and prosperously upon their every voyage.

And to carry out the metaphor, we regard the completion of each new volume as the reaching of a desired port—the entering of a safe and tempting harbour—the bringing home of troops of friends. We furl our sails for a moment, and sit down with our readers to the banquet that is to crown the voyage.

Greeting and good wishes then go round the board, where we have spread a goodly array of rare and savoury dishes, and where we have loving cups in plenty in which to pledge our friends!

We think we may point with some fair congratulation to the contents of this, our third summer tome, and the fourth of our teeming series. There are many remarkable features in this volume which give it importance in an historical point of view, and in a literary sense; and even in reference to art, invest it with a character hitherto unknown to the world of newspaper intelligence, and at once fascinating and instructive to readers of every class. Upon these features we may make brief remark; but first, in a political sense, we cannot help referring to the fact that it registers one of the most remarkable occurrences in the history of the Nineteenth Century—we mean the important and interesting State Trial of Daniel O'Connell and his fellow traversers for conspiracy in the Sister Kingdom. And here we are strikingly reminded of the immense historical advantage of such a publication as the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS over every other expounder of the events of present time. Absorbingly will posterity be interested in such an occurrence; and we have handed it down full of a warm and bright vitality. We have not recorded a dry law case, but there is canvas as well as a report, and pictured truth as well as written history. Not one actor of that great drama has gone unlimned—not a single phase of portraiture has been omitted. The scenes and circumstances of the trial have been depicted with strength and fidelity, and that momentous episode in the destinies of Ireland is vivid, comprehensive, and complete. The other minor passages of world's progress have been reflected with equal care, and treated according to their importance, with the various illustrations of an ever-suggestive art.

The literary feature of introducing a series of nouvellettes from the pens of the first writers of our time, has met with a very general and gratifying approval. It seems to have harmonized with the family character of this newspaper, and to have fertilized the dry realities of the actual world with a pleasant stream of fiction to please the palate, and prompt the imagination of the young.

There is one gem of knowledge and interest in this volume to which we point with pride. It is to the Illustrated History of the Art, by which we have risen into fame, power, and popularity—the Art of Engraving upon Wood. In a Journal which has so fostered its progress and widened its territory—which contains some of the most beautiful specimens of its excellence—which is a rare epitome of its practical utility—a storehouse of its harvest—a garden of its flowers, an orchard of its fruit—it seemed singularly appropriate that its "Picture History" should be registered as we have registered it here. It is a theme full of important instruction and poetical delight, and it will give an enduring character to whatever production it may adorn.

And, now having glanced at some of the more immediate novelties of our book, we lastly refer to the announcement which it contains of another of our projected gifts of gratitude to the Public—to that glorious Panorama of the Splendid Thames, upon which we are now concentrating the genius of modern art, and by which we hope shortly to inspire the public with fresh emotions of surprise and delight. This volume will surely be the more acceptable for containing the promise of that captivating work.

And with the announcement of this gage d'amitie, we may now take our farewell of our readers, thanking them for the past, as sincerely as we would cheer them for the future; and having taken our respite of greeting, hurrying away to find them fresh fountains of pleasure, and open new sources of intellectual enjoyment—feeding them with that attractive knowledge which is the most piquant pabulum of the mind.

LIST OF ENGRAVINGS IN VOL. IV.

ABERDEEN, the Earl of, Portrait of, 105
Abinger Hall, the seat of the late Lord Abinger, 235
Achard, M., in the character of "Farinelli," 77
Acmil, View in, 181
Addison's Birthplace, 316
Adopted, The, or Impulse, not Principle. Illustrations to, 44, 61, 77, 78
Albert, His Royal Highness the Prince: Portrait of, 9
Visit of to Cowes, Isle of Wight, 185
Plate Presented by, to the 11th Hussars, 403
Albert Gate, The, Hyde Park, Knightsbridge, 301
Alicant:—
Military Execution at, 196
Views of, 129, 130
"Alice Hawthorn," the Winner of the Gold Vase at Ascot Races, 305
American Diorama, The, General Tom Thumb, 124
American Steam Frigate Princeton, 333
Angra, Terceira, Landing Place at, 353
Anniversary Meeting of the Civic Authorities and the Metropolitan Clergy in St. Paul's Cathedral, 304
Anti-Corn-Law League Meeting in Covent-garden Theatre, 136
"Ariel" Steamer, Launch of the, at Rotherhithe, 248
Artillery Company's Ball, The Honourable, 121
Ascot Races, 268, 369
Assyrian House (the Russian Ambassador's), Dover-street, 364
Atmospheric Railway at Kingstown, &c., 16
Auber, Portrait of Mons., 308
Azores, Views from the, 132
Azores, The, and Madeira—
Watering with Paddle box Boats, at St. Mary's, 263
Caldeira at Flores, 263
Landing Place at Angra, Terceira, 263
Point of the Cross, Madeira, 263

BALLANTINE, Mr., Counsel for Fletcher, 228
Balloon at Paris, Immense Copper, 193
Barber (Will Forgeries), 249
Battersea-bridge, 300
Baumann, Mr. F. (the Fagotto Player), 99
Belper, View of, 68
Bennett, Mr. (Irish Bar), 24
"Bohemian Girl," Scene from, 45
Bordeaux, The Duc de—
Visit of to Alton Towers, 19
Visit of to Dudley Caverns, 12
"Boscawen," Launch of her Majesty's ship, at Woolwich, 221
Boston, The Fire at, 424
Botanic Society's Fête (The Royal)—
Principal Tent, 288
Refreshment Room, 288
Bowie Knife of America, 100
British and Foreign Institute—
Opening of the, 93
Prince Albert's Visit to, 93
British Factor and Merchant Seaman (Sculpture), 104
British Institution, 185, 197
British Museum, Façade of, from Sir R. Smirke's Design, 28
"Brides of Venice"—
Scene from, at Drury-lane Theatre, 277
Mrs. Shaw in, 277
Buccleuch, His Grace the Duke of, 105
Buckingham Palace, The Music Room, 381
Buckingham Palace Gardens, The Chinese Summer House in, 305
Buenos Ayres, 196
De Rosas, the Governor of, Portrait of, 196
Bunn, Mr. A. J., of Drury-lane Theatre, 221
Burdett, The late Sir Francis, Bart., 64

CABRIOLET, The New Patent, the "Tribus," 141
Caldeira at Flores, 263
Caledonian Asylum, Laying the First Stone of the Girls' School, 333
Caledonian Ball at the Hanover-square Rooms, 137
Camberwell New Church, 48
"Cambridge," The Destruction of the Barque, at Plymouth, by Fire, 38
Campbell, Lord. Portrait of, 180
Campbell, the Poet, Portrait of the late Thomas, 297
Campeachy, View of, 148
Canton, Five Views of, 100
Cantwell, Mr., Portrait of, 41
Carcigan, Portrait of the Earl of, 316
Cardwell, M.P., Mr., Portrait of, 65
Carpenter, J., Statue of, the Founder of the City of London School, 324
Carthagena, View of, 148
Central Criminal Court, Opening of the, 236
Cerito, Mdlle., as "La Vivandiere," 356
Chamber of Deputies (The French), 4
"Charlotte" Smack—The Silver Cup presented to Capt. Muys of, 149
Chelsea, Fancy Bazaar at the Royal Hospital at, 388
Chelsea New Church, 300
Cheltenham Proprietary College, 424
Chess, 262
Chester Races—"Red Deer" winning the Cup, 288
Chillingham Bull, Shooting, 92
Chinese, African, and Levantine Traders (Sculpture), 104
Chinese Funeral, 5
Chinese Lace, 69
Chinese Presents to her Majesty, 36
Chinese Trophies at Windsor Castle, 8
Chiswick House—The Duke of Devonshire's Grand Fête to the Emperor of Russia, 384, 385
Christ's Hospital Scholars at the Mansion House, 313
Christina, Queen, Progress in Spain, Sept., 1846—
"Christmas Carol," Scene from the, at the Adelphi Theatre, 109
Clanricarde, The Marquis of, 332
Clarkson, Mr., Counsel for the Prosecution in the Wills Forgery Case, 228
Clive, M.P., Lord Viscount, Portrait of, 69
Clonmellan, near Dublin, The Round Tower at, 28
Cochrane, M.P., Mr. Baillie, Portrait of, 180
Coins and Medals, Devonshire Collection of, 187
Comet, The Great, as seen at Van Diemen's Land, 84
"Comus." Scene from, from Esty's picture, 373
Condors at the Surrey Zoological Gardens, 92
Conservative Club-house, St. James's-street, The New, 85
Consumption, New Hospital for, Fulham-road, 173
Prince Albert laying the First Stone of the New Hospital for, 388
Foundation-stone, 388
Copper Balloon at Paris, 193
Cork, City of—Scenes on the day of the O'Connell Dinner, 244
Corvo, Caldeira, or Crater, in (Azores), 133
Costa, Signor Michael, Portrait of, 404
Coursing—Greyhounds, 260
Cranoe, Leicestershire, Schoolhouse, 37
Craig, the Rev. Dr., Portrait of, 248
"Crown Diamonds," The Scene from at the Princess's Theatre, 308
Croxton Park Races—The Race, 217
Culloden, The Battle of, 264

DAMASCUS, The Maid of, 132
De Grey, Lord, The Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, 24
Dartmewater, Yacht Accident on, 360
Lake Trout Fishing, 276
"Devil to Pay" The, Running at Newmarket, 237
Devon and Cornwall Royal Botanical and Horticultural Society's Show, Assembly-room, Plymouth, 373
Devonshire Collection of Coins and Medals—Syracuse Medallion, Æquina, Ar, Thrax, Vitellius, Zenilla as restored by Trusan, 187
Disraeli, M.P., Portrait of Mr., 404
Don Carlos, Portrait of, 132
"Don Carlos," Scene from Costa's Opera of, 421
Dorcy, Mrs., (Will Forgeries,) 249
"Drama at Home," The, Scene from the Extravaganza of, at the Haymarket Theatre, 237
Driving, Extraordinary Feat in. Mr. Emidy Driving 38 Horses to Greenwich, 313
Dudley Caverns, 12
Duisken, Madame, Portrait of, 45
Duprez, Portrait of, 140
Durham Regatta, 421

EAST INDIA COMPANY, Court of Proprietors, 289
East India House, Court of Directors, 281
Edgeworth's, Miss, House, 261
Edinburgh Royal Institution, Colossal Statue of Her Majesty at the, 97
Egerton's, Lord, Fête at Worsley—The Pavilion, 408
"Elberfeld" Steamer, Loss of the, 137
Eldon, The Earl of, Portrait of, 65
Electric Printing Telegraph of the South Western Railway, &c., 284
(See also "South Western Railway.")
Elephant, State, The Rajah of Puttealla on his, 5
Eliot, Lord, Chief Secretary for Ireland, 24
Emidy, Mr., Driving 38 Horses to Greenwich, 313
Emigration to Sydney—Ship Towing out, 229
Emigrants at Dinner, 229
Plan of Ship between Decks, &c., 230
Enigma Yacht, The, 330
Epsom Races, 320
The Derby Day, 336
The Road, 336
View of the Warren, 337
The Betting Ring, 337
Ernst, Herr, Portrait of, 345
Etna (Mount), from Catania Harbour, 48
Eton Montem, Illustrations of, 248, 340, 352, 353, 354.
Exeter Hall, Interior of—May Meetings, 317
Eye Chapel, The, 13, 14

"FAIR STAR," Scene from the Extravaganza of, at the Princess's Theatre, 245
"Farinelli: ou le Bouffon du Roi," Scene from, at the St. James's Theatre, 77
Farrington Street, North View of, 125
Fashions, The, 60, 124, 205, 277, 360, 419
Favanti, Mdlle., Portrait of, 189
"Favourite," The, Scene from, at Drury Lane Theatre, 205
Ferrand, M.P., Portrait of Mr., 292
Finnoe House, 13
Fish (Lernea Spratta) taken off Lyme Regis, 131
Flageolet Player, The Young, 89, 109, 125
Fletcher (Will Forgeries), 249
Flores (Azores), The Valley of Waterfalls in, 133
Church of Santa Cruz, 133
Fornasari, Portrait of, 308
Fox Hunt, a Novel One, 197
Freiston Shore Races, 424
Fruit Schooner, 420

GAMING Analyzed, 347
"Gazelle" Yacht, The, 330
George the Fourth, Chantrey's Statue of, in Trafalgar-square, 128
Gladstone, M.P., The Right Hon. William Ewart, 105
"Gnome" Yacht, The, 330
Goldsmith's Hall—Nixon's Statues of the Seasons, 21
Grand Staircase and Vestibule of, 21
Gordon, Colossal Statue of the Late Duke of, at Aberdeen, 312
Gorhambury Races, 321
Goths, Portrait of the late Ernest Duke of Saxe, 105
View of Chateau of Rhenard's Brun, near, 84
Palace of, 85
Gothics', The, Ball at the Hanover-square Rooms, 113
Goulburn, M.P., the Right Hon. Henry, Portrait of, 105
Graham, Bart., M.P., the Right Hon. Sir James, Portrait of, 105
Gravesend, The Great Fire at; Ruins after the Fire, 376
Greenland Whaling Ship leaving Hull, 156
Greenwich, Magnetic Observatory; Electric Light Apparatus; The Declination Magnet; Horizontal Force Magnet; Vertical Force Magnet; Electric Bell and Apparatus, 104
Greenwich Park, Barrows in, 420
Greenwich Pensioners: Daniel Fearhall; Henry Silles; Joseph Burgin; James Connell; George French; Joseph Brown; John Manning, 233
Gresham Club House, 108
Grindsbrook Font, Derbyshire, 281
Grisi (Carlotta) in "La Esmeralda," 208
Gurney, Mr. Baron, 349
"Guillaume Tell," Scene from Opera of, at Drury-lane Theatre, 173
Gwalior, Kaugeewhala, the Usurper of, 244
Views of—Hill Forts—Fortified Posts, 153

HADDINGTON, the Earl of, Portrait of, 105
Halford, Bart., M.D., the late Sir Henry, Portrait of, 108
Hampstead Heath, 332
Hardinge, the Right Hon. Sir Henry, Portrait of, 105
Harrison, Mr., as "Thaddeus," in the Opera of "The Bohemian Girl," 45
Hawk and a Weasel, Battle Extraordinary between, 211
Haydi, The City of, 297
Henley Regatta—Eight-oared Match, 416
"Henry IV., Part I.," Scene from—Death of Hotspur, 77
Herald's College, The New Record Room, 248
Herbert, M.P., The Hon. Sidney, 136
Heron, Miss, The Infant Power, 277
Hibernia, The brig, Destruction of, by Fire, 188
Highland Dancers and Pipers, 356
Hill, the Right Hon. Lord, Portrait of, 65
Hogg, M.P., Mr., Portrait of, 208
Holland, Funeral of the ex-King of, 53
Holy Week in Rome, 212
Hong-Kong, Great Seal for, 8
Horse Racing in the Reign of Charles the Second, 320
Horse Training, 260
Horse Watcher, The, 221
Houston, Gen., President of Texas, 380
Huddersfield, Demolition of a Woollen Mill at, by fire, 376
Hull, The first Greenland Whaling Ship leaving, 156
Hussars (the 11th), Plate presented by his Royal Highness Prince Albert to, 403
Hyde Park in "The Season," 261

ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE, Illustrations from the, 27, 220
Imposition, A Novel Mode of, 170
Ireland—Dublin Corporation, Portraits of the late Lord Mayor, Mr. Alderman Butt, and of the Recorder, 40
Ditto of the Town Clerk (Mr. Forde), and Town Councillor M'Loughlen, 40
Dublin, Hall of the Four Courts, 49
Recorder's Court, 101
Dukes Music Hall, 37
Ditto, Aggregate Meeting of the Roman Catholics or Ireland in, 37
Phœnix Park, Grand Review in, 415
Richmond Penitentiary, Dublin—Visits to O'Connell, 380
Signal Fires in, 40
State Trials in—Counsel for the Crown: Portraits of the Attorney General for Ireland (the Right Hon. T. B. C. Smith), the Solicitor-General for Ireland (Mr. Greene), Mr. Bennet, Mr Brewster, Q.C., Mr. Freeman, Mr. Holmes, Mr. Martley, Mr. Joseph Napier, and Mr. Smyly, 24
Crown Solicitor—Mr. Kemmis, 24
Solicitors for the Defence: Messrs. Pierce Mahony, Cantwell, and Gartlan, 24
Legal Portraits—Messrs. Clements and Hayes, 41
Court of Queen's Bench, Portrait of Mr. Bourne, Chief Clerk of, 24
The Judges Proceeding to the Four Courts, 69
Sheil, Portrait of Mr., Counsel for John O'Connell, 69
O'Connell and John O'Connell, Portraits of, 68
Procession through Dame-street, 56
O'Connell leaving the Robing-room for the Court, 56
Court of Queen's Bench, the Trial, Reporters Row, 57
Court of Queen's Bench, the Traversers on Trial, 81
Discussing the Jury Panels, 88
Attorney-General Listening to O'Connell's Defence, 88
Irish Armed Out Pensioners, a Group from Life, 20
Isabella II., Queen of Spain, 261
Isle of Man, King William's College in, and Destruction thereof, by Fire, 64
Italian Opera-house, Her Majesty and her Royal Guests at the, 389

JACK CADE'S Cavern, at Blackheath, 209
Janus, The New Government Steamfrigate, 121
Figure Head of, 121

KALERGI, The Greek Patriot, Portrait of, 345
Kamehameha, King of the Sandwich Islands in Council, 20
Kensington, the Gardens of Gwalior, 244
Kemble, Mr. Charles, Reading Shakspeare before Her Majesty, at Buckingham Palace, 341
Kew Gardens, The Strelitzia Regina in Flower at, 261
Kingstown and Dalkey Railway—Starting of the Train, 15
Geo. IV. Obelisk, Railway Station, 16
Club-house, &c., 16
Knatchbull, Bart., M.P., The Right Hon. Sir Edward, Portrait of, 105
Knole Park Gateway, 356

"LA ESMERALDA," Scene from the New Ballet of, at her Majesty's Theatre, 173
Lafitte, the late M. Jacques, Portrait of, 372
Funeral Procession of, 372
Lance's Picture at the British Institution—Portrait of a Lady in Waiting of the Time of Louis XV., 168
Lanercost Priory, near Naworth, 340
Latouche, Esq., High Sheriff of Dublin, 24
Leopold, King of the Belgians, Portrait of his Majesty, 121
Lernea Spratta, one of a Shoal of Fish taken off Lyme Regis, 121
Light-house of Cast-iron for the West Indies, 309
Lithuanian Jews, Expulsion of the, 416
Liverpool Grand Steeple Chase, 152
Liverpool Mechanics' Institution Sculpture-gallery and Drawing-room, 135
Scenes at, &c., 136
London Merchants and Persian Trader (Sculpture), 104
Londonderry—stakeboats, 14
"Lottery," The celebrated Steeple-chase Winner, 241
Louis Philippe, presentation of the Cross Dignitaires to his Majesty, on the 1st of January, 1
Lover, Esq., Samuel, Portrait of, 208
"Loving Cup," Presentation of the, at the Mansion-house, 304
Lucrezia Borgia, Scene from the Opera of, at the Princess's Theatre, 29
Lumley, Mr., of Her Majesty's Theatre, Portrait of, 237
Lyme Regis, Fire at, 317
Lyndhurst, Lord Chancellor, 105

MABEL MARCHMONT, Illustrations to, 9, 25
Maclaris, Point of the Cross at, 263
"Maid of Judah," The, Mr. and Mrs. Wood in the Opera of, 61
Malahide Castle, 309; Great Dining Hall in, 309
Manchester and Leeds Railway Iron Bridge, 309
Manchester, Theatre Royal, Burning of the, 301
Manners, M.P., Lord John, Portrait of, 208
Marriage of Reason," Scene from, at the Haymarket Theatre, 157
Mary, Queen of Scots, escaping from the Castle of Lochleven, 300
Masle, Mr., Justice, 249
Maynooth College, 172
Melvill, The Rev. H., Portrait of, 48
Merchant's Daughter, The, Illustrations to, 157, 173, 189, 190
"Merry Wives of Windsor," The, Scene from, 61
Meteuile, Statue of the late Sir Charles, by Baily, R.A., 208
Metropolis Churches, 48, 108, 165, 276, 300
Military Academy at Woolwich, (The Royal), 413
Milsom Church, 316
Milton, near Gravesend, New Church, 332
Molière, Monument to, at Paris, 45
"Monarch," East Indiaman, Launch of the, 392
Moon, Eclipse of the, 376
Morocco; View of Tetuan, 380
Morpeth, Lord Viscount; Splendid Casket, or Wine Cooler, presented to, 68
Murphy, M.P., Mr. Sergeant, Portrait of, 117
"Mystery," Yacht, The, 320

NAMUR MORTAR, The, 196
Napier, Mr. Joseph (Irish Bar), 24
Nawortli Castle:
Destruction of, by Fire, 340,
Interior during the Conflagration, 340
Neglected Record, A Leaf of a, 220
Newcastle Races Plate, 403
Newcastle-upon-Tyne—Barge Day on the Tyne, 341
Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Free Grammar School at, 336
Newfoundland, St. John's, 200
Newmarket, The Betting Room at, 292
New Zealand Chiefs: Kauparaha and Kangihaenta, 412
New Zealanders:
Dinner, 188
War Dance, 188
Rose, a New Zealander, 188
Normanby, The most Hon. the Marquis of, Portrait of, 100
Northamptonshire Stakes, The Great, 201
Hurdle Race, 201
Northamptonshire Grand Military Steeple Chase:
The George previous to the Race, 216
Weighing on the Ground, 216
The Soldier in the Brook, 216
The Start, 216
Dead Beat, 216
Taking the Brook, 217
Nottingham Mechanics' Institute, 149

OASTLER, M.P., Portrait of, 156
O'Brien, M.P., Portrait of W. S., 424
O'Connell, Daniel, and his Sons, John and Daniel, Portraits of, 41
O'Connell, Mr. Daniel:
Entrance of, into St. Mary's Hall, Coventry, 181
Investiture of, with the Holy Order of St. Joseph and Mary, Virginia-street, Ratcliffe Highway, 181
O'Connell, Mr., Grand Banquet to, in Covent Garden Theatre, 161
O'Connell's Cap, 101
Old London, Picture Model of, at the Surrey Zoological Gardens, 345
Osborne House, Isle of Wight; the intended Residence of Her Majesty, 168
Owls, Snowy, at the Surrey Zoological Gardens, 116
Oxford, The late Fire at, 137
Oxford Commemoration, 396, 397
Oxford-street, The Fire in, 332

PALM-SUNDAY in Spitalfields, 213
Papaita, Bay of (Society Islands), 113
Parsonage, near Nottingham, 253
Parliament, Opening of, 72, 73:
Parry, Mr. John, Portrait of, 389
Pas de Tambourines and Carving-knife," The, Mr. and Mrs. Keeley in, at the Lyceum Theatre, 345
Paul and Virginia, print engraved from Schopin, 25
Paul and Virginia, ditto, 260
Pearl Earrings, Derby, 117
Peel, Bart., M.P., The Right Hon. Sir Robert, Portrait of, 105
Pegasus, The King (Apendoytes Patachonica), 120
"Phantom" Yacht, The, 320
Phœnix Park, Dublin, Grand Review in, 415
Pico Wine Boat (Azores), 133
Pierce Hill—Meeting of Pilmen on, 276
Pilman, A, 276
Plymouth Breakwater, New Lighthouse on, 33
Polka, The, 389
The Bohemian, 184
The Parisian, 184
By J. Offenbach, 184
The Drawing-room, 301
Pomare, Queen, of the Society Islands, Portrait of, 113
Post-office, The General, 40, 401, 409, 410.
Power-Loom Factory, Interior of a, 314
"Premier," Wreck of the Transport, 53
After the Wreck, 53
Prince of Wales, His Royal Highness the, Chair presented to, 149
Prince of Wales's Library, No. I. The Printer. Illustrations to, 122
"Princess Alice," The Government Steamer, 209
"Princess," The, Winner of the Oaks, 356
Princeton, American Steam-frigate, 333
Privy Gardens, Unwelcome Visitor in, 269
Prussia, His Majesty the King of, 145
Putney-bridge and the Thames Regatta, 412
Pytchley Hunt Ball, The, 300

QUEEN, The, Her Most Gracious Majesty Victoria the First—
Her Majesty and her Cabinet Ministers, 105
Her Majesty's Visit to the Royal Academy, 305
Chinese Presents to her Majesty—
Great Bell in the Library of Buckingham Palace; top of the Bell; Figures on the Bell; Chinese Vases, 36
Colossal Statue of her Majesty, at the Royal Institution, Edinburgh, 97
Her Majesty's Drawing-room, 204
The Guard-room, St. James's Palace, 401
Queen Anne's Room, ditto, 204
Her Majesty at the Italian Opera, with her Royal Guests, 389

RAINFORTH, Miss, as "Arline," in the opera of the "Bohemian Girl," 45
Raleigh's House, Sir Walter, at Youghal, 292
"Rainbow," Portrait of; the property of Mr. Crockford, 321
Reading, The New Gaol at, 108
Registration of Arms in Ireland, Machine for, 172
Religious Tract Society, Paternoster-row, New Depôt of the, 117
Retribution, by the Baroness De Calabrella, Illustrations to, 205, 221, 237, 238.
"Richard the Third," Scene from, at Drury-lane Theatre, 109
Richardson, Mr. Joseph (the Flute Player), 29
Richmond Penitentiary, Dublin (See Ireland).
"Rienzi in the Forum," from Elmore's Picture, 373
Rimini, Francesca da, 89
Ripon, the Earl of, Portrait of, 105
Rodwell, the Earl of, Portrait of, 117
Rotherham Temperance Institute, 13
Rotunda, Dublin, Sketch from front of Frederick, 21
Royal Academy—
Her Majesty's Visit to the, 305
Prince Albert's Visit to, 305
Royal Academy Exhibition—
Scene from "Comus," from Etty's Picture, 373
"Rienzi in the Forum," from Elmore's Picture, 373
Royal Exchange, The New, 309
Tower of, &c., 29
Sculpture for the Pediment of—British Factor and Merchant Seaman; Lord Mayor, Alderman, and Common Councilman; Chinese, African, and Levantine Traders; London Merchants and Persian Trader, 104
Royal Gardens, 121
Running Rein, the Winner of the Derby, Portrait of, 336
Russell, M.P., the Right Hon. Lord John, Portrait of, 101
Russia, His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of, 261
Fête to, at Chiswick House, by the Duke of Devonshire, 384, 385
Departure of his Imperial Majesty from Woolwich, 377

ST. BARTHOLOMEW-THE-LESS, Bethnal-green, New Church of, 304
St. George's Chapel, Windsor, Stall and Banner of the King of Saxony in, 60
St. George's Church, Bloomsbury, 276
St. Giles's Church, Cripplegate, 165
St. James's Bazaar, Exhibition of Decorative Works, 305
St. James the Less, Bethnal Green, New Church, 364
St. James's Palace, The Tapestry Chamber, 296
St. Joseph and Mary, Investiture of Mr. O'Connell with the Order of—Cast of the Brotherhood of, 181
St. Mary's, Watering with Paddle Boxes at, 263
St. Pancras Church, 108
St. Patrick's Day—Irish Harp; Badges and Knight of St. Patrick; Schools of Benevolent Society of St. Patrick; Monument of Children to the Freemasons' Tavern, 169
St. Thomas's, West Indies, from Wright's Wharf, 316
"Salasin," The Barque, 420
Salmon Leap, near Coleraine, Ireland, 376
Salvi, Mr., Portrait of, 289
Sanders (Will Forgeries) 249
Sandwich Islands, Kamehameha, King of the, in Council, 20
Sandwich Islands, Eruption of the Mouna Roa, 33
Saracen's Head Inn, Friday-street, Chesapeake, 73
Sauzet, Portrait of M., President of the French Chamber of Deputies, 4
Saxony, His Majesty the King of, Portrait of, 364
Sea Lion (Otaria Jubata) 120
Seals of various kinds, 120
"Severn" Steamer, Wreck of the, at Newport Bridge, 301
Shaftesbury, The Earl of, 197
Shaw, The Right Hon. Frederick, Recorder of Dublin, Portrait of, 40
Shaw, Mrs. A., in the "Brides of Venice," 277
Sheath-bill, The Blackbilled (Chionis Minor), 132
Sheil, M.P., The Right Hon. Richard Lalor, Counsel for Mr. John O'Connell, 69
Signal Fires in Ireland, 40
Silver Cup presented to Captain Muys of the Charlotte smack, 149
Skerry vore Lighthouse, 59, 60
Sloth, The, in the Zoological Gardens, Regent's Park, 321
Smith, Mr. Albert, Portrait of, 389
Smith, The Right Hon. T. B. C. (Attorney-General for Ireland), 24
Smith, The Right Hon. T. B. C., Attorney-General for Ireland, listening to O'Connell's Defence, 88
"Smoke," Illustrations from, by Alfred Crowquill, 140, 141
Smythe, M.P., Portrait of the Hon., 293
"Snow Balling." Drawn by Kenny Meadows, 93
Society Islands—Bay of Papaita, 116
Portrait of Queen Pomare, 116
Soult, Marshal, 313
South Eastern Railway—Great Joint Station of the Croydon, Brighton, and Dover Railway Company, Southwark, 76
Section of the Viaduct, 76
The Grosvenor Viaduct, 76
South Eastern Railway—New Brick-layers' Arms Terminus, 285
Timber Viaduct from Cooper's Bridge, 285
Frame-work of the Viaduct, 285
South Lancashire Election; Hustings at Newton-in-the-Willows, 360
South Western Railway—Electric Printing Telegraph, &c., &c., 284
Spain, Queen Christina's Progress in, 165
Spanish Villagers Retreating, 132
Stamped Postage Paper, 172
Stanley, M.P., Lord, Portrait of, 105
Stern-wheel Steamers, Holborn, 189
Stock Exchange, The, 225
Stockholm, The Admiralty and Harbour, 313
The Royal Palace, 273
Strelitzia Regina, The, in flower at Kew Gardens, 232
Strutt, Esq., Portrait of the late Joseph, 68
Sudeley Castle, 180
Surrey Zoological Gardens, Picture Model of Old London at the, 345
Swan, Knights of the Ancient Order of the, 152
Sweden, The late King of, 177
Sweden and Norway, Their Majesties the King and Queen of, 272
Swiney, Portrait of the late Dr., 67

"TAMING the SHREW," Scene from, at the Haymarket Theatre, 189
"Tam O'Shanter," Scene from Pantomime of, at Astley's, 13
Ten Kettle, Tale of a, 140
Tetuan, Moorish Tomb at, 264
Texas, Church of Alamo, San Antonio de Bexar, 380
Texas, General Houston, President of 380
Thames Regatta and Putney Bridge, 412
Thames Royal Yacht Club, Challenge Cup, 393
Thames Yacht Club, the Royal Sailing Match, 340
Thatted Church Spire, 325
Thiers, M., 93
Thillon, Madame Anna, Portrait of, 324
Thirlwall, Master, (the Violinist) 29
Thorp Cloud; or, the Monastery of Dore Dale, 149
Thorwaldsen, the, Sculptor, Portrait of, 236
"Tom Thumb," The American Dwarf, "General," 124
Trafalgar-square, Chantrey's Statue of George the Fourth in, 128
Tribus, the New Patent Cabriolet, The, 141
Trout Fishing, The Otter for, 276
"Tudor," East Indiaman, Launch of the, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 392
Tunis, The City of, 180

"UGLYBUCK," The, Winning a Race at Newmarket, 289
United Service Institution, The Armoury of the, 149
Usedom, Count Sauss from, at the Haymarket Theatre, 125

VERA CRUZ, 17
"Victoria Land," in the South Polar Regions, Discovered by Captain Sir J. Ross, 380
Vivandiere, La, Madlle. Cerito as, 356

WALTON'S IZAAK, House at Stafford, 157
Washington, the Capitol, 316
Waterloo Bridge, (No. 10) Wreck the, off Hastings, 288
"Waterwitch, The," Launch of, 393
Welch Church, Ely-place, Holborn, 12
"Wellesley" East Indiaman, Launch of the, at Blackwall, 329
Wellington, the Most Noble his Grace the Duke of, K.G., &c. &c., Portrait of, 105
Wellington Statue in the City, The, 404
Western-super-Mare, Knightstone Baths at, 269
Wharncliffe, the Right Hon. Lord, Portrait of, 105
Whisky Still in Connemara, 141
Whitehall; Whitehall Plating, 312
Winkley, the Late Mr., Portrait of, 317
Wilkie, Mr. Joseph's Statue of the late Sir David, 40
Wilkins, Counsel for Barber, 228
Will Forgeries Case—Examination at the Mansion House, 30
Wills Forgery Trials, 340—Portraits of the Counsel, 228
Williams, Mr. Justice, 249
Wilton, the Earl of, Lodge of, Fall of, 217
Windsor Great Park, Grand Review in, 381
The Illustrious Visitors and Staff, 381
Windsor, Review at, 365
The Illustrious Visitors and Staff at, 365
Windsor Steeple Chase, Sketches from, 244, 245
Wood, M.P., Colonel, (Bracon), 197
Wood, Mr. and Mrs., in the Opera of "The Maid of Judah," 61
Wood Engraving; Its History and Practice, Illustrations from, 251, 252, 253, 254, 257 259, 273, 293, 309, 325, 356, 405, 417.

XANTHUS EXPEDITION—Water Tomb at Telmessus, 264

"ZAMPA," Scene from, at Her Majesty's Theatre, 308
Zeland, The Earl of, 333,

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 88.—Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 1844. [Sixpence.

REPRINT. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, GRATIS.

PROSPECTS OF THE SESSION.

ON the advent of fresh legislation, and the approach of another session of Parliament, the public naturally fix an eye of curiosity upon what is likely to transpire for the improvement of affairs, and ask themselves what are the intentions, and what will be the acts of Government after the coming assemblage of the representatives of the people. And really this inquisitiveness is most justifiable, and the questions every way proper to be discussed. We do not wonder, therefore, that the whole subject should have been, for the last day or two, considerably canvassed—that men's hopes from the future administration of Sir Robert Peel's Government have been measured, in no small degree, by their experience of the past; and that the result should be a feeling—in spite of a disposition to confidence—less sanguine than apprehensive.

From the unmeasured tone adopted by some of the journals most favourable to his accession to office, his performance, or want of performance in it, has disappointed stanch friends, and whetted the opposition of equally stanch enemies; and it is certain that high and glowing and confidential expectation does not fix upon him as it used.

For ourselves who look calmly on, untinged by colouring excitements—uninfluenced by the slightest feeling of party—with no hope at heart but for the common good, and no thought of political ambitions or happiness but in the general welfare—we can much applaud and much condemn the past conduct of the Government—we can find much to deprecate and much to approve.

We will frankly declare, however, that neither for vivid action, for boldness, for decision, nor for enterprise (qualities which were supposed to be inherent in the Premier, from his tone and course in opposition, but which have since been "sicklied o'er with the pale cast" of doubt and inactivity, if they really dwell within him) can we praise the Minister or the Government which he directs. He was, certainly, in the last session, opposed with much virulence, and more vexation; but he had about and around him a strength which he did not use, and the result was a waste of public time and treasure, which the exigencies of the country proclaimed to be sad, if not sinful—grievous, if not guilty indeed.

We are still—with a friendliness of spirit which makes us lean towards the Government—less for what it deserves than for what we believe it capable of deserving—avoiding actual reproach, and partaking a toleration which we think the crisis of the times eminently requires from public men—we are still disposed to withhold rebuke, and to urge the avoidance, for the future, of the errors which have been a drawback upon the past.

Parliament will hardly assemble again in the same spirit with which it congregated for the laboured frivolity of the last session; and legislators, newly instructed by their constituents, perhaps rebuked, and certainly reminded of their abandoned pledges, will evince a disposition for action, and, we hope, indicate to the Ministry that a practical activity of Government must proceed. We hope that such a manifestation would be met with a decided—"Yes! ready, march—away to the adoption of sound and safe and vigorous measures—alike without flinching, without halting and without doubt." This is what we hope from Sir Robert Peel. Our confidence in obtaining it is, we have declared, weakened by the past; but we are not despairing, and earnestly and energetically do we press the principle of a bold industry upon those whom we would fain see earnest and energetic too.

We are alive, in the outset, to the great difficulty which Ireland presents—how much it monopolises of the whole legislative attention of the country; session after session, eating away the very heart of debate—how it is stirred in its disturbful spirit, and has the elements of fire in all its veins—how the trials of its agitators are looked to with intense interest, and may, with uncertain action, influence all the destinies of the country, for good or for ill; but, with this knowledge, we are far from combining the admission that before this difficulty (half compounded, as it is, of grievance, and half of crime) the wants and progress of legislation for the whole English people should be absorbed and unprovided for, or the means of promoting our own social, commercial, and domestic welfare impeded and thrown aside.

How much is wanted at home, which, if once granted by the Minister, would carry England, to a man, with him, in any plan for pacificating the wild spirit, or redressing the real grievances, of the Sister Isle. What sacrifice would we not readily make for prompt, decided, and kindly domestic legislation!

Why not strike nobly at the roots of evils which are alarming the sensibilities—or weaning the affections—or depraving the hearts of the community. We are an honest people, and will support you in debt, difficulty, and disaster, if you do not attack our household love. You prove us one way with an income-tax —why, with endurance and generosity so completely tested—why not win us with a boon? Why compel us again and again to reiterate that your New Poor-laws must be destroyed—that you must give, if you would either keep or thrive in your high calling, a large measure of Christian charity to our poor and destitute, unhappily grown to swarm? Why not believe that the whole English spirit revolts against your workhouse system—your starvation diet—your crushing of honourable exertion by denial of out-door relief—your brutal separation of man and wife, brother and sister, mother and child—your misapplication of the principles and purpose of true benevolence and a wholesome national alleviation of a distress, which, if properly alleviated, would be national no more? Will you never see that if you will give us this one boon—a boon asked by our hearts and affections—you will gather around you a love that will be strong as death—that will uphold for you the strength of your Government, and the loyalty which pours its blessings upon your Sovereign's throne.

PRESENTATION OF THE CORPS DIPLOMATIQUE TO LOUIS PHILIPPE ON MONDAY LAST.—(See next page.)

Nor stop here—make your great and ennobling lessons of humanity be felt through every artery of the land. Go into your prisons with them, and subdue the soul of crime! Abolish the dreadful system of gaol-discipline, which is daily offending public morals, and strikes disgust upon the sense! Away with your silent and solitary punishments, which brutalize the nature of your criminals, and make your sinners mad! Lead them out of savagery, and up to God! Then do more. To repress the march of corrupting influences, and weaken the bane of ignorance, introduce an extended system of moral and religious education. You have the power to do it—do it without trembling or fear. Promote schemes, too, for the averting of destitution preserve the balance of power by neither sacrificing the commercialist nor the agriculturist to the cry of party; expunge cruelties of all kinds from your manufacturing and productive sources of wealth and strength; cement the bond of union between the poor and the rich; and, although all these measures may be carried with prompt industry, and would be filled by little space, you will find that they will do more for you with the country at large, and more for the country at large itself, than all your abstract discussions upon artificial policy, which the ingenuity of party originates, and the misfortune of the empire bewails. Take care of England, and England will aid you in taking better care of Ireland—either by the conquest of principle or the conciliation of wrong—than she has yet been taken care of by any Government for many a day.

This is the language we would address to Sir Robert Peel and his Ministry, when directing our anxieties to the prospects of the Session of 1844.

PRESENTATION OF THE DIPLOMATIC CORPS TO LOUIS PHILIPPE.

The most interesting ceremony observed on New Year's Day, in Paris, was the general reception at the Court of the Tuileries. Louis Philippe, then surrounded by his family, received the congratulations of the different official bodies. His Majesty appeared in good health. The Queen was greatly affected. This most excellent lady, on all public occasions, deplores the loss of her dearly-beloved son. The engraving conveys a faithful picture of the impressive scene.

The Moniteur publishes the addresses presented to the King on the occasion, with the replies of his Majesty. The members of the corps diplomatique were the first admitted to the honour of presenting their homage to the King, and it was the Pope's Nuncio, who, according to ancient usage, conveyed them in the name of his colleagues.

"Peace," he said, "for the maintenance of which your Majesty, in conjunction with all the Sovereigns, has constantly and incessantly made the most generous efforts, is every day more prodigal of its blessings. Religion and public morality, those only sources of the welfare of nations insure the repose and prosperity of France and Europe. Those blessings, Sire, are the sweetest recompense your Majesty can desire. Their duration and their very progress are assured by the high wisdom of your Majesty, and of all the Sovereigns, by the perfect harmony subsisting between their Cabinets and the interest of their people. May Heaven deign to continue its assistance to your Majesty!"

The King replied, "I am happy to hear from the members of the corps diplomatique the renewal, in the names of their Sovereigns, of the expression of sentiments such as those which you have just manifested. It is gratifying to me to see that accord of all the Cabinets for the maintenance of peace consolidating itself more and more. Each year brings us additional guarantees of confidence in futurity, and imposes upon us new thanksgiving to Divine Providence for the blessings we enjoy."

Baron Pasquier, the Chancellor, next offered to the King the felicitations of the Chamber of Peers, and took occasion to refer to "the recent memorable instance in which sentiments and hearts so highly manifested themselves," as a presage of future felicity for the dynasty and country. The King replied, "Nothing could be more gratifying to me than to hear you place among the favourable presages left to us by the year that has just expired, an interview which caused me a lively satisfaction, and of which the recollection will ever be dear to me." M. Sauzet, the President of the Chamber of Deputies, confined himself to congratulating the King and country on the continuance of peace and the progress of civilization, which he ascribed in a great measure to the wisdom of the King; and his Majesty, in his reply, said, that if he had succeeded in achieving the great object of which the President had drawn so brilliant a picture, it was because he had found in the Legislature that support which, at the same time that it consolidated the empire of the laws, had enabled him to overcome all obstacles. The Archbishop of Paris, in his discourse, also alluded to the visit of the Queen of England, "a powerful ally, who came to acknowledge the wise and persevering efforts of the King for the preservation of the tranquillity of Europe." The prelate ventured upon a faint reference to the existing quarrel between the clergy and the university, but his Majesty took no notice of it in his answer.

LONDON DOCK COMPANY.—The half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of this company was held on Tuesday at the Dock-office, New Bank-buildings, Mr. John Catley in the chair. From the financial statement it appeared that the revenue of the company for the last half year, including wharfage and other dues, amounted to £197,168 15s. 7d.; the expenditure £108,868 9s. 5d. A dividend of we per cent. was declared.

THE COLONIAL BANK.—A meeting of the proprietors of the Colonial Bank was held on Tuesday, and at which the directors had to make an unfavourable report. The embarrassed state of affairs in the West Indies having rendered the managers of the Bank extremely cautious in the business they have done, the profits have declined again, the amount for the half-year, ending the 30th of June last, being £10,412. The circulation of the Bank is given at £182,578, and the deposits and other liabilities are £620,617. The specie is returned at £272,054. The robbery of £11,000 committed at the Bridgetown branch is set down as a dead loss. The Directors estimate the loss upon cash credits and overdrawn current accounts at 15 per cent., or £30,000, on bills at about £115,000, making the total loss, less the reserved fund, £116,000. In consequence of this unforward state of things no dividend was declared. One proprietor moved for the dissolution of the Company, but the idea was not supported.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, JAN. 2.

SPAIN.

The letters I have received this morning from Madrid are dated the 25th; their contents are barren of any interest of importance. The capital was in a state of great agitation, and fears were entertained that the apparent tranquillity would not last for many days. The inhabitants and the military were continually quarrelling, and the recent infamous conduct of several officers, in destroying the presses of the Eco de Comercio, has created such disgust, that the military were hooted as they walked through the street.

The Eco de Comercio was greatly blamed for an article against Christina, the purport of which was to denounce the intended return of the Queen Mother. Now, it is a curious fact, that this paper advanced has turned out to be true to the very letter; for Christina has consented to return to Madrid, and will leave Paris the beginning of February. To enable her to hold a species of official appointment, she has been named tutress to her second daughter, the Princess Louise; this subterfuge will not deceive the people—every one is prepared to see Spain placed under the absolute control of Christina and Narvaez.

The intended return of Christina has been officially announced to the French Government, and the delegates, Messrs. Denoza Cortes and Ros de Alano, have returned to Spain.

The Ministers are far from feeling themselves secure, either in the Chambers or with the people; and to avoid answering many disagreeable questions, it is more than probable that they will close the session, or resort to a dissolution of the Cortes. M. Hoyos, the new ambassador to the court of Rome, was to leave Madrid on the 26th.

The last accounts from Catalonia are to the 26th. Baron de Meer arrived at Figueras on the 23rd. The next day he examined the lines, accompanied by General Prim, without being molested by the fort, but the firing re-commenced soon after they had retired. The Committee of Inhabitants, who visited the fort in the expectation of being able to induce Amelier to capitulate, returned greatly disappointed; Amelier would listen to no conditions whatever.

ITALY.

The following account of the eruption of Mount Etna, contained in a letter from Palermo, will be found interesting:—

"From the commencement of last month, the old crater continued to send forth hot ashes, smoke, sand, and lava.

"On the 24th of November a second crater opened near to Coriazzo, from which a fresh stream of lava flowed towards Cortieri. It continued to advance in the same direction up to the 1st day upon which this letter was written, marking its passage by a frightful accident, which occasioned a considerable loss of life. Not far from Cortieri the lava collected in a low spot, where a quantity of water was lying.

"As it continued to form a smoking mass, a number of spectators came from numerous points to look at the unusual spectacle; many workmen were employed in cutting down the trees around the spot; all at once, a loud explosion was heard, from the steam produced by the lava acting on the water, and the superincumbent mass was thrown around with great violence. Upwards of sixty persons were killed or severely burnt by the burning steam and pieces of red hot lava. The horses and mules which had conveyed the crowd there were much injured. The exact number of persons killed is not given.

"The lava from the old crater had turned aside from the direction of Bronte, which was considered out of danger. The lands of Basilani are covered over, and it is thought that the lava will flow as far as Gripido. The whole distance it has run over is about ten miles, it having gone across the public road in a stream more than sixty feet wide."

Several persons belonging to noble families continue to be arrested at Naples and Rome—all the prisons are crowded. Many English families of distinction had taken houses at Florence, where the carnival was expected to be very brilliant.

GERMANY.

A gentleman who lately left Berlin informs me that on the 10th of November was inaugurated, at Kowno, the colossal statue erected by the Emperor Nicholas, in commemoration of the remarkable events which occurred in 1812. On one side is engraved, "God is against the aggressor;" and on the other, "In 1812, 700,000 soldiers of the armies of Russia, and 90,000 only were saved." These passages are extracted from one of the despatches written about that period by Alexander.

Official information has been given by the Court of Vienna, that Austria intends having commercial agents in China under the protection of her flag. A small expedition is fitting out and will soon set sail.

FRANCE.

M. Sauzet has been re-elected President of the Chamber of Deputies. Many persons, ill informed, circulated the report that the majority was divided in opinion, and that many were opposed to M. Sauzet. This conjecture originated in the wish of many Conservatives to see M. Dupin fill the Speaker's chair. The subsequent election of the Chairman of Committees has, however, clearly shown that the Ministry is as strong this session as it was the last.

The Ministers seem determined to war against the Legitimists. Several of their journals have been seized, and the editors cited before the tribunals; amongst others—La France, Gazette de Languedoc, Quotidienne, and La Nation. It is said that those officers who visited England to pay their respects to the Duke de Bordeaux, are to be tried by a court-martial, for leaving France without the permission of the Minister of War.

Mr. George Jones, the author of "The History of Ancient America," was presented, on Saturday last, by Lord Cowley, to the King, the Queen, and the Duke de Nemours.

Prince Leopold, son of the King of Bavaria, travelling as Count de Schegeren, after passing a short time at Cadiz, left for Gibraltar and Malta. The Prince is to be married to the daughter of the Grand Duke of Tuscany.

There was a slight shock of an earthquake last week at Cherbourg, several houses were seriously damaged, but no lives lost.

The Semaphore has to say that Cannes, the seat of Lord Brougham, saying that the example of his lordship in settling in that country, has been followed by several Englishmen of distinction. At a short distance from Lord Brougham's, General Taylor has a splendid villa, at present occupied by a family of high distinction. Mr. Leader, the member for Westminster, has lately purchased a very fine estate, on which he purposes to build a splendid mansion. Lord Brougham and Mr. Leader have made the joint-purchase of an extensive pine fore-t, most abundantly stocked with game, and abounding with foxes.

It is a curious fact, that out of a population in France of 34,000,000, upwards of 20,000,000 wear wooden shoes.

The number of bankrupts declared in Paris during the year 1843, amount to 737; in 1842, there were 649.

The following curious statistic is extracted from an official report on the Bagnes for convicts, and dated January 1, 1843. The total number was 7309, being 401 more than at the same period in 1842. Their ages were—from 16 to 20, 219; 21 to 25, 2121; 31 to 40, 2304; 41 to 50, 1681; 51 to 60, 708; and from 61 to 72. There were 6478 unmarried men: 4331 could neither read nor write; and 2113 could only write and read but very indifferently. Their crimes were—assassination, 188; assassination and robbery, 68; bankruptcy, fraudulent, 14; bigamy, 5; cutting and maiming, 125; crimes of public functionaries, 25; political crimes, 5; rupture of ban, 10; poisoning, 67; extortion by violence, 18; forgery, 215; coining, 134; arson, 157; murder, 899; sending threatening letters, 3; parricide, 18; robbery by armed bands, 12; insubordination, 54; selling accoutrements, 3; rape, and attempts, 362; robbery, 4709; running away with a minor, 1; and other crimes, 31; amongst the convicts were—11 medical men, 7 druggists, 17 engravers and printers, 1 actor, 54 clerks and shopmen, 245 domestic servants, 1 literary man, 5 ecclesiastics, 4 lawyers, 39 schoolmasters and teachers, 134 musicians, 133 soldiers and subaltern military officers, 6 musical men, 12 merchants, 6 notaries, and 38 men of independent property. Out of the 7309 convicts, there were 392 foreigners, of whom 34 were English or Irish; 707 were Catholics; 7 Lutherans; 1 Calvinist, 33 Jews, 5 of the Church of England, 68 Mahometans, 1 Anabaptist, and 9 professing no religion whatever.

The misery amongst the lower classes in Paris is greater this winter than I ever remember it; many unfortunate beings literally die from starvation. A few days since, a young girl accosted a gentleman near the Carrousel. "Give me something, I pray you," imploringly demanded the poor creature, "for a police agent is watching me, and I shall be taken and put in confinement, where I shall get something to eat, for I have had nothing for the last twenty-four-hours." We have no poor-laws, and begging is a crime.

On the 27th ult. the Champagne wine-merchants met at the Hotel de Ville of Rheims, to adopt measures for preventing the imitation of champagne, which every year is increasing.

The Constitutionnel expresses its doubts of the death of Catalani. It says:—"The journal from which we obtained the account of the death of Madame Catalani, gives some details relative to her family and position. It is said that this lady expired at her residence near Sinigaglia (Roman States); that her husband, M. Valabrègue, died in 1828; and that she left a fortune of eight millions of ten millions of francs. These circumstances are not exact. Madame Catalani has never had any residence in the Roman States; her husband still lives, and all her remaining fortune amounts to only 20,000 francs a year. We hope that, as the correspondence has made so many mistakes, he is also mistaken as to her death."

There were printed in France during the year 1843, 6176 works of various descriptions, 316 works on music, 1879 engravings, of different kinds, and 147 maps.

Our musical season has commenced, but as yet we have nothing very saillante. The Grand Opera is very poor, particularly as regards a tenor, and unless M. Fillet, the director, is able to recruit one in Italy, we are likely to pass, as regards that theatre, a poor winter. "Don Sebastian" is played to empty benches, the receipts not averaging 5000 francs. Now the daily expences of this theatre is 11,000 francs, the subvention given by the Government reduces it to 6500 francs, so that "Don Sebastian," each time that it is performed, leaves a loss of 1500 francs. The Italian Opera is well attended: Grisi continues the great favourite; Mademoiselle Brambilla is daily rising in public estimation; indeed she is much applauded. Rubini's great powers remain unimpaired, without a doubt much whether many of the first operas could be produced. Lablache reached Paris on Saturday last; he appears this evening for the first time in "Don Pasquale."

Our first masked ball took place last night at the Opera Comique; it was badly attended.

All the foreign artistes visiting Paris have subscribed to the fund of the Association of Musical Artistes. Liszt gave 1000 francs, Meyerbeer 500 francs, and others in proportion to their means. On application being made to Rossini, when last in Paris, he replied, "I am an italian artiste, and have something of the same sort at Bologna," and he refused. Rossini can, however, be liberal on particular occasions. The following anecdote is related of him.—One day a poor Savoyard was grinding on his organ, on the Boulevard Montmartre, "Di tanti Palpiti." A gentleman passed by, and cried out "Faster." "I can't, sir," replied the boy. "I'll show you," said the gentleman, who, seizing on the handle of the organ, played for full five minutes, and then withdrew. Some time afterwards the same boy was playing the same tune in another part of Paris, when he was assailed with "Bravo, bravo, that's the time—continue;" at the same moment some money was thrown to him, wrapped in a piece of paper. It was a napoleon, and the generous donor was Rossini—the same who taught the Savoyard how to play "Di tauti Palpiti."

Prince Gabriel Poniatowski is expected in Paris this winter. He is a young man, about twenty-eight years of age, possessing great merit as a singer and composer. He generally inhabits Florence, and the principal theatres of that city have already applauded his works. The beginning of last month he brought out at the Theatre Argentina, at Rome, an opera, called "Bonifacio di Jeremei:" the success was most enthusiastic.

Signor Mario Tadolini, the tenor Guasco, and the basso Varèse, are engaged at Turin, for the Carnival, at which period will be brought out Coppola's opera, "Jeanne de Naples." Don Pasquale fait fureur à Naples. "Linda di Cammouix" has had great success at Seville. "I Capuleti ed i Montecchi," by Bellini, is in rehearsal at Madrid.

MONTE VIDEO.

By a mercantile arrival we have advices from Rio Janeiro of the 4th November, but these is little additional news. An explanation is, however, given of the contradictory accounts we have previously received respecting the instructions sent to the Brazilian Minister in the river Plate, on the blockade of Monte Video by the Buenos Ayrean squadron. The order sent was to respect the right of blockade claimed, as far as it applied to arms and munitions of war, but to allow no interruption of commercial intercourse in other commodities, inclusive of flour and all provisions. This will be fatal to the plans of Rosas; but as there is no doubt but the same principle will be adopted by the other maritime powers, he will have no choice but to submit.

SYDNEY.

We have advices from Sydney, to the 27th August, by a vessel arrived on Tuesday last. The Governor had delivered his first Message on the finances of the colony to the new Legislative Council on the 23rd August. His Excellency enters very minutely into the detail of every department for the year 1842, and contrasts the first two quarters of the present year with the corresponding quarters of the last. The total revenue of the colony for 1842 was £414,156, and the expenditure £339,030, leaving a surplus of £75,126. This is exclusive of the income and charge upon the land fund, the result of which shows a reverse picture, and not at all favourable to the practical working of the present arrangement. The charge upon the land fund last year was per survey on sale £21,128, and expenses of Aborigines £12 110, being a total of £46,943, whilst the produce of the sales was only £14,575, leaving a deficiency of £31,668. This contract demands the attention of Lord Stanley in the present principle upon which the land sales are conducted, a principle which we have more than once had occasion to observe, is loudly complained of in the whole of the colonies.

NEW ZEALAND.

We have received a file of New Zealand papers to the 25th of July inclusive, from which we make the following interesting extracts:—

(From the New Zealand Colonist.)

JULY 7.—On Tuesday evening, Mr. Spain returned to this town from the mission to Otaki. We understand that, on his arrival at Waikanae, he met with Rauparaha, who was endeavouring to persuade the natives of that place to make common cause with him against the settlers. The chief, however, continued firm to his first purpose, stating that he had always received from the settlers just treatment, and would not engage against them in a quarrel which noways concerned himself or his people. This friendly sentiment was confirmed by the statements of Mr. Spain, who took great pains to impress upon the whole body of natives that principle of English law, which forbids that the innocent should be punished with or for the guilty. On the Saturday, Mr. Spain proceeded to Otaki, where he met Watanui and the other chiefs of the Ngati Raukawa tribe. From them he received positive assurances that they would in no case be concerned in acts of aggression upon the settlers, but they unanimously stated their determination to protect Rauparaha at all hazards.

We have just heard a report of the death of Rangihaita, which we are informed occurred at Otaki on Monday last, in consequence of the wound in his foot. From the inquiries we have been able to make, we feel convinced of its truth. This event has considerably removed one obstacle to the settlement of one part of the country. Rangihaita might be considered as the type of the New Zealander before the race were brought under the civilising influences which have for some years past been at work among them—violent, reckless, and unrelenting. Happily, the present number of such men among the natives is small, and as they die off they leave no successors.

We have just heard a report that a man named Hanham, who was supposed to have been killed in the late melancholy affair at Wairau, has reached Nelson, but two are still missing, named Burton and Stokes.

JULY 21.—The Government brig arrived here yesterday morning, from Auckland, bringing Major Richmond, the chief police-magistrate; Colonel Godfrey, Commissioner of Land Claims, who is about to proceed to Akaroa; Mr. Edward Shortland; Captain Bennett, Civil Engineer; and 30 soldiers of the 96th. We have as yet heard but little of the intelligence brought.

The arrival of a body of soldiers will tend to restore confidence, and we believe that ample inquiries will be made into all the circumstances connected with the affair at Wairau.

We understand that Major Richmond will proceed, in the course of a day or two, in the brig to Cloudy Bay, and thence to Nelson, and return to this place as speedily as possible.

A fight had taken place among the aborigines between the Maitland tribe on the one side, and the Port Stephen and Paterson tribes on the other. Several were killed, and a great number wounded on both sides. The Maitland tribe had fire-arms.

IRELAND.

INAUGURATION OF THE NEW LORD MAYOR.—THE STATE PROSECUTIONS.

On Monday last the Lord Mayor for the current year (Timothy O'Brien, Esq.) was sworn into office with the usual formalities.

The arrangements of the corporation were directed to the splendid house in state, and, after some preliminary proceedings, the late Lord Mayor (G. Roe, Esq.) rose and addressed the assembly at some length. He commenced by saying, he felt it his duty to render an account of his stewardship for the past year; and, after adverting to some topics of local interest, he observed that he regretted much to find himself opposed to the majority of the house on a question which had been discussed by it; but while he could not concur in the opinion of the majority, still he felt that the discussion of the Repeal of the Union was a perfectly constitutional and justifiable one in that house. The manner in which that discussion was conducted, elicited the approbation of all those who were present, or had heard of it. There was no illtemper exhibited on either side, and the question was disposed of without producing in that house the slightest feeling of ill-will. The next topic to which he should advert might be considered to have grown out of that discussion—he meant the pending state trials. He looked upon them with the greatest anxiety; and after considering the subject in all its bearings, he had come to the conclusion that it would be for the benefit of the country—nay, of the United Kingdom at large—that those trials should take place in this city. (Cries of "Hear, hear.") He felt that they would produce excitement and agitation, and lead to all the evils consequent upon such a state. (Hear, hear.) Surely, in the midst of such agitation as these trials would lead to, the country could not make that progress in the paths of commerce or agriculture. He would frankly tell the assembly that, after being in communication with men of all parties since the prosecutions had commenced, he firmly believed it to be the general desire that the agitation of the country should be preceded by the abandonment of those trials. (Hear.) He felt extreme delicacy in saying anything that might be considered trenching upon the administration of the law, which he felt to be sacred ground; but he considered that an expression of public feeling, under all the circumstances, would be calculated to serve the country. He would, therefore, urge such an expression of public feeling, praying her Majesty to take the question of the state of Ireland into consideration, to appoint a committee, if necessary, of the whole House of Commons, to ascertain the causes of discontent which unhappily prevailed. (Hear, hear.) As a mercantile man, he felt that the agitation and excitement that would be produced by the state prosecutions would retard the influx of capital and all improvement for a considerable time. Suppose that complete success should attend these prosecutions—would it be calculated to allay the irritation and discontent of the country? (Cries of "No, no.") Suppose, again, these trials should end in disagreement, would that restore peace? (No, no.) If, on the other hand, as was apprehended, it would be a drawn battle, would that tend to any possible good—would it allay the angry feelings which had been excited? No man could say that the prosecutions would be should these prosecutions be pressed on. (Hear, hear.) His lordship concluded by expressing a hope that the majority of that house would petition her Majesty to grant an amnesty for the past, and take steps to remedy the grievances of Ireland. (Loud cheers.)

Alderman Boyse (Conservative) asked his lordship whether the address he had delivered was to be taken simply as his own sentiments?

The Lord Mayor replied in the affirmative.

Alderman Boyse again rose, and proposed a most complimentary vote of thanks to the Lord Mayor, for the admirable and impartial discharge of his duties.

Alderman Sir John Power, Bart., said he felt the highest gratification is secor ding the motion, which passed unanimously, amidst the warmest plaudits.

The Lord Mayor then retired.

The Lord Mayor elect, Timothy O'Brien, Esq., was then sworn in with the usua. formalities, and took his seat as Lord Mayor.

Soon after the council adjourned.

The processions to the Guildhall accompanied the new Lord Mayor consisted of a great number of private carriages, headed by a military band.

THE STATE TRIALS.—STRIKING THE JURY.

On Tuesday a good deal of interest was manifested by the publication of the summons for the striking of the special jury, which was fixed for twelve o'clock, in the office of the Clerk of the Crown, but after considerable altercation between the parties on either side about the delivery of the lists to the traversers, the business was postponed.

On Thursday the striking of the jury to try Mr. O'Connell and the other traversers, took place in the Queen's Bench Office, before Mr. Bourne; and Messrs. Brewster, Q.C., and Smiley attended on the part of the Crown. Several of the traversers, and their counsel and agents, were present. The press were excluded, except one reporter on each side, but the following summary of what took place is correct

Mr. Whiteside, Q.C., applied to have the drawing of the names postponed, because he was prepared to show that 65 names of persons marked by the Recorder as eligible to serve as special jurors were omitted from the list handed to the traversers by the Sheriff.

Mr. Dickenson, the Sub Sheriff, stated, that he and the High Sheriff copied the names and description of every individual appearing in the list handed to them by the Revision Court, and not a single dot to an i had been omitted.

Mr. Whiteside said, he did not doubt the high character of the Sheriff, or his deputy, but he insisted that, by some fatality, or by design in a hidden quarter, 65 names were omitted.

Mr. Brewster stated, that he supposed the public officers had done nothing but what was their duty, and the Clerk of the Crown had nothing to do with the matter which had been attested, but not proved.

Mr. Bourne remarked, that he should proceed with the names as handed to him by the Sheriff.

Mr. Ford said, that he, as attorney for Mr. O'Connell, entered his protest against the proceeding to strike the jury now, and he would withdraw from the inquiry.

The 717 jurors composing the panel being indicated by numbers or cards were counted, and put into the ballot-box.

The drawing of the names was then proceeded with, and after several objections which were made by the traversers, on the ground of non-residence, the following were drawn out. Two appear on the list who are Liberals, expressly disqualified as members of the Town Council, but the Town Clerk had not the proper evidence in the case of one of them. Those marked with an * were objected to by the traversers :—

John Bohan, 4, Upper Bridge-street, merchant.
* George W. Boileau, 87, Bridge-street, druggist.
* James Hamilton, 14, Upper Ormond-quay, wine merchant
Laurence Gorman, 57, Kevin's Port, grocer.
* John Boileau, 58, Stephen's-green, East, linendraper.
James P. Smith, Old Kilmainham, law-student.
* James C. Papworth, Marlborough-street, architect.
* Captain Edward Roper, 15, Eccles-street.
* Stephen Parker, St. Andrew-street, pawnbroker.
* William Ring, 47, George-street, brazier.
James G. St. George, Albany-street, wine-merchant.
* Edward Clarke, Esq., 128, Stephen's-green, Castle, jeweller.
* Benjamin Eaton, 8, Princes-street, bonder.
* John Thwaites, Sackville-street, soda water manufacturer.
* James Hamilton, Chamber-street, ironmonger.
* John Irwin, Esq., 2, Fitzgibbon-street, D D
* Francis Faulkner, 78, Grafton-street, grocer.
* John Croker, 36, N. George-street, merchant.
James Fallon, Stoney Batter
* Robinson Carolin, 22, D Oiler-street, builder.
* John Fry, 30, Dame-street, coach-trimming manufacturer.
* Wm. Hardwick, 24, Grenville-street, merchant.
John Fitzpatrick, 23, Dame-street, grocer.
* Henry Flynn, pianoforte-maker.
* Henry Thompson, wine-merchant
Michael Deane, brazier
* Anson Kyd, china warehouseman.
* Nicholas M. Macdonald, wine-merchant.
John Duncan, wine-cooper.
* John Rigby, gun maker.
* Robert Hanna, wine-merchant.
* John Wolves, merchant.
* George Whitaker, Esq.
* Robert Chambers, merchant.
* William Longfield, Esq.
* William Ord, tanner.
* Robert S. Stubbs, linen-draper.
Joshua W. M'Cormick, Esq., merchant.
* William Suit, upholsterer
* John White, seedsman.
* Wilmore Woodruffe, Esquire, merchant.
* George Mitchell, tobacconist.
* James Walker, engraver.
* John Carolin, builder.
* George Fowler, merchant.
John M'Goni, grocer
Timothy Green, publican.

Yesterday the list was reduced to 24.

[Next week we shall have the pleasure of fulfilling our engagement with our thousands of Irish friends and subscribers, by presenting them with the first portrait of the "Dublin Sketches," including the portraits of all the counsel for the Crown in the forthcoming State Trials, with portraits of his Excellency Earl de Grey, the Lord Lieutenant, and Lord Eliot, the Chief Secretary, with biographical memoirs taken expressly for the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, by the affable kindness of those distinguished noblemen.]

A deputation, consisting of the Right Hon. George Rose, Lord Mayor; the Duke of Leinster, the High Sheriff, Sir Edward Borough, James Hans Hamilton, Esq., M.P.; George Alexander Hamilton, Esq., M.P.; Edward Grogan, Esq., M.P.; Simon Boileau, Thomas Hutton, and John M'Mullen, Esq., waited on his excellency, the Lord Lieutenant, on Saturday, the 30th ult., to convey to him the resolutions passed at the Mansion-house, on the 23rd ult., relative to giving increased facility to the communication between Dublin and London The deputation was most favourably received, and the Lord Lieutenant expressed in the handsomest manner his earnest anxiety to do all in his power to forward the objects for which the meeting in question was held.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The Repeal Association met at one o'clock on Monday, Dr. Murphy in the chair. Mr. John O'Connell adverted to the speech delivered by the Lord Mayor on his retiring from office; and, on the part of the traversers, disclaimed all anxiety for the interposition of the Corporation, or any other body of men, with the Queen, in favour of the gentlemen against whom the state prosecutions had been commenced. The people's leaders had committed no crime; and much as they revered and respected her Majesty, they could therefore, suppliate her pardon. Mr. Steele fully concurred in the sentiments of his friend, Mr. John O'Connell. Mr. John O'Connell read two letters from his father (Mr. O'Connell), expressing his gratification at the recent adhesion to the repeal cause of Mr. Smith O'Brien, Mr. O'Neil, of Shanes Castle, and other gentlemen; and enclosing his subscription to the repeal rent and those of twenty-five grand children. At four o'clock the repeal rent for the week was announced to be £289 2s. 2d.

THE ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY.—For several weeks the opening of the Atmospheric line from Kingstown to Dalkey has been interdicted by the Lords of the Treasury, owing to the remonstrances of parties owning property on the line. Mr. Walker, the eminent English engineer, has arrived in Dublin, having received instructions from the Government to hold an inquiry on the subject.

The late Mr. Maher, M.P., a short time previous to his death, added to his will a codicil not signed, leaving to Mr. N. Maher landed property to the amount of £5000 a year, and his stock, valued at £7000; to Major Sidwell, £2000; and to various charities, £1000.

It is certain that Austria intends to have commercial agents in China, under the protection of her flag. A small expedition is already fitting out, for, notwithstanding the unfavourable news brought by the last India mail, the Austrian merchants and shipowners have not lost courage.

A plot has been discovered at Galatz, the object of which was to overturn the present order of things in the Danubian provinces and in Bosnia. A great number of persons have been arrested.

SIR EDWARD LEITH MURRO'S EFFORTS.—Contrary to general expectation, the above sale was allowed to proceed on Wednesday morning without interruption. Mr. Wakley probably thought discretion the better part of valour, after the correspondence which has passed between his solicitor and the gentlemen consulted by the friends of Lieutenant Munro. Be this as it may, the sale commenced and was carried through without his appearance. The company was not numerous, and consisted chiefly of brokers and that class of persons usually attending sales of this description. Three or four military officers and some few ladies were present.

THE INAUGURAL ADDRESS OF THE TRINITY COLLEGE (DUBLIN) HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

RECENTLY DELIVERED AT ITS RESTORATION, BY MR. MAGEE, B.A., OF THAT UNIVERSITY.

(From the Sketch Book of the Irish Barrister.)

(Concluded.)

The speaker began to argue in very forcible terms against the introduction of politics into the debates of the Society, which, he said, would anticipate on the very threshold of life the heart-burnings and strivings and jealousies that beset its path. Nothing however could be imagined more ridiculous than getting together to play at statesmen, to retail crude notions caught up at second hand, and to support them by arguments which the hearer would find more clearly stated in yesterday's newspaper—and to enact a sort of contracted Parliamentary squabble, in which nothing is real, save the anger and virulence which, though barely excusable in the original, became worse than ridiculous in the copy. It was said, however, that the excitement of politics was necessary to rouse the speaker. Better that such should never enter there. But he contended it was not necessary. On political subjects it might be so, but there were many others on which it was not. Of all subjects like politics, where excitement was the chief means of success, the orator selected for himself the easiest and lowest branch of the science of persuasion. He, on the contrary, who depended for success, not on the nature of his theme, but on his own powers, and could threw the charm of eloquence even on indifferent or disagreeable subjects, commanded the attention and won the suffrages of his hearers Under other circumstances, he, with such powers, availed himself, when necessary, of their passions it favourable, or bent them to his purpose if adverse.

History will confirm what reason asserts, that men who have exercised the most powerful and lasting influence on the age they lived in, have been men trained in the retirement of a convent or the meditative silence of the cloister. She will tell you that it was the voice of a hermit that roused Europe to arms, and sent forth her millions to whiten with their bones the sands of the desert—that it was the voice of the peaceful monk of Erfurth that echoed through the lordly halls of the Vatican and shook them to their centres—that it was the element that mighty empire which it had been the work of centuries to raise—or to sap its great popular orders, the men who wielded of old the fierce democracy of Greece or Rome. She would point to them pondering over their silent studies for this task. She would show you Demosthenes devoting himself to the study of Thucydides, or his great disciple, our own immortal Chatham, committing to memory the pages of Barrow—or in our own country the secret by which you our great orators, the men who made the Irish Bar or the Irish Church the admiration of the civilised world—can see them in the records of the Historical Society, not engaged in discussing the politics for the marguine on party topics of the day, but turning from those scenes of strife and excitement, engaged in the sober studies of history or discussing some unpretending question in morals or philosophy.

With these great examples before them, it behoved them to acquire habits of clear thinking and accurate reasoning, to glean from history a knowledge of human nature, to gain a habit of exercising a calm judgment on past events, the best pledge of your wisdom in dealing with those to come.

The last great advantage of the Historical Society was, that it favoured the very best introduction into public life, and stood as a link between the Academy and the world.

The great danger of a purely academic course of education is that those engaged in it are likely to forget that it is only a means to an end—to forget that their studies are not so much to be valued for themselves alone as for the habit of mind they form, that the information they gain here is not designed to be a cumbrous load of knowledge, but a well arranged store on which they may draw to supply the exigencies of each moment Thus the student which delights in the pleasures of science and literature are too apt to linger about them, and spend their time solely in acquiring knowledge of all kinds, without ever thinking how they may best use it; and the consequence of this is, that when they go out into public life, they find themselves quite in a new world in which all the learning that they have so painfully acquired is of little or no value. They are like fish swept from their shelves full of dusty learning, the subjects and objects of which Now this defect the Historical Society was peculiarly fitted to remedy. She taught the literary enthusiast that something more than mere erudition is necessary; that, if knowledge be power, it is knowledge skilfully directed, and brought to bear upon each passing event She takes up his education where the University had left it - she concentrates the mass of information which he has acquired —she bids him prove the weapons with which his studies have furnished him, and to use them with skill and effect, and thus she saves him the mortification of being outstripped by men who are far his inferiors in information or intellect, but who had acquired the art which he wanted of making the best use of the little they did possess.

The course of events has certainly been to give a much freer expression to the popular voice of late in those countries until lately governed by a privileged element in government. No man, however powe ful, could rule in defiance of the public voice; and nations must now be ruled by moral, not physical force. The art of war has been declined to consist in directing the largest possible mass of troops upon a given point; and the art of government seems barely to become the art of directing the largest possible mass of public opinion upon any one measure. It is not necessary for our purpose to inquire how far this great change is for the weal or ill for our country. All we have to deal with is the fact that there is evidence in society of a force which every day and hour is adding—that there has arisen among us a mighty spirit whose influence nothing is lowly enough to despise, nothing so powerful as to resist Should it not be our object to gain to the service of truth and virtue this resistless power? We should fondly meet this strange and mighty spirit and compel him to do our bidding. There is no more talismen which will enable us to command its services. Eloquence is the only spell to which he will yield obedience. It is by moving the heart alone that you can hope to sway the public mind—to rule the millions as one man—to win the affection of the multitude—to still their fierce passions, or else to yoke them like steeds of fire to your triumphal car.

It is not then a matter of deep importance that you, who must hereafter be as led to places of difficulty and trust, should acquire an art so essential to the discharge of your trust?—Is it not important that you should possess not merely the wisdom to choose the right path, but the power of leading others into it, that to the cause you may be called on to maintain you should be able to give the prestige of intellectual superiority, that you should not only love what is true but be able to make truth lovely?

This is what your country looks for at your hands; she looks to this university to furnish men who shall uphold her laws and guard her institutions. She looks to her training from the gates of this noble fortress of learning and piety a band not of raw and undisciplined recruits, but of steady and well trained veterans—men well skilled in the use of their weapons, and sure to use them with effect—champions who she l be able and willing to aid her in her hour of need This is, indeed, the strongest claim which I can make for the Historical Society.

* * * * * * *

I would bid you look forth upon the changing aspect of society to see the thousand influences at work there, heaving its surface, and stirring its very depths. I would bid you mark the gradual diffusion of knowledge, the mighty power of mind, to see at the same time the restlessness, the uncertainty, the impatience of all restraint—the love of novelty and change, that seems to pervade all ranks alike. And then to reflect that into this tempestuous ocean you are soon to enter, not as unrolled and obscure individuals, not as mere units in the great mass of society, but as leaders, as guides, as instructors.

* * * * * * *

Beware lest the momentous interests intrusted to you suffer from your carelessness or incapacity. Beware how you give men reason to think that the cause you so ingenuously defend is not worth preserving. Indeed, you dislike the mental labour these duties demand, or shrink from the responsibilities they entail—if you covet a life of inglorious ease, and safe obscurity—then if such is the course you propose to yourselves, adopt, I pray you, some mercenary trade; seek for it the industrious artisans, or thriving manufacturers; but do not intrude yourselves into the pulpit or the senate; do not attempt a task for which you are by nature unfitted; do not dare, in times of peril, to assume a trust which you have determined to betray.

* * * * * * *

You are about to enter a scene of conflict. The church of which you will soon be ministers is beset by many active and powerful foes; and you will be painfully reminded that the duty of a pastor is to guard, as well as feed, his flock to maintain truth against its inveterate foes, as well as to urge it on reluctant or lukewarm friends. In these days the men who take upon themselves the office of teachers should be men of lofty and glowing eloquence, as well as deep and fervid piety—men who may not only adorn the church by their virtues, but defend her by their talents. It will be your duty to guard the pure fount of religion against those who would seek to close it for ever; or those still more insidious foes who strive to poison it at its source: each new form of error you must detect and oppose—each fresh assault of vice or irreligion you must repel It is your task to commend the respect of the sceptics, philosopher—to gain the affection of the humble, and the illiterate, and to bring all alike to own the power and the beauty of religion. Remember that the church into which you are entering has ever been the safe asylum of eloquence. The mandate of a sullen tyrant may close the halls of justice, or awe a corrupt and trembling senate into silence and assent. But there is a spot where he does not intrude—there is a charmed circle within which his voice is powerless—on the altar of religion burns free and bright a flame he would vainly seek to quench. Unlike the lawyer or the senator, who require some theatre wherein to display their eloquence, the Christian orator, though every church should be razed to the ear h, will still have the same theme on which to dilate—the same audience to address for the solemn interests of eternity, and unaffected by the movements of sublunary things; and men will still listen to him who to is them of their immortal nature—their high and awful destiny From the day when the Roman in his pride and power trembled before the prisoner, whose life depended on his word, to this very hour, has the voice that reasons of righteousness been heard despite of the efforts of those who hate or fear it. The fierce blasts of persecution may sweep over the sacred harp, as it times upon the willow, but they will wake a sole an strain of unearthly melody, wh ch shall be heard through all the din and no hug of the tempest; and surely never was there a nobler field for the exercise of Christian eloquence than that now before you.

* * * * * * *

Remember, too, what solemn and momentous interests may be committed to your charge—for what are you called on to defend? not the wealth of an establishment, the privilege of an order—no! yours is a far higher and holier duty, a nation's welfare and a nation's honour are entrusted to your keeping, for assuredly the welfare of this or of any country is inseparable from the maintenance of pure religion. Religion is the only bond strong enough to hold together the discordant elements of society, which but for its restraining influence, would burst asunder and resolve themselves into their original chaos. Assuredly, whatever tends to the good of religion tends at the same time to the safety, honour, and welfare of our Sovereign and her dominions. It is, and must be, even an essential element in national greatness, and it is her maintenance of religion that has raised our own country to her place among the nations. Go forth through our land, walk round her bulwarks, survey her fortresses, gaze on the tall cliffs that guard her shores, behold the fleets that sweep proudly on the waves that encircle her, see her cities rience rich the ceaseless hum of commerce, presenting on every side the signs of wealth and luxury.

But bare lies not the secret of her strength States as proud as she, empires as glorious, have fallen ere now, and left but the ruins of their tombs to mark the spot where once they stood. Cities as great and palaces as magnificent, have ere now sent up the red blaze of ruin to the midnight sky, lighting the march of the spoiler o'er the hearths he has made desolate—no it is not her wealth, nor luxury, nor even her valour, that preserves her. No, you must turn from gazing on her docks and piers and frowning fortresses, and look where, amidst the cottage homes that cluster round it, the humble village church lifts its spire to heaven. Enter within its grey and ivied walls and gaze on its structure, simple and unadorned—what is there that speaks of power? what signs are there here of a nation's greatness! Yet here for ages has been kept the tall-man of England's might—for here have thronged her present sons to offer to their God the incense of their prayers Here, where you stand, bowed the feeble knees of age, the strength and pride of manhood. the grateful forms of y uth—here have their hearts been filled with pure and holy thoughts—here have they caught from the lips of their venerated teacher the lessons of wisdom, of piety, and true patriotism—here have they learned to love their God, to honour their sovereign here he peasant in his infancy has lisped the words of prayer and praise—here in his youth has he learned to live—and here he in old age has his tottering steps have borne him to learn to die. Around him rest the ashes of his fathers, and as he reads upon their humble grave stones the simple lines expressive of the hope in which they departed, his eyes fill with tears, and his heart registers a vow that he will never forsake the faith which they have bequeathed him, entwined as it is with all his best affections, mingling with all the sweet recollections of a mother's prayer, a father's blessing Yes, here we see the secret spring of Britain's greatness even in that pure fount of truth, which sends forth its thousand rills, bringing peace and virtue to each peasant's dwelling. Yes, national religion is inseparably connected with national prosperity; you cannot corrupt or overthrow the on- without destroying the other. The profane hands that are stretched out to touch the ark of a nation's faith may make it totter, and even fall, but assured y they shall wither in the society for a moment they may exult in their impious joy at having extinguished the light that exposed their vices—they rejoice with guilty joy as they watch the striking forms of faith and virtue, but short lived will be their song of triumph. See, arising from the abyss, the evil spirits of anarchy, rapine, and murder; speedily do they advance to share between them the fair realms which they had long vainly coveted, now left vacant by their guardian angels.

"Then shall the fiends at length prevail
Against the seraphs they assail;
And, fir ed on heavenly throne, shall dwell,
The freed inheritors of hell.

* * * * * * *

When the Holy City was compassed about by hostile armies—when the hour of her desolation was approaching, that hour whose foreseen agonies brought tears from the eyes of Him who could have saved her, but she would not—while famine was slaying her thousands, and pestilence her tens of thousands—when discord raged within her walls—while those who wielded the sword of the Romans had spared fell by the hands of their brothers—while the shouts of fierce and unnatural combatants, the ravings of blasphemy, or, still more revolting, the sounds of mad and impious revelry, were heard mingling strangely with the wail of those who were perishing by hunger, or the groans of those who laid them down in their despair to die—a sound more fearful than all these was heard throughout the city, a dread sound- of woe that shook terror within them from the sanctuary, from the shrine, was heard a voice, "Let us depart' let us depart!" and still, as that dreadful sound was swept by upon the midnight air, it smote upon the ears of the trembling listeners like the voice of doomed city. As it was then, so shall it ever be—the deserted shrine is the surest prestige of approaching ruin.

Ma. you, deeply impressed with all your fearful responsibilities, resolve to maintain those truths of revelation in all their purity, and spread around you all the rich blessings of religion, so that throughout the length and breadth of the land peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety, may be established among us to all generations.

* * * * * * *

Then in the deep asylum of our country's breast,
Shall the pure elements of greatness rest;
Virtue and Truth, the tutelary powers,
Her hearths shall hallow and defend her towers.
Still where the hand-maids of Religion rear
In the soft beauty of their verdure smile,
Where yew and elm o rershade the lowly fanes
Text-graved the peasants records shall remains,
Shall the blest echoes of the sabbath bell
Sweet on the quiet of the woodland swell;
And from each cottage-dwelling's lowly shades,
When star-light glimmers through the deepening shades,
Devotion's voice in choral hymns sha l rise,
And hear the land a warm response to the skies.*

This is indeed a fair and lovely prospect, and if I could think that my feeble effort to depict it to you has caused one heart here more clearly to appreciate its beauties—if I could hope that the words I have used have awoke in the mind of one here present a quicker sense of his most solemn duties, and firm resolution to discharge them, then I should rejoice to know that I have not spoken in vain.

Mr. Magee, after having thanked his audience in terms of characteristic eloquence for the attention which they had paid to his address, and for adding one more to the many pleasing recollections which he should bear with him on leaving those peaceful academic scenes, offered them his most ardent wishes for their future welfare, alike of the Society and themselves.

If ever deep and earnest feeling could give power to the wishes which it forms, making the hope that springs warm from the heart a prophecy, then at this moment would I with certainty predict a lon course of fame and triumph to the Historical Society. I would foretell the time when its dwelling, if not eclipsing the glories of its predecessor, the Historical Society shall again send forth its aspirants for all the highest honours of the state—when in the bands of justice, in the senate, and in the pulpit, her members shall be seen reaping the admiration—the love of all; and shedding around them, wherever they move, the bright light of truth, bidding men, as they watch their bright course of honoured usefulness gratefully remember the institution which gave such men to bless their country by their virtues, and adorn her by their fame.

* * * * * * *

It has already been announced, as the result of the mission of Prince de Wallerstein, that France and England have granted to Greece a delay of five years for the payment of its arrears; but this, we understand, is on condition that the National Assembly, now being held at Athens, shall acknowledge the Greek loan.

The Prussian Gazette states that an order has been issued by the court of Russia, forbidding the public functionaries of the Russian provinces of the Baltic to wear either beard or mustachios.

Despatches for Sir Charles Metcalfe, Governor of Canada, and for the Governors of the other North American Colonies, were sent off on Wednesday evening from the Colonial Office.

A national delegate meeting, or "conference," of coal miners, commenced its sittings in Manchester on Tuesday. The delegates, to the number of seventy or eighty, assembled in Carpenter's Hall, Garratt-road. On the Wednesday night, in the same place, a lecture was delivered by William DIXON, on the subject of the miners' grievances.

It is currently reported at Kelso, that at the next election for a member to represent the county of Roxburgh in Parliament, it will be contested by the Marquis of Douro, on the Conservative interest.

The commune of Hornu, near Brussels, has determined on erecting a church which will have its interior entirely of iron. It is expected that it will be a most complete proof of the state of metallurgy.

The Journal de Toulouse states that it is proposed to establish a railroad between that city and Bordeaux. It is said that an Anglo-French company has been formed, the director of which had arrived in Toulouse, and has met favourably received by the monied men of that place.

The railroad from Amsterdam to Utrecht was opened to the public on the 20th ult.

We hear that the French steamers from Marseilles to Alexandria, are to go by way of Malta, and not as hitherto by way of Syra. By this change we should be obliged to have our correspondence to and from Alexandria pass through Marseilles, which will not be indifferent to our merchants.

For some weeks back, the hatters of Ashton, Mottram Bredbury, Manchester, Gee Cross, Stockport, Denton, and other places for many miles round, have struck for an advance of wages.

By including the troops in garrison, and the average of strangers making only a passing stay in the town, the amount of the inhabitants of Paris may now be reckoned at about 1 200,000.

Mr. Commissioner Youles has ceased to be connected with the Irish Poor-law Administration.

* Altered from Mrs. Hemans.

THE FRENCH CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.—ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

In our last week's paper we reported the opening of the Chamber of Deputies, with the speech of the King, Louis Philippe.

On Thursday last, the Chamber was fully occupied with the election of the President. After the election of the Secretaries, M. Lafitte, the President, as oldest member, rose, and read a speech which excited a strong sensation, and met with great interruption. This having subsided, M. Sauzet was re-elected President.

M. Lafitte then called upon M. Sauzet to take the chair; and having given him, according to usage, a friendly embrace—a ceremony which passed amidst loud laughter—placed him in it.

M. Sauzet then rose and said:—In again taking possession of this seat, to which your continued confidence has again called me, I congratulate myself on being surrounded by all those colleagues whom your suffrages formerly gave me. Such an honour is a great encouragement to us to persevere in our duties through this our second session. The first session was opened amid the most mournful emotions. Parliament has not deceived the hopes of the country. The feelings of uneasiness having been calmed, and a new pledge given for the future of our national dynasty and of our institutions, everything attests the strength and union of the constitutional powers. (Hear.)

M. Odillon Barrot: You see that the chair can be made the means of diffusing political opinions.

Another Member: This speech is the counterpart of the other.

M. Sauzet. But the severity of our duties must not relax. It imposes upon us vigilance to maintain and industry to cultivate. In the days of storm and danger the country knows that all the energies of its representatives are applied to calm that storm. It does not ask an account of the time dedicated to its safety. But when tranquillity is re-assured, its just importance requires that its moral and material wants should be attended to, that its laws should be improved, its strength developed, and its prosperity consolidated. It is our business to give, by our deliberations, a free course to that marvellous national activity which, though sometimes misplaced, never tires, and of which provident wisdom can alone direct the course. But already, gentlemen, great progress has been made. Numerous labours, conscientiously prepared, are only awaiting a public discussion. The first session has fulfilled its duties—may the second do the same! May the Chamber concur with its bureau, by the order of its deliberations, by its prompt and well distributed labours, so that no salutary ideas may be omitted, or moment lost. Let us demonstrate all that can be expected of an intelligent and powerful nation, governed by free institutions, and may we thus merit the acknowledgments of our country. (Cheers.)

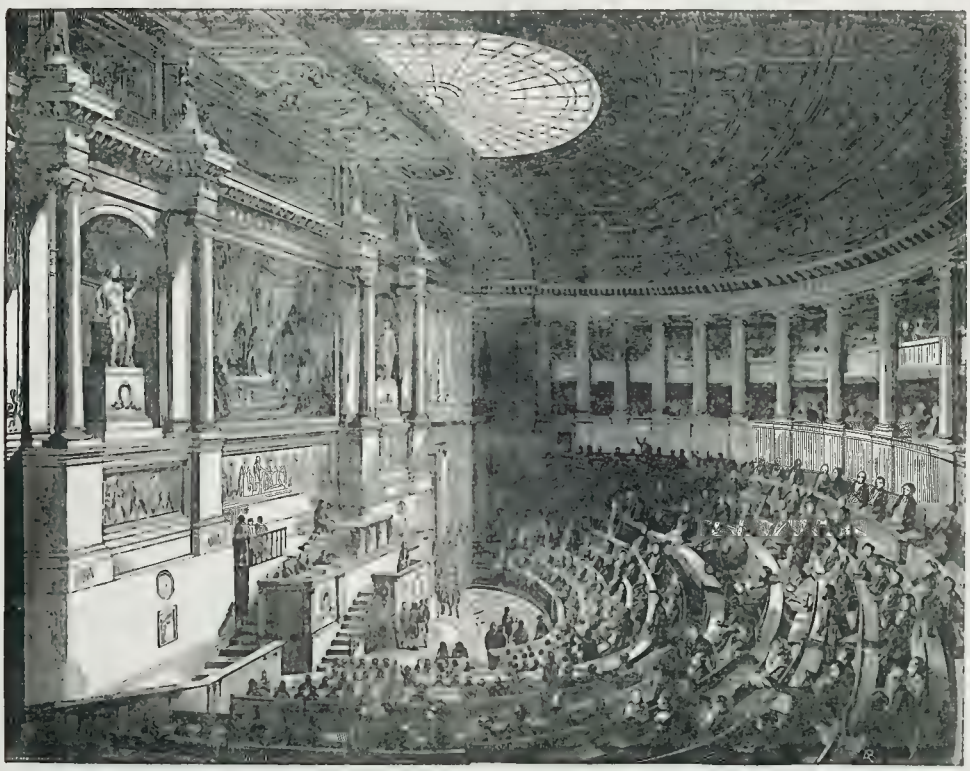
PORTRAIT OF M. SAUZET, PRESIDENT OF THE CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.

Our portrait represents M. Sauzet about to obtain silence in the Chamber, by his bell of office.

The second engraving represents the Chamber (Salle des Seances), which differs essentially in arrangement from our own Houses of Parliament.

The Chamber is of semi-circular form, lighted from the roof, and disposed like an amphitheatre. The members sit upon benches, which rise one above another. Two benches in front, covered with blue cloth, are appropriated to the King's Ministers. At the centre of the chord of the arc are the chair and desk of the President; upon each side are the Secretaries of the Chamber; and in the rear sit the President's Secretary and door-keepers. In front, below the President's desk, is the Tribune, which the Deputies ascend when they address the Chamber. It is of marble, adorned by a bas-relief by Lemot, representing History. On each side of the Tribune are seats for short-hand writers: and at each end of the chord is the office of the Moniteur. This portion of the Chamber is highly decorated; it consists of a handsome façade, divided into three principal compartments, by an Ionic column and pilaster; the central compartment is filled with a representation of the oath of August 9; and is flanked with two niches, in one of which is a statue of L[illegible] P[illegible] Order[illegible] the attic, above the pattern, is restored "Charter, 1830." The walls are decorated with bas-reliefs in [illegible] and stucco, and relieved with panels of green and gold. The Deputies enter by a door at each end of the screen, and take their seats upon the benches, which are distinguished as the right, the centre, and the left, and are appropriated to the respective political sections of the assembly. In the semi-circular part of the Chamber, above the seats of the Deputies, is a double row of tribunes, or boxes, between columns and pilasters, in stucco, to imitate white-veined marble; these boxes are hung with red drapery, and are appropriated to the Royal Family, the diplomatic corps, the peers of France, the state council, the journalists, and the public; this last box, or tribune, containing but 30 seats. The Chamber is altogether very handsomely appointed; the pavement is of marble, in compartments, with allegorical decorations. The ceiling is richly painted in caissons with figures and ornaments. The grand doors are of solid mahogany, and the door-cases are of marble, richly sculptured.

Such is the Chamber of Deputies, at this moment the scene of active debate.



THE FRENCH CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

INDIA AND CHINA.

The Indian Mail has arrived, with letters and papers from Bombay to December 1. The principal items relate to the prevalence of great sickness in the two newly-acquired possessions of Scinde in India, and of Hong Kong in China. Peace prevails throughout British India, although the preparations for war were busy throughout the north-western districts. An army of about 15,000 men was assembled on the banks of the Sutledj, and another was collecting at Agra; the former to compel the Sheiks to adopt some regular fixed system of government, and the latter to force the Government of Gwalior to make proper arrangements.

The fall of the Indus, consequent on the cessation of the monsoon, has always produced a description of malaria in a country where no improvements have been carried during centuries; and it was not to be expected that the British troops should not suffer in districts where every advantage was sacrificed to making hunting grounds for the Ameers.

In Hong Kong the sickness has arisen, as the Chinese say, from the nature of the waters of the islands, which they pretend cannot be used for any time without the worst result. It was even asserted that the British authorities contemplated the abandonment of that island since the death of the much lamented Mr. Morrison.

Much attention has been directed towards the Punjaub. The chiefs are represented as disunited, the soldiers are mutinous, and the provinces are distracted by their fears, for they dread an invasion from the Affghans at Peshawur, and of the British at Lahore. Moultun is described as highly disturbed; the inhabitants—who do not profess the Sheik religion—are in dread of massacres and plundering. Many of the natives are seeking every opportunity of abandoning the Sheik districts, and of escaping with their property into Hindostan. Even the French officers are quitting Lahore. General Ventura, the last of the foreign favourites of Runjeet Sing, has solicited leave to resign the service, and to retire to his own country. Two of the other junior officers have been dismissed. General Court had left, and General Avitable was at Calcutta.

It is difficult, even in India, to obtain correct intelligence of what is going on at the Court of Lahore, and many of the rumours circulated have proved unfounded. Heera Singh, the young Minister, appears still to retain power; he is, as it is known, the son of Dhyan Sing, who was the all-powerful Minister of Runjeet, and of his successors until his death, in September last. Heera Singh, who has the puppet child, King Dhuleep, in his custody, is now said to have obtained the aid of Goolab Singa, his father's eldest brother, and a leading Hill chief, who, at the head of twenty-two thousand men, came in the beginning of November to the capital. Goolab Singh is looked upon as hostile to the British, and will, it is thought, bring about a decided conflict, by influencing his nephew and the court not to assent to any proposals coming from the Government of India.

A crisis was expected in Lahore, when the Governor-General shall have reached the banks of the Sutledj. Several corps of the British troops were in movement in that direction. The number of troops at Ferozepore, Loosana, and Umballa, was estimated at 14,000 men Major-General George Hunter commanded at the two former places, while Major General Sir Robert Dick had the command of the Sirhind and Meerut divisions.

The last intelligence from Lahore states that Heera Singh had entered into a combination with Futteh Jung, the son of Schah Shooja, which had excited the jealousy of the Sheik soldiery, who threatened to attack and plunder both those young men.

It was expected that there would be an attempt on the part of the soldiers to pillage the wealthy inhabitants of the towns.

The news from Cabul current during the month was, that Dost Mahommed had been murdered; but though believed by many, it eventually turned out to be a fabrication. It is true that his position is far from an enviable one; he has named his son, the notorious Akbar, to be the Governor of the Hill Country, near Jellalabad, whence it is thought that he will attempt, ere long, the invasion of Peshawur. Peshawur is described as in a ticklish position, for there is no longer an European General to defend it, and all the plunderers around the Khyber Pass are anxious for an opportunity to sack it.

In the central part of India the affairs of Gwalior are at present most interesting; the Army of Exercise is assembling at Agra. On Sunday, the 19th of November, a dispute took place between some of the troops at Gwalior, which ended in their fighting with each other, when 400 were slain on both sides. Khasgerwalla, the usurper, who some months ago had endeavoured to oppose the influence of the British, had been taken prisoner, and nearly sacrificed by the insubordinate and enraged soldiers. He was saved with difficulty, and the insurgents appeased merely by the promise that he should be given up to the Hon. Company.

A sort of expectation had been raised that the resolution had been adopted by the British statesman now governing in India, altogether to take possession of the states of Gwalior.

There appears to be a general acquiescence throughout India to the British taking final possession of the territories that once were Sindiah's. There is no lawful sovereign, for the child now called to govern is but an adopted son; and the oppressions of that government have been such, that the whole population wish to become British subjects, in order to be saved from the continual pillage of the relentless and unpaid soldiery.

The next point of interest in the north of India was the great enthusiasm raised for the liberation of Colonel Stoddart from Bokhara. A considerable subscription was raised for the purpose of defraying the expense of sending a person thither to examine into the truth of his confinement and of his safety. It is thought that nothing further will be done in India until the result of Dr. Wolff's mission is known.

The most exaggerated accounts are circulated respecting the sickness, but there appears to be but little danger apprehended from any of the neighbouring tribes. Sir C. Napier was at Currachee, where his lady had joined him. He purposed to go to Hyderabad in the beginning of December, and with a considerable body of troops to proceed to look out for healthful situations, at which the troops are to be stationed in future.

Lord Ellenborough had become more popular than during the preceding twelve months. His lordship was to start about the 25th of November for the north-western provinces, invested with every power to make peace or war by a special act of the Legislative Council.

CHINA.

The news from China extends to the beginning of October. The most important intelligence was the arrangement of a supplementary treaty between the Chinese and the British Governments; one clause of which is for the purpose of guaranteeing to all foreign nations the same privileges of trade as to the British themselves. This will have the effect of rendering unnecessary all negociations between the Chinese Emperor and the other powers.

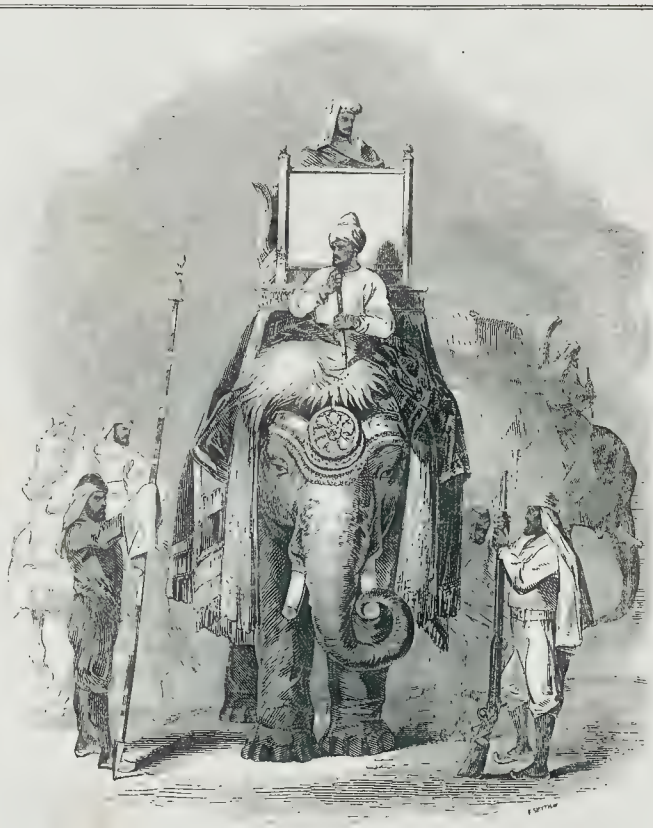
Sir Henry Pottinger, who had gone to Macao to attend at the funeral of Mr. Morrison, is stated to have regarded the supplementary treaty with such importance as to have a steamer sent specially with it to Suez.

The state of trade at Canton was not satisfactory, owing to the tricks of the old Hong Merchants, and their adherents, the linguists. The state of trade along the coast is said to be satisfactory. Howqua, the celebrated Hong merchant died at the age of 75, leaving 15,000,000 dollars' worth of property. The celebrated Mandarin Lin has also paid the debt of nature. The Rev. Mr. Gutzlaff has been appointed Chinese secretary in the room of Mr. Morrison.

Amongst the deaths in China are mentioned F. R. Foote, Deputy Commissary General, and Captain Haviland, of her Majesty's 55th Foot.

THE RAJA OF PUTTEEALLA, ON HIS STATE ELEPHANT

Probably, a more fitting opportunity will not occur for introducing to the reader a specimen of the Hon. Miss Eden's admirable portraits of the Princes and People of India. The publication was commenced under the most distinguished patronage, the fair artiste being a daughter of Lord Auckland, the late Governor-General of India; and by this means possessing peculiar opportunities of witnessing many characteristics of Indian life, which Miss Eden's accomplished pencil has sketched with rare fidelity and beauty. The views and portraits are drawn on stone most effectively by Mr. Lowes Dickinson; and the work will be completed within a few days.



STATE ELEPHANT.

The specimen we have selected is an imposing scene of Indian pomp, and semi-barbaric splendour. It represents the Raja of Putteealla, seated upon his state elephant. The Raja is chief of the Sikh Principalities, on the south bank of the Sutledj, which owe allegiance to the British Government, and are under its protection. These Principalities were saved from subjection to Runjeet Sing, in the year 1809, through the interference of the British Government. Lord Minto was then Governor-General of India, and Sir Charles Metcalfe was the Envoy deputed by him to restrain Runjeet Sing in his conquests south of the Sutledj. The revenues of the Raja of Putteealla are supposed to from £300,000 to £400,000 a-year.

FUNERALS AND TOMBS OF THE CHINESE.

The Chinese no sooner come to years of discretion than they make provision for their deaths. Every man furnishes his house with a coffin, among other moveables, to put him in mind of his mortality; and people of rank enclose a piece of land for a burying-ground, where they erect a tomb, and a magnificent temple over it, to which they are brought when they die, though at never so great a distance from home.

The son having invited his friends and relations to attend his father's corpse to the grave, the procession begins with those who carry the images or pictures of men, women, beasts, and birds. Dishes of meat also are carried before the corpse. Then follow the priests, with drums, music, and jingling bells, and next the coffin, under a large arched canopy, carried by twenty or thirty men. The sons follow the coffin, on foot, supporting themselves on crutches, as not able to sustain themselves without. The women then advance in close chairs, covered with white silk, rending the air with their cries; and, besides these, are other women who are hired to make a dismal, mournful noise on the occasion. Being arrived at the tomb, which may be taken for a palace, the company enter it by a grand portal, having a less gate on each side of it; and the corpse being deposited in it, an altar is erected before it, and lights left burning on the altar.

The friends of the deceased visit the tomb at certain seasons, and prostrate themselves before it with their faces to the ground. They burn incense, pour out wine, and offer dishes of meat to the deceased, which they are not ignorant becomes an entertainment for the priests when they are gone.

CHINESE FUNERAL.

The character of the deceased being engraved on marble is placed before the altar. Every man also has a tablet in his house, whereon are engraved the names of his great-grandfather and father, whom they worship; and their great men have temples erected to their memory and a yearly sacrifice offered to them.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SUNDAY, Jan. 7.—First Sunday after Epiphany.
MONDAY, 8.—Plough Monday.
TUESDAY, 9.—Rogue Forts taken, 1841.
WEDNESDAY 10.—Royal Exchange burnt, 1838.
THURSDAY, 11.—Sir Hans Sloane died, 1753.
FRIDAY, 12.—Linnæus died, 1778.
SATURDAY, 13.—Cambridge Term begins.

Times of the Tides at London Bridge for the Week ending Jan. 13

Sunday.		Monday.		Tuesday.		Wednesday.		Thursday.		Friday.		Saturday.
M	A	M	A	M	A	M	A	M	A	M	A	M	A
h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.
2 41	3 59	4 17	4 36	4 55	5 17	5 36	5 56	6 18	6 41	7 6		7 30

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

TERMS, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

	£	s.	d.
Per Quarter	0	6	6
Half Year	0	13	0
One Year	1	6	0

May be had of all Newsmen and Booksellers, or at the Office, 198, Strand.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"An Indian Officer and Subscriber."—Had the proposed cap been adopted, we might probably have engraved it.
"W. S. T."—The New Year's Carol is too uneven for our columns.
"C. C."—Our correspondent's complaint has been referred to the Secretary of the Great Western Railway.
"M."—The marriage is legal notwithstanding the omission of the name.
"J. H." Cutlers' Hall. The plates in Mr. Dickens's Christmas Carol are engraved upon steel, and the other illustrations on wood.
"W. W. J." Chippenham; "G. H." Penzance.—A sovereign, full weight, is a legal tender; but no person can be compelled to take a sovereign short weight.
"La Gonaleuse."—We do not think the German Opera will perform in London this season.
"P. H." will see that we have mentioned the design in another part of our paper.
"Arvisides."—81 Jermyn street.
"M. A. Y."—Monmouth.—We think the charge per quarter of 7s., with credit, is reasonable.
"A. A."—A person born of English parents in America would be considered a natural-born subject of England.
"C. S."—We shall insert one of the sonnets.
"A Subscriber."—The Chiltern Hundreds are a portion of the high land of Buckinghamshire, governed by a steward appointed by the Crown. The Buckinghamshire have long since ceased, but the nominal office is retained; and a Member of the House of Commons, not in any respect disqualified, can resign his seat only by the acceptance of an office under the Crown, which is done by his receiving the nominal appointment of the Chiltern Hundreds.
"E. H.," Baldwin-street. We are happy to state that the Christmas gifts this season have been so numerous that we have been unable to devote space enough to particularize them.
"G. B."—Thanks. Our correspondent should order the paper to be sent by a London agent by Saturday's post.
"J. S. D.," Yarmouth. We recommend the Census for Scotland and Ireland to be bound with our Vol IV.
"A Subscriber," Norwich.—The defendant can be compelled to pay all expenses.
"H. O. N.," Dublin; "I. S. W. T." are thanked; but our columns are too crowded.
"W. R.," Birmingham.—The building has been already engraved in our journal.
"Exb."—The lines will not suit.
"Geminensis."—The postmaster is correct.
"E. J."—We cannot undertake to decide bets.
"A. Z."—Mr. Catlin's pronunciation is Ki-o-kuh-way.
"W. W." Great Coram-street.—Should any event occur at the place, we shall be glad to engrave it.
"F. R. R." Walmer. The errata in the Census of England and Wales will be published with the Census of Ireland and Scotland.
"C. W. L." The policy would only be worth its original cost.
"A Lincolnshire Subscriber." We have not room.
"J. B." should keep his money; we have no opinion of print lotteries.
"A Constant Reader," Jersey.—Herbs are placed in the prisoner's dock, at the Old Bailey, to prevent infection.
"W. C."—We are not aware of the process adopted in Sir Thomas Branker's works.
"A. B. C.," Wynstead.—The specimen is but indifferent.
"Hiles," Dublin, is mistaken.
"Militaire."—We do not think the illustrations would be popular.
"H. G. H.," Wimswould.—Steel is, properly speaking, neither a mineral nor a metal, but a metallic compound of carbon and iron.
The equestrian statue of George IV., at Trafalgar-square, will be engraved in our next.
"An Irish Subscriber."—A substitute for glazed frames in hotbeds, &c., has recently been invented in Germany. It consists of fine calico strained upon the frames, and covered with a kind of varnish. Our correspondent will find the details of the invention in the Magazine of Science. No. 217.
"M. H. A. C."—The seven wonders of the world among the ancients, were—1. The Pyramids of Egypt. 2, 3. The Walls and Hanging Gardens of Babylon. 5. The Statue of Jupiter Olympus. 6. The Temple of Diana, at Ephesus. 6. The Colossus, at Rhodes. 7. The Tomb of Mausolus, King of Caria—the first mausoleum.
CRESS.—"Edward." "W. H. P.," and "A Chess Tyro."—Received.
"C. P."—The King and Knight cannot possibly mate the King alone. (See Walker's Treatise, &c.) Get a board and try it yourself for a few hours. We have forwarded the letter from Gosport.

No. 84 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, for Dec. 9, 1843, is now reprinted.

ROYAL PORTRAITS.—We have great pleasure in this week presenting to our readers the first of a series of PORTRAITS of the SOVEREIGNS and PRINCES of EUROPE, drawn on the wood by the distinguished Belgian artist, M. Baugniet, who has been honoured with sittings by nearly all the crowned heads of the Continent. The likenesses by this artist are admitted to possess remarkable fidelity.

ERRATUM.—In a small portion of our impression, the continuation of "Mabel Marchmont," from page 9, appears, by a mistake of the printer, on page 6.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 1844.

THE foreign news of the week, although it has thickened upon us in the form of expresses, may be summed in small space, and in few words. Louis Philippe, after his satisfactory speech to the Chambers, reported in our last number, has set to work about his own business, and is directing his energies towards obtaining a dotation for one of his sons of a good number of thousands of francs per annum. The question of the vote is likely to be pretty violently argued, and it is believed that Guizot is bringing it on somewhat against the approval of his conscience—and some go so far as to assert even at the hazard of his ministerial existence. La Roi le veut, however, and Louis is pretty despotic where money is concerned, although we are not of those who believe that he would sacrifice such a minister as Guizot upon any question so limited in national importance as the grant of a pension in his family, no matter how arduous the duties or responsibilities its recipient would be obliged to fulfil. The American President's message will have been discovered by our readers to be a mere budget of verbiage, not at all pregnant with political importance, although teeming with the elaborateness and pomposity of Yankee display. It calculates, and guesses a great deal, but enunciates no new principles; nor does it open any fresh difficulties to the vista of peaceful men. The Canadas, however, have in them more elements of uneasiness, and betray a disturbful spirit in the French party, who, headed by M. Lafontaine and others, in withdrawing their support and aid from Sir Charles Metcalfe's councils and Government have evinced a fretfulness of purpose which all parties in England condemn; and which, while it may unsettle weak minds, about the condition of a colony so recently agitated by political rebellion, only strengthens the popular belief in the wisdom and sagacity of the present administration of the functions of the British governing in that quarter of the globe. Sir Charles Metcalfe has opposed steadiness to puerility, and dignified argument to sophistry, at once querulous and unjust.

From India, the arrival of the Overland Mail brings us no intelligence of importance. Some sickness in our Chinese territory is to be regretted, as much as their general tranquillity is satisfactory—and the comparative repose of India is to be viewed hopefully that it may be symbolic of future peace. Some native chiefs are at loggerheads, as they always will be, and treachery and duplicity foment internal broils; but there seems no reason to believe that British ambition will break out into fresh aggression, or that our troops will be again called upon, for the present, to act in the theatre of war. In respect to the subject of conflict between English and natives in foreign places of colonization or emigration, the recent accounts from New Zealand—where there had been a serious affray of blood, and many British lives sacrificed—present the conduct of a magistrate of the name of M'Donough in a very enviable and respectable light, as a sagacious minister of peace—as discarding all principles of revenge—as claiming only inquiry and justice—and so far satisfying, instead of exasperating, the natives, as to obtain their co-operation in the proclamation of such a laudable design. As a consequence, we hope that these fresh and mischievous differences between the English emigrants and the native New Zealanders will be speedily and bloodlessly arranged.

Spain's new Minister has tried the hazardous and despotic experiment of suspending the sittings of the Cortes by a monarchical decree, until Government shall have taken upon itself the responsibility of levying supplies from the people, with a view of obtaining afterwards a bill of indemnity from the very Legislature, whose functions it abrogates for the moment, and whom it intends, on re-congregating, to dissolve altogether, should they refuse its pleasant and dictatorial request. So much for the progress of affairs in Spain!

WE are not enthusiastic admirers of everything that comes from the authorities of Somerset House; many of their orders have enforced general principles, with so little regard to modifying circumstances that they have given rise to cases of extreme individual hardship, and even of unchristian cruelty. But, on the other hand, we are not disposed to cavil at the portion of good that may come from that "centre of the system," by which the "cold charity" of the Law is controlled.

It is, perhaps, one of the greatest advantages of centralization, that it accumulates or gathers into one focus masses of information that could not otherwise be so well brought to bear on any particular fact, or, it may be, a particular abuse. And in England it is always facts that prevail; facts change systems and put down abuses, when mere declamations would utterly fail. Surprising is the power of the advocate of change when he can point to a frightful mass of details—most of them horrible, some of them nearly incredible—but all of them, alas! too true, as the supporters of his cause, and the prompters of his exertions. Such was the immense volume published by the Committee on the Labour of Children and Females in the Coal Mines—it brought to men's knowledge the horrors which in abodes "disinherited of day," the earth covered, but, fortunately for humanity, did not hide. Of the same repulsive and harrowing description is the recent report made by order of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, by Mr. Chadwick, on Interment in Towns. A pamphlet was written some years ago entitled "The Use of the Dead to the Living;" it treated the question of the supply of subjects to the Schools of Anatomy—and we believe it had considerable effect on the legislation of the time. Mr. Chadwick's Report is just the reverse of the pamphlet above-named; it is a minute exposition of the injury that arises to the living generations of this vast city, from the manner in which they permit—or are compelled by circumstances to permit—their dead to be disposed of. The practice of burying within towns and cities has grown up gradually, and, therefore, almost imperceptibly, and not till it has been shown by such an exposure as the present to have caused such evils, is the whole mischief of the practice to be perceived. There is not one principle of our common nature that is not outraged by the revolting indecencies which are detailed in this volume. The history of mankind scarcely tells us of one race that did not cherish a feeling of respect to the remains of humanity—the poor clod of clay from whence the spirit has winged its flight, leaving it to be "compounded with the dust whereto 'tis kin." The feeling is strong alike in the barbarian and the civilized race, nor is it affected by the difference of creeds and religions. But it is in civilized lands that this principle is most frequently shocked, owing to the callousness of the officials who are connected with the last sad rites, to the increase of population in circumscribed spaces, the want of power to step out of old modes of proceeding, and various other reasons which we would rather leave to be suggested by the mind of the reader than formally state ourselves. The prominent evil put forth in the report, is the injury to the public health by the decomposition of vast heaps of animal matter in the midst of our streets and thoroughfares. Of this "enough and more than enough," of evidence has been given. We have gone through this evidence as a duty, but have no wish to repeat any of it here. The fact cannot be disputed; it seems, indeed, to have been long acknowledged. One of the finest of our old dramatists—Webster—who, we suppose, is suggested to us in connection with this subject by what is called the association of ideas, for he was parish-clerk of St. Andrew's, Holborn, illustrates it with some force in a passage which we quote from memory:—

> The pestilence that hangeth in the cloud,
> The bright sun soon disperses it; but when
> The rank infection in some dunghill lies,
> There a work for bells and grave.

He uses most clerkly and funeral images, but his physical doctrine is correct, and with most fearful amplitude is it borne out by this report. But these material evils, if we may so call them, great as they are, are not so terrible as the moral pestilence that seems to arise from the abuses linked with the most necessary and inevitable of duties. One circumstance (mentioned in connection with the account of the operation of burial clubs) is truly dreadful, and makes us doubt if we are living in a civilized and Christian land. It is proved that where parents have been members of burial clubs, children have been by them deprived of life in order to obtain the amount of the burial money from the society! In one case a man obtained payment of the money from ten different clubs, amounting in all to £34 3s., for the burial of one child! The next illustration we quote in the language of the report itself:—

> Two similar cases came under the notice of Mr. Cuppock, the Clerk and Superintendent-Registrar of the Stockport Union, in both of which he prosecuted the parties for murder. In one case, where three children had been poisoned with arsenic, the father was tried, with the mother, and convicted at Chester, and sentenced to be transported for life, but the mother was acquitted. In the other case, where the Judge summed up for a conviction, the accused, the father, was, to the astonishment of every one, acquitted. . . . . It is remarked on these dreadful cases by the Superintendent Registrar, that the children, who were boys, and therefore likely to be useful to the parents, were not poisoned, the female children were the victims. It was the clear opinion of the medical officers that infanticide has been committed in Stockport to obtain the burial money.

Here, then, is a new crime created by civilization, and engendered by the crowding and massing together of thousands and hundreds of thousands without that provision of space for the proper and decent disposal of the dead which is absolutely required both for health and morality. The mere possibility that such a crime can be perpetrated in the midst of us, should be, irrespective of sanatory considerations, or any regard of our own safety from infection, a strong impelling motive to men of all opinions to unite for the purpose of finding a remedy, or of carrying out those already proposed, provided it be at all practicable.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—Her Majesty and the Prince, with the whole of the Court and Household suite, attended divine service in the private chapel. The Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay officiated, and preached from the 2nd chap. of the Philippians, the 5th, 6th, and 7th verses. The orchestra were in attendance, and chanted a portion of the service. Mr. Kiesll, her Majesty's private organist, presided at the organ. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent and Lady Fanny Howard attended divine service in the parish church. The Rev. I. Gossett officiated. Intelligence reached Windsor that sickness, said to be the small-pox or the measles, prevails in some of the families of the domestics at the seat of his Majesty the King of the Belgians, which has prevented the Court from going thither at present.

MONDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert walked from the Castle to the Riding School, to witness the distribution of their new year's bounty to the poor of Windsor. Her Majesty and the Prince were attended by Lord Rivers, the Marchioness of Douro, the Hon. Miss Montague, and Hamilton, Col. Arbuthnot, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Mr. Anson. The following joined the royal dinner party:—The Duchess of Kent, Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, Lady Fanny Howard, Lady and the Hon. Miss Montague, Hon. Mrs. Arbuthnot, Viscount Anson, Mr. and Mrs. George Hope, and Sir H. Wheatley.

TUESDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert promenaded in the precincts of the Castle. Prince Albert, accompanied by Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, and attended by Lord Rivers, Col. Arbuthnot, and Mr. Anson, went out shooting in the royal preserves in the morning. The party afterwards returned to the Castle. Her Majesty and Prince Albert dined with the Duchess of Kent, at Frogmore. Almost the whole of the ladies and gentlemen in waiting on her Majesty and his Royal Highness had the honour of dining at Frogmore. At the conclusion of the banquet her Majesty, the Prince Consort, the Duchess of Kent, and her Royal Highness's distinguished guests, retired to the upper drawing-room, where a concert was performed by the military band of the 1st Life Guards.

WEDNESDAY.—His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and her Royal Highness the Princess Royal were taken for their customary exercise by her Majesty, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, walked in the grounds about the Castle in the course of the day.

THURSDAY.—Prince Albert rode to Swinley, attended by Lord Rivers, Mr. G. E. Anson, Col. Arbuthnot, and Captain Duncombe, to enjoy the sport of shooting. The royal party, after excellent sport, returned to the Castle to lunch. In the afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert rode out in a pony phaeton, his Royal Highness driving, followed by another pony phaeton, driven by the Marchioness of Douro, with the Hon. Miss Hamilton.

THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—Her Majesty's nephew, Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, with the Rev. Canon Wood and his amiable bride, spent the Christmas with her Majesty, who, with her usual liberality, has been dispensing her seasonable benevolence to an immense number of poor families in the vicinity of Witley Court, and in several instances has personally relieved the wants of the indigent and distressed at their humble dwellings.

The Court went out of mourning on Thursday for his late Majesty King William Frederick of Holland, Count of Nassau.

Viscount Melbourne arrived in South-street on Thursday afternoon, from a visit to Lord and Lady Palmerston, at Broadlands. His lordship is in the enjoyment of excellent health.

DEATH OF SIR GEORGE HARPER CREWE, BART.—This respected Baronet expired at Calke Abbey, the family seat in Derbyshire, on Monday last. He was born in 1795, and married Miss Whittaker, daughter of the Rev. Thomas Whittaker, in 1819, by whom he leaves several children. He was elected, in 1837, Member for the southern division of Derbyshire, and continued in the House of Commons until the late general election. He was a Conservative in politics. Mr. John Harper Crewe, eldest son of the deceased, was born in 1824, a successful baronetcy.

EARL GREY.—The accounts which arrived in town on Wednesday relative to the health of Earl Grey, were more satisfactory than any which had been previously received. It is expected that the noble Earl will be able to leave his room in a few days.

We understand that the Duke of Grafton has resigned the Lord Lieutenancy of Suffolk, which he has fulfilled so much to the satisfaction of the public for a long period, but the duties of which his age and infirmities have disabled his grace from executing. It is generally believed that Earl Jermyn will succeed to the office.

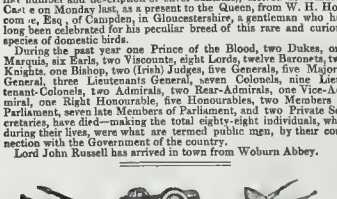
DEATH OF GENERAL LOVEDAY.—This gallant and venerable officer, who died at Bath last week, at an advanced age, had seen much service in India, and his commission as Lieutenant-General (local rank) bore date January 10th, 1837. He married Miss D'Esterre, sister to Mr. Norcott D'Esterre, who was shot by Mr. O'Connell in a duel near Dublin, in 1815, by whom he had a numerous family.

THE HON. CAPTAIN ROUS.—We are able to announce the gallant captain is recovering from the effects of his late accident, and that he will not lose the sight of the injured eye. It has been incorrectly stated that the misfortune was occasioned by the gun bursting; it exploded while in the act of reloading, and the ramrod wounded the finger (since amputated), lacerated the eyebrow, and actually passed through the rim of his hat. The captain's escape was almost miraculous: had his head been a little more advanced, the consequences must have been fatal.

PRESENT TO HER MAJESTY.—Eight most beautiful and purebred bantams, consisting of a cock and three hens of gold, and the like number and description of silver bantams), arrived at Windsor Castle on Monday last, as a present to the Queen, from W. H. Holcombe, Esq., of Campden, in Gloucestershire, a gentleman who has long been celebrated for his peculiar breed of this rare and curious species of domestic birds.

During the past year one Prince of the Blood, two Dukes, one Marquis, six Earls, two Viscounts, eight Lords, twelve Baronets, two Knights, one Bishop, two (Irish) Judges, five Generals, five Majors-General, three Lieutenants General, seven Colonels, nine Lieutenant-Colonels, two Admirals, two Rear-Admirals, one Vice-Admiral, one Right Honourable, five Honourables, two Members of Parliament, seven late Members of Parliament, and two Private Secretaries, have died—making the total eighty-eight individuals, who, during their lives, were what are termed public men, by their connection with the Government of the country.

Lord John Russell has arrived in town from Woburn Abbey.



NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

NAVAL OBITUARY.

Flag Officers.—Admiral Sir Graham Moore, G.C.B., G.C.M.G.; Rear-Admiral Sir Arthur Farquhar, K.C.B., K.C.H.; Captain Samuel Chambers.

Commanders.—Edward Williams, Edward R. Bunter, Fletcher N. Clarke, Joshua Kneesbaw, James Sibbald, William G. Roberts, Hugh D. C. Douglas, George Bissett, William Suallard, John Bowen, Henry F. Seagram, Grant Allan, George Lawrance, William Archbold, John Fulton.

Lieutenants.—Edward de Montmorency, William Shield, William J. Edwards, James Shrapnell, Benjamin Smart, Sampson Marshall, Roger Langlands, John de Foulkes, Ponsonby Sheppard, William C. O'Hara, George G. Fabian, Joseph Taylor, Andrew D. Barbrey, Joseph Proctor, Alexander S. Wright, Bryan Roberts, John F. T. Starke, John Cashman, Daniel H. M'Neill.

Masters.—John Brice, Joseph Perriam, Richard W. Milroy, William C. Pettigrew.

Second Master.—Charles E. Maitland.

Medical Officers.—John Richardson, Richard Hinds, Alexander B. Greig, James Grant, Alexander Hessio, Casspbell Frame, Arthur D. Milne, William Leitch, John Simpson, Hugh H. Monk.

Pursers.—Thomas Wallis, John Taylor, Benjamin Heather, Frederick Hellyer.

ROYAL MARINES.

First Lieutenants.—Richard Browne, William Sampson.

Second Lieutenants.—George D. Clarke, Thomas Cruise, Digby J. Sloggett.

MONTHLY MILITARY OBITUARY.

Generals: Morrison, Col. of 13 F., and Gov. of Chester, London; Lord Aylmer, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., Col. of 1 F., and Gov. of Dumbarton Castle, London.

Lieutenant-Generals: Sir J. Taylor, K.C.B., Col. of 80 F., London; Blommart, Taunton; Loveday, E. I. Comp. Serv., Bath.

Major-General Belianis, E. I. Comp. Serv.

Colonels: T. Westan, h. p. 14 Gar. Bn.; Knight Erskine, C.B., h p. Bradshaw's Levy; Du Vernet Grosset Muirhead, h. p. R. Staff Corps, Budderholm.

Lieutenant-Colonels: J. Williamson, Commandant of R. Mil. Asylum, Chelsea; W. R. Dickson, K.H., h. p., New Bruns. Fenc., and Asst. Adj.-Gen. in Canada, Quebec.

Majors: J. Lenihart, late of the E. I. Comp. Serv., Clevedon, near Bristol; P. Craigie, E. I. Comp. Serv., Dinapore.

Captains: Bryan, h. p. Gren. Gds.; Gardner, h. p. 4 F.; G. Campbell, h. p. 26 F.; R. M'Nabb, Unatt.; Burt, late of R. Eng., Blandford, Dorset; M'Dermid, late 3 R. Vet Bn.; Heine, h. p. 1 Germ. Leg.; Steinwehr, h. p. Brunsw. Inf.

Lieutenants: Knellys, 33 F., Boulogne; R. Harvey, R. Art., Jamaica; R. Brown, h. p. R. Mar.; De Ruvynes, h. p. 20 D.; Bashaw, h. p. 1 Ceylon; Flood, h. p. 4 F., Liverpool; Hamilton, h. p. 29 F.; Horan, h. p. 32 F.; Morris, h. p. 88 F.; Leslie, h. p. 57 F. (Adj.); Carson, Unatt.; R. H. Peel, do.; Wolff, h. p. 1 Line Bn. Germ. Leg.

Cornets and Ensigns: Masterson, 63 F., on board the Minerva, on passage from St. Helena to England; Langford, h. p. 49 F.; Bury, h. p. 57 F.; Cowper, h. p. For. Corps of Waggoners; Von Jeinsen, do.; Kersting, h. p. 1 Line Bn. Germ. Leg.

Paymaster Cross, h. p. 83 F.

Quartermasters: Dowling, h. p. 4 Dr. Gds.; M'Intyre, h. p. Ross and Cromarty Fen., Liverpool.

Medical Department: Dep. Insp. Gen. of Hosp. E. Portsea, h. p.; Dr. M'Dougle, h. p. Scots Fus. Gds.; Dr. Purdon, h. p. Staff; Humphrey, do.; Hughes, 3 Provincial Batt. of Militia.

Chaplains: Rev. J. Hughes, h. p. Staff; Rev. J. Morgan, h. p. 105 F.

A small detachment of ten men of the 7th Dragoon Guards is at Maidstone, under orders to join the head-quarters of that regiment at the Cape of Good Hope. The officers who will accompany the draft are Cornets Gore and Bumbrey, of the 7th. It is stated that the depôt of the 16th Lancers, which was transferred from Canterbury to Maidstone in September last, will, at an early period, be removed from the last place to Brompton barracks.

The Gladiator, a fine first-class steam-vessel, was ordered to be commenced at Woolwich on Monday last, and the shipwrights will be employed by task and job work; and as the greater part of her timbers have already been converted, it is expected she will be ready for launching in about three months from this period. Two new steamvessels are to be built at Deptford, one to be named the Spitfire, and the other the Porcupine.

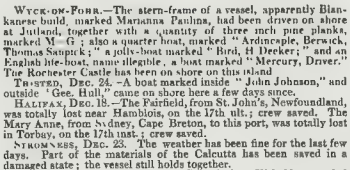
A court-martial has been held in India on Paymaster Henry Routh, of her Majesty's 15th Hussars, on various charges of embezzlement and fraudulent appropriation of considerable sums of money. He was found guilty, and sentenced to transportation "beyond the seas as a felon for seven years." Paymaster Routh had been a lieutenant in the regiment nearly eleven years, and paymaster about four. The sentence has been approved by Sir Hugh Gough, the Commander-in-Chief, and Mr. Routh sent to the Presidency of Fort St. George.

We have been given to understand that the command at the Nore has been agreed to Vice-Admiral Sir Wm. Hall Gage, now one of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, whose present appointment is likely to be bestowed either upon Rear-Admiral Bowles, or Rear-Admiral Ross.

PORTSMOUTH.—Her Majesty's sloop Helena, 16, Commander Sir Cornwallis Ricketts, Bart., sailed from Portsmouth on Tuesday morning for Devonport, for the purpose of embarking Mr. Bankhead, the American Minister; she will land him at Jamaica, and then proceed to join Rear-Admiral Percy in the Winchester, at the Cape, to which station the Helena will be attached. Her Majesty's brigantine Bonetta, 3, Lieut.-Commander Edward E. Gray, arrived on Sunday from Sierra Leone, coast of Africa, where she has been upwards of three years; she sailed on Tuesday evening for Sheerness to be paid off. The Princess Royal, transport, arrived at Spithead on Sunday, from Antigua, having on board Lieut.-Col. Philip Dundas, 9 officers, and 270 rank and file, being the head-quarters of the 47th Regiment. The Princess Royal came into harbour on Sunday evening, but in consequence of there not being a barrack vacant, either at Portsmouth or Gosport, the troops were obliged to remain on board. The 44th Regiment, now quartered at Haslar and Fortan barracks, left for Winchester on Wednesday, when the 47th landed and occupied their quarters. The second wing of the 47th is expected to arrive in a week or ten days, in the Boyne transport, from Antigua.—The 44th Regiment: Col. Skelton and the officers of this regiment gave a grand ball and supper to 500 fashionables on Tuesday evening, and marched for Winchester next morning.

SHEERNESS.—FUNERAL OF SIR EDWARD BRACE, K.C.B.—The funeral procession of this highly-respected and meritorious officer took place on Tuesday morning, and his remains were placed on board the Myrtle steam-vessel, to be conveyed to the family vault, at Fareham, near Portsmouth. At a quarter before eleven, minute-guns from the Camperdown and Ocean announced the moving of the procession from his late residence in the dockyard, and a detachment of the 77th led the way, followed by a portion of the Royal Marines. The coffin was borne on a carriage similar to those used in the Artillery, and the appointment has not yet actually taken place, that Sir Jahlee Brenton will succeed the late Sir Edward Brace, as Commander-in-Chief at the Nore.

THE AMERICAN NAVY.—The Government report of the war and navy department of the United States gives as the naval force of that power a total number of 76 vessels of various descriptions. Of these there is one three-decker of 120 guns; nine ships of the line, 90 guns each; one razee of 62 guns; twelve 52 gun frigates; one 50 gun frigate; two 48 gun frigates; eleven first-class sloops of war, 24 guns each; three 22 gun sloops; five 16 gun sloops; two sloops for store ships, 6 guns each. There are also four first class sloops on the stocks nearly ready for launching. Eleven 10 gun brigs and schooners; three ditto, used as store ships, and one for a receiving vessel at Charleston. There are likewise four small schooners employed as packets or receiving vessels. The steam navy consists of the Mississippi, of 12 guns; the Princeton (Erickson's propeller), of 12 guns; the Fulton, of 8 guns; the Michigan, of 6 guns—an iron steamer, built and recently launched on Lake Erie, can carry 14 guns, but her present armament is two 64-pairhan guns, and four 32 pound carronades; the Union, of four guns (with Hunter's submerged wheels), and the Poinsett, of two guns. A contract has been made to build an iron steamer at Pittsburg, of 1000 tons, to sail at the rate of nine miles per hour, with steam, and to cost 150,000 dollars. A small iron steamer of galvanised iron has been ordered to be built at Washington, but suspended for want of means. On the stocks are—The Vermont and Virginia, each 90 guns, at Boston; the Alabama, 90 guns, at Portsmouth, New Hampshire; the New York, 90 guns, at Norfolk; the Santee frigate, 52 guns, at Portsmouth, New Hampshire; and the Sabine frigate, of 52 guns, at New York. Six sloops of war are ordered to be built, two have been launched, and others are ready for launching. The Washington, 74, was broken up; the Hudson is unfit for repair: and the Franklin, 74, and Independence, are at Charleston, waiting more favourable times to be repaired.



SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

WYCK-ON-FORR.—The stern-frame of a vessel, apparently Blankanese build, marked Marianna Paulina, had been driven on shore at Jutland, together with a quantity of three inch pine planks, marked "M G;" also a quarter boat, marked "Bird, H Decker;" and an English lite-boat, name illegible. a boat marked "Mercury, Driver." The Rochester Castle has been on shore on this island

TEXTEL, DEC. 24.—A boat marked inside "John Johnson," and outside "Gee. Hull," came on shore here a few days since.

HALIFAX, DEC. 18.—The Fairfield, from St. John's, Newfoundland, was totally lost near Hamblois, on the 17th ult.; crew saved. The Mary Anne, from Sydney, Cape Breton, to this port, was totally lost in Torbay, on the 17th inst.; crew saved.

STROMNESS, DEC. 23. The weather has been fine for the last few days. Part of the materials of the Calcutta has been saved in a damaged state; the vessel still holds together.

DUNBAR, DEC. 28.—The schooner Branch, from Kirkaldy, stranded some time since, at Goat Point, two miles eastward of this port, had been got off, with very little damage, and is in dock repairing.

ST. JOHN'S, New Brunswick, DEC. 2.—The Daniel O'Connell, from Windsor to Portland, ran on a ledge, in Cranberry Isles, on the 26th ult., and must discharge. The wreck of the Borneo, of this port, from Liverpool, on shore on the beach at Cranberry-Head, has driven off, and is floating about at the entrance of the harbour.

The Oriental left the Southampton river at four, P M., on Tuesday, for Alexandria, taking out the mails for Egypt, India, and China, consisting of 80 boxes and several sacks; also upwards of 100 passengers, and a large freight of Manchester goods. The Lady Mary Wood arrived on Saturday evening, after a passage of less than seven days, from Gibraltar, bringing the damaged shaft of the Great Liverpool, which was immediately despatched into the north to be repaired, and it is expected will be ready to be shipped in the Iberia on the 10th inst. for the Liverpool, which is at Gibraltar.

INTERESTING TO MARINERS.—Through the intercession of the Hon. Grantley Berkeley, M.P., with the Trinity Board, the dangerous reef of rocks in Christchurch Bay, on the Hampshire coast, has just been properly buoyed. The rocks are known as the Christchurch Ledge, and have long been dreaded as very perilous to navigation.

VESSELS RUN DOWN AT SEA.—A vessel called the Dorothy, laden with potatoes, from Lynn, was run down between Whitby and Sunderland, by the Jane, of South Shields, on the 27th ult. Hull, when the latter sunk, with the loss of all on board, except the master and an apprentice, who were providentially picked up by the crew of the other vessel. Five seamen were lost. The night was extremely dark, and it is not yet known to whom the blame belongs. Reports have been received of the loss of the schooner Betsy, from Runcorn, off Lamley, on the 22nd inst., in consequence of coming in collision with the ship Albion, from Liverpool. Fortunately, the crew was saved by the latter, which landed them on the following day at Holyhead. The Albion was at the time on her passage to New Orleans, and the Betsy, which had a cargo of iron on board, was proceeding to Dublin. Accounts received on Saturday from North Shields, state that the steam vessel belonging to Bridlington, in attempting to enter the harbour on Thursday morning, struck on the rocks under Tynemouth Castle and the ruins of the abbey, where she remains, and it is feared she will become a total wreck, as she has makes a complete breach over her. Her crew and passengers were saved by the boats. Two tugs, during Thursday morning, were employed to get her off, and made several attempts, which, however, failed. The steamer is a fine vessel of the small coasting class.

WOOLWICH.—On Wednesday last an inquest was held at the Gun Tavern, Woolwich, on view of the body of John Mann, aged twenty-three, a gunner and driver in the 3rd battalion of the Royal Horse Artillery, who was found dead near the barracks. The deceased was found lying on his back quite dead; and, in consequence of the recent desperate fracas in the town, a report soon got currency that the deceased had died from violence. This report proved to be unfounded. It appeared by the evidence, that the deceased was found in the outer range between eight and nine o'clock on Saturday evening. He had been confined to barracks for absence from duty, and had been employed in the stable-yard. He could only have just previously obtained egress from his quarters, either by scaling a wall, or passing the sentry. Dr. Savage, assistant-surgeon to the regiment, deposed that he had made a post-mortem examination of the body; there were no external marks of violence. His heart was enlarged to double its natural size, and was the primary cause of death, accelerated by mental excitement, or probably from the exertion of running The jury, therefore, returned a verdict that the deceased died from natural causes.

POSTSCRIPT.

The Revenue for the Quarter and Financial Year ending yesterday (Friday) was made up until last evening, and we rejoice in being able to state that it shows an increase on the quarter, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, and on the year a considerable increase. In the important item of Excise on the year there is an increase of about £400,000. The Customs also exhibit an increase on the year of nearly half a million. In the Stamps there is a small decrease on the quarter. The Property and Income Tax remains much the same, averaging something more than £1,260,000 the quarter. In the assessed taxes a slight decrease occurs. The Post-office returns do not materially differ from former quarters; and the returns from the other branches of the revenue are satisfactory. On the whole, the aspect of the revenue for the last year shows a gradual increase in the trade and commerce of the country.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer and Sir James Graham visited Sir Robert Peel yesterday morning at the Right Hon. Baronet's residence in Whitehall Gardens.

Lord Stanley is expected in town this evening from Knowsley Park. Sir Peregrine Maitland, Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, is expected to embark on Monday, to enter upon his official duties.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT (Friday).—The Court met at the usual hour yesterday morning, and disposed of the remaining cases in the calendar, which only occupied about one hour.—The Court then adjourned until Monday the 5th of February.

The first day for the payment of dividends at the Bank of England, for 1844, will commence on Tuesday next, the 9th instant. The transfer books for annuities due January 5, will be opened on the following days:—Consolidated Three per Cents., on Wednesday, the 17th instant; New Three-and-Half per Cents., on Tuesday, the 16th instant: Three per Cent. Annuities, 1726, on Wednesday, the 10th instant; New Five per Cents., on Tuesday, the 9th instant; and annuities for terms of years, on Friday, the 19th instant. A considerable quantity of new sovereigns, half-sovereigns, and silver coinage has been received at the Bank during the last week from the Royal Mint, in anticipation of the demand that is likely to be made for the new gold coinage.

Between four and five o'clock in the afternoon of Thursday, a clerk in one of the London private banking houses was robbed of his case, containing several sums of money, while on his way from Princes-street to Cornhill. The case contained, amongst others, one sum of money, amounting to between £1200 and £1300, that had been paid to him at one of the leading joint-stock establishments.

NARROW ESCAPE ON THE BRIGHTON RAILWAY.—On Tuesday night a miraculous escape from a frightful accident occurred on the Shoreham branch of the London and Brighton Railway. On the arrival of the steam-packets from France in Shoreham harbour, when from stress of weather they are unable to approach the pier at Brighton, the railway company are in the habit of running a special train for the accommodation of the passengers. On the evening in question a special train left the Kingston station about nine o'clock for Brighton, and at the same time the usual train, conveying a number of passengers, left Brighton; but by some mismanagement, both trains ran on the same line. On arriving between Southwick and Hove, they met, to the great terror of the passengers. As all the trains carry a strong red light as an alarm, the engineers discovered their perilous situations from the steam of both engines was shut off, and the signal communicated to the guards to put on their breaks, which was fortunately done in time to prevent a collision.

SUICIDE THROUGH INTEMPERANCE.—An inquest was held yesterday afternoon, before Mr. Carter, at the Park Coffee-house, Worcester-street, Southwark, on the body of James Loyal Lawry, aged 45, a boot-maker, who hung himself on Tuesday afternoon last, at his own residence, No. 5, Newland-court, Redcross-street, while in a state of intoxication. The deceased was well known in the neighbourhood as an inveterate drunkard, and had been several times punished by the magistrates at Union-hall, for creating disturbance and assaulting his wife, while in a state of intoxication. It appeared that on Tuesday he went home in a state of inebriation, and asked for some tobacco, which he sent one of his daughters for. He then went to the top of the house. About half an hour afterwards his wife went up stairs to ask him down to have a cup of tea, when she found him hanging by the neck, with a black silk handkerchief round his neck, and attached to the top of the door. She immediately sent for a medical gentleman, who found life was extinct. He had formerly been in affluent circumstances in the Borough, but latterly, through misfortunes, became embarrassed, which led him to drinking. He has left a family of six children, the youngest four months old.—Verdict, "Temporary Insanity, brought on by excessive drinking."

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The Paris journals of Wednesday are nearly filled with a report of the proceedings on the day before in the bureaux of the Chamber of Deputies, for the selection of the committee on the address to the throne, to the speech from the throne. Of the nine members of the committee chosen, seven are ministerial. The Ministry announced that negociations were pending with England for a modification of the treaties with regard to the right of search, which has in a great measure silenced the Opposition, as this was the only subject on which considerable excitement had been created. In reference to this subject the Globe of last night naïvely observes, "To yield to the great measure silenced the Opposition, as this was the only subject on which considerable excitement had been created. In reference to this subject the Globe of last night naïvely observes, "To yield to the clamour of the war party in France, and to have it supposed that England is compelled to bribe the French Government into a consent to remain on friendly terms with her, would not, in the long run, be the way to cement that alliance, and render it available for the peace of Europe."

SPAIN.—Our accounts from Madrid are of the 28th ult. Great excitement prevailed in consequence of the suspension of the Cortes on the previous day, which is regarded by numerous parties as a gross violation of the constitution. The Heraldo says, that after the Minister had read the suspension decree in the Senate, a number of senators crowded round him, and expressed to him their satisfaction "at the adoption of a measure which would certainly tend to enable the Government to adopt resolutions calculated to consolidate the throne, public order, and liberty." The Corresponsal, Eco del Comercio, and Espectador strongly condemned the measure

Carnival Capaccini, the Pope's Internuncio at Lisbon, was expected at Madrid, to arrange the religious differences between Spain and the Holy See.

The arrival of our ambassador, Mr. Bulwer, is anxiously expected, as an indication of the part England means to take in the disorder of affairs. His reception and dining with Louis Philippe look like an accordance between the two Governments, and it is to be hoped, therefore, that the spirit of rivalry between the two nations in Peninsular affairs will give way to a good understanding, and that there will no longer be a French party and an English party.

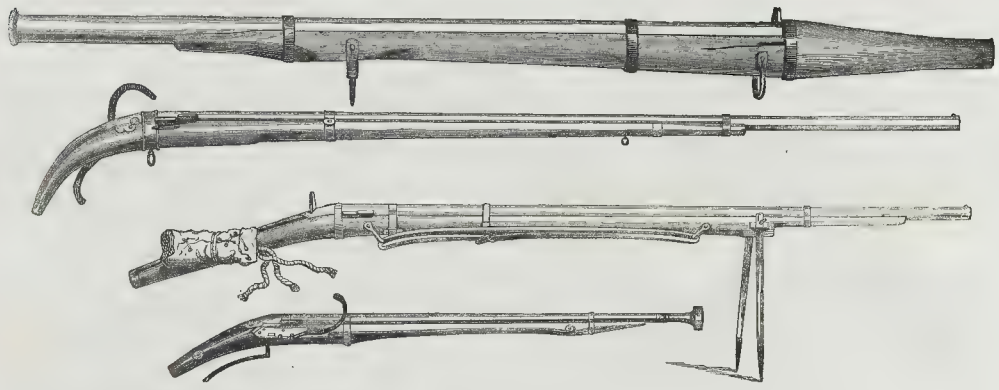
A suspension of hostilities during one month had been agreed to between Baron de Meer and General Ametler, the commander of the insurgent garrison of Figueras.

At the Lambeth-street Police-office on Thursday, an engineer, named Nehemiah Shakspeare, was held to bail on a charge of having wilfully caused or permitted the explosion of a steam boiler, by which the lives of upwards of seventy individuals were placed in jeopardy. The Messrs. Johnston, of Gloucester-street, on whose premises the occurrence took place, are the prosecutors.

WARD OF FARRINGDON WITHOUT.—A petition is in preparation, to be presented on Plough Monday, against the following gentlemen, on the ground of disqualification, viz.:—Messrs. Richard Taylor, Robert Obbard (deputy), Edward Hodgson, and W. Gresham. The circumstance has caused a considerable sensation throughout the ward.

Whenever mortals have inspired a passion for spirits, that passion has always been the germ of infelicity. However strongly it may have been developed, or however ardently reciprocated, disastrous results have invariably been the result. Mortals never yet made matches with spirits. Of their having loved them fondly, we have heard, but in the annals of spirits there is nothing like an absolute match of the kind on record. Nor is this to be lamented. Spirits may indeed do for mortals to love, but they certainly will not do for mortals to marry. They couldn't guide, they couldn't govern, they couldn't hold them. Of all flighty wives they would be the most flighty. They might dance very well, they might sing very well, they might look very well, and be very enchanting, but they would be found to be fit to love only in imagination. It is true that in all cases there is much imagination in love: two-thirds of it is generally composed of imagination; but when love is all imagination, they by whom it is cherished are much to be pitied.—Sylvester Sound.

CHINESE TROPHIES, AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

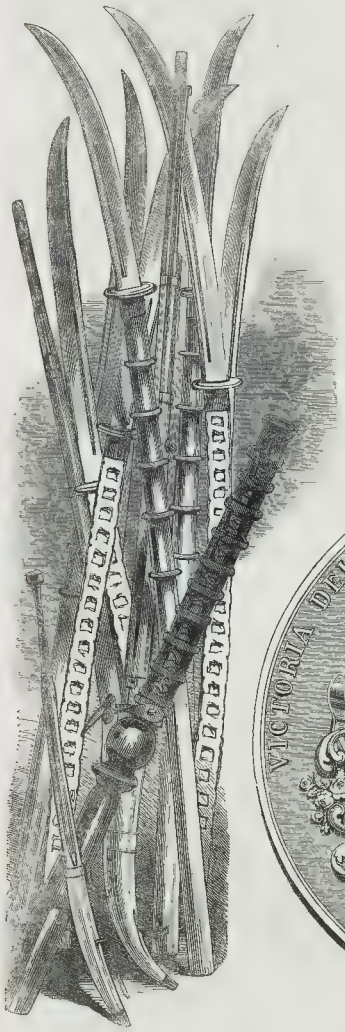


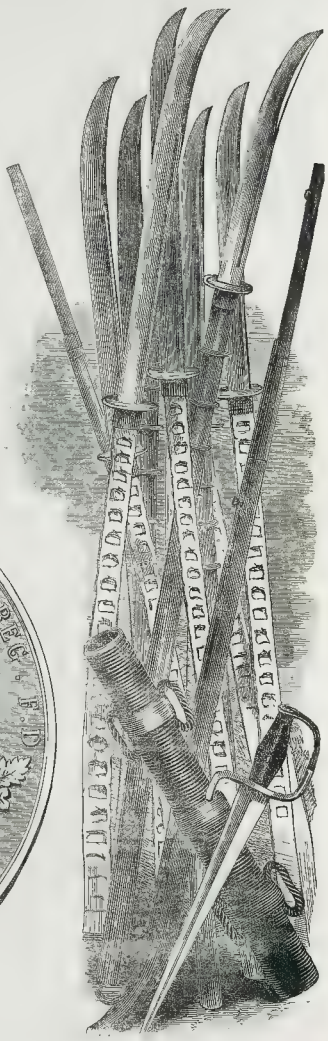
CHINESE TROPHIES.

A very interesting collection of military weapons, taken during the Chinese war by the gallant crew of her Majesty's steamer Nemesis, Commander Hall, has recently been presented to her Majesty at Windsor by the officers of the vessel, and are now, by the gracious permission of her Majesty, in the course of exhibition to the private visitors of the Castle. By express command we have been favoured with an opportunity of drawing them, and they are copied in the accompanying engravings. These "celestial" trophies are very superior in their proportion, workmanship, and adaptation to the purposes of offensive warfare—for John Chinaman, in the simplicity of his valorous arrangements, seldom dreams of making defensive preparations; and they exemplify in a curious manner the comparatively accelerated growth of a semi-civilised people in the belligerent arts, in preference to those of a more peaceful character. One of the swords and several of the guns might almost be taken for European productions, and to not a few political alarmists they will without doubt suggest a host of Russian associations. The collection comprises several very elegant matchlocks, of the lengths of 5 feet, 5 feet 11 inches, and 6 feet 6 inches; a blunderbuss 4 feet in length, and a cannon 2 feet 8 inches, both constructed in the manner of the ringed guns of the time of Edward III.; a number of pike-like swords, from 4 to 6 feet in length, fitted with banded or indented handles for securing the weapons a steady grasp; and some straight swords, with double edges and modern guards. In these weapons, the "sights," matches, rests, slings, temper, edge, &c., exhibit considerable practical knowledge of the arts of gunnery and the use of the sword.

As an appropriate pendant to these national memorials of a war which we trust may never be resuscitated, we have added a cut, drawn, for the sake of clearness, on a scale somewhat larger than the original, of the great seal for Hong Kong. It is the first ever struck for the use of a British Sovereign in the Chinese dominions, and as such will be prized by the historian as much as it will interest the general reader. The design for it was made and the die sunk by Mr. B. Wyon, her Majesty's medallist in chief; and we regard the whole work as a successful, because suitable, effort of his established skill and ingenuity. The tablet at bottom displays a view of Hong Kong, with an English and Chinese vessel trading in the harbour. All colonial seals are, in this respect, designed on a similar principle.

In another part of our paper will be found some important but inauspicious news from this newly-acquired colony.





GREAT SEAL FOR HONG-KONG.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT. DRAWN BY M. BAUGNIET.

PRINCE ALBERT.

Prince!—more in principle than high estate!—Old Play.

Consort of the fairest Queen
That our favour'd Isle hath seen,—
'Tis a heart-felt joy to find
One of such a gentle mind:—
Who, though part of Majesty,
Yet can all the subject be—
Mixing with each loyal throng
That about—around—along
The pathway of thy Partner moves;—
Sharing in that best of loves
A People's adoration—truth—
Worshipp'd from the earliest youth
Of Her whose Sovereign smile can bless
The Nation e'en in its distress!

All hail! young Albert!—princely—great—
We never can another meet,
Who'll give the jointure of his dow'r,
The deed of influence and pow'r,
So readily to Science—Art—
And all things else which bear a part
In that divine Philosophy
Whose angle's in the farthest sky;
(And which we only here subtend)
The rich man's fav'rite, poor one's friend;
The peaceful, yet if wish'd the bold,
As any warrior sire of old.
We greet thee Albert! doubly wed
To England, and to England's Head
And heart, where Royalty reposes
(Pray Heav'n! long time!) on bed of roses! W.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON CAUGHT "NAPPING."—At the conclusion o the banquet at Windsor Castle, on Tuesday week last, her Majesty and Prince Albert, with their distinguished guests, retired as usual to the green drawing room, the Queen's private band being stationed in the adjoining apartment (the crimson drawing-room) the folding doors of which were thrown open. In the course of the evening her Majesty left the private apartment, arm in arm with the Duke of Wellington, and seated herself with the Duke on her right hand, and surrounded by the court, near the band. After listening to the performance of two or three compositions, the Queen rose from her seat to retire, a movement which was, of course, followed by the whole of the royal party, with the exception of the Duke, who had fallen into a profound nap. Her Majesty, smiling, and evidently enjoying the involuntary forgetfulness of his Grace, playfully tapped the Duke on his shoulder with her bouquet, which speedily brought him from a state of momentary oblivion to perfect consciousness, when the Queen, with a gracious smile (amidst the suppressed titterings of the illustrious guests), made his Grace a low curtesey, and, taking the noble warrior's arm in the most kind and affectionate manner, and laughing the while, proceeded from the crimson to the green drawing-room, where coffee was served.

THE DUC DE BORDEAUX.—On Sunday morning, after attending mass at the Roman Catholic chapel, at Stonehouse, near Plymouth, his Royal Highness the Duc de Bordeaux, travelling under the title of Count de Chambord, embarked in the barge of the Commander in Chief, Admiral Sir D. Milne, Bart., and went on board the Sylph tender. His Royal Highness then proceeded to the Breakwater, and after inspecting that great national work returned to the harbour, and went on board the Astrea, "to give," as her gallant captain, N. Lockyer, C.B., receiving his Royal Highness with yards manned. The duke and party were shown over this splendid vessel, when his Royal Highness did not fail to express his gratification. On Monday morning, about half-past ten, the Duke visited the Dockyard and made a general survey of the establishment, all the officers being in attendance at their respective departments to give every information. All the respects and courtesy usually shown to foreign noblemen of distinction have been paid by the authorities to the Royal Duke.

A matrimonial alliance is said to be on the tapis between the Rev. Lord Augustus Fitzclarence and Miss Gordon, grand-daughter of the Marquis of Huntley.

MABEL MARCHMONT.

By THOMAS MILLER.

AUTHOR OF "GODFREY MALVERN," "GIDEON GILES," "ROYSTON GOWER," "RURAL SKETCHES," "A DAY IN THE WOODS," "BEAUTIES OF THE COUNTRY," ETC.

OD'S will be done, my child," exclaimed old Abraham Marchmont, pressing his granddaughter Mabel affectionately, and raising her eyes from the holy volume, which was laid open upon his knees.

"Amen," echoed Mabel, as she bent lower over the garden chair, while her long brown ringlets mingled with the silver hairs of her grandfather—a hoary head, which threescore and ten winters had whitened. "God hath been very kind to us," added she, in a soft and tremulous voice. A tear rolled down her damask cheek as she spoke, and fell upon the old man's wrinkled hand.

"She may not be dead," murmured Abraham to himself; "it is that I fear;" and for several moments he remained silent.

"How beautiful are all His works," said the old man, his thoughts wandering for the moment from the subject they had been conversing upon, as he pointed to the western sky, broken into a thousand masses of luminous gold, into which the sun seemed fast sinking.

"Beautiful," murmured Mabel, raising her eyes, while her thoughts fell backward to the feelings nearest her heart, and she saw only the splendour of the evening sunset, as we catch glimpses of gaudy visions in a dream.

As the venerable old man sat in silence, contemplating the beauty of the sky, his thoughts wandered to Milton's description of the return of the Son of God when he had driven Satan and his angels down the yawning precipice, and all the hosts of Heaven marched forth with bannered gold, and welcomed back the Holy Victor. Such seemed the sun—so stretched the clouds, like a mighty and armed host, rank above rank, along the western steep of Heaven—armour, and banner, and plume, and helmet, blazing in gold—broad and far along the whole skirt of the bending sky.

It was but for a few moments, and his thoughts trod painfully backward, as his eyes glanced upon the open Bible—to the beautiful history of Ruth, which he had been reading—and with a heart full, almost to breaking, he said in a sorrowful tone of voice, "Thou hast been long with me. Mabel, thou hast been unto me what Ruth was to the widowed Naomi—my home has been thy home—we are the last of a long race, and I have hoped and prayed that thou alone mayest be with me when I close mine aged eyes, and sink in silence into the arms of Death."

"Speak not so sadly, dear grandfather," answered Mabel, as she threw her arms around the old man's neck, "Speak not so, or you will break my heart. I will never leave you—I never wished to leave you, strongly as you have urged my marriage with Alfred. Much as we both love him—you pain me when you name it, and yet it is ever uppermost on your lips."

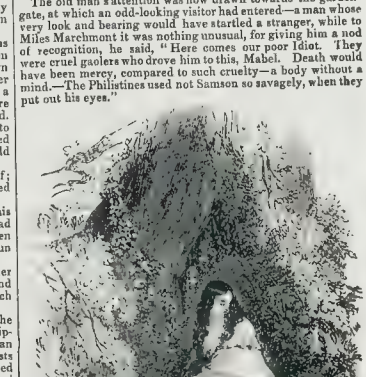
"True, true. Thou wert ever a good child," replied her grandfather, "and I am very old and foolish; it may be somewhat selfish too, now, Mabel; yet thy happiness is dearer to me than mine own. I know not why I should wish to retain one blossom on the withered bough, when all the rest have fallen off and are dead. I would, and I would not—I am fickle as a child—and yet I should like to see thee made happy before I die. The old cottage will be large enough for us all! On that threshold I welcomed home thy father and mother from church—beneath this roof thou wert born from out this doorway they were carried to their last home—and I——"

Tears choked his further utterance; Memory rose up before him, with bowed head and drooping hair—her wan finger pointing to the outstretched and sleeping sea of graves—that silent sea, whose green waves heave but once into hillocks, then freeze down into the ridgy roofs of the dead, silent and motionless for ever. For every sigh we heave for the past is a nipping winter stealing upon the summer of the present, and blighting the very bloom on which the heart has set its choicest pride. Unseen, and too often unmarked by ourselves, we hang over the brink of the grave, wearing, footstep by footstep away, pining for what, while living we valued not aright—for what, when dead, will like ourselves rest a clod of the valley—the soil from which other hopes and loves will spring, and pine, and die.

Abraham Marchmont had seen wife and child carried over his threshold, and consigned to their tranquil resting place—to that solemn spot—where he had heard the earth fall hollow and sepulchral on the coffin-lids of his own father and mother, years, years, agone, "each in their narrow cell for ever laid."

Still Mabel hung about him like a thing of light, whose brightness might chase away all memory of the grave—the last link between him and Eternity. Yet, through her face, Death often peeped in upon the old man; it was like her mother's, she whom his own soul loved, that only son his wife had worshipped, those lips his own aged father had often kissed. So "coil by coil unwound" whenever he looked steadfastly on Mabel, when he gazed on the summer of her beauty, and thought of the winter "which had been."

The old man's attention was now drawn towards the garden-gate, at which an odd-looking visitor had entered—a man whose very look and bearing would have startled a stranger, while to Miles Marchmont it was nothing unusual, for giving him a nod of recognition, he said, "Here comes our poor Idiot. They were cruel gaolers who drove him to this, Mabel. Death would have been mercy, compared to such cruelty—a body without a mind.—The Philistines used not Samson so savagely, when they put out his eyes."



"I will leave you alone with him, grandfather," said Mabel "my spirits are already sadly depressed. Poor gentleman," she added, looking at the visitor, "I often wonder what he could have done, that they should have used him so unmercifully."

"There is some mystery connected with his misfortunes, which few know saving the old lady at the Manor House, where he resides," answered the old man. "The terrible and un-English plan of imprisonment has driven him to what he is—the Silent System and Solitary Confinement,—which I cannot even name without feeling ashamed of my country, for adopting such a savage and unnatural punishment."

Mabel heaved a deep sigh, cast a silent and pitiful glance on the poor Idiot, then opening a little wicket at the far end of the garden, crossed the adjoining field, and entered the neighbouring wood—her favourite walk and one which her mother had often selected on a summer evening. There is something almost holy in such places: they are hallowed by the memory of those we loved when living—and in some moods, the dead seem to be with us, we hear them speak as they were wont to speak in the remembered days of old.

Meantime the new comer had amused himself by plucking the choicest flowers in the garden, which he placed in every button-hole of his coat, and having filled these, he commenced planting them round his hat-band, until he completed the wreath; then came up to the old man laughing, unconscious of the havoc he had made.

Poor fellow! it made the heart ache only to look at him. His face had once borne God's image, and been stamped with manly dignity. The high forehead was there, a waste pile, untenanted. The deep sunk eyes, that had once marked the man of thought, now lacked instre: their fire was quenched; or, in moments of anger, flamed with an unnatural light; the mild gaze was gone; they either blazed or were extinguished. The golden throne of reason had been overturned. The Goths and Vandals of our Gaols had been at work: they had killed the mind, and turned the living body loose into the world!

"Oh, God!" exclaimed the old man, rising from his garden chair, and looking at the poor Idiot, "thou only knowest what this poor creature endured in his solitary cell, until his silence and his sufferings drove him mad. 'Repent and live,' are written in letters of light on the pages of Thy Holy Book—characters worthy of being emblazoned on the gates of Heaven. Despair and Die stand cast in letters of iron over the prison gates that darken our land, as if marking those damnable abodes where Hope enters not. Oh, dreadful thought! to know that there was no human voice to comfort him—no human footfall to break that terrible silence—nothing but his own burning thoughts and aching heart—sickening and sinking day by day, and night after night. Horrible! horrible!—even the fiends find companionship. Poor fellow! Death unto thee would indeed have been an Angel of Mercy."

Miles Marchmont then seized the arm of the Idiot, and attempted to amuse him, just as he would have done a child, by gathering him flowers, and giving him fruit; putting the latter into his mouth; for he would have swallowed hemlock, had it been offered to him.

He was now gentle, simple, and foolish as a new-born babe; and very few weeks had wrought this melancholy change. Powerful friends had rescued him from solitary confinement and death; they just saved the living body, and no coroner's inquest was held over the DEAD MIND. He had been refractory; had cursed his savage gaolers; had yelled and shouted; had prayed aloud for death. So they gave him darkness. They thrust him into a deep, dark, silent cell; alive, they buried him; then, cruel mercy! put food into his coffin, and made the dead-living man eat. A dead man suddenly awakening to life, in his dark grave, could not have listened more attentively for a sound than he did after his first struggles were over: motionless and silent did he listen in the deep darkness, hour after hour. No sound came: he held his breath—he could not hear for his own loud breathing; he held his breath, and then his heart knocked awfully loud against his bosom—his very soul seemed struggling to get free, as if it loathed the living body imprisoned in that vaulted coffin. But the mind was not yet dead; it aroused the body, and the man once more sprung up; like a newly-captured lion, he stalked to and fro in his horrible den. He paced madly his three limited strides, striking his hot head against the cold stones, unconscious of what he did. The beaded drops stood thick upon his burning brow; his tongue clave to the roof of his mouth with parching thirst; yet his savage keepers gave him no drink. He might have been caged up in the centre of a desolate and sandy desert, where never was heard the voice of man, and looked for pity among the howling wolves that thirsted to lap his blood, as sought for it in that deep, cold, stony, and silent cell. Then he knelt down, and prayed for death—with clasped hands and streaming eyes did he pray to die. But even Death seemed to shun that horrible abode, and to pass on with a shudder, leaving the wretched living to die, without a blow from his friendly dart—pitying and passing on, and leaving the coffined-living to his emissaries the gaolers: for Death knew that there was but a wall between them and his own dominions—the quiet realms of the grave.

So days of agony passed, until his thoughts became knotted, and he had no separate idea; all was massed in confusion; his very mind was numbed; one great overpowering agony had seized upon each lesser sense, and left no room for cessation. His thoughts had locked themselves up in one great pain; a mountain seemed to have settled upon his head, and crushed flat the mind beneath its pressure. Then they brought him forth into the light—silent, solitary, blinding light—and he smiled, played with his fingers, and thanked them, for light and darkness were now alike to him. The sun of his reason was fast setting, and gleamed sadly upon the ruins of a shattered intellect and broken heart. Then the white walls seemed to make faces at him; and he "mopped and mowed," and returned their mocking grimaces. He could not even see the cold unfeeling eye gazing upon him through the trap-hole in the door, while he was making armies of straw, and laughing as he blew his combatants together. Formerly, he felt low, sinking, and hungry; and yet, when his food was slided in, he could not eat it, for it was not hunger, but despair, that preyed upon him. But now this pang had passed. The slow poison springing from that horrible bite had crept through every vein, and poisoned every drop of healthful blood. He now devoured all that was given to him, and gnashed his teeth at his keepers. His body held the mastery over his mind. His hands had triumphed, and, by the aid of his brutal gaolers, forced the food into his mouth which his soul loathed—for there was no friend there kind enough to help him to die. They crammed food into his throat, and left it in his coffin: their only dread was lest he should die.

His friends were then written to: and he was allowed once more to mingle with his fellow-men. This living body, without a mind, was turned out of its grave into the sunshine, and it looked round, as if it expected to find the earth desolate; clapped its hands to its ears, and ran from the sound of living voices; sought dark and silent corners, in which to hide itself; until, at last, it became reconciled to the face of man; licking like a dog, the hand that fed it, yet lacking the sagacity which that faithful animal so often shows towards man.

And now he came fondling and caressing old Miles Marchmont, for he knew by instinct that the old man was kind to him, and was now rubbing his face against his hands; then trying to catch him a bird, chasing a bee, or plucking a flower, or sometimes peeping into the cottage window to see if supper was forthcoming, for kind old Miles Marchmont used to cut his food into small pieces, and feed him with it.

God waiteth his own good time: the day of reckoning is sure to come; that day when, if He stirreth up the rage of man, the thunder-fires of Heaven will plough deep the blackened graves for these dens of cruelty, tyranny, and savage oppression, and leave them, like the Cities of the Plain, marked only by the sullen and weltering waves, to tell of the great iniquities buried beneath. The grim and weather-beaten gibbet-posts, on which the bleached bones and rusty irons hung and shook, and rattled in the wind, were not half so hideous to the imagination as these silent slaughter-houses are, to which thousands of our fellow-creatures are now yearly consigned. There stood the deed, marked by its dreadful doom, a hideous and shocking reality, beneath which the wicked shuddered, and the good man prayed. Death then claimed his victims in the open noon of day, but now he has to dive into deep cells and silent prisons, where the flapping of his wings spread no awe, where the voice of Pity is never heard, "where the wicked never cease from troubling and the weary are never at rest," until hushed in the lap of our mother earth, where they sleep the sleep that awakens not, until the last trumpet has sounded

But we must leave the old man and his visitor for a brief period, and follow the footsteps of the beautiful and disconsolate Mabel, into the dim twilight of the greenwood, where she wandered alone, hanging her head aside, and looking very unhappy. "She may not be dead," were the words that rung in Mabel's ear, for they had been uttered more than once during the day by her grandfather, and the very thought was enough to make a maiden, who loved like Mabel, very miserable.

Alfred Etherington, Mabel's accepted lover and intended husband, had, at the age of seventeen, married a young lady scarcely six months older than himself. It was a childish match—a boarding-school courtship; where they made love over the high wall of the old Manor House, and ate the peaches to show their constancy. A gold watch presented by the young lady won the consent of the governess, who had little to care for, saving her half-year's salary, and perhaps the more readily consented, as notice had been given that the "lady-love" was to quit the academy at the expiration of the six months. Alfred succeeded equally as well with the old person, with whom he was a favourite; and as there was no one at hand who had any interest in prohibiting the bans, the "boy and girl" were made "man and wife." The village bells rang merrily on the occasion, and, saving that by night the ringers were drunk, nothing remarkable occurred until about a week afterwards, when the young lady's guardian (while she was out nutting with her husband in the woods) drove up to the old Manor House in a post-chaise for the purpose of taking her from school. An explanation of course took place. Mrs. Etherington was sought, and found; she shook her ringed finger at her guardian, talked about love and death, and in one or two hours afterwards was seated beside her guardian in the post-chaise, waving her white handkerchief at her husband as she departed; while he, poor fellow, stood with both hands thrust into the very bottom of his trousers-pockets, whistling a most melancholy air.

The young lady's guardian seemed to be a man of the world; he made, to use a homely phrase, "but little bother about the matter," said "what was done could not be undone;" spoke about settlements, and the necessity of two days' absence—of bringing back some of her friends from London, and celebrating the marriage in high style; and away went the chaise, post-boys and all, and from that day to the evening Mabel wandered alone in the greenwood, the "bonny bride" was never seen. Three months after her departure, however, a letter sealed with black, and bearing the French post-mark, reached the disconsolate husband, and told him in pretty plain language that his young wife was dead, requesting him also to make no further enquiries about her family, but, like a good boy, to draw his two hundred pounds annually, which was invested in the funds, and spend it in the best way he might choose.

Of course he went into mourning, engraved the name of Amy (for he never knew her by any other name, and it was short) on many a tree; tried his hand at an elegy, and could not, for the life of him, find a rhyme to correspond with the second line of the first verse, for it was "coffin'd;" was much courted and petted by all the young ladies in the boarding-school; had sly hints thrown out by old mothers who had marriageable daughters, that it was mocking Providence to mourn so long for the dead, and that so young a man, with two hundred a year, and so many lovely faces about him, ought to seek for comfort in—TWO HUNDRED a year. A widow of fifty felt for him like a mother, wished only that he were her child. One of sixty could not look at him, but upon him, he so much resembled her poor dear husband when he was young. Another of forty had commenced a novel upon him, entitled "The Mysteries of the Manor House;" and had actually invited him to tea to hear the first volume read. While Misses without end beset him—beginning with bib and tucker, and ending with a terrible bustle—of sighs, besetments, ogles, hems, whispers, &c. &c. &c.

So four years glided away; and at the expiration of that time he became acquainted with honest Miles Marchmont. He was then a young man, and Mabel a maiden under sixteen, yet the mistress of her grandsire's household; and never yet was found matron who bore her new dignity with greater honour than did our youthful Mabel. Everything she did became her. Whether she helped her grandfather's servants to brew or bake, cream or churn, she still looked the mistress.

> She was the prettiest low born lass that ever
> Ran on the greensward. Nothing she did but seemed > To smack of something greater than herself—
> Too noble for her place. SHAKSPEARE.

And Alfred loved her—loved her like a man; "he who does more is no man." Here we give a whole blank volume to be filled up by the imagination of our readers. It begins with what he said, and ends with what he did: it is sweet and very pastoral.

"She may not be dead," said and sighed sweet Mabel. A woodbine in love could not have sighed or said it more sweetly, although it had wooed its opposite neighbour of the dell, the wild rose, between the twain of which our Mabel then walked, "half spied, so thick the blushing roses round about her blowed."

"Hang not thy head aside, sweet Mabel, like Desdemona's maid," called Barbara; "who had a song, an old thing it was, called 'Willow, willow, willow,' and who went about the house all day singing it;" a picture which only the poet has painted, shame to our artists! though he whom she loved proved false.

We knew not, Mabel, but that the musk-rose of the dell (a pearl-flushed and perfumed home, hung in a silent world of green,) may in summer time nourish some fair spirit amid its fragrance. We cannot tell what the butterflies say to the flowers when they shake the downy silver from their folded wings, and give unto them a fresher bloom. The golden-belted bees may have a language of their own sweeter than the murmuring that we hear, and with which they allure the blossoms to give up their honey. The brook babbling to the bulrushes may possess eloquence which is lost upon us, and dies away among the whisperings of the tufted reeds. The lettered flowers that strew the dale may be the pages of a book, which only the hovering angels can read, and thy fate may be recorded therein, dear Mabel.

Nay! droop not thy pretty head!—the sun is fast sinking. "She may be dead," dear Mabel. The wild roses above thy brow, and the grey old stem against which thou leanest, can tell thee nothing. The forest-brook brawling along between its mossy banks, will but add to thy melancholy by its sound, my Mabel. Hie thee home to him who loves thee with a holy love, for the round moon will soon arise, and the song of the nightingale (which silly poets have written so much about) will turn thy poor brain. Thy chamber-window, with its snow-white curtains, peeps through the twinkling leaves of the vine, and seems to look for thee through the last gleam of sunset. Even thy bird hanging in the open casement bath called thee home. Although fairies sleep under the blossoms after sunset, dear Mabel, the dreamy old wood is a safer couch for thy beauty than the sin-stifled streets of cities. But the night air is cold, and the blue of the twilight grows deeper; as for the blossoms, they are all asleep—so good night, love-lorn Mabel.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE TWELFTH-NIGHT KING.

(From Beranger.)

BY LEWIS FILMORE.

Thanks to the chance! Your King am I,—
Your homage pay in song and wine!
And while the festive moments fly
This circlet on my brow shall shine.
On rank and power each heart is bent
And to ambition all are prone,
Who with his Star would be content,
When he like I could wear a Crown?

The King upon a brow of care
Must place the weight of gold and gem;
The Shepherd too a crown can wear,—
But wreathes it of the ivy-stem.
With Care the King his splendour buys,
The Shepherd's wreath Love twines alone—
The "gold-bound brow" of slumber flies,
The Shepherd sleeps—yet wears his Crown.

The poet pants—the warrior burns,—
To live in verse—to shine in story—
That brow a double laurel earns,
For which song gilds the deeds of Glory.
He's more than king who both commands—
And though he fall 'neath Fortune's frown,
And lose the sceptre from his hands,
He still, of Merit, wears the Crown.

My subjects fair! the bloom of youth
And innocence is on your brow,
And soon will men, the foes of Truth,
Bend humbler than to kings they bow;
Kings walk amid deceitful snares,
Man's falsehood often all unknown,—
If Beauty heeds what flattery swears,
How soon may beauty lose her Crown?

Ah! lose a Crown!—such words of fear
Should bid me think of keeping mine;
Come! in my reign be each a peer!
While free from tax shall flow my wine.
So drink, my subjects! drink with me,
Nor, till the midnight hour has flown,
'Mid song, and dance, and festive glee,
Will I resign my chance-drawn Crown.

LITERATURE.

HISTORY OF DROGHEDA; AND ITS ENVIRONS; WITH A MEMOIR OF THE DUBLIN AND DROGHEDA RAILWAY.

A work, thus entitled, has just issued from the Dublin press, in two volumes, 8vo., embellished with twenty beautiful views, taken on the spot by Mr. John R. Jones, and which are superiorly engraved on steel by Mr. Edward Radclyffe. Four maps will further illustrate these scenes of deep historic interest, where the commerce of Ireland was fostered, English Government established, and the present royal succession secured upon the throne, by the memorable battle of the Boyne. The history is compiled by Mr. Dalton, of Summer-hill, Dublin, a member of the Irish bar, well known for his antiquarian researches and dispassionate historic works, and we trust he will meet that support and co-operation in this country, which this disinterested effort to advance the literature of his own, at the present crisis and at his own risk, should command, independent of the beauty, interest, and cheapness of the publication.

THE MAGAZINES FOR JANUARY.

The prime month of the year is usually rife with first numbers; the accessions to the magazine rank are, however, this year but few; still there are manifestations of improvement in the old favourites; so that, altogether, there is abundant promise of an increase of entertainment for that very numerous and widely-spread species—"the reader."

Foremost of the new comers is "Hood's Magazine and Comic Miscellany," opening with the Haunted House, a romance by the editor; an exquisite blending of the pathetic and the picturesque, and altogether true poetry, reminding us of the author's "Eugene Aram." Here is a specimen:—

> O er all there hung shadow of a fear,
> A sense of mystery the spirit daunted,
> And said, as plain as whisper in the ear,
> The place is Haunted!
>
> The Death Watch ticked behind the pannell'd oak,
> Inexplicable tremors shook the arras,
> And echoes strange and mystical awoke,
> The fancy to embarrass
>
> Prophetic hints that filled the soul with dread,
> But their one gloomy entrance pointed mostly,
> The while some secret inspiration said,
> That Chamber is the Ghostly!
>
> Across the door no gossamer festoon
> Swung pendulous—no web—no dusty fringes,
> No silky abr sales or white cocoon
> About its nooks and hinges.
>
> The spider shunn'd the interdicted room,
> The moth, the beetle, and the fly were banish'd,
> And where the sunbeam fell, athwart the gloom
> The very midge had vanish'd.
>
> One lonely ray that glanced upon a Bed,
> As if with awful aim direct and certain,
> To show the BLOODY HAND in burning red
> Embroidered on the curtain.
>
> And yet no gory stain was on the quilt—
> The pillow in its place had slowly rotted;
> The floor alone retain'd the trace of guilt,
> Those boards obscurely spotted.
>
> Obscurely spotted to the door, and thence
> With many doubles to the grated casement—
> Oh what a tale they told of fear intense,
> Of horror and amazement!
>
> What human creature in the dead of night
> Had come'd like hunted hare that cruel distance?
> Has sought the door, the window, in his flight,
> Striving for dear existence?
>
> What shrieking Spirit in that bloody room
> Its mortal frame had violently quitted?

Across the sunbeam, with a sudden gloom,
A ghostly Shadow flitted.

Across the sunbeam, and along the wall,
But paused on the air as very dimly,
It hardly well'd the tapestry at all,
Or portrait frowning grimly.

O'er all there hung the shadow of a fear,
A sense of mystery the spirit daunted,
And said, as plain as whisper in the ear,
The place is haunted!

Poetry, and that of the best order, is everywhere plentifully sprinkled through the number: it is full of pleasant pungency and epigrammatic point, as in "A Tale of Temper."

There is a capital dourderie report of the Irish Rebellion, a sort of rejuvenescence of the Comic Annual. We have not space to particularise further, but must sum up by adding, that the entire Number is in Mr. Hood's raciest vein; and wishing success to "The Comic Miscellany."

MAXWELL'S HISTORY OF THE REBELLION IN IRELAND IN 1798, is another first appearance of the serial class, and promises to be a sound as well as attractive record; the authorities quoted prove the author's research, and each page sparkles with his vivid style of narrative. The subject is extremely interesting at this moment, by way of parallel, so that we doubt not Mr. Maxwell's work will soon spring into popularity. It is to be issued in parts, each illustrated with plates by George Cruikshank; those in the present number are the "Surprise of the Barrack of Prosperous," and the "Arrest of Lord Edward Fitzgerald."

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT resumes the "Proceedings in Eden," and brings the travellers home. The satire is so very smart, that the dose must be pleasant, even to the subjects; thus —

From Mr. Moddle to Eden is an easy and natural transition. Mr. Moddle, living in the atmosphere of Miss Pecksniff's love, dwelt (if he had but known it in a terrestrial paradise. The thriving city of Eden was also a terrestrial paradise, but Surprise of the Barrack of Prosperous," and the "Arrest of Lord Edward Fitzgerald."

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT resumes the "Proceedings in Eden," and brings the travellers home. The satire is so very smart, that the dose must be pleasant, even to the subjects; thus —

From Mr. Moddle to Eden is an easy and natural transition. Mr. Moddle, living in the atmosphere of Miss Pecksniff's love, dwelt (if he had but known it in a terrestrial paradise. The thriving city of Eden was also a terrestrial paradise, but unconscious of its prop erors. The beautiful Miss Pecksniff might have been poetically described as a something too good for man in his fallen and degraded state. That was exactly the character of the thriving city of Eden, as pro-perly enlightened by Zephaniah Scadder, General Choke and other worthies: part and parcel of the talons of that great American Eagle, which is always trying itself sky high in pursuit after, and never, no, never, never, thumbs down, with draggled wings, into the mud.

Next is an unmistakeable portrait of one of the steam-boat passengers. —

He had straight black hair, parted up the middle of his head, and hanging down upon his coat; a little fringe of hair upon his chin; wore no neckcloth; a white hat; a suit of black, long in the sleeves, and short in the legs; soiled brown stockings, and iced shoes. His complexion, naturally muddy, was rendered muddier by too strict an economy of soap and water; and the same observation will apply to the washable part of his attire, which he might have changed with comfort to himself, and gratification to his friends. He was about five-and thirty; was crushed and jammed up in a heap under the shade of a large green cotton umbrella: and rum mated over his tobacco-pug like a sow

Here is a vignette of an English home :—

It was one of those unaccountable little rooms which are never seen anywhere but in a tavern, and are supposed to have got into taverns by reason of the facilities afforded to the architect for getting drunk while engaged in their construction. It had more corners in it than the brain of an obstinate man; was full of mad closets, into which nothing could be put that was not specially invented and made for that purpose; had mysterious shelvings and bulk heads, and inclinations of staircases in the ceiling; and was elaborately provided with a bell that rung in the room itself, about two feet from the handle, and had no connection whatever with any other part of the establishment. It was a little below the pavement and abutted close upon it; so that passengers grated against the window panes with their buttons, and scraped it with their backs; and fearful boys suddenly coming between a thoughtful guest and the light, deified him, or put out their tongues as if he were a pugilism; or made white knobs on the ends of their noses by flattening the same against the glass, and vanished awfully like spectres.

The scene of "the great Mr. Pecksniff, the celebrated architect," and "the member for the gentlemanly interest," making "a kind of dirt-pie," and laying the first stone of a grammar-school, is capital throughout; for it turns out to be Martin's design, the villain Pecksniff having only put four windows in and spoilt it. We like this showing up of the petty larcenies of the world of art.

AINSWORTH'S MAGAZINE has added to its contribution-roll Mrs. S. C. Hall, Camilla Toulmin, and Leigh Hunt; and graceful additions they are. Mrs. Hall's paper is well-timed—"The Long Hours," and glances at the sufferings of "the fevered dressmaker" and "the suffocated shopman," and other specimens of white slavery. The editor's contributions are his own portrait, after Maclise, and the commencement of his long-promised "St. James's, or the Court of Queen Anne," with a pair of good interior scenes. Leigh Hunt's paper on the Honey of Mount Hybla, is pleasant, classical, and Indicatorish; for the hint he thanks Messrs. Fortnum and Mason's shop-window. The paper headed "Charles Dickens," is a review of his most recent works; but the writer is not in his forte.

(To be continued.)

NIGHT.

For the Night cometh when no man can labour.

Night is coming—when no man may labour,
When sleeps in its scabbard the warrior's sabre,
When the huntsman has wound his last call, and the rover
Casts anchor for ever: Life's voyage is over:
Night is coming!

Night is coming: we go to our fathers—
To the regions of shades, where Eternity gathers
The sheaves of Death's reaping—the spoils of his sickle,
The brave and true-hearted, the craven and fickle:
Night is coming!

Night is coming: the head that is hoary
Shares the low pillow with mankind in glory
The bright brow of boyhood, the fond breast of woman,
The monarch and menial, clansman and foeman:
Night is coming!

Night is coming: Joy comes in the morning;
It comes to the free soul, sin's tyranny scorning;
It comes to the souls who could "love one another,"
And lay down life's coil for the good of a brother:
Night is coming!

Night is coming: but a night that is deeper
Shall flap with its foul wings the soul of the sleeper
Who sleepeth sin's slumber, and only shall waken
To horror, when Earth from her pillars is shaken:
Night is coming!

Night is coming: your house set in order:
Broods the death-cloud over Life's narrow border—
Flashes the shaft, winged from Ruin's red pinion,
And crumbles to ashes Earth's tyrant dominion:
Night is coming!

Illuminated Magazine.

THE LATE WILLIAM ALLEN, F.R.S.—Few names have been more highly spoken of than that of the eminent head, for upwards of half a century, of the firm of Allen and Co., druggists, in Plough-court, Lombard-street, who died on Saturday last, at Lindfield, Sussex, in the 74th year of his age. The deceased gentleman, who was a member of the Society of Friends, was long the head of his profession, and distinguished by his great chemical attainments, having been an intimate friend and associate of the late Sir H. Davy, and in conjunction with Mr. Pepys, made the most celebrated series of experiments on the composition of the atmosphere, and its influence upon animal life. His character was equally eminent as a philanthropist and a philosopher; he was intimately connected with Wilberforce and Buxton in their successful efforts for the suppression of the slave-trade; was one of the original promoters of the Anti-Slavery Society, and of the British and Foreign School society, of which he acted as treasurer for many years. He took an active part in the formation of the Pharmaceutical Society, of which he was president, and took the chair at the last anniversary meeting.

THE NELSON STATUE.—The statue of Nelson upon the Corinthian column, Trafalgar-square, having been found not to exhibit a perfectly erect position, and which is supposed to arise from the size of the cable by which it is supported, giving it that appearance, directions have been given by Mr. Bailey, the architect, to have the cable reduced. A scaffold has been erected at the base of the pedestal on which the statue stands, for that purpose.

THE PALACE OF CASERTA, AT NAPLES.

At the end of sixteen miles of level road we arrive at the Palace of Caserta, a noble and magnificent building, exceeded by few, if any, in the world. Versailles and the Escurial are, of course, larger, but I have seen none so perfect as the Caserta. It is a vast quadrangle, of enormous magnitude; the south front has three noble arched entrances, of which the centre one leads into a sort of continuous portico, supported by a hundred columns. When we were admitted to the grand staircase an universal scream of admiration burst from the whole party at the first view of this vast and exquisitely beautiful specimen of architecture. I can conceive nothing more perfect, were the architect furnished with Aladdin's lamp, and unlimited by sordid consideration of the cost. Charles the Third began it in 1753; and when he laid the foundations of a palace more in harmony with his taste than his means, little thought his dynasty would be displaced to make room for a pastry-cook. It is more fit for the state residence of the mighty sovereign of Great Britain than the king of a nation of little more than eight millions of inhabitants. The steps of this vast staircase, where three or four carriages might drive up abreast, the walls on each side, the vestibule, and dome at the top of it, supported by its twenty-four coupled columns, are all of the finest marble, of the richest colours, and most exquisite forms: the interior of the dome is charmingly painted; the different sides of this beautiful vestibule communicate with the chapel, the theatre, and the royal apartments, all admirable, but it would require twenty pages to describe them. I was much struck with the theatre, which, though small compared with that of Versailles, is in equally good taste, and has the strange peculiarity that the boxes, of which there are forty, in five rows, and an immense one in the centre for the royal family, are supported by the pillars taken from the temple of Jupiter Serapis at Puzzuoli, where only three now remain, but these three are indicative of one of the most curious and interesting facts in the history of the globe, of which I shall speak by-and-by. The royal apartments put to shame, by their magnificence, the palaces of Spain, and by the exquisite richness of their decorations, the comparatively poor and bald apartments of Windsor Castle, which are the best we can show in England, at least of the royal residences, for several of her Majesty's subjects are better housed than herself. This nation needs a little spur to its pride in this respect. The new Westminster Palace will do something towards removing the reproach from us; but till it is completed I shall not believe but some sudden gush of popular economy may stop its progress, and leave it, has the others, a monument of meanness.

Many of the apartments in the Caserta are not yet completed, and require for that purpose larger sums than it is at present convenient to his Majesty to spare. He is reported to be hoarding very largely, but this is perhaps only a stratagem of his enemies, who wish to have it thought that he is convinced of what they are always asserting and wish to be generally believed, namely, that his situation is very precarious, and that he will probably be soon put aside, and make way for a man of the people.

At the back of the palace we see a long stream of wa er, a succession of cascades in a straight line, of which I shall speak presently.

To reach the beautiful Casino of the Belvidere and its splendid gardens, we had to pass through the village, whose great square was completely filled with mendicants. We here see the blessed effect of there being no statutable provision for the poor. Our carriages were certainly not expected, and therefore this vast congregation of paupers must have calculated only on the ordinary resources of the place, which has no appearance of wealth. The miserable, squalid wretches, some blind, some lame, some extremely old, surrounded the carriages in swarms, and the noise of their petitions was deafening. It was impossible to carry on a conversation together till we had escaped from the crowd: to give to such numbers was hopeless, and there was no reason to make a preference, so we hastened on to the gardens.

The gardens are winding walks ornamented with flowers, cut through an extensive wood of arbutus, myrtles, laurestinas, olives, and other evergreens, occasionally intermixed with the pines and forest trees of England.

When the important and most interesting ceremony of dinner was completed, we walked round by the great cascade, and wended our way slowly round to the palace. This extraordinary waterfall is formed by a river brought from a distance of forty-seven miles, according to our decrees (through twenty-seven according to other authority), through solid rocks, and across deep valleys, one of which, the Maddalone, is traversed by an aqueduct of three stages, the lowest nineteen arches, the next twenty-seven, and the highest forty-five. This great work was accomplished in seven years, and is a strange example of misdirected skill and labour. Such works are necessary for canals and railroads, but for the mere conveyance of water iron pipes would have sufficed. It is curious that so simple a fact as water finding its level should not have been known to the ancients, although they had unconsciously acted on the principle in the supply of water to Herculaneum and Pompeii. We see in the Museum here, the bronze tubes from those cities, as large as, and exactly resembling, those in use at the crossings of streets in the present day, where by turning a handle the stream was directed to any of the four streets which it was desired to supply.—Illuminated Magazine.

TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN.—The Rev. C. Graves has been appointed Professor of Mathematics, in consequence of the appointment of Professor M.Cullagh to the Professorship of Natural Philosophy, in room of the Rev. Dr. Lloyd, who has become a Senior Fellow.

OXFORD, JAN. 1.—Messrs. John Young Seagrave, William Henry Milman, Mark Haggard and Stephen Swabey have been admitted actual students of Christchurch, having been elected from Westminster in May last. At the same time, Messrs. Charles James Webber, Charles Vernon Harcourt, Henry Archer Harvey, and Chichester Samuel Fortescue, were elected students.

OXFORD, JAN. 3.—The judgment of the Delegates of Congregation in the appeal from Dr. Kenyon's decision, in the cause so much talked of, "Macmullen v. Hampden," was this day delivered in open court by Dr. Plumptre, the master of University College. There were present as Dr. Bradford, rector of Lincoln; Dr. Jackson, of New College; and Mr. Williams, of New College, delegates on the same occasion. The delegates have decided against Mr. Macmullen, declaring that the amended libel on the part of that gentleman was wrongly admitted, and expressing an opinion that there are no allegations on the face of the libel on which any legal duty is grounded, for the breach whereof an action on the case for damages would lie. They, therefore, reverse the judgment of the assessor, and order the amended libel to be dismissed with costs. Notice of another appeal to the Delegates of Convocation was immediately given by Mr. Macmullen's proctor.

SUPPOSED CHEMICAL CAUSE OF THE FIRE AT LIVERPOOL.—It is known that the strong smell of sugar proceeding from the stoves of sugar houses is a gas liable to ignition. The places about the stoves are kept very air-tight. The particularly heavy atmosphere, which has prevailed for a length of time, may have assisted the accumulation, and favoured the chemical changes to which this gas is liable to a point when explosion must take place, without any contact of flame, but, from the affinities and particular state of electricity governing the elements composing the sugar gas, to resolve itself into low combinations. We trust the subject will be taken up by scientific men.—It was currently reported through the town that the men were locked in when at work, but there is no truth whatever in the statement.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BEDFORDSHIRE.—We understand that Government have sent down three active detective policemen to assist the constabulary force of this county in the detection of the villains who have committed the late acts of incendiarism on farming property. We are happy to state that the farmers are also exerting themselves for the protection of their property, and the prevention of this crime, by placing watchmen on their premises; and, as instances of the advantages of this system, we may state that on Thursday last William Bone was fully committed to Hertford gaol, by the Bench of Magistrates at Leigh, for setting fire to Mr. Rudd's farm, called Gouche's Farm, near Dunstable. On the 26th Robert Truett, a labourer in the employ of Mr. Swannell, was remanded by the Rev. J. B. Magenis and the Rev. Vere Alston, until Monday, on a charge of having set fire to the farm of Mr. Swannell, at Telmersham.

BRIGHTON.—On Sunday night Brighton was visited with a tremendous hurricane, which lasted until the following morning. The wind did considerable damage to houses in exposed situations, and it is feared that disasters have occurred at sea. About ten o'clock on Monday morning the wind lulled, and was succeeded by a fall of snow, the first this winter. The town continues very full of fashionable company, including the Duke of Devonshire, the Earl of Jermyn, the Countess of Athlone, the Duke of Somerset, Lieut.-Gen. Sir C. Dalbiac, the Countess of Effingham, the Countess of Charlemont, &c

BRIGHTON.—Apartments are taken at the Bedford Hotel for the Duc de Bordeaux. His Royal Highness has been invited to Brighton by the Earl and Countess of Shrewsbury, who, it will be remembered, entertained the Duke at Alton Towers on his arrival in England.

BRISTOL.—FRIGHTFUL AND FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Saturday morning the inhabitants of Clifton-road, Bristol, were greatly alarmed at hearing a tremendous noise, similar to the rumbling of thunder, which was soon discovered to arise from the falling of one of the new villas now in the course of erection in Cli ton-road, better known by the name of Gallows Acre-lane. At the time of the accident there were six men employed on the building, five of whom escaped unhurt, but one, we regret to say, was buried beneath the fallen mass, and when dug out was found to be a corpse. He was a young man, 17 years of age, of the name of William Jewell. The escape of the other five workmen was little short of miraculous, the catastrophe happening so suddenly. One of them chanced to look up, saw the wall tottering, and cried out, "Good God, the wall is coming on us!" and scarcely were the words out of his mouth before the crash came. One of the men had just time to hide under an archway; another had the presence of mind, seeing that he could not get beyond the reach of the falling stones, to place himself close up against a wall, when the mass fell right at his feet, leaving him uninjured: the others, with the melancholy exception of Jewell, contrived to get out of the reach of the impending ruin. From the evidence delivered at the inquest, it would appear that this deplorable accident was occasioned by the rottenness of the stones, and other materials used in the lower part of the building. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death," at the same time requesting that the depositions should be sent to the mayor and magistrates, for them to take what steps they judged proper.

GLOUCESTER.—At the quarterly meeting of the justices for the county of Gloucester, held at the Shire-hall in Gloucester, on Tuesday.—Mr. Parnell in the chair—the new dietary introduced into the gaols throughout the county by order of the Home Secretary, formed the subject of discussion. The subject was introduced by the chairman, who made the startling remark that the dietary, although fixed by Sir James Graham, after consultin the most eminent physicians and surgeons in the kingdom, and ordered to be introduced into all gaols and bridewells throughout the country, as a great improvement on previous dietaries, had no sooner been introduced into the gaols of Gloucestershire than great complaints were heard of it from the prisoners. The court, however, was without the power of making any alteration. A presentment on the subject of the enlargement of the several gaols and bridewells, including the building of a considerable addition to the County Gaol and Penitentiary at Gloucester, was then read. Resolutions in conformity with the above presentment were passed.

NOTTINGHAM.—INCENDIARY FIRE.—On Friday night last another of those abominable outrages on property was perpetrated at Hucknall-Torkard, in the county of Nottingham, a wheat-stack, containing about twelve quarters, the property of Mrs Price, a widow, having been ignited by some putiful scoundrel or other. The fire was discovered soon before the burning into a blaze, and plenty of assistance being at hand, it was put out in a very short space of time, but not before the whole of the wheat was spoiled. A clue has been obtained to the detection of the scoundrel who committed the offence, and it is to be hoped that he will not escape the punishment which the law so justly inflicts on such persons.

ESCAPE OF CONVICTS.—On Sunday afternoon last, several convicts made their escape from the county gaol, Nottingham. Between four and five o'clock, on the second turnkey going down into the felon's yard, an attack was made upon him, the key taken away, and he was locked in the yard. Six convicts rushed up the steps, proceeded to the outer door, where, meeting with the head turnkey, they fell upon him, knocked him down with great violence, and, forcing the key from his hand, which he resolutely held for some time, they unlocked the door, and out they ran. An alarm was given, but the men all escaped. We have received the following description of them:—Joseph Smith, aged twenty-one, stands five feet nine inches in height, fresh complexion, brown hair, hazel eyes, and oval visage; Joseph Bowers, aged thirty, five feet six inches high, fresh complexion, dark brown hair, oval visage, and several scars on the left hand; John Binns, aged twenty-four, five feet seven inches high, fresh complexion, brown hair, and oval visage, lately lived in Derbyshire. These three men were convicted of the burglary at Sutton Bonnington, at the house of the Rev. Robert Meek, and were sentenced to transportation for life at the late special assize. Thomas Barton, aged thirty-six years, five feet nine inches high, dark complexion, dark brown hair, hazel eyes, oval visage, and under sentence of transportation for fifteen years, for stealing ten lamb hogs at Farnsfield, in the county of Nottingham. William Thompson, aged twenty-two, five feet six inches high, fresh complexion, brown hair, grey eyes, and oval visage; convicted at the late special assize of burglary at Fiskerton, Nottinghamshire, and sentenced to be transported for ten years. Thomas Green, aged twenty-four, five feet nine inches high, brown hair, light complexion; convicted of burglary at Fiskerton, and was sentenced at the late special assize to transportation for life. The convicts all had the prison dress, and were without hats. A large reward is offered for their apprehension. Thomas Barton was apprehended within an hour and a half after his escape, in Colwick-street, Nottingham, by a gamekeeper. Barton, on his trial, endeavoured to set up the plea of insanity, and, on being "collared" by the keeper, who took him for a poacher, attempted a similar defence. On being asked who he was, he said that he had just got out of the Lunatic Asylum, in order to see his friends, and that, if the keeper would let him alone, he would go back again. This statement, however, was insufficient to satisfy the keeper, and he was handed over to the custody of the police. Within the very short space of time which had elapsed he had contrived to change his dress; and it is said that a man was observed to give him a coat, whilst he was running by Swinton Church. The turnkey Lowndes was taken to the hospital, and, on being examined, his skull was found to have been fractured, and very slight hopes were entertained of his recovery, but he is now considerably better.

ROCHESTER.—On Monday last the Rev. Henry Winter, chaplan to the Fortitude convict ship, together with Mr. George Bassett, army butcher, residing in the High-street of Chatham, appeared before the county magistrates, to answer informations, charging them with disposing of a heifer on the 25th of November last, being unfit for food of man. Several witnesses proved the death of the beast from a disease called "murrain," and its subsequent conveyance to the defendant Bassett's shop, having been cut up and dressed as if for sale, and that fewer than five collops had been taken from the same way. The carcases were described as being in a most awfully loathsome state and quite unfit for human food. Several important witnesses being absent, the defendants were held to bail to appear on a future day.

A Greek was decapitated, about a month since, for abjuring Islamism, to which he had been recently converted at Bilejeh, a town in the neighbourhood of Brousse, near Constantinople. The British Consul has been instructed to investigate the matter and report thereon.

The Rev. H. Moseley, Professor of Natural Philosophy, at King's College, has, we are informed, received the appointment of Inspector of Normal Schools, from the Committee of Privy Council for Education.

THE DUC DE BORDEAUX AT ALTON TOWERS.

This magnificent baronial seat of the Earl of Shrewsbury was a scene of princely festivity, during the recent sojourn there of the Duc de Bordeaux and suite. We learn too that the Earl and Countess of Shrewsbury have just arrived at the Bedford Hotel, Brighton, where an extensive suite of apartments have been engaged for his highness. A series of grand entertainments will take place on the Duke's arrival in Brighton, and on Sunday morning there will be high mass at the Roman Catholic Chapel.

Alton Towers is distant 10 miles from Ashbourn, in Derbyshire, and 20 from Stafford. It was originally a small house, occupied by a steward, when Charles, the fifteenth Earl of Shrewsbury, in making a tour of his estates, on arriving at Alton, was so struck with its beauty, that he resolved to enlarge the house and add to its picturesque gardens. At length he made Alton Abbey, as it was then called, his principal country residence; and the mansion, thus enlarged at different periods, and by different architects, became more picturesque than symmetrical. The present earl, possessing a similarity of taste with his uncle, on succeeding to the family honours, continued the work in the same spirited manner; he added noble galleries, with an immense wing, containing the state apartments, and a beautiful chapel —making Alton Towers one of the most magnificent residences in the kingdom, and befitting the rank of the ancient and illustrious house of Shrewsbury.

On approaching the mansion, near the head of the north side of the valley, is a Gothic bridge and embankment, with a huge imitation of Stonehenge beyond it, and a pond above the level of the bridge alongside it, backed by a mass of castellated stabling. Further along the side of the valley, to the left of the bridge, is a range of architectural conservatories, with glass domes, richly gilt. Further on, still to the left, and placed on a high and bold native rock, is a lofty Gothic tower, or temple; but so various are the objects filling the remainder of the valley, that words cannot give any idea of their effect. The boldest architectural features of the mansion are the broad square tower which terminates the picture-gallery; several beautiful oriels of the Elizabethan period; and the lofty and elegant Gothic tower of the chapel; the whole pile looking over the picturesque gardens; with a lawn and lake in the immediate vicinity. The structure exhibits every order of architecture, from the Saxon era to that of Elizabeth; and the pointed, florid, and Tudor styles, are introduced with harmonious effect, with "The battled towers, the donjon keep,

The loop-holed grates where ladies peep
And flanking walls that round it sweep.'

The interior is superbly appointed. Thus, we have the noble entrance hall, the armoury, the picture-gallery, the chapel, the octagon, a splendid suite of state rooms, besides various other suites of apartments. A very minute description of the mansion and its costly contents will be found in Mr. Adam's diligently written "Guide to the Peak."

ALTON TOWERS, THE SEAT OF THE EARL OF SHREWSBURY.

VISIT OF THE DUC DE BORDEAUX TO THE DUDLEY CAVERNS—THE ENTRANCE.

INTERIOR OF THE DUDLEY CAVERNS.

VISIT OF THE DUC DE BORDEAUX TO THE DUDLEY CAVERNS.

Among the curiosities of Staffordshire are the extensive limestone quarries of Dudley, nine miles north-west by north from Birmingham. A tunnel, one mile and three-quarters in length and thirteen feet high, has been cut through the hill on which the castle stands, for conveying the limestone under the castle-hill to the kilns.

These far-famed "Dudley Caverns" were lately visited by the Duc de Bordeaux and suite, previously viewing the extensive iron works of Philip Williams, Esq., at Gopsal Oak; and also the museum of the Dudley and Midland Geological Society, where the Prince was received by Lord Hatherton, the Vice-President, and several members of the committee. They afterwards proceeded to the Caverns situate under the Castle-hill, which were illuminated in a beautiful manner by thousands of candles; and these, being reflected by the water, produced an extraordinary effect. Red and blue lights were also disposed with great taste, the intense glare of which displayed even the lofty heights of these wonderful excavations. There were several elegant devices; and, among others, one representing a crown and sceptre. The display terminated with a royal salute; and all who have visited the Dudley Caverns are aware of the tremendous and startling effect produced by firing vollies within these excavations. Marshal Soult, a few years back, leapt precipitately out of the boat (thinking discretion the better part of valour), when saluted by one o. these thundering cannonades.

The Duc de Bordeaux was accompanied by Lord and Lady Hatherton, Ladies Lyttelton and Fitzgerald, Lord Loftus, the Hon. Spencer Lyttelton, Dr. and Mrs. Penfold, the Vicar of Dudley, the Mayor and magistrates of Dudley, and a large party of ladies and gentlemen. His Royal Highness was conducted through the works by Richard Smith, Esq., and expressed great admiration at the caverns, and also of the preparations which that gentleman had made for his reception. The Royal Duke returned to Dee's Royal Hotel, Birmingham, where he remained that night, and left by an early train for Tring, on his way to Oxford.

OPENING OF THE METROPOLITAN WELCH CHURCH.

The chapel of St. Etheldreda, in Ely-place, Holborn, has just been opened for the performance of divine service in the Welch language, in accordance with the forms of the Established Church. The Rev. J. R. Williams, late curate of Lampeter, who has been appointed incumbent, officiated, for the first time, on Sunday morning, the 17th ult. The Reverend Gentleman took his text from the 16th chapter of St. Mark, and the 20th verse; and the sermon was at once impressive and most appropriate for such an occasion—the opening of the first church in London wherein the service is performed in the Welch language. The congregation numbered about 300 persons; and in the evening the church was still better attended. It is somewhat singular that no provision should hitherto have been made for the spiritual wants of the Welch residents in the metropolis, in their own language; seeing that they form a very respectable portion of the community, and liberally support their own institutions.

THE WELCH CHURCH, ELY PLACE, HOLBORN

SONNET TO JANUARY.

Gate of the year! where wouldst thou lead us now?
On still thro' Winter's path?—or will, ere long,
Thaw the cold icicles that point thy brow,
And wend us to a way of woodland song
And Spring-time, flow'r-embroider'd road of light?
Art thou like Susa's portals which disclose,
Unto the Alpine traveller, the sight,
All suddenly, of fair Italia's rose
And vine, and honeysuckle interlac'd?
Or has December left a will behind
That thou shouldst on perpetuate his snows,
And make the year, like that he left, a waste?
Is not young Spring a wooer warm and kind—
Wilt not for her thy rigid locks unbind? W.

SONG OF AN EVENING SPIRIT.

The breeze of the mountain
Is laden with balm;
The tones of the fountain
Are silvery and calm;
The glow of the sunset
Is glorious and bright;
The waves of the ocean,
In fairy-like motion,
Are joyfully dancing in light.

The ruins so hoary
My fancy engage;
The evenide glory
Has gilded their age.
The song of the nightbird
Has sweetly begun,
The gale's airy pinion,
O'er Vesper's dominion,
Has fluttered "Adieu;" to the sun.

The spire in its brightness
Is towering on high;
The barque in its lightness
Seems touching the sky;
The murk of the village,
In murmuring tone,
Swe is softly and sweet
Through the sylvan retreat,
And mingles its voice with my own.

My odorous arbour
Is lonely and far;
The gold tinctured harbour
No hurricanes mar;
The column of incense
Is languishing here:
But the beam of the west
All resplendently dress'd,
Has come as my charioteer.

SCENE FROM THE PANTOMIME OF "HARLEQUIN TAM O'SHANTER," AT ASTLEY'S.

ASTLEY'S THEATRE.

A regular Christmas pantomime at this house is quite a novelty; it being many years since a Harlequinade was produced here; which seems rather strange, considering its resources and capabilities for such kind of performances. Nothing could have been better chosen than the subject of the present one, which is founded on Burns's admirable tale, and is entitled, "Harlequin Tam O'Shanter and his Steed Meg, or the Fairy Thistledown and Witches of Alloway Kirk." The poet's story is closely adhered to in the main, with a liberal addition of fairies, sprites, and demons, necessary to the well-being of a legitimate pantomime. Some of the scenery in the introduction is most admirably contrived, particularly the flight of Tam through the storm, on his mare Meg, followed by the witches of "Auld Alloway's Haunted Kirk," which made many a heart thrill, so widely supernatural the chase seemed. At length the safety bridge ."the brig o' Doon"—appears in sight, and Tam exclaims, in Rab's own words:—

> Now do thy utmost speed, my Meg,
> And win the keystane of the brig;
> Then at them thou thy tail may toss—
> A running stream they dare not cross.

For all this poor Meggie loses her tail, and the tale of the introduction ends also by the usual transformations. In the comic portion there was a most ludicrous scene in the interior of a nursery, where six babies are sleeping in six separate cradles. The humour of the Clown (King) and Pantaloon (Matthews) in this was such as to convulse the audience to an unparalleled paroxysm of laughter. The pantomime was altogether most ably sustained. Between the pieces there was some most fearfully dexterous rope-dancing by Mons. Plege and his son, which, in itself, is well worth the whole performance at some other establishments.

FINNOE HOUSE.

Finnoe House, the subject of the annexed sketch, is situated in the centre of a small demesne, within one mile of the town of Borrisokane, in the Barony of Lower Ormond, County of Tipperary. As the scene of the recent massacre of the Waller family it has acquired a celebrity to which its unpretending appearance and situation could not legitimately lay claim.

FINNOE HOUSE.

As a stranger, whose duties led him to the vicinity, curiosity induced a visit to a place of such unenviable notoriety.

We commonly associate with a deed so horrible, the idea of a place of kindred gloom—fancy anticipates a situation remote and solitary, buried amidst the darkness of embowering woods, promising a degree of impunity to the lawless daring of the midnight assassin. With such a preconceived impression of the probable appearance and situation of this ill-fated mansion, how was I surprised to find it exactly the reverse! Situated in the angle where three roads meet, the house is not more than fifty or sixty yards from any of the leading thoroughfares. The house, a small, elegant, cheerful mansion, in the cottage style, the very picture of a happy rural home, with the neat little parish church almost beside it, and only separated from the rectory by the road, surrounded with one or two handsome villas, and the demesne of Rodeen—no situation could be more unlikely to be the scene of so foul, so brutal an atrocity. The time selected for the perpetration of the crime adds considerably to its enormity; upon the evening of the Lord's-day, a season of security and peace! While the venerable and lamented Mr. Waller and family are seated at dinner, they are assailed by a brutal gang of murderers, who leave the whole party, consisting of two gentlemen and two ladies, weltering in their gore in the space of a few moments.

Conjecture wearies itself to find a reason for this outrage. Even the peasantry, so ready to attribute hardship and tyranny to the landlord, are silent in reference to this event.

Few men have deserved better of his neighbours than the late Mr. Waller. Where the beautiful demesne and mansion of Finnoe now stand, was a waste, uncultivated, moory tract, about 20 years ago. Being desirous of residing upon his estate, in order to afford employment to his numerous tenantry, and set them an example of improving the light unprofitable land upon which they were located, his first care was to enclose a very small demesne—small, that he might not encroach upon their small holdings, and to build a suitable mansion; and with such ardour did he carry out his intentions, that he continued for more than fifteen years to expend upon improvements considerably more than the annual income of the whole estate, giving most extensive and lucrative employment; and just as his object is realised in making Finnoe all he designed it to be, he is suddenly cut off by the hands of those whose condition he so ardently desired to raise and ameliorate.

Since writing the above, I have to add a melancholy addition to the catalogue of murders in this blood-stained district:—On St. Stephen's night, at an early hour in the evening, a confidential servant of Mr. Faulkner, of the adjoining demesne to Finnoe, of the name of Ardill, a Protestant, was most savagely assassinated; and this at a time when in that very neighbourhood the authorities are in search of the murderers of the Waller family, with the tempting reward of £1000 for their discovery. Poor Ardill is the father of a large and helpless family of eight children.

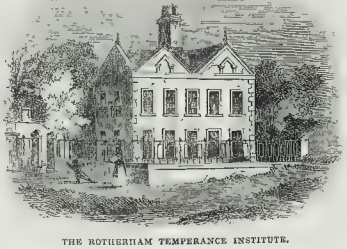
One more instance, and I am done for the present. This day, the 28th of December, within one mile of Nenagh, where I now write, another man has been most brutally murdered in the noon day, in the presence of several individuals. Happily, in this last instance, the murderers are in custody!

I may add, in conclusion, that, as a passing stranger, without a single local attachment in this county, what I have written is the honest and unbiassed result of my personal observation.

J. B. D.

ROTHERHAM TEMPERANCE INSTITUTE.

In the latter end of September, 1842, an inquiry was instituted by the Committee of the Rotherham Temperance Association, for the purpose of devising means whereby its operations might be rendered more efficient, and its progress more commensurate with the importance of the object sought to be achieved. From this inquiry it appeared, that however successful the Association might be in reclaiming the dissolute from evil and improvident habits, and in saving many others from forming those habits, yet, that it had no sufficient resource, whereby the reclaimed might be saved from relapse, or those not already perverted to evil preserved in the right path, and that therefore it was not only desirable, but absolutely indispensable, that an Institution should be formed which should possess within itself attractions, benefits, and privileges, more than sufficient to counteract the power of previous habits and the influence of too prevalent example, and thereby render the operations of the Association not only more successful, but also more permanent and substantial. To effect this purpose, several members agreed to advance £150, and call upon the inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood generally to assist them in the undertaking. The appeal was made and nobly responded to, insomuch, that the committee were enabled to purchase twelve hundred volumes of new and first-rate standard works, by the most popular authors in every department of literature and science, a pair of large globes, a large collection of maps, both filled up and in outline; diagrams and drawings illustrative of natural history, geography and astronomy, with considerable philosophical apparatus; maps of Bible history, &c., &c., for the instruction of classes of young persons, &c., who are enabled to enjoy these advantages at a very small charge. They have likewise been enabled to purchase the late vicarage house and premises, of which the above is a sketch of the west front, and now only give it this publicity in order that other similar associations may be stimulated to exertions more vigorous and worthy of the cause they have espoused, but hitherto lamentably failed in giving to it that all but paramount prominence and character which is its just due.



THE ROTHERHAM TEMPERANCE INSTITUTE.

THE EYE GLASS.

WRITTEN AND ILLUSTRATED BY ALFRED CROWQUILL

Blindness is no recommendation either in a man or horse; a man who cannot see his way clearly is of no use either as a guide or adviser. A short-sighted horse is a dangerous acquaintance, as his false optics cause shying, and he shies you off—the man and the horse have not a pin to choose between them. A man who cannot see beyond his nose is looked upon as a fool, yet is near-sightedness assumed as a mark of great wisdom or intense study. Either in a bill to pay, or a friend to know, give me a long sight.

The Exquisite man upon town may have his own reasons for assuming blindness, as retaining the glass in the eye with nonchalance is looked upon as a fashionable gymnastic; it is also available in meeting a tailor or other dun; he can carelessly drop his discriminator and pass on. This is excusable, being a kind of blind foresight; but for any one without these excuses, who sees you as plain as noon day, to distort his physiognomy by a horrid grimace, and to hold a glass dexterously between the eyebrow and cheek, is a disgusting affectation.

I have seen this passion carried so far as to decorate the riding whip with a glass, as if the poor equestrian could not distinguish between the horse's head and tail.

The inveteracy of this habit was once carried to its height by a right honourable exquisite, who, upon being called out by a brother officer, on taking the ground, stuck his eye-glass calmly in his eye, surveyed his friend from top to toe, placed it coolly into his waistcoat pocket, and shot him through the heart. That was short-sightedness indeed! But who is not short-sighted; it is the cause of all the ills that flesh is heir to, and our only chance is to obtain credit of Prudence (sometimes passing under the name of Foresight) for the loan of an eye-glass, or clarifier of our mental vision, to assist us in avoiding the many pitfalls and dirty ways that continually are open to engulph the thoughtless and unwary. Oh! the blessing of a long sight, Experience seldom giving it us but in time to see the pretty mess we have got ourselves into. Infancy opens its eyes and appears to see clearly, but sinks rapidly into blindness as the passions come into action. Next the schoolboy, blind to his own good, looks upon his mentor as a tyrant, draws bogie in his ciphering-book, or falls to sleep over his lesson on his industriously carved desk.

The young man, blinded by vanity, dashes into the army or navy, and finds, too late, he has been following a will-o'-the-wisp that has rewarded him with a wooden leg, the feelings of a gentleman, and half-pay.

Another, attacked by one of the worst forms of ophthalmia, called love, looks through the prism of his passions, which paints his adored as something angelic and irresistible; he continues wrapt in the delusion until he comes to the word amazement; which, like the ancient Abracadabra, clears the mist, the prismatic colours rapidly fade, and he possesses a woman.

The spendthrift is one of the most extraordinary of short-sighted mortals; for though the end of his career may be next week he sings, dances, drinks, and mixes in all kinds of debauchery, throwing his gold about as if it were inexhaustible, when before many days he may stand in need of the most miserable pittance; in this case the blindness must be total, or, the precipice being so near, the lamentable object would have an opportunity of avoiding his total destruction.

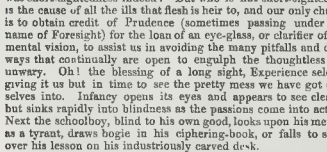
Vanity is sure to create blindness to a great degree; such as not being able to see your own faults at home, but perceiving clearly those of your neighbour's over the way; or an old fool, who, with a natty cane and a jaunty air, whistles an Opera tune through two remaining teeth, without the slightest perception that he is laughed at; fit companion to him is the passé fine woman who keeps the young women, her daughters, in the background, and resists all attempts to bring them out, persevering in calling them her chits of girls until they are thrown by her neglect and short-sightedness into the arms of designing men unworthy of them; and she sinks into the old woman, fighting with a savage feeling to retain her hold of the world, or that which she considers to be such.

Blindness in the case of avarice has been deemed incurable: though ridiculous in its form, the afflicted one sees nothing but his treasure, which he hoards, and starves himself through manhood and in age to amass a heap of riches; hugging himself even in the hour of death with the delight of possession of that which has caused him to pass a life of starvation and bitter contempt; and he leaves it behind him to be scattered by the hands of people who despised him, weighed down by the dreadful onus of having so much good at his disposal, and locking it within his own iron heart.

Prudence even will yield its blindness when all other feelings are thrust on one side to entertain it; the prudent man hesitates to marry until he becomes a creature of solitary habits and whimsicalities; he calls it foresight, and then hopes to find a woman, young and amiable, to be the tormented of his unaccommodating mind. The prudent father blights the happiness of his child, by thwarting her affections, because the object is not rich enough in bank stock: he is short-sighted enough to believe that the richest husband is to be preferred, and that love, sympathy, and devotion are much better when commercially brought under the head of £ s. d.

The next much to be pitied is the man who will travel from Dan to Beersheba and say all is barren, the sun and the moon enlightened him unheeded, the beautiful flowers spring beneath his feet and are trodden down unnoticed, he walks through the beauties of nature unmoved, with the most pure and beautiful spring of self-happiness dried up within his heart. To him mountains are fatiguing, vallies are damp, and the magnificent ocean has an extremely unpleasant smell; he praises railroads that he may see the end of his journey, that being the only end he started for; he has a kindred feeling with the man who sees no good in any one, and is blind enough to say that he never saw an honest man; he buttons up his pockets with a knowing wink, expressive of his excessive cunning and foresight. Poor mistaken mortal! he is worse than animal; for in foresight the insect and the animal place our boasted humanity in a very low scale of creation. He who never opens his pocket never opens his heart, which, like all other things shut up from genial warmth, becomes mildewed and blighted; and, as the central fount of life, contaminates and destroys every healthful pulsation; he becomes, as he deserves to be, a bane to himself.

The next—but I could go on ad infinitum—and I fear to bring a trifling care home to myself which might cause me to light my cigar with this paper, and all the little boys lose the lesson which I have attempted to give them on the vice of being near-sighted, and making a virtue and a pride of it, proving that it is not weakness in the eye but in the head.



SURREY SESSIONS.

(Before Thomas Puckle, Esq., and a full Bench of Magistrates.)

The January Epiphany Sessions for the county of Surrey, for the transaction of county business, and the trial of prisoners for felonies committed in any part of the county, commenced on Tuesday morning at the Court house, Newington by St Mary's, before the High Sheriff of the county, Thomas Puckle, Esq., chairman, and an unusually full attendance of the magistracy; there being upwards of sixty magistrates present. The learned Chairman in his address to the grand jury, remarked that though the calendar contained the names of upwards of sixty prisoners, from the review of the past year he was happy to announce that crime was not on the increase in the county, which might be attributed to two circumstances—the activity of the police, which was both a preventive and detective force—and also to the great pains which were taken in the education of juvenile offenders, in order to effect reformation in their character. The report of the chaplain of the county gaol stated the number of prisoners in confinement to be 238, and that six male prisoners were under orders for transportation.

The county treasurer's account stated that he had a balance in hand of upwards of £7000, and that he should require a rate of twopence in the pound to meet the expenses of the ensuing quarter. The court granted the required rate

The subject of compelling the attendance of debtors at the church service on Sundays was next entered upon, and elicited a very warm discussion. Mr. Hawes was of opinion that it was a stretch of power to compel the attendance of a Jew, a Roman Catholic, or Dissenter, on the worship of the Church of England; and although the Secretary of State had given it as his opinion that the governor, by the 163d rule, could compel them to attend, or subject them to punishment, the honourable member said, he thought the governor would hesitate before he made use of the discretionary power which the act gave him. After a very lengthy discussion, the matter was referred back to the visiting justices. The Rev. M. Howe was elected chaplain of Horsemonger-lane, in the room of the Rev. Samuel Benson, resigned.

Extraordinary Charge of Felony and Highway Robbery.—William Dodd, a young man, very genteelly dressed, and of respectable connexions, surrendered on Wednesday morning to take his trial, on a charge of highway robbery, at Clerk's-green, near Dorking, in this county. The indictment charged the prisoner with stealing the £5 notes of the Reigate and Dorking bank, on the 30th of November last, from the person of Thomas Muggridge, farmer, of Warnham, which was the property of his uncle, Mr. Thomas Muggridge, farmer.—Mr. Wallenger appeared for the prosecution, and the prisoner was defended by Mr. Charcook.—It appeared that the prosecutor had been waylaid on his return from Dorking with his horse and cart, on a lonely part of the road, by three men who threw stones at him, and knocked him off the unmen stated; but he could not identify the parties. On the morning o the 15th of December, as the Dorking bank was opened, the prisoner presented himself at the bank to change one of the notes, and received five sovereigns. Immediately after the departure of the prisoner, the manager of the bank ascertained that the note in question was one of those which Mr. Muggride had been robbed of, he the manager, having received information of the robbery, and was requested to stop the notes should they be presented for payment. The prisoner was immediately followed by Mr. Overton, the manager, was soon overtaken, and questioned as to his possession of the note. The sovereigns were also demanded from him, which he instantly gave up. The prisoner accompanied Mr. Overton back to the bank, when he stated, in answer to several questions put to him, that he had another £5 note, and that he could produce it. It was ascertained to be the other stolen note. The prisoner said he found the money in a canvas bag at Westcot, in a hedge on the road-side, near to his mother's residence Elizabeth French, who was a town public-house, proved having changed that about half-past ten o'clock in the evening after the robbery the prisoner accompanied by two other men, called for some refreshments at her house, and tendered a £5 note in payment, which she refused to change. The prisoner then offered a second note for the same amount, which she also refused. The notes were the same as those produced. The notes were of the Dorking and Reigate bank. Mr. Charcook rose, and addressed the court on behalf of the prisoner, who he said, was the last person in the world likely to turn highwayman. His friends and connexions were highly respectable, in affluence, and the very circumstance of the prisoner being enabled to cash such heavy bill, on a serious occasion, spoke volumes in his favour. He would never render himself liable to transportation on such a charge. The learned counsel then called William Brett, who deposed that he was with the prisoner, and saw some money, which it was reported a strange man and woman had secreted in the hedge, and which, it was said, had been taken from Mr Muggridge. Witness kicked about the bank, and the money was found. The bag contained two £5 notes, which were very wet there was also half-a-crown. He saw a strange stout man searching for some thing, but could not tell what it was. This was on the 1st of December. The witness underwent a most severe and rigid cross-examination by Mr. Wallenger, when he said he had been out of work for three years; he had been in trouble, and fined for pheasant-shooting.—Mr. Overton, the prisoner for some years; had tried to find money on several occasions.—Three other witnesses gave similar testimony, and sustained a rigid cross-examination. One of the witnesses said he got his living in the best manner he could.—The jury, after nearly an hour's consideration, returned a verdict of "Not Guilty."

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

CARMARTHEN ASSIZES.—Carmarthen, Dec. 31

THE WELSH RIOTS.

Mr. Justice Cresswell entered the court at nine o'clock, on Saturday. In reference to the cases of Thomas Hughes, John Jones, and Benjamin Jones, charged with having unlawfully and riotously assembled on the 1st of August last, at Pontarcelfoche, in the parish of Llangadock, and then and there feloniously demolished the dwelling house of Griffith Jones, being the Pontarcelfoche toll-house, the property of General said, that he had perhaps a defence that there was a deficiency of proof of a "riotous assembly in the case of the Dolaithrion toll-house and gate, he should enter a nolle prosequi as regarded the charge of felony. There would be no difficulty, of course, in endeavouring against the prisoners for a riot and destroying the gates, and he would therefore remove that case, by certiorari, to the next assizes. His lordship acquiesced in the propriety of this mode of procedure. The prisoners were then passed at the bar, and having pleaded not guilty, were discharged without bail.

Extraordinary Case.—David Evans, a farmer, and James Evans, his servant, were charged with having, on the 30th of September, 1843, riotously and unlawfully assembled at Pantycraig, in the parish of Llanfihangel Rhaeyoon. Both prisoners pleaded not guilty. They were defended by Messrs. Nicholl, Carne, and E. C. H. Hall. The Attorney-General was on behalf of the prosecution, and said that the prisoners were indicted for a misdemeanour and not, and the substantial charge was that on the night of the 30th of September, they, with others, demanded a sum of moo y from Thomas Thomas, of Pantycraig, a farmer. Mr. Thomas was disturbed in the night by a body of men, disguised and armed, dragged from his house and taken to the house of one of the prisoners, where a sum of moo ey was demanded in compensation for an injury his cattle had done to the pris ner by trespassing in his corn field. He was after wards allowed to go back. Since that time Mr. Thomas had unfortunately lost his life He did not mean to attach suspicion to either of the prisoners with respect to that transacti n, as the prisoners had been in gao ever since the affair for which they were now being tried, but he mentioned the fact Mr. Thomas could not appear to give his evidence. As, however he was examined as the presence of the prisoners was had an opportunity of cross-examining him and making any statement they thought proper, his deposition would become evidence against them The Attorney-General then read the depositions detailing the particulars of the outrage, which were given in this paper at the time of its occurrence, and concluded his statement to the case by addressing the Court and Jury in the following humane and impressive terms:—"This is the last case to which I attach any great importance. This is the last case in which the outrages that have been so frequent in this county have been carried on, for purposes and used for the furtherance of private ends. The object of these prosecutions is not so much the punishment of every individua. who took part in the disturbances, or who were concerned in any outrages, but generally warehouseman in the very next house to that tenanted by Messrs. Storer, and it is supposed by that means acquired his knowledge of the position of the houses he has participated in robbing.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FATAL COAL-PIT ACCIDENT.—Last week a dreadful accident occurred at a coal-pit, belonging to the trustees of the late Duke of Bridgewater, near Hulton, by which several lives have been lost, and a great number of persons frightfully injured. It appears that on Tuesday morning, about six o'clock, about 30 men and boys assembled, and part of them—about 17—had got into the workings, and had partially got to work, when the men at the mouths of the two pits were alarmed by a tremendous explosion, from both of the shafts, blowing up the tubs or baskets, which were in the shafts at the time, and also forcing forward two carters, who were standing near one of the pit mouths, a distance of several yards. There were about 17 persons, men and boys, in the pits when the explosion took place. Some of them were sent up in a state of complete stupefaction, with their clothes almost burnt from their bodies, and so disfigured with coal dust and soot, that it was with considerable difficulty they could be identified as they were brought up. Isaac Mills, a drawer, was found in a most deplorable condition. He died about eleven o'clock the same night. After a search of about an hour and a half the men found the body of Robert Bradshaw, a young man about 18 years of age, his skull being frightfully fractured, part of his brains being scattered over the tub of coals which it would appear he had been in the act of drawing when the explosion took place. Of course, as may be imagined, from the extent of the injury to his head, he was quite dead. The body was also much burned. As the unfortunate people were brought up they were placed in carts, of which there were several at hand, and conveyed to their respective homes. The hands ceased working on Saturday afternoon at the usual time, and, of course, were "at rest" on Sunday and Christmas-day, during which time it would appear that a considerable body of the carburetted hydrogen collected in the different workings.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE BIRMINGHAM AND GLOUCESTER RAILWAY.—On Wednesday, last week, on the arrival at Bromsgrove station of the down train from Birmingham, a hat, jacket, and bundle of sticks were found lying on the buffer bar of the engine. This leading to the suspicion that some accident had happened on the line, the pilot engine was instantly despatched to ascertain the particulars; and between Barnt Green and Crofton Hall, the body of a labouring man was found lying between the rails quite dead. The body was warm, and it appeared the train had not passed over him, but it is supposed that the buffer bar of the engine struck him in the back, and that his hat, jacket, and sticks, were jerked at the same moment upon the buffer bar, and there remained until the engine arrived at the station as before mentioned.

SINGULAR ACCIDENT.—Mrs. Ann Mitchell, the proprietress of one of the Kensington omnibuses, came by her death a few days since in the following singular manner. She was seated on the outside, at the extremity of the seat behind the driver, when on attempting to pass a van the turpaulin which covered the van caught deceased and swept her off the seat. Having fallen on the road the wheel of the van passed over her body, which she sustained such injuries that she died in a few days afterwards at St. George's Hospital. The deceased was a very extraordinary woman. For many years past, in all weathers, she had ridden "from early dawn to dewy eve," on the outside of one of her own vehicles, looking carefully after the main, and taking heed that her cattle were good, and her servants obliging.

An inquest was held on Tuesday, at Bermondsey-wall, by Mr. Carter, on the body of a milkman named Richard Creasey, aged 66, in the employ of Mr. Kelsey, dairyman, who died from the effects of a kick from a cow which he was about to milk. Verdict, "Accidental death."

STEAM BOILER EXPLOSION.—An alarming explosion of a steam boiler took place on Tuesday morning, at the cigar manufactory of Mr. Johnston, in Gloucester-street, Commercial-road East, which has been productive of considerable mischief, although fortunately no loss of life has resulted. The following is Mr. Superintendent Braidwood's official report of the injury done:—A serious damage done to boiler and machinery; roof of engine house blown off, and back wall of drying house severely shattered; front wall much out; half floors and contents of drying-rooms destroyed; several workmen and boys injured; part of carpenters' workshops damaged by the force of the explosion. The buildings were formerly a sugar-house, and belong to Nicholas Tenperly, of Mincing-lane, Esq., who has

THE KINGSTOWN AND DALKEY ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY—STARTING OF THE TRAIN.

THE KINGSTOWN AND DALKEY ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY.

Atmospheric propulsion on railways is now an accomplished fact. Several preliminary trials have been made on the line we are about o describe, and very shortly the establishment will be in full operation.

The scene of this triumph of science is one line of the train laid down for the purpose of conveying granite from the quarries of Dalkey for the construction of the magnificent harbour of Kingstown; and the Dublin and Kingstown Railway Company having been empowered by their Act of Incorporation in 1831, to purchase the road, on the completion of the harbour works, with the consent of the Commissioners and of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, they opened a negotiation for the purchase of one half the road—or a single line—and the necessary consent having been obtained, the purchase was made, and the works were commenced.

It will scarcely be necessary to describe the general principles of the Atmospheric Railway; but there are some details connected with its practical application which it may be requisite to enter into, as the applicability of the system depends principally on the mode of keeping the pipe air-tight. This explanation we quote from No. 10 of the Artisan, a work we conscientiously commended to our readers at its outset, and each succeeding Number has tended to raise this periodical in our estimation; it is at once sound and popular, elaborate and economical:—

In the Atmospheric Railway, a pipe of about twelve inches diameter is laid between the rails on which the carriages run; this pipe is exhausted at one end by an air-pump; a travelling piston is forced along it by the pressure of the atmosphere; and a rod, or plate, of iron, connecting the piston with the carriages, traverses a slit on the top of the pipe. The great difficulty to be overcome was to cover this slit with a substance which would be air-tight, and yet would permit the connecting-rod to pass without offering much obstruction. The plan adopted by Messrs. Clegg and Samuda, the projectors of the system as improved, will be best understood by reference to the accompanying diagrams.

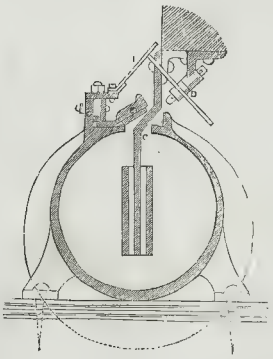

FIG. 1.

Fig. 1 represents a vertical section of the pipe. The opening at the top is covered by a continuous valve G, extending the whole length of the pipe. It is formed of leather riveted between two iron plates. The upper plate is wider than the slit, and prevents the leather from being pressed in by the pressure of the atmosphere; the lower plate just fits the slit, and is curved to the shape of the pipe. One edge of the leather is fastened to a longitudinal rib, cast along the opening, and forms a hinge, as on a common pump valve. The other edge of the valve, when it covers the opening, forms, with a ridge cast on the pipe, a channel or trough, on its whole extent, a section of which is shown at F, fig 2. This trough is filled with a composition of bees-wax and tallow, which, when melted and cooled, adheres to the side of the valve, and keeps it air-tight. As the travelling piston is forced along the pipe, one side of the valve is raised by four small wheels fixed behind the piston, so as to admit the connecting rod C to pass, as represented in fig. 1. The opening thus made also admits the air to act against the piston. The rupture thus made in the composition of wax and tallow is cemented again, before the train passes, in the following manner:—A steel wheel R (fig. 2), regulated by a spring, is attached to the carriage, and presses down the valve immediately after the connecting arm has forced it open, and a copper heater N, about five feet long, filled with burning charcoal, passes over the composition and melts it, thus leaving the valve air-tight as before, and ready for the next train. A protecting cover, I, formed of thin plates of iron about five feet long, and hinged with leather, is placed over the valve, to protect it from rain or dust. It is contemplated to have each pipe about three miles long, with a stationary engine for each length of piping to exhaust the air; and an arrangement is made by means of which the piston, as it approaches the end of the pipe, opens a valve which admits it into the next length of piping, so that the train may proceed from one to the other without stopping.

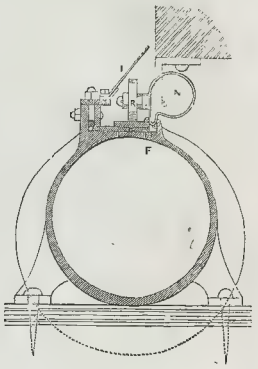

FIG. 2.

It is evident that as the tractive force is derived entirely from the pressure of the atmosphere on the piston, its amount will depend on the area of the piston, and on the extent to which the exhaustion of the air can be carried by the air-pump. It must also be evident that the difficulty of keeping the pipe air-tight will increase with its length, and with the pressure obtained. The vacuum-pipe on the branch of the Birmingham, Bristol, and Thames Junction Railway, where the atmospheric system has been in operation for more than three years, is only nine inches internal diameter, and but half a mile long. It is on an incline of part 1 in 120, and part 1 in 115. A vacuum, equal in some instances to a column of mercury 23½ inches high has been obtained, and loads of 13 tons have been propelled at a speed of 20 miles an hour. On the Dalkey branch of the Dublin and Kingstown Railway, the pipe is 15 inches in diameter, and its length, so far as it has been tried, is one mile and a quarter. The average incline is 1 in 100; the exhaustion has been extended to 22½ inches of mercury, and three carriages loaded with passengers have been propelled up the incline at a speed exceeding 40 miles an hour.

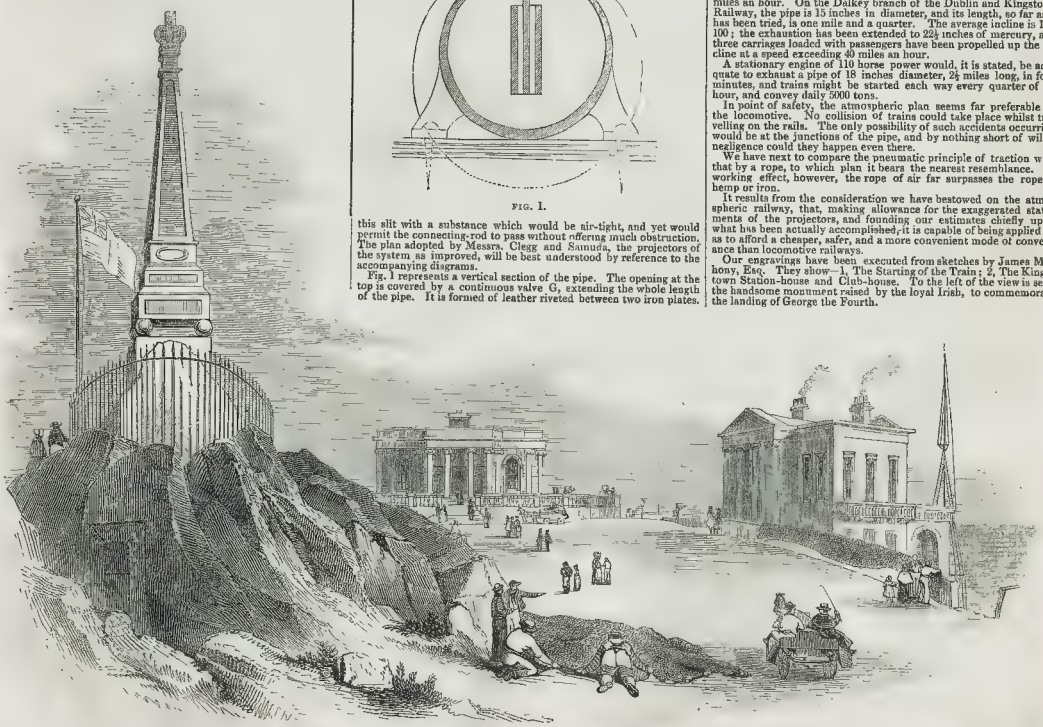
A stationary engine of 110 horse power would, it is stated, be adequate to exhaust a pipe of 18 inches diameter, 2½ miles long, in four minutes, and trains might be started each way every quarter of an hour, and convey daily 5000 tons.

In point of safety, the atmospheric plan seems far preferable to the locomotive. No collision of trains could take place whilst travelling on the rails. The only possibility of such accidents occurring would be at the junctions of the pipe, and by nothing short of wilful negligence could they happen even there.

We have next to compare the pneumatic principle of traction with that by a rope, to which plan it bears the nearest resemblance. In working effect, however, the rope of air far surpasses the rope of hemp or iron.

It results from the consideration we have bestowed on the atmospheric railway, that, making allowance for the exaggerated statements of the projectors, and founding our estimates chiefly upon what has been actually accomplished, it is capable of being applied so as to afford a cheaper, safer, and a more convenient mode of conveyance than locomotive railways.

Our engravings have been executed from sketches by James Mahony, Esq. They show—1. The Starting of the Train; 2, The Kingstown Station-house and Club-house. To the left of the view is seen the handsome monument raised by the loyal Irish, to commemorate the landing of George the Fourth.



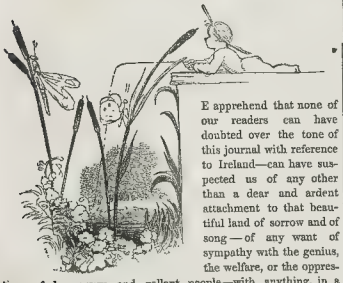
GEO. IV. OBELISK—THE ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY.—THE KINGSTOWN STATION AND CLUB-HOUSE.

LONDON: Printed and Published at the Office, 198, Strand, in the Parish of St. Clement Danes, in the County of Middlesex, by WILLIAM LITTLE, 198, Strand, aforesaid.—SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 1844.—REPRINT.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 89, Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JANUARY 13, 1844. [Sixpence.

IRELAND—THE APPROACHING STATE TRIALS.



APPREHEND that none of our readers can have doubted over the tone of this journal with reference to Ireland—can have suspected us of any other than a dear and ardent attachment to that beautiful land of sorrow and of song—of any want of sympathy with the genius, the welfare, or the oppressions of her warm and gallant people—with anything, in a word, short of a patriotic love for the country—which is not the less sincere for being the reverse of revolutionary—or the less enduring because it would cement the strength and cordiality which binds it to the British monarchy—in the best and wisest and strongest of all social, moral, and political ties—the tie of that union by which England calls it her Sister Kingdom, and our Queen regards it as second child of her realms. But why need we repeat that we love Ireland. Is there any point of grievance in her fair distracted territory—among her wild enthusiastic people—that we have not manfully and impartially denounced as an evil to be redressed? And still we hold on to our course—still we tell our present, and all Governments, that Ireland must be studied like England—through the affections of her people—and that wrong must be strangled with animosity, so that neither may survive. All political strifes—all hereditary feelings—all religious difficulties—are not to be overcome suddenly; it is not in the nature of events, the country, or the people, that they should; but there are practical afflictions which might and must be redressed, and which a Government may meet more fearlessly than ever they can meet sedition with prosecution, and relieve more generously than ever they can pardon the agitation to which they give—but too unfortunately—the semblance of excuse. We have denounced the Poor-laws lustily—we have dwelt indignantly upon their bad and brutal principle—their total inapplicability to miserable and far spread Irish poverty—their want of consolation to suffering, of domestic sympathy with the purer affections which remain holy always in the human heart, and holiest when they burn brightly in the bosoms of those whom the world has frowned upon and crushed—(for is not Love most beautiful when it is the one sweet light shining amid a storm of sorrows)—their stinging injustice and untender means of practice and operation—in a word, their wholesale social and political infamy—blighting, blasting, and withering as it sweeps over the poor.

We have addressed ourselves to the subject of absenteeism, and implored the administrators of affairs to inquire how far that and the other great and essential question of the relations of landlord and tenant, are capable of mitigatory legislation, of harmonizing the perhaps only partial remedy.

We have sought to soothe the paramount religious disagreements which stir, and prompt, and goad the inveteracy of political opposition, by preaching a doctrine of tolerance and indulgence, which we should be too happy to see responded to upon the soil of the country for whose good it was invoked.

We have prayed at the hands of Governments and agitators alike, a silencing of that quick, varying, and uncertain storm of the national soul—that wild social turbulence—that undefined impetuosity of action and of thought, which have alternately heated and lacerated Ireland's bosom, until speculation flies from them in terror, and commerce gazes upon them with alarm. We would fain have conjured the spirit of calm—of bright repose—of ministering safety and confidence—to have lured the gold of our English capitalists to that fine field for its outlay—for the promotion of a glorious system of agriculture, where the earth, though not dug deeper than its surface, is capable of giving mines of wealth—for the impetus to trade, the employment of the people, and the institution of public works; but when we asked for the blessings of such a system agitation scowled down upon us its fury—when we claimed for Ireland the bread of prosperity her own disturbers presented her with a stone!

Well, then, we have surely loved Ireland; and according to our, poor and humble ability, would serve her too. And let no one say that we had a spark of unfriendliness in our bosom when loudly, heartily, emphatically, we raised our voice against Repeal. That word, when agitation had taught Ireland to ring with it, we would gladly have heard sounded without a single echo! We would take Ireland as the Sister of England's bosom, and we would not bear to see the parting of their sweet embrace. England, we have said before—and when we speak of England, we speak of her people, and not her Governments—has evinced a ready sympathy with the social and political sufferings of the "Shamrock Isle;" and the connection which has held them together has improved Ireland—in happiness, in riches, and in trade. The severance of that tie, if it were possible—which, in the present position of events, we solemnly aver that it is not—would ruin the Sister Kingdom irretrievably, and for ever. We spoke up then firmly, inexorably, against Repeal—we spoke against no party, against no order of political faith apart from that, but against the dangerous speculation itself. We attacked O'Connell—at once and above board—for agitating his too fevered and susceptible countrymen with that alarming question; but upon all others—upon every ground of expedient legislation for Ireland's good—we affirmed that stern impartiality and neutrality of purpose, which, flinging party from its presence as the cursed "madness of many," addressed itself only to promoting what was right, and annihilating what was shameful. In O'Connell we denounced the present agitator and not the past patriot—and in Repeal we hated the specious and fictitious remedy for wrongs and sorrows which we had deplored, but not denied!

And now, upon the eve of those momentous state trials—of which our next number will record the early progress we hope—with the same earnestness of purpose against the object of Repeal—to vindicate the same impartial dignity with respect to the proceedings at issue against the head repealers—we would gladly hear the cry of faction hushed as the court of justice opened. We believe that it would be more honest, more honourable, more religious, more true to the spirit of the Constitution, if all men would abstain from giving breath to the lungs of Party during these judicial investigations. Why this rage about Crown and traverser—Protestant and Catholic—over a plain, simple, solemn process of the law—which ought to be without quibble in its exercise, deceit in its nature, or partiality in its conduct, and which should be surrounded with dignity and decorum as the head bastions of a fortress impregnable and impassable to all but Justice herself. To our minds there is a sort of guilt even in the prejudgment of out-door popular opinion—and the wrangle of courts which accuse juries before they embark upon their sacred functions is unseemly and disgusting in the extreme. The jury panel for the Irish state trials is now struck, and we care not one jot how it is constituted. We hear that the Crown has struck off so many Catholics, and the traversers so many Protestants, and that the traversers themselves are some of them Protestants and some of them Catholics—so that right or wrong seems pretty evenly balanced between them; but we care not a jot for that, nor should we have cared if all the jury had been Protestants or all Catholics. We place our faith for justice in much higher considerations than these—in the inviolability of an oath tendered from earth to Heaven, and laid at the footstool of the throne of God. And next to this sacred security, we place a firm reliance upon our belief that the merchants, tradesmen, and gentlemen of Dublin are too proud of their honour, too chary of their respectability, and too fond of the rectitude of their own conscience, and the principle which speaks within, to commit the crime of perjury, either for Queen Victoria or for Daniel O'Connell. They will hear, see, sift, think, and decide—we are sure fairly, that is, as they think they ought—we believe justly, that is, as we hope they will—and without party or prejudice, whatever may be the issue—we exclaim fervently, "May God defend the right."

Now we have thought it proper to write so much about Ireland and her state litigation, before plunging into the heart of the interesting crisis that awaits her—we believe our readers will take this article as an earnest of the pure, but at the same time fearless impartiality with which we shall watch this great tournament in the halls of justice; and in this belief we have only to add—not, we hope, an ungracious or ill-considered promise—that our illustrations of the trials will be proportionate to the grandeur of the occasion, and the dignity of the theme, and will every way vindicate the character of the Illustrated London News!

VERA CRUZ.—See next page.

VERA CRUZ.—ARRIVAL OF THE WEST INDIA AND MEXICAN MAILS.

The Clyde, Royal Mail Company's steamer, Captain Symons, arrived at Southampton on Tuesday morning, bringing the following mails:—Columbian, Mexican, and West Indian.

The news from Mexico is somewhat important and dramatic. On the fourteenth of November, when the Clyde arrived at Vera Cruz, it was learnt that Santa Anna had visited that place the day previous, and that he had had the troops drawn up in the square and harangued them. He stated that he had arrived for the purpose of inspecting the fortifications, and that war with England was inevitable; that he was determined to support the honour of his country to the fullest extent, and would defend the castle of San Juan de Ulloa in person, and would resign it only with his life. About four o'clock in the afternoon, however, shortly after this bombastic exhibition had taken place, a special messenger arrived with the information that he had been re-elected President for a further term of five years. The news was received by the military with great rejoicing and enthusiasm, but no particular manifestation was made by the civilians on this announcement. The moment the information had been communicated, Santa Anna immediately mounted his horse, and returned to his house in great haste, without inspecting one of the fortifications, or taking further notice of the troops in any shape whatever. It is the opinions of the inhabitants of Vera Cruz, that he merely made the demonstration for the purpose of securing his election, and that his denunciations against England were sheer bravado, and nothing else.

Her Majesty's ship of war Albatross was at Vera Cruz, as also three French corvettes and a Spanish frigate.

An illustrative view of Vera Cruz may, at this moment, be specially interesting to our readers. It is still the most important commercial town in the United Mexican States. It lies on the south-western shores of the southern part of the Gulf of Mexico; though it has, properly speaking, no harbour, but only a roadstead formed by several shoals, which enclose in a semi-circular form a tract of sea, which in many parts offers good anchorage. The largest of the shoals lies opposite the town, and at its western extremity is a rocky island, on which the fortress of St. Juan de Ulua is built.

The town is built on a level and arid shore, consisting of sand, and almost destitute of vegetation; but at the back of the town are sand-hills, rising from 25 to 36 feet above their base, and the high temperature which there sand hills acquire in summer, and the reflection of the solar rays from them are considered the principal cause of the temperature of Vera Cruz from May to September, being somewhat higher than the mean annual temperature of the equator.

Vera Cruz is inclosed by walls, which surround the town so completely that the free circulation of air is impeded; and disease is, accordingly, very prevalent. The streets are, however, very wide; the paving is very good, and each street has raised footways, formed of lime, sand, and shells, which equals stone in durability, and is highly polished by the feet of passengers. Many of the houses are excellent; all of them are constructed of porous white coral, which composes the cliffs on the coast; the houses, too, are flat-topped, and covered with cement, and these roofs serve as tanas for rain-water. There are many public buildings, including several hospitals. The population is stated to be now about 12,000 inhabitants.

Vera Cruz, though its trade has declined since the War of Independence, still serves as an outlet for mining produce, and of all the cochineal destined for the markets of Europe and the United States; tobacco, sugar, coffee, jalap, vanilla, and sarsaparilla are also among its exports. The greater part of the tobacco, and even some tracts along the Pacific, are supplied with foreign goods from the capital, which receives them by the way of Vera Cruz, which town, therefore, must be considered as the port of the city of Mexico.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, JAN. 9.

SPAIN.

The affairs of Spain are in so confused a state that it would be hazardous to form an opinion. The various letters I have received this morning from Madrid, all agree that a crisis is imminent, and that the struggle will be severe. The members are preparing for a general election, the Progressists have emissaries in every part of the country exciting a spirit of discontent against the Government, and agitating for a popular rising. Whether the ministers or their opponents will succeed, it is difficult to say—the question remains in the hands of the military, a body corrupt, incentious, and disorganised. At the present moment, the military, as regards the officers, are friendly to the Government, and may be considered their instruments. In every part of Spain they not only insult all those who possess liberal sentiments, but have taken on themselves to destroy the press. The following article, which appeared on the 26th ult. in a Cadiz paper called El Nuevo Defensor del Pueblo, is a fair sample of the general conduct of the furet protectors of the people. The paper says:—Yesterday an article appeared in this paper declaring that amongst those who excited the civil and military authorities on Sunday last, was a Captain of Cavalry, who WISHED HIS MORSE COULD WALK IN THE BLOOD OF LIBERALS. The Captain came yesterday to our office, and asked for the editor. On being told that he was absent he returned, threatening to pull down the printing-office. Soon after, the editor, sitting quietly in a coffee-house, was touched on the shoulder. On turning round he beheld the Captain, who exclaimed, 'You have insulted me,' and instantly drew his sabre and made a cut at the editor, which with great difficulty he avoided. The editor then left the café, pursued by the Captain. Having sought refuge in another coffee-house, the waiter assisted him in escaping. Afterwards, three soldiers entered the café and greatly insulted every person present, and great damage was done to the premises. A party of municipal guards protected the printing-office from any attack." The same scenes have taken place in Madrid and other principal towns. Should the ministers be able to gorge these valiant fellows with money, they will not only stick to them, but do all their dirty work! It was reported in Madrid that a Carlist conspiracy had been discovered, which was to have broken out at Las Rosas, but had been prevented by the vigilance of the authorities.

The last accounts from Madrid are to the 3rd; there was nothing fresh. Mr. Bulwer had been presented to the President of the Council, by Mr. Jerningham, the Secretary of Legation.

Letters from Catalonia to the 2nd give us positive that Ametller had capitulated on the 30th ult. The inhabitants of Barcelona made an attempt at revolt on the 31st ult., under the direction of the late Secretary of the revolutionary Junta, Montana y Roma, and the Colonel Riera, but it has been repressed by the governor.

ITALY.

Letters from Rome, of a late date, confirm the report of the intended marriage of Queen Isabella of Spain, and Count de Trapani, youngest brother of the King of Naples. The Prince is not more than sixteen years of age, and has not yet completed his education at the College of Nobles.

The Marquis Masgrave, and the Director General of Texas, two of the wealthiest noblemen in Italy, lately died at Naples. They have given the whole of their fortune to the Jesuits, and other religious communities.

Tranquility, by the latest accounts, appeared to be restored in the Papal States, and every precaution was being taken by the Government to prevent a repetition of the late disorders.

GERMANY.

Letters from Trieste of the 23rd December, state that several Greek priests had reappeared in the Adriatic; they had already captured two vessels and murdered the crew. The Austrian and Greek Governments had sent some fast sailing vessels in pursuit of them.

A treaty has been agreed to between Prussia and Austria for uniting the railroad of Upper Silesia, now in a state of construction, to that of the Emperor Ferdinand, by means of a branch line passing from Giemuts to Neumunts near to the Prussian frontier

The King of Wirtemberg has ordered a grant to be made to the Jews for keeping up their places of religious worship, schools and hospitals.

On Carnatinas Eve Prince Albert of Prussia went in his carriage to the street in Berlin which bears his name, and, having called around him all the poor inhabitants, distributed to them money and clothing. He also paid such of their debts as were owing to bakers, butchers, and tailors.

FRANCE.

The debate in the Chamber of Peers yesterday was interesting. The report of the Committee of the Address was brought up by the Duke de Broglie. It is nearly an echo of the speech. The latter part of the first paragraph evidently alludes to the visit of the Legitimatist Princes to England, it speaks of "criminal manœuvres," and the last phrase is, "The King has kept his oaths—what Frenchman could forget or betray his own?" The Duke de Richelieu was the first legitimate Peer who spoke on the address. He observed that in 1830 he was a Peer of France, and consequently the principal obligations which the honour that had been transmitted to him brought with it, and not thinking himself freed from those obligations by the changes that had taken place in the state, he had determined to remain in his duty and to take the oath was required—he took the oath, and had never broken it. An occasion presented itself to go to a neighbouring country to express to the Duke de Bordeaux the sentiments which he should always consider it a particular honour to entertain. The Marquis de Veyrac, another Legitimist Peer, thought that the last phrase of the first paragraph of the address appeared to attack both the dignity of the Chamber and the independence of its members. In 1830 he had served a royal child, the loyal heir to a throne, had been included in the exile of his family. What reproaches had one to address to the young and chief victims of the fatal ordonnances? None! Prudence had preserved that royal child, and brought him to man's estate. He wished to gain information by visiting different countries, and for two years he had been travelling through Europe. At present he was in England. What was he doing there? Was he sailing around him adventurers and men of arms? No! A few friends had crossed the Channel to express to him their respect and their affection. Who would dare to blame them? He would affirm loudly that the progress of civilisation would prevent all blame or punishment falling on the meeting of the noblest sentiments between the most respectable misfortune. M. Guizot, in reply, said that the present Government had not attempted to exercise any exaggerated surveillance over the Prince to whom allusion had been made; but when his presence in one or the great capitals of Europe appeared to involve one of two consequences—either to place the French ambassador in a false position, or to furnish matter for exciting men's passions—we at once declared that such a position could not last, and that if it were persisted in the presence of our ambassador appeared to us neither suitable nor proper. England is a country of great liberty and great publicity. The Government was aware that the English Government was not armed against the consequences which we had treated of elsewhere; but, at the same time, we had a right to reckon on its loyal friendship Our hopes in that respect had not been deceived. The Queen of England refused to receive the Duke of Bordeaux, and by that step gave a striking proof of her displeasure, and her disapprobation of the political colour that was attempted to be given to this journey, and the consequences that might be drawn from it After the resolution of the Queen not to receive either in public or in private the Duke de Bordeaux, scenes took place in Belgrave-square, to which intentionally he would apply the epithet of scandalous—yes, scandalous, in the eyes of all men of sense or worth in every country. The Prince travelling for improvement, and in its place the title of Pretender to the Throne of France—of Pretender in virtue of a right which, since 1830, no French subject living under the laws can for an instant allow to appear. The Legitimist party had not to burden a certain number of their adherents, and he had no hesitation in affirming that by far the greater portion of that party blamed energetically what had just been lauded in the Chamber. He believed that the Legitimist party, like every other old party in the country, united by deeply-rooted sentiments and beliefs, reckoned amongst its members men animated by noble and good feelings, but the wisest, the most moderate, and the most intelligent, in all parties, allowed themselves to be excited by political busy bodies. In fact, gentlemen, to use a vulgar phrase, "the tail ran away with the head." (Applause.) Such were the motives that led the Government to regard as dubious the sentiments expressed in the address. They should not quit the course of moderate and liberal policy which they professed, but they should take every possible measure for the future, as well as at present, to prevent the recurrence of events which filled the mercy of rash attempts. That was the point which the address arrived at when it declared that "factions were put down, and the powers of the state, whilst they disdained their denunciations, found their united watch and their firm manœuvres." Yes, they should disdain, as they had hitherto done, all vain denunciations; but when they became revolting scandals or threatening symptoms of announcement. In fact, a criminal manœuvre should not be treated as mere frivolity, and, with the assistance of the Chambers, they were sure to succeed. (Applause.)

The Committee on the address of the Chamber of Deputies have elected M. Saint Marc Girardin to be their reporter. The Committee, by a majority of eight to two, voted that the address should express the same sentiments as those contained in the speech from the Throne, with the exception of a paragraph in favour of the nationality of Poland

Lord Brougham and Sir Henry and Lady Webster have returned to Paris.

On Saturday the examination of the different colleges got up a pretty demonstration in favour of the ill-timed speech of M. Lafitte in the Chamber of Deputies. After delivering an address to the old ultra-Liberal, they went in a body to pay a visit to the poor Berenger, whom the Foreign Office has put under the ban of M. Guizot." Not finding M. Berenger at home, they amused themselves in insulting the Commissary of Police, and finished the day by about a dozen of them being arrested.

The Journal des Chemens de Fer notices a discovery for railway travelling of rather a novel character. It consists of an enormous wheel, large enough to contain a horse and its driver. This wheel is on the principle of a squirrel's cage, in which the animal, although he never moves forward, constantly causes the cage to revolve. Other wheels, connected with the train, are set in motion by the revolutions of the monster wheel, and thus the train is made to advance in the ratio of the speed of the horse

Our Carnival has commenced rather dull; it is, however, expected that most of the fashionable salons will be opened next week. With the exception of the Italian Opera, the theatres are badly attended—indeed, there is no novelty to attract an audience. The principal parts in the opera "La Fortune en Dormant" is confided to Mesdames Stoltz and Dorus-Gras, Messrs. Levasseur and Barroilhet. The principal character in Auber's "Syrène" has been given to Mademoiselle Lavoye. It is said that "Caghostro," a comic opera, in three acts, will be brought out on the 15th.

Donizetti is at present in Vienna, rather indisposed; his medical attendants have a dread him to seek repose for some time. Notwithstanding the opinion of the doctors, this fecunde maestro has already spoken to write for the Milan theatres two operas and a ballet, and has promised to write for our Grand Opera the music to Scribe's piece, "Jeanne la Folle."

Mademoiselle Grisi, "la Diva Assoluta," is playing at Naples with great success. Thus opera does the maestro great credit, and, according to the opinion of the Italian amateurs, can be compared to the "Pirate," "Sonnambula," "L'Elisir," and "Anna Bolena."

Rossini's "Siege de Corinthe" is in rehearsal at Prague. The libretto has been translated into the Bohemian language.

PORTUGAL.

Our Lisbon correspondence of the 2d inst. brings the intelligence of the opening of the Cortes by the Queen in person that day

Senor Olozaga arrived at Lisbon at the end of the last month, and was residing on the 1st instant in one of the suburbs of that city.

The late ministerial crisis in Portugal has terminated in the refusal of the Queen to accept the resignation of the present ministry: her Majesty's subsequent proposal to him to form a new ministry, and his declining to do so, and reinstation with his colleague. The continuance of the ministry has been marked by her Majesty's especial favour, conferred on the Prime Minister by his elevation to the dignity of a Councillor of State

HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH.

"Noble Peers of the Kingdom and Senores Deputies of the Portuguese Nation.—I see with pleasure once more assembled in this honourable house the representatives of the nation, the fundamental law of the state has invested with the noble character of legislative interpreters of the national wishes and opinions.

"With the view of making myself more intimately acquainted with the wants of the people, accompanied by my august consort and two of my children, I left the capital for some weeks to visit the principal towns of Alemtejo and Estremadura, and I hope that this visit will not prove unprofitable, or fail to contribute to the prosperity of the inhabitants of those places, whose love, loyalty, and respect towards my royal person, it gratifies me to give public testimony of in this place.

"Subsequently to the solemn opening of the last legislative session, it pleased Providence to afford other means of security to the throne of these kingdoms in the birth of an Infanta.

"I have the satisfaction of being able to assure you that I continue to receive from allied nations assured proofs of friendship; and I confidently expect that the negotiations with the Holy See will be shortly brought to a conclusion—the rights of the crown have been preserved, and the wants of the Lusitanian Church attended to

"And to me it is above all things agreeable, to assure you that the public tranquillity has not suffered the slightest alteration in these kingdoms.

"In determining the force to be kept up, both military and marine, you will attend to the interests of the honour and security of the nation.

"In conformity with the constitutional character of the monarchy, the statement of the revenue and expenditure of the state for the future economic year will be presented to you; and as well with respect to this object, as in regard to the different measures which the Government has to propose to you the proposals which they will deem fit, and which experience has demonstrated the necessity of. I fully expect that the Chambers will afford my Government that co-operation which is to be expected from its zeal and its interest in the public weal."

GREECE.

The Augsburg Gazette publishes the following note from Lord Aberdeen to the British Minister at the Court of King Otho.—"The financial position of Greece gave rise in the month of April to a meeting of the conference of London, which produced four protocols. Three of them were signed at St. Petersburgh to be acted with the most perfect good understanding. The Russian representative not having full powers to accept definitively these protocols, they have not been published. It was agreed between them to send them to St. Petersburgh to be signed by the Emperor. After the events of the 3rd of September, Prince Wallenstein Oettingen received a commission from the King of Bavaria to hand to the conference at London a note, and to come to an understanding with the Courts of London and Paris relative to Greece. According to this note, the King of Bavaria appeared to wish to acknowledge the representative Government accepted in Greece as King Otho had written to the King of Bavaria after the 30th of September, that constitutional institutions were not only useful but necessary to the country. King Louis expressed at the same time his wish that the Powers would continue to cause his rights to be respected and his throne to be consolidated. The French and English Governments, therefore, have determined to give their representatives of Greece special instructions relative to the present state in that country.

WEST INDIES.

By the steamer Clyde, arrived at Southampton some days behind her time, we have accounts to the 8th December. The gazette, bringing the sum of £26,490 dollars on freight, 4,661 ounces of gold and gold dust, 3,690 oz. of silver, 152 oz. of platina, and £1,463 in British money, with one box of emeralds, &c.

In Jamaica the Legislature had passed some useful bills, and among others, one for the railway from Kingston to Spanish Town, and one for a census of the island, being, we believe, the first ever taken, and likely to prove of some importance in determining hereafter the increase in a free black population as compared with one still in slavery. Trade was still dull, and money so scarce, that it was even apprehended by some that there would soon be serious difficulties among the mercantile community of the colony.

In Barbadoes the weather continued dry and the planters were anxious for a little rain

There are statements in the West India journals of the slave trade being very openly prosecuted in Cuba, under the sanction of the new Governor General, O'Donnell, who, if this be true, will, we trust, be properly and promptly called to account for his conduct. We fear, from the concurrent testimony reaching us, that the slave trade is really on the increase, despite the vigilance of our cruisers, owing to the shameful violation of existing treaties by foreign powers.

AMERICA

The packet ship Liverpool, Capt. Eldridge, landed her papers at a late hour on Wednesday night, at Liverpool. She sailed from New York on the 21st ultimo, and by her we have received papers of the 20th and 21st; the intermediate dates, viz., the 16th, 17th, 18th, and 19th, are on board the packet ship New York, which sailed from New York on the 19th, two days before the Liverpool, and is now off the port.

The papers we have received do not contain any news of importance. There is not a line in them from Canada. The proceedings of the American Congress do not appear to have been of a character to excite any attention. It is reported that some changes will certainly be made in the Tariff, and it is added that a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means are in favour of a great and decided reduction in the duties, and that they intend to introduce a bill forthwith.

News from Monte Video to the 16th of October, received at New York by the Liverpool from Rio Janeiro, announces that the blockade of that port was strictly maintained by Admiral Brown, who had issued a proclamation forbidding the entrance of any vessel with articles for the use of his opponents

H.M.S. Spy had captured three slavers off the coast of Africa. One of them had 500 slaves on board, all of whom were liberated, and the vessel condemned and sold.

The mercantile accounts are less satisfactory than those received by the last steam-ship. There was scarcely any business doing in any of the New York Markets, and the money was particularly dull. On the day preceding the sailing of the Liverpool there was little business done, and what was, was generally transacted at a decline of prices.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BLUNTISHAM.—On Monday evening last, about seven o'clock, a fire was discovered raging in the homestead of Mr. Aspden, farmer of the place, and one of the guardians of the poor. The flames were soon got under, in spite of the exertions of the neighbours, and the presence of two engines, were not subdued till all the stacks in the yard but one, and a barn containing threshed corn were consumed. The dwelling-house was saved, but the implements and stock on the premises. There is no doubt as to the conflagration having been caused by an incendiary, as Mr. Aspden has for some time past been subject to a system of annoyance. Mr. Aspden has been insured in the amount of about one-half of the stacks were cut off, and very lately all the gates on his farm were despoiled of their hinges.

CAMBRIDGE.—At March on Tuesday night, about eleven o'clock, a large thatched barn, the property of Mrs. Barton, widow, was discovered to be on fire; the premises are situate in the town, and from the rapid and powerful ascendancy of the flames it was found impossible to preserve any portion of either building or contents. The fire engines of the town were quickly brought to the scene of destruction, and a plentiful supply of water was obtained; at one period, however, considerable fears were entertained for the safety of the property of Mr. Teesdale, wine merchant, but fortunately the fire was confined to the premises in which it originated. The barn had been used as a carpenter's shop, in the occupation of Mr. Bevis, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Peyton, and contained a quantity of deals, &c. This fire is generally thought to have been accidental, though a different opinion prevails in some quarters. The property, we believe, is not insured.

CAMBRIDGE.—MYSTERIOUS DEATH.—Mr Cristord, for many years the proprietor of the Bull, one of the principal hotels of Cambridge, was found drowned in the Cam on Monday morning, under circumstances in which it was difficult to come to the conclusion whether his death proceeded from accident or self-destruction. A labourer named Darnell, of Newenham, perceived a hat lying on the bank, near a place called the Bull Leys, and a few yards from this, in the river, he observed a human body standing upright, with the water coming up nearly over his head, which proved afterwards to be the body of Mr. Cristord. He had his gloves on, and his coat was buttoned up to the chin. The body was cold, the face black, and the clothes dry, as if he had fallen to the mud at the bottom, and had been struggling to get out.

GLOUCESTER. MANSLAUGHTER AT A CARD TABLE.—A young man named Richard Fricker met with an unfortunate end on Saturday evening last. A party of some boon companions, in a beershop called the Plasterers' Arms, in Barton-street, when another man, named George Fricker, joined the party about seven o'clock, and they all sat down to play at cards. He was intoxicated, and very quarrelsome, and as the game proceeded, he looked over the cards of one of the players, and made a signal to his partner for the purpose of showing what cards were out. This aggravated Cole, who told him he would play no more, and threw up his hand. Fricker then challenged Cole to fight, and Cole rose from his seat, and struck a severe blow in the mouth. A proposition was made to adjourn to the yard, but Fricker would not agree to this; and, taking an opportunity, hit Cole a violent blow under the jaw with his fist, which knocked him down. In the fall he struck his head against the bar of his head, and continued to beat him for some time, until he lay outstretched on the floor, and upon being called on to rise, it was found that he was quite dead. Fricker then laid hold of the landlord, threw him on the ground, and beat him about the head. Mr. Hughes, a medical man, promptly attended, and pronounced Cole to be dead. The landlord was much hurt his pockets a phial, containing laudanum was found. Every effort was made to counteract the effects of the poison, but in vain; the unfortunate gentleman expired on Saturday afternoon.

ST. IVES.—During last week a labourer employed on the farm of Mr. Wratten, farmer, of Needingworth, near St. Ives, discovered what he considered to be a piece of paper projecting from one of his master's stacks, when, on a nearer inspection, it was ascertained to be a sort of a large fuse attached to a ball of what is considered to contain combustible matter, which was placed about a foot in the stack. The paper or fuse had been lighted at the end exposed, but from some fortunate reason had smouldered a short time and gone out.

IRELAND.

THE STATE PROSECUTIONS.

On Friday Mr. Brewster, Q.C., and Mr. Kemmis, Crown Solicitor, attended at Mr. Bourne's office for the purpose of reducing the Jury list to the number of 24. Mr. Pierce Mahony and Mr. Cantwell, solicitors, were in attendance on behalf of the Traversers. Mr. Steele and Mr. Barrett were also present.

Mr. Bourne, addressing Mr. Steele, said: As you appear one of the parties on the record, and appear in person, FIELD—for I say, if you have anything to offer, I am quite ready to hear you, before proceeding with the immediate business for which we have met here.

Mr. Steele: I do not intend just now to trouble you, but I beg to inform you that my attorney is present, and under his guidance I am acting.

Mr. Mahony complained of several qualified persons, some of whom were Roman Catholics, being omitted from the Jury list, and Mr. Bourne, refusing to entertain the subject, he handed in the following protest:—

"COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, CROWN SIDE.
"THE QUEEN v. DANIEL O'CONNELL AND OTHERS.

"I require you to take notice that I do hereby protest, on behalf of the traversers, Daniel O'Connell, Esq., and the other proceedings taken and steps taken in striking a jury in this case. First—Because the names of a great number of persons qualified to be inserted upon the special jury list, and whose right had been allowed by the Recorder of the City of Dublin, have been fraudulently and unjustly omitted from the special juror list. Secondly—Because you refused to receive evidence to prove the above fact, although proof of the same was in readiness and tendered to you. Thirdly—Because many persons not resident in the county in the special juries list who do not reside in the county of the City of Dublin.

Because you refused evidence of the said fact, although proof of the same was in readiness and tendered to you. FIELD—Because several of the persons struck in striking names were drawn yesterday do not reside in the county of the City of Dublin. For these reasons, in addition to those I offered to you yesterday, and also to those given to you in writing yesterday by Mr. Forde, I solemnly protest against any further proceeding in striking a jury in this case. Dated the 8th day of January, 1844.

"PIERCE MAHONY, Attorney.

"To Walter Bourne, Esq., Clerk of the Peace."

The reduction of the jury list was then proceeded with, and on the part of the Crown the names of eleven Catholics and a gentleman named Hamilton, a native of England, were struck off. A similar number of persons, supposed to be hostile to the Repeal question, were struck off on the part of the traversers, and the affair terminated after some very strong observations had been indulged in by Mr. Cantwell. The Sheriff disclaimed being actuated by other than the most impartial motives, and Mr. Mahony bore testimony to this fact.

In consequence of this exclusion of all the Roman Catholics from the special jury in the state trials, a requisition is in progress for an aggregate meeting of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, to petition Parliament and address the Queen on the subject.

Very extensive alterations are being made in the interior of the Court of Queen's Bench preparatory to the coming trials. The gallery has been extended back to the extreme end of the court, and new stairs have been erected to the side boxes. Both the inner and outer bars have been divided by a partition, and the seats at the end of the bar have been taken away, which makes the place much more ample, and will be available for accommodating many more persons than heretofore. The alterations about the table are judicious, and the side bar has been amplified, in order that the "conspirators" may have places there. One of the side galleries, including the jury-box attached, will be appropriated to the reporters, who, it is needless to say, should have every facility and accommodation afforded to them on this important occasion. It was said that the front seat of the above gallery was to be set apart for "peers, and other high personages," but on making inquiry on the subject, both the High and Sub-Sheriff declared that one of the galleries should be reserved exclusively for the reporters, and that a person, no matter what be his rank or station, would not be allowed to interfere with the reporters, or disturb them in the discharge of the all-important duty which they had to perform.

DUBLIN, Jan. 9.—Summonses were this day served, by the Crown, upon several members of the committee of the Repeal Association, who are required to attend as witnesses at the trials. Yesterday and this day summonses were also served upon those of the gentlemen of the Dublin newspapers, who are required to give evidence on behalf of the Crown. As all the witnesses are to be excluded from the court, unless the witness actually under examination, this summoning of the reporters will produce extreme inconvenience to the various journals to which they belong, as well as disappointment to the public.

JANUARY 10.—A notice of great importance was last night served upon the traversers and their attorneys, calling upon them to produce among the list of the minute-books, letter-books, account-books, lists of Repeal wardens, and original documents used at the several meetings of the Repeal Association and the "monster" meetings throughout the country.

HALF-PAST FOUR O'CLOCK. I have just learned that a very general rumour prevails that the trials are abandoned. Such a rumour is not new—but the present has not an air worthy at least of some notice. The grounds assigned are, that after the Recorder left here and arrived at Drayton Manor, he discovered among his papers some sheets of the jury list, which contained the names of some of the Roman Catholics, above whose absence from the panel so much has been said and written during the past five or six days.

I mention this rumour without having made any inquiry in a quarter qualified to confirm or contradict it, at time presses, to save the post.

Wagers are already made that no trial will be had this term. Probably the knowing ones think that some crotchet has arisen which cannot be overcome in time.

JAN. 11.—Hilary Term was opened this day with the usual formalities, and the Queen's Bench was much crowded at an early hour. Rumour busied itself in debating the matter with the fictions that orders had come from the other side of the water, to put an end to the proceedings against Mr. O'Connell and the other accused parties, but there is no foundation for the rumour.

To show the anxiety of the public to be present at the state trials, I may mention a matter which would otherwise be only of local interest; the County Grand Jury box and the adjoining gallery having been set apart for the press.

REPORTING.—A meeting has been held of the Dublin Reporters and the Correspondents of the London Press, and a resolution of the following purport carried:—

"Resolved—That having been informed that several members of our body have been summoned to give evidence on the approaching State Trials, we feel it incumbent on us to protest firmly against the principle involved in this proceeding; and we declare our conviction that to compel reporters and correspondents of the public press to give evidence in the course of judicial proceedings respecting matters which come under their observation exclusively in that capacity, would be attended with great public inconvenience—would embarrass us in the discharge of our onerous duties, and by compromising our neutrality would materially impair, if not destroy, that confidence we have heretofore been favoured with by all classes of the public."

[We can ourselves bear testimony to Mr. Latouche's great courtesy towards the press, and we think he deserves the thanks of the public for his conduct but we would take leave to suggest to him the propriety of placing the police constables outside the door instead of inside the gallery, as they were stationed during the proceedings last term, to the great annoyance of the "Fourth Estate."—ED. I. L. N.]

On Thursday Mr. O'Connell arrived at Clonmel. The corporation and the traders went out to met him; he was conducted into the town in a triumphal procession, and was greeted as he passed from every house. He appeared in excellent health and spirits, and much gratified at the devoted marks of attachment bestowed upon him by the inhabitants of the town. He addressed the assembled people from the balcony of his hotel, and most emphatically urged them above all things to keep the peace, and avoid every kind of violence. He was afterwards entertained at a banquet, at which the Very Rev. Dr. Burke was in the chair, and about 300 gentlemen were present.

On his way to Dublin Mr. O'Connell received an address from the corporation of Kilkenny, who went forth to meet him in full costume and with all the insignia of their office. He arrived in Dublin on Friday night.

At a meeting of the freeholders of Tipperary, held on the 4th of January, it was resolved to put Nicholas Maher, of Tenlulla, in nomination to fill the vacancy in the representation of that county. Mr. O'Connell was asked to allow his son Daniel O'Connell to stand, but he deferred to the claims of Mr. Maher, who was, he said, a patriot long before patriotism was fashionable.

At the Repeal meeting, held at the Conciliation Hall on Monday, the week's rent amounted to upwards of £600. Mr. O'Connell was present, and the attendance of members was more than usually numerous. The Attorney-General gallantly denounced the Landlord and Tenant Commission as a "humbug," and recommended the people, instead of crowding the streets during the Repeal trials, to read the accounts of them in the newspapers. He promised them, whatever might be the result, they would ultimately have the Irish Parliament in College-green.

THE CORPORATION.—An adjourned meeting of the Corporation was held at the City Assembly House—the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor presided, when Alderman Roe moved the following resolution:—"That an address be prepared to her Majesty, praying that her Majesty may be pleased, on the assembling of Parliament, to direct that an inquiry be made into the grievances of Ireland, and that her Majesty would be graciously pleased in the meantime to direct the suspension of the present state prosecutions until effective measures shall be taken to redress those grievances, and that such address, when prepared, be submitted to the citizens at large for signature." A long debate ensued, which was ultimately adjourned until next day.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SHOCKING SUICIDE OF A YOUNG GENTLEMAN NEAR CHALK FARM.—On Tuesday morning, shortly before nine o'clock, the following most shocking and determined act of suicide was perpetrated by a youth apparently not more than eighteen or nineteen years of age, and attired in the garb of a gentleman, in one of the fields adjoining the Chalk Farm Tavern, Camden Town. It appears that two boys, named Jones and Henry Crewe, were playing in the carpet-ground belonging to the father of the former, when they observed the deceased come from the direction of the Regent's Canal, and then load a pair of pistols. Shortly after they heard the report, and, on the boy Jones turning round, he saw the deceased falling. Crewe ran to the spot, and then called out "Murder!" The boy hove away together to find a policeman, and having met police constable John Carter, 88 S, near the York and Albany, they told him what had happened. On his arrival in the field he found the unfortunate deceased lying on his back, near the carpet-ground fence, with his head literally blown to atoms, and his face so shattered as not to leave the slightest trace of his features discernible. One pistol was lying near his right hand, discharged, and another on his left side, loaded nearly up to the muzzle and on full cock. At this time pulsation had not ceased, but the body presented a most appalling spectacle. On him being searched by the constable, upwards of a quarter of a pound of powder was found in a powder-flask, and four other separate parcels in deceased's pockets, together with three large bullets (which indicated from their appearance that he had carried them about with him some days), on which were also found patches a pewter, and a small piece of paper having writing on it of the words "Suffer Structure Account." He is of remarkable fine build, about five feet four inches in height, and has light brown hair. He was attired in a dark cloth frock coat with a figured shadow stripe, black cloth waistcoat and trousers, black handkerchief, nearly new, and lastly also a new Wellington boots, one of with red morocco leather, and his stockings were marked "J. A., No. 2." a black cloth cap was also found near the spot, which no doubt belonged to him. The body was conveyed to St. Pancras workhouse to await an inquest.

MURDER OF TWO CHILDREN BY THEIR MOTHER.—On Wednesday evening, shortly before six o'clock, the discovery of a horrid case of murder was made in Griffen-street, Deptford. It appears that the father of the two children returned home from London soon after five o'clock, having been in town all day on private business, and when, on going into the back parlour to meet his wife, he found her with her throat dreadfully cut, lying with her head towards the foot of the bed, weltering in her blood, but still alive, and, on getting a light, he discovered his two children, the names of one about two years of age, lying at their mother's feet next the head of the bed, with their throats so dreadfully cut that the knives had become almost immediately afterwards extinct. He ran out and informed the police, when Mr. Ewins, (S) Inspector, Lovell, 15 R, and Sergeant Roscoe, 2 R, entered the premises, and immediately sent for Dr. Arthur, the parish surgeon, and another gentleman, who came at once and sewed up the wound in the woman's throat, and by Mr. Forde, Lambeth-street, by the time the churchwardens, &c., had arrived, and searched the place, and after some time, they found a razor covered with blood. The name of the father is John Farnley Dickinson, recently carrying on the business of a licensed victualler at the Peterborough Arms, Parsons Green, Fulham, where it was understood he was unfortunate. His wife's maiden name was March, and she formerly lived at Kensington. At the time of the dreadful event Mr. Dickinson was keeping a lodging house at No. 5, Griffen-street. In some boxes and drawers were found an immense number of pawnbrokers' duplicates for articles pledged at Bermondsey, Horsleydown, Knightsbridge, and Kensington, and it is evident that the family had been supported by such means for some time past. The following part of a letter was found in a box by the bedside: "Dear Sir, I now write to you for the last time; you said last night it was the unhappy fault, it was owing to my own misconduct, that I was now in my present distress; but that I deny. I say now, and I shall always say, that you were the cause of my downfall at the Peterborough Arms. I am compelled to write to you, as I could not express myself to you last night. I now wish to know if you will be so kind as to pay my rent for me?" The prisoner was heard the woman say to the surgeon, police, and churchwarden, that she did the deed herself. Some brandy and water, and also warm tea was handed to the woman, which revived her a little, and enabled her to speak in a low tone. Mr. Dickinson was removed to the union workhouse for personal safety. Two policemen are left to watch the unhappy man.

SHOCKING ACCIDENT.—On Saturday, a house painter and decorator, named Pury, 42 years of age, who was at work at the town residence of the Duke of Devonshire, in Piccadilly, whilst standing upon the parapet, between thirty and forty feet from the ground, suddenly slipped and fell upon the grand entrance stones in the area in front of the premises. The poor fellow when raised was found to have sustained a shocking fracture of the vertebræ of the back, besides other serious injuries.

SUDDEN DEATH IN A BALL-ROOM.—A truly awful instance of the uncertainty of life was last night afforded in the neighbourhood of Kingsland. A party of friends had met to spend the evening at the house of Mr Thomas Edwards, brew-dealer, when one of the party, Miss Silas Fisher, who resided within a few miles of Edwards's, on standing up to join a quadrille, became suddenly seized, and before medical assistance could be obtained, the vital spark had fled. The deceased was much beloved and respected by a large circle of acquaintance.

SHIPWRECK. LOSS OF LIFE.—The Dublin newspapers, which arrived on Monday evening at the Dynas Coalworks, the property of Walter Coffin, Esq., in the parish of Llantrissent, in Glamorganshire. The case is at present involved in considerable mystery; from what we can collect, it was a case of fire-damp, and that from ten to twelve lives have been sacrificed, and severe injuries have been suffered by others. The roof of the pit has been blown up, and the bodies are all buried in the ruins, and it is contended that a week of day and night labour will be required before the bodies can be found.

SHOCKING ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday morning, between eight and nine o'clock, as a country waggon, heavily laden, was passing through Long-acre, when nearly opposite Long-acre, an elderly man, evidently in a state of intoxication, was in crossing the way, suddenly fell completely before the horses belonging to the waggon, and before assistance could be rendered, the man had been run over and so severely injured that, on his being conveyed to the hospital, the amputation of both legs was considered necessary. It appears that his name is Jenker, a tailor, and lives in the neighbourhood of Drury-lane.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—At a pigeon-match, held at Richmond, Yorkshire, on New Year's Day, the party were, as usual, surrounded by a number of young persons firing at the birds which escaped. A youth in the crowd, whose gun had missed fire, and while replacing the cap, incautiously directed his piece amongst the by-standers. The gun suddenly went off, and the contents striking the forehead of a boy named Deighton, twelve years of age, carried away the whole of the upper part of the head. He died instantly.

HEARTLESS OMNIBUS ROBBERY.—Last week a poor woman, living at Hackney proceeded to Peckham to receive £3, a yearly gratuity of a charitable lady residing there, and on her return home in a Peckham omnibus, a gentlemanly-looking fellow entered into conversation with her on the suldiness of the season, and in consequent blessing to the door, &c., when she foolishly recounted the charitable deeds of her benefactress, and explained the nature of her errand. Her sympathising fellow-passenger left at the Elephant and Castle, and on her arrival at Grasechurch-street the poor woman found her pocket had been cut, and the £3 and a 6d. extracted. A few benevolent individuals at Hackney are about to restore the amount.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—Elizabeth Edgley, aged 34, housekeeper to Mr. Laing, of Stanfield Court, Inner Temple, met her death a few days since, by falling down stairs, and her comb being forced into the scalp. The deceased was widow of John Edgley, coachman to the late Sir William Gage, Master of the Rolls.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT. Benjamin Dunnell, a plate layer on the North Midland Railway, was killed by the engine of the Leeds train from Manchester on Thursday last, owing to his own carelessness in not getting out of the way in time. He has left a wife and six children.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

Captain Thos. Fernyhough, Governor of the Military Knights of Windsor, expired very suddenly on Monday morning, at his residence, the Governor's house in the lower foundation of the Castle. He was in the 67th year of his age and has left a widow and four children—two sons and two daughters. The vacant governorship is in the gift of her Majesty, upon the recommendation of the Dean and Canons of Windsor.

On Saturday last Mr. M. J. Whitty, the high constable of Liverpool, sent in his resignation of an office he has held with the highest credit to himself and the utmost benefit to the town for upwards of eleven years.

The Lord Bishop of London has sent by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts a journal of his visitation to the western portion of his diocese during the autumn of 1842, which the society has determined on publishing for circulation amongst its members.

A shelf, about six inches from the shop window of Mr. J. C. Akester, chemist, &c., St. James's-street, Hull, has been burnt in to the depth of a quarter of an inch at least, occasioned by the rays of the sun impinging upon one of the large globular show glasses in the window, and thence passing through to the shelf in question. Had not this been timely observed it might ultimately have led to a conflagration.

The French press, in 1843, brought forth 6,176 works in all the languages, dead and living; 4,870 engravings and lithographic prints; 147 maps, plans, and charts; and 116 pieces of music have also been published.

The Champagne wine merchants met at the Hotel de Ville of Rheims on the 27th, to adopt measures for preventing the imitation of Champagne, which every year is increasing.

Complaints are continually being made that letters and parcels, beyond the twopenny rate are charged to the receiver, after having been prepaid, in many, at the time of being posted. This arises in consequence of post-masters and receiving-houses not being provided with stamps for 1½d. and 2½d. "Paid Twopence," and who are therefore compelled to mark in red ink the postage, showing no difference between a letter thus already paid than one to be received for.

At the weekly meeting of the board of guardians of the Hackney Union, held last week, it was resolved unanimously—"That the board deprecate the low remuneration made in the metropolis to sempstresses, and believe that the present state of things, so much condemned, has been brought about by the anxiety of guardians of unions themselves, and other superintendents of large establishments, to find employment for their inmates, even at a nominal price, and that the master of the workhouse of this union be now directed not to receive any more slop-work."

The new British and Foreign Institute is to be honoured at its opening with the presence of Prince Albert, who has consented to become its patron.

Last week J. C. Schetky, Esq., professor of drawing at Addiscombe College, was appointed marine painter in ordinary to her Majesty.

On Monday last the ceremony of laying the first stone of the new church of St. John, Notting-hill, in the parish of St Mary Abbotts, Kensington, was performed on the site chosen on the summit of the hill, known as the Hippodrome hill on the Uxbridge-road. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. John Sinclair (Archdeacon of Middlesex) who delivered an impressive and instructive address in the presence of a vast assemblage of people who attended on the occasion.

The Marquis of Salisbury has withdrawn from Freemasonry. The refusal of that body to elect him Grand Master, in succession to the late Duke of Sussex, is the generally assigned cause.

By appointment of the Free Church Assembly's commission, Dr. Burns has left on a mission to the United States, in behalf of the religious body he stands connected with. The reverend gentleman goes out to America as a companion to Dr. Cunninghame, for the purpose of explaining the position of the Free Church of Scotland, and for collecting funds for its support. We believe it is the intention of this deputation to continue in America for about four months, and not to return sooner than for the sitting of the Free Assembly in May next.

A letter from Hanover, of the 27th ult., states that the master of the hounds had been murdered while hunting in one of the forests of the Cleyer. The crime is supposed to have been committed by poachers.

Dr. Kalley, after suffering an imprisonment of four months in Madeira, has at length been released on bail.

Such is the scarcity of silver in Barton, in Yorkshire, that several influential tradesmen in the town have been under the necessity of issuing tickets of the value of half-a-crown, in lieu of silver change for gold. These tickets are now in circulation, and answer all the purposes for which they are wanted.

Monday a meeting of several hundreds of colliers took place on the Moor-day-green, Barnsley. From what could be gathered of the speeches, it is the intention of the coal miners in England and Wales to form themselves into one great union, so that they may all act in concert at any given time for an advance of wages.

A very beautiful sword has been transmitted to Captain Sir George Sartorius, of the Malabar, by General Espartero, in commemoration of Sir George's services in Portugal, which so powerfully influenced the establishment of Spanish freedom. The sword was presented to General Espartero by the province of Santander.

Burke the notorious trotting horseman, was convicted at the Hitchin Petty Sessions, on Tuesday last, of cruelty to Brewer's pony, which he drove at some time ago in a match against the Bedford coach, and was fined in the full penalty of forty shillings.

The Duke de Nemours, the future Regent of the French, has not waited for his dotation to give himself a magnificent equipage, drawn by the finest horses that perhaps exist in France. It is said that those superb animals are a present from the Queen of England.

The Suabian Mercury states, under the head of Darmstadt, that M. de Haber, who recently killed M. Sacharga in a duel, intends to surrender to the proper tribunal, and to undergo the sentence of imprisonment, if found guilty, will, according to law, be three years' imprisonment in a fortress.

Last week the cuckoo was frequently heard in the neighbourhood of Blackburn.

The Christian order of the Swan has been revived in Prussia, by a royal decree, dated Berlin, Christmas-eve, 1843.

Her Majesty has commanded to be transmitted to Mr. Catlin, through the medium of the Hon. C. A. Murray, Master of the Household, a check for £20, to be presented to the Ojibbeway Indians. These interesting creatures evince a great desire to revisit Windsor Castle, which is likely to be gratified.

The statue of the late Sir D. Wilkie was, we hear, carried by the National Gallery for erection last week; but the floor of this unfortunate building was found insufficient to support the weight, and they have been propping it up to the needful strength.

In the Bristol District Court of Bankruptcy, on Thursday last, dividends were declared on the separate estates of Hobhouse, Philpott, and Lowder. Mr. Hobhouse's and Mr. Philpott's private estates paid 9s in the pound. On that of Lowder, a dividend of 8s in the pound, in addition to 9s in the pound already paid, was declared.

In the Dublin Consistory Court the suit of Lady Galmoy against Lord Galmoy has been dismissed, on the ground that both parties were disentitled by their own conduct, each having proved the charge brought against the other.

The latest accounts from New Zealand correct some inaccuracies which had appeared in the earlier statements of the massacre of our unfortunate countrymen. It was said that the settlers first fired upon the natives and killed several of them, including the wife of the Rangaiata, who had a child in her arms at the time, and that this was the commencement of the affray.

A company has just been formed in shares, with a capital of 500,000 francs, for the destruction of rats and mice throughout France! There is abundant room for the operations of the company, as the depredations of these pests, of which are almost unexhaustible from the vast numbers of rats which infest them, but the means by which the company proposes to clear away this annoyance are not revealed.

Earl Spencer has written a letter to Mr. Whitworth, Honorary Secretary to the "Northampton Farmers and Graziers' Association," resigning the Presidentship of that Society; owing to the decided opposition expressed by the members at his lordship's recent declaration in favour of free trade principles.

We understand that the will of the late eccentric Mr. Thompson, (vide "Price" Memoirs of the late Mr. Humphrey Gregory, at present a prisoner in Newgate, is disputed, and the question is about to come before the Prerogative Court.

Mr. J. R. Kemp, late Member of Parliament for Lewes, and to whom nearly half Brighton at one time belonged, has been outlawed at the suit of Wm. Pilkington, Bart., and Dame Mary Milbourne Swinnington, his wife.

The occurrences which have taken place amongst the colliers since the commencement of the new year seem to indicate that the present differences between men and their employers cannot be amicably adjusted, and that the result must be a general strike. In every instance the men have refused a proffered advance of wages.

The public must now be very cautious in receiving sovereigns and half-sovereigns, all of which will be rigorously weighed at the banking offices, when offered there for payment. If there be a deficiency, however small, the sum of 6d. is deducted from each sovereign, and 3d. from each half ditto; and the coins, having been cut with a hammer and chisel, are despatched to the Mint for re-coinage.

As an instance of the decline of the whale fishery, it is mentioned that the whole number of vessels that sailed for this trade in 1843 was eleven, whereas they used to be about thirty per annum.

The churchwardens of the parish of St. George, East, Middlesex, have distributed the goods of several of the inhabitants for church rates.

According to a recent decision of the French Minister of War, no officer of the army shall in future obtain leave to marry, unless the person to whom he is to be united should possess a revenue of at least 1200 francs per annum.

The following capital jeu d'esprit is from the playbill of the Haymarket pantomime: "The public is respectfully informed that the little dog mentioned in the original story has been omitted, for fear the animal's attraction might render the manager liable to the penalties of the 3d and 4th of Victoria, cap. 47, sec. 56, by which it is enacted, 'that no person within the district of the Metropolitan Police shall use any dog for the purpose of drawing or helping to draw,' &c."

A correspondent from Watchet in Somersetshire, informs us that singing mice abound in that locality to a numerous extent. Two of the scrawlers have been caught, and are described as extremely interesting both in their performance and appearance.

KAMEHAMEHA, KING OF THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

The great interest which the aggressive policy of the French Government towards the Sandwich Islands has excited on behalf of their King Kamehameha III., and the incipient constitution of which he is the intelligent administrator, has induced us, at much trouble and expense, to procure a beautiful full-length portrait of his Majesty, as he usually appears dressed, in a rich Windsor uniform, on the occasion of a consultation with the somewhat turbulent members of his council. The group is a curious one, and presents a striking picture of the "civilization which eats up the savage." Kauikeaouli, whose proper name is Kauikeaouli, is the brother of the lamented Liholiho, who, with his Queen, died in London in 1824. On their death he was raised under a regency, of the head of which sat his gentle but heroic mother, Kaahumanu. During the latter years of his minority he became a victim to pleasure, and spent his days in the society of the most dissolute chiefs of the islands. But having sown his "wild oats," and learned the commiserating nature of earthly pleasures, he fortunately became acquainted with the American missionaries, and, under their tuition, his naturally noble nature recovered its primitive strength, and he at length became a willing convert to the religious and mild under-currents of the Anglo-Saxon race, and consequently, at the same time, a determined foe to the Jesuitical spirit of their Gallic neighbours. In this spirit he has recently given to the Hawaiian archipelago a magna charta, which breathes in all its enactments a sentiment of representative liberty, and a love of the human race, much, while it enables him to the gratitude of the good of all nations, should in an especial manner procure for his island empire the sympathetic protection of Great Britain. Not a tittle of its fair scroll was dyed in blood, nor did a threat or blow urge its execution. It was an optional change from the hereditary absolutism and grinding tyranny of his forefathers to written laws and constitutional freedom. In doing this, says Jervis, "Kamehameha has shown himself a worthy descendant of the great Tamehameha (Kamehameha I.) Embodyin in his crown the spirit of progress which characterizes his nation, he has kept in advance of his people, and as boldly led their ranks in the pursuit of political wisdom, as even his father, in the forlorn hope of a doubtful strife. To the latter belongs the credit of uniting the islands under one head, a victorious monarch; but to the former is due the more genuine glory of conferring upon them the blessings of enlightened councils, which, if allowed fair scope, will ultimately produce happiness at home and respectability abroad." Such is the character and conduct of the sovereign of whom Louis Philippe, by the mouth of his captain, C. Laplace, demands "he shall conform to the usages of civilized nations;" or, in other and more intelligible terms, sanction the unlicensed introduction of French brandy and French priests. We may here mention that Mr. Wyld has just published a corrected chart of the Sandwich Islands, which is interesting in connexion with the French interference.

KAMEHAMEHA, KING OF THE SANDWICH ISLANDS, IN COUNCIL.

IRISH ARMED OUT-PENSIONERS.—A GROUP FROM LIFE.

TOWER OF THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.

The tower of this truly superb structure is now externally completed. The grasshopper vane has been repaired and regilt, and deposited in its place. The dials and hands of the clock have been placed; the machinery just perfected; Mr. Tite has consulted Professor Taylor, the Gresham Lecturer on Music, as to the arrangement of the actual times of the chimes; and the bells are in the course of casting. This is the third time that "the Gresham grasshopper" has been perched upon the summit of the Royal Exchange. "Twice," says the Spectator, "has the Exchange been burned to the ground, and twice has Gresham's grasshopper, emerging like its fabulous prototype from the flames which consumed its nest—another, yet the same—like a new-minted sovereign, brighter than it was before from the fiery purging—resumed its place on the highest pinnacle of the building; where it may be viewed, either like the stork which builds on the house-tops in Holland as a sort of tutelary genius, or, like the banner which floats over the Royal palace as the blazon and mark of the presence of Royalty, or as combining both attributes in itself. The denizens of the Royal Exchange are not the first who have had the grasshopper for their emblem; the citizens of Athens wore it as their distinctive badge. There was more of the freshness of youth in the idea which those old Greeks associated with it; there is more of the sad experience of the world's age in the truth of which it is the type or hieroglyph in our day. The soil-born Athenians saw only a light-hearted brother in the grasshopper, aboriginal, indigenous, as they claimed to be in Attica—as brisk, energetic, careless, restless, and fickle, as themselves. Theirs was the mere natural grasshopper of the fields, born of the summer, and leading a summer life—a creature existing only in the present, without a past and without a future. Ours is more the mythological grasshopper into which Aurora changed Tithon, for whom she obtained immortal life, but not immortal youth.

What has been said of Rome's Coliseum may be said of our Exchange—while London stands it will stand. While London is a city it will be thronged by eager crowds, of whom their grasshopper is an apt emblem. The worship of the grasshopper will be as enduring as that of the deified oxen Apis and Brama.

The tower is placed towards the eastern end of the main building; its height is about 160 feet, being 23 feet higher than the tower of the last Exchange, which, in general design, it resembles. We shall, however, be more explicit as to architectural details, when we describe the entire structure.

The grasshopper will be remembered as having been the crest of Sir Thomas Gresham, the founder of the original "Royal Exchange." There is no foundation for the tradition that Gresham adopted the grasshopper for his crest in consequence of the creature having once saved the merchant's life when a boy. Gresham, on the other hand, was descended from an ancient family in Norfolk, and educated at the University of Cambridge; so that he is not likely to have been found pining with hunger in a field, to be saved by the chirping of a grasshopper attracting a person to the spot where the future merchant lay. The whole story is, probably, even more fabulous than that of Whittington and his Cat; but Gresham and his grasshopper may have had its "sweet uses" in teaching a lesson of hope and trust in Providence. Gresham lived in Lombard-street, and kept a shop on the site now occupied by the banking-house of Messrs. Stone, Martin, and Co.; and over his door was his crest, a grasshopper, by way of sign. The original sign of Gresham's shop was seen by Pennant, and is stated to have been in existence as lately as the year 1795; when, on the erection of the present building, it disappeared from the station it had so long occupied over the door; its metallic value having, probably, aroused the cupidity of some of the labourers

GRASSHOPPER VANE, AND TOWER OF THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.

Reverting to the gilded vane, a correspondent has penned the following

IMPROMPTU,

ON SEEING "THE GRASSHOPPER" PLACED ON THE NEW EXCHANGE.

A German natur'list, 'tis said,
Did once a time contrive
To make defunct Grasshoppers chirp
As well as when alive!
An architect in London town
Has done as good a thing,
For where the last was burn'd down,
He makes a new one sing.
'Change—'Change—
New—new 'Change!
There's nothing like change—
There's nothing like 'Change!

Now after this, will any dare,
'Gainst Criticism's lashes,
To say Grasshoppers may not rise
Like Phœnixes from ashes? W.

ARMED OUT-PENSIONERS.

The Government scheme for saving a penny and risking a pound, in a general armament of the military out-pensioners, which our readers will recollect was so long and hotly opposed in the House of Commons, is now in course of being carried into effect in Ireland, where it has also become a subject of much derision, and, to the poor pensioners, of great and increasing annoyance. Our sketch represents a group of veterans in Dublin, rigged in their new and extraordinary toggery—a compound of the policeman and the soldier's costume preparatory to one of those vexatious drills, by which their honourable repose is hereafter to be disturbed. They evidently do not like their garments. Their trousers, of a dark brownish grey, striped with scarlet, their dark blue surtouts turned up with red and yellow, their dandified epaulettes, and, above all, the abhorred regulation hats, seem to be the subject of a condemnation, in which our readers will, without doubt, as heartily join. The dress might suit a cadet or an elegant sentimentalist of L'Ecole Polytechnique, but for a retired hero, one "in whose ashes live his wonted fires," to be so cribbed, cabined, and confined, is surely as unnecessary as it is cruel. But, in truth, the whole affair is a monstrous absurdity, degrading to the service, and discreditable to the nation.

GOLDSMITHS' HALL.—NIXON'S STATUES OF THE SEASONS.

SPRING.

The grand staircase of Goldsmiths' Hall has just received a most artistical accession to its embellishment, in four exquisite statues of the Seasons, from the masterly chisel of Mr. Samuel Nixon. Each figure is about four feet in height, and is placed upon a paneled pedestal, in the situations shown in the centre engraving. The material of the statues is exquisite white marble; and the poetic feeling displayed in the designs is ably carried out in the extreme delicacy of their execution. They have been universally admired by the cognoscenti of the sculptural art; and will add materially to Mr. Nixon's well-earned fame.

Of the superb architectural pile which these statues grace, we annex a few details; although, as regards the interior, for the present, our description is almost restricted to the portion of the structure in which these statues are placed.

"The Goldsmiths'" is the most magnificent of all the Halls of the City of London, and is the third edifice erected by the Company on this site—in the rear of the General Post Office. The former building was taken down in 1829, and the present structure forthwith commenced from the designs of Mr. Hardwick, who has here produced a very noble piece of architecture, in the Italian style of the 17th and 18th centuries. The building is 189 feet in front, from north to south, and 100 feet in depth, and is completely insulated. The plinth, or basement, is of Haytor granite, and the superstructure of fine Portland stone. The west, or principal façade, is composed of six attached Corinthian columns, the whole height of the front, supporting a rich Corinthian entablature, continued all round the building, and having a bold cornice of extraordinary beauty. The east, north, and south fronts are decorated with pilasters, with which also the angles are terminated The plinth is six feet high, and some of the blocks in the column, shafts, and entablature, weigh from ten to twelve tons each. The windows of the principal story have enriched pediments, supported by handsome trusses; and the centre windows have massive balustraded balconies. The intercolumniations of the centre above the first story, in place of the continuation of the second story windows, bear the Company's arms, festal emblems, and naval and military trophies, boldly sculptured. The entrance door is a rich specimen of cast-work.

The entrance hall makes no great architectural show; it is separated from the grand staircase by a glazed oak screen, which is a good arrangement, both as regards effect and convenience; without being altogether shut out of view even at first, the staircase does not come into view too soon; and the vestibule having first to be passed, gives an idea of greater extent than if that and the staircase formed a single open space. By being enclosed, the latter is rendered infinitely more comfortable; not only draughts of air, but the noise attending the arrival of carriages and the setting down company, is cut off, and visitors can linger on the staircase in their ascent, without being exposed to the gaze of attendants in the hall. It certainly is a scene to linger in: most striking as is the coup d'œil, on first entering, and it is one of almost magical effect, a fresh architectural picture—a new combination presents itself at every turn of the ascent; and as you advance, the space shows itself greater; nor is the full climax of effect gained until you have reached one of the side colonnades, and thence survey the full extent of the staircase from end to end (80 feet) across the four ranks of columns. We have here so many—such a succession of architectural scenery and effect, that it is quite impossible for any single view to do justice to, or convey an adequate idea of, such a subject.

Our engraving shows the staircase as seen on immediately entering except that, instead of being a direct front one, the view is turned a little obliquely, both as being thereby more picturesque, and as showing the upper part more clearly on one side, and the second range of columns. Standing on this spot, there is a striking degree both of expanse and loftiness over-head; to the first of these the depth of the colonnades and upper loggias contributes in no small degree, for had the design been in all other respects just the same, but with only a single line of columns on each side, the effect would have been considerably less—different, in fact, as to kind, as well as degree, and of by no means so striking and unusual character. The scenic effect thus produced is considerably enhanced by the mode in which the light is admitted entirely from above—over the centre division, through three large arched windows beneath the dome, on the south, west, and north sides, and over each of the loggias behind the columns, through three compartments in the flat ceiling, filled in with dispered and stained glass, and therefore highly ornamental in themselves, and also tasteful novelties in design.

GRAND STAIRCASE AND VESTIBULE OF GOLDSMITHS' HALL

We have yet to explain one or two matters that are rather important in an architectural interior, yet cannot be understood from an engraving—and first as to colour; that of the walls is a light neutral tint, inclining to buff, and the doors and doorcases are oak, but the shades of the columns and pilasters are of dark green veined scagliola in imitation of verde antico, and their bases and capitals white. The balustrades of the stairs are of bronze, and others of the same material and pattern enclose one compartment of each colonnade, and a narrow passage or balcony, which allows persons to cross from one side to the other without passing through the rooms, or having to descend one flight of stairs, and ascend the opposite one.

Captivating in its ensemble as a highly scenic piece of architecture this staircase derives additional picturesque effect from the introduction of the four figures of the Seasons, and two larger ones in the middle intercolumn of each colonnade above; that on the south, or right-hand side, and which is shown in the engraving, being Diana, the opposite one Apollo. The two last are from the antique.

Another piece of sculpture here, and one deserving particular attention, is a very fine marble bust, by Chantrey, of William IV. Unnoticed it can hardly be, since it occupies a very conspicuous situation in a niche immediately facing us, as we ascend the first flight of stairs, but, owing to the point from which the view is taken, this niche is not seen in our engraving. Immediately over it, in the centre compartment, hangs a large portrait of George IV. on horseback, by Northcote, between those of George III. and Queen Charlotte, presented to the "Company" by William IV., from the royal collection at Kensington.

The Banquetting-hall is in a corresponding style of magnificence; its dimensions are—80 feet long by 40 feet wide and 35 feet high; it has on each side a range of beautiful Corinthian columns, with corresponding pilasters behind them; at the further end is a lofty arched alcove, hung with draperies, and lit from invisible tapers; and scagliola pilasters, with vast mirrors between them, reflecting the side columns; whilst the splendour of the white and gold capitals and entablature, crimson draperies, painted windows illuminated from the outside, noble doors with panels of sculpture over them, and a ceiling of very rich design,—is indescribable. At the opposite end to the above is an oaken screen with Corinthian columns, supporting the music-gallery. The suite of apartments occupying the extent of the principal front, is fitted up in costly style; and superb carpets, gorgeous damask in draperies, gold frames, sparkling lustres, massive candelabras, and mirrors multiplying this pomp of furniture—well bespeak the opulence of the company. An antique painting of the legend of St. Dunstan and the Devil, has been preserved, with some exquisite carving, from the old Hall.

SUMMER.

AUTUMN.

WINTER.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SUNDAY, Jan 14th.—Second Sunday after Epiphany.
MONDAY, 15th.—Moliere born, 1670.
TUESDAY, 16th.—Battle of Corunna, 1809.
WEDNESDAY, 17th.—Dr Franklin born, 1706.
THURSDAY, 18th.—Old Twelfth Day.
FRIDAY, 19th. Copernicus born, 1473.
SATURDAY, 20th.—American Independence, 1776.

HIGH WATER at London-bridge, for the Week ending Jan. 20.

Monday.	Tuesday.	Wednesday.	Thursday.	Friday.	Saturday.
M. h. m. 9 13	A. M. h. m. 9 56	M. h. m. 10 39	A. M. h. m. 11 16	M. h. m. 11 56	A. M. h. m. 0 29
A. M. h. m. 1 0	M. h. m. 1 33	A. M. h. m. 2 0	M. h. m. 2 31	A. M. h. m. 3 0	M. h. m. 3 41

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.
TERMS, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

	£	s.	d.
Per Quarter	0	6	6
Half Year	0	13	0
One Year	1	6	0

May be had of all Newsmen and Booksellers, or at the Office, 198, Strand.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"An Eleven Months' Subscriber," by addressing Messrs. Allen and Co., booksellers, Leadenhall street, may hear of the work he requires.
The contribution received from a reverend gentleman at Cranoe shall appear.
" R. G. P.," City.—We have only space for the subjects suggested, in connexion with the anniversary.
" J. B.," Walsall.—The information is too late.
" J. S.," City-road. A trifling sum, according to station.
" A. A.," Mount Pleasant, completing, with several others, that newsmen are not sufficiently careful in folding the paper for transmission by post.
" J. S. L."—The expense of changing a name amounts to between £100 and £200. Our correspondent should apply to a solicitor.
" J. G.," Harworth, Darlington, should write to Lloyd's, or to the " Nautical Magazine."
" F. S. C.," Spalding. The charge is regulated by the credit given.
" H. Y. H." should order the last Navy List of any bookseller
" H. J."—If they balance, it is sufficient.
" J. J. J." We have received a neat sketch from Swindon, for which we thank our correspondent; but we are not aware of having expressed a wish for the subject.
" H. F. S."—All back numbers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS are kept in print.
" M. L."—The etiquette is to place the knife and fork upon the plate when it is sent up a second time.
" X . " Bath, should apply to the Spread Eagle office, Regent-circus.
" F. P. C."—An engraving of Eunice House appeared in our last.
" I. B. J."—We recommend our correspondent to avoid the parties in question, and to apply to a respectable physician.
" A. F.," Pimlico, should have good recommendations to the Commissioners of Excise.
" A. X. Z." will perhaps send the portraits in question.
" J. W. S.," Paris.—Declined.
" G. R.," Bradford.—All our numbers are in print. Sir H. Pottinger has appeared.
" George," Ramsgate.—We have not room.
" C." did not pay the postage of his letter.
" P."—We have covers for the volumes of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS (8s. each); and any bookbinder will bind them, without the expense of sending them to London.
A Correspondent wishes either of our subscribers to explain the phrase " by gings."
" Troglodemus Muddlework.—The stature is meddling.
" T. H. P." The remedy shall be inserted as soon as possible.
" A Regular Subscriber," Brompton.—King James II.
" X. G. L." Alford may at any time receive a catalogue by applying at the Custom-house.
" A Mesmeriser."—We are not believers in Mesmerism; and our correspondent's letter is not authenticated.
" A. L.," St. Pancras.—We have not room at present for the subject.
" G. L." had better apply to a respectable solicitor for replies to his conditional questions.
Declined.—" R. H. M." Baxterley; Song for the Stranger, by " M. A. S." " T.," of Liverpool, should apply to the builders, Messrs. Bedborough and Jenner, of Sheet-street, Windsor, or to Mr. James Walter, Market-place, Windsor. Her Majesty's poultry-houses are about to be considerably enlarged.
" F. A. B." shall be replied to by post.
" W. P. A. L."—Nos. 36 and 37 have been reprinted, and may be had by order of any newsman.
" G. B.," Tenterden.—The apartments at Windsor Castle are usually shown on all days, except Friday.
A Subscriber for 1843—44." The first Monday after Twelfth Day was called Plough Monday, because it was the first day after Christmas that in olden times husbandmen resumed the plough.
" J. B. P.," Edgbaston.—To the diagrams of epicurism, the livers of geese for the celebrated " Pâté de foie d'oie de Strasbourg" are prepared by roasting the bird alive before a slow fire; but the pâté does not consist entirely of livers, as is generally imagined. It is not more in request now than were the great goose-clubs in the time of the Romans. (See Diary.)
" D. S.," Edinburgh, is warmly thanked for the sketch, which shall be engraved in due time; and our correspondent's reasonable request shall be attended to.

CHESS.—" H. Hinchliff," " Peon." received.
A gentleman will be happy to play a game at chess by correspondence with some one. Address " A. B. C.," Post-office, Gravesend.
" M. P. D."—If he cannot mate you in fifty moves, the game is drawn.
" Ben" will be happy to play a friendly game by correspondence. Address " Ben," Post-office, King's Lynn, Norfolk.
" W. Harris" shall appear early.
" Pawn" is anxious for an antagonist. He might accept either of the above challenges.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS IN THE COUNTRY.—Covers for binding the Third Volume may be had of any bookseller, who will receive it in his regular London parcel at a trifling expense of carriage, and quite free from injury.
Subscribers wishing to complete their volumes are informed that all the back numbers are reprinted, and may be had by order of any bookseller and newsman.
MABEL MARCHMONT.—The completion of this tale is unavoidably deferred till next week. This arrangement will not, however, prevent our commencing the story by Miss Camilla Toulmin, as announced in our last.

ERRATA.—The distinguished artiste of the Portraits of the Princes and People of India is the sister of Lord Auckland, and not his Lordship's daughter, as stated in our text.
In a small portion of our impression last week, the continuation of " Mabel Marchmont," from page 9, appears, by a mistake of the printer, on page 6.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1844.

Art has done much for Charity; it has painted her in attractive forms, and recommended her by the graces of outline and colour to the eyes, and, through the eyes, to the minds of men; it has sculptured her in marble, "with children round her knees," and given to the hard stone the pliable softness we associate with that first of virtues. We are sorry to say that Charity does so little to return the obligation. We have been disagreeably interested by a description given in the Times of Wednesday, of a visit paid by the charity boys of the parish school of Marylebone to the National Gallery. It was by the sanction of the "authorities," of course, and might be considered a praiseworthy appreciation of the influence of art, and an indication that they were willing to give even the poor alms-taught boys a glimpse of the beautiful. But there is a fatality that hangs over every thing "parochial;" the Bumble spirit breaks in and spoils everything, making even good intentions ridiculous. Some of our readers may, perhaps, have read the exquisitely absurd account of what might have been rendered at once pleasing and useful. The number of the boys was three hundred; we would answer for it they were not individually of very extraordinary bulk; we have seen twice the number of grown people in the rooms at the same time without very much inconvenience; but everything that is done by "authorities" must be done in an extraordinary manner. These unlucky boys were made to place their left arms round the railing that runs in front of the pictures, and thus pass round the several rooms; they were besides ordered to look at the paintings "over the left"—of course the only practicable position. We need not point out how the whole object of such a visit—if object it had—was destroyed by such an arrangement, in reading which, it is difficult to know whether most to laugh at the absurdity, or grow angry at its cruelty and disregard even of the comfort of the poor children. As to their being enabled to derive any pleasure from the inspection of the national collection, under such circumstances, it was quite impossible. Imagine the "Portrait of a Jew," of Rembrandt, or "Venus attired by the Graces" looked at "over the left," or in a difficult and distorted squint! Why, in the name of everything reasonable, not have allowed the boys the common freedom of every visitant; or brought them there in sections; or have done anything rather than made them ridiculous. True, they are the children of charity—and of charity law-compelled and rate-extorted. But why surround even this with absurd and repulsive circumstances that would make the warmest charity unwelcome? We have far too much of this among us; we clothe the naked, but it is in a garb of degradation—stamped and branded as if the recipients were felons. We teach the children of destitute ignorance, but them, too, we make ridiculous by needless and gratuitous interference. Nothing that is to be done, by them or for them, can be done as common sense and common humanity would dictate. We take charity children to see the master-pieces of art, and make them look at them as they were never looked at before. Is it impossible to do anything for poverty, but we must show the unfortunates that the "trail of the serpent" is over everything connected with them?

We understand the Government in Ireland is fully prepared to enter upon the prosecution of "O'Connell and others" on the appointed day. At a late hour on Monday night the briefs for the Crown Counsel (thirteen in number) were ready for delivery. The briefs are partly printed and partly lithographed, and each contains between three hundred and forty and three hundred and fifty pages. The letter-press printing alone in each brief occupies one hundred and seventy pages, so that it would seem there is plenty of one sort or another to be proved. All persons concerned are called upon by the Crown to be present in Dublin by Sunday the 14th, at the latest; and on Monday, it is expected, the battle of the lawyers will in good earnest begin.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite, and the household, attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay preached from 2nd St. Luke, 32nd verse. In the afternoon her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Albert, and attended by part of the royal suite, walked in the grounds about the Castle. The amusements at the Castle during the preceding day were of the usual routine description.

MONDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert took their usual walking exercise. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal were taken out in the royal pleasure grounds. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Fanny Howard, and Lord Wriothesley Russell joined the royal dinner party.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert took their accustomed early walk, and left the Castle in the afternoon for Claremont. Her Majesty and her illustrious Consort occupied the first royal carriage and four, and were accompanied by her Royal Highness the Princess Royal. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and the members of the royal suite followed in the remaining carriages and four. The royal party took their departure from the Castle at 25 minutes past two o'clock, the cavalry escort being commanded by Lieutenant Lowther. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by Lady Fanny Howard, paid a visit to the Queen previous to her Majesty leaving the Castle. The royal progress to Claremont was marked by a general display of flags and banners along the way. Her Royal Highness the Princess Sophia arrived at Claremont shortly after four o'clock. According to present arrangements the Court will not return to Windsor until Tuesday next, on which evening her Majesty's private band have been commanded to hold themselves in readiness to perform at the Castle. It is gratifying to state that the sickness (feared to be of an infectious nature) which prevailed very recently in the immediate neighbourhood of Claremont has entirely disappeared.

CLAREMONT, Wednesday.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert went out shooting in the grounds and preserves in the vicinity of Claremont. The unfavourable state of the weather prevented her Majesty taking her accustomed early walk. Major-General Sir Robert and Lady Gardiner had the honour of dining with her Majesty in the evening.

THURSDAY.—Prince Albert went out shooting, attended by Sir E. Bowater and Lord Rivers. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal were taken an airing. The Queen and Prince Albert left Claremont in the afternoon for a drive, in an open pony carriage. The Royal party took their departure from Claremont at half-past three.

His Royal Highness the Duke de Bordeaux, on leaving Brighton, by the last train on Sunday evening, was rudely assailed by some persons in the garb of "gents." A carriage was appropriated to his Royal Highness and suite, and, on the Duke going to it, he found it occupied, the railway attendants having neglected to keep the carriage vacant till his Royal Highness came. The tenants of the carriage were politely requested to alight, at the same time being told that the carriage was engaged by his Royal Highness, but the occupiers positively refused to leave their seats, although on hearing their refusal with language not the most refined, and the consequence was the directors were under the necessity of putting on another carriage for the illustrious Prince and his attendants.

EARL GREY.—The Hon. William Grey, youngest son of the noble and venerable earl, arrived at his lordship's mansion in Berkeley-square, on Tuesday, from Howick-hall. The answer given yesterday to inquiries was, that accounts received from Howick by that morning's post stated that his lordship was going on well.

APSLEY HOUSE.—Circulars of invitations have been issued by the Duke of Wellington, for his Grace's political dinner on the 31st inst. It is said cards inviting upwards of 60 peers have been sent out.

Sir R. Peel gives a grand parliamentary dinner on the eve previous to the assembling of the Houses of Parliament. The entertainment will be to a party of about 40. The Right Hon. Baronet does not return to Drayton Manor, as his presence will be required in town from the press of public business.

Viscount Melbourne left Brook-street, on Monday, for Brocket Hall, Herts, where his lordship is expected to remain till Easter.

Prince Colloredo died at Vienna on the 28th ult.

The Lord Chancellor arrived at his residence in George-street, Hanover-square, on Monday evening, from his seat, Turville Park, Henley-on-Thames.

We are happy to announce that Lord Western, who has been suffering severe indisposition for some days past at his house, in South-street, is much better that his lordship's friends entertain sanguine hopes of his ultimate recovery.

The Ecclesiastical Commission for England had a meeting on Tuesday, at the office in Whitehall,—eight of the Commissioners present were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Llandaff, the Earl of Chichester, and the Dean of Westminster.

The Attorney-General had an interview same day with Sir Robert Peel. Sir James Graham and other Ministers also visited the Right Hon. Baronet.

Accounts have been received at Holdernesse House which state that Lady Alexandrina Vane, daughter of the Marquis and Marchioness of Londonderry, and sister of the Marchioness of Blandford, is seriously ill of scarlet fever, at Paris, and it is feared the other members of the family may also take the infection.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE NEW AMERICAN SHIP PRINCE ALBERT.—The splendid new American line-of-packet ship, Prince Albert, which arrived in the St. Katherine's Dock on Thursday last, has, since then, been a source of very great attraction to persons who feel an interest in matters connected with improvements in shipbuilding. The Prince Albert is the companion-ship to the Victoria, that was launched last year, and although of the same rate of tonnage (1000), she is considerably larger in every respect, and in all her appointments superior; she is, in fact, the strongest and most capacious vessel ever built in America for commercial purposes.

NATIONAL GALLERY.—The boys of the Marylebone workhouse, about 300 in number, paid a visit to the National Gallery on Tuesday morning. The arrangements to prevent confusion were complete, each boy following close upon the other's heels, having secured his line of march by encircling with his left arm the rail which prevents a too near approach to the pictures. The perspective effect of this living line, threading in and out and around the rooms, was not unlike some huge snake, each boy forming a joint or vertebræ of grey cloth and brass buttons. Any advancement in a taste for the fine arts cannot fairly be adduced from this visit; the boys having been told to look "over their left" at the pictures, which they did according to the free interpretation of the injunction.

Thursday being the first day of Hilary Term, Westminster Hall presented its usual bustling and animated appearance. The Judges in the Equity Courts commenced business as early as ten o'clock; but in the Common Law Courts proceedings did not commence before one o'clock.

THE MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.—The following circular has been addressed to the Conservative members of the House of Commons:—" Whitehall, Jan. 4, 1844.—Sir, As upon the meeting of Parliament, on Thursday, the 1st of February, public business of importance will be proceeded with immediately, I take the liberty of earnestly requesting your attendance in the House of Commons on that day. I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

" ROBERT PEEL."

DEATH OF SIR HUDSON LOWE.—Sir Hudson Lowe expired on Wednesday evening from the effects of the severe attack of paralysis of which he was recently the subject. As the officer to whom was entrusted the custody of the Emperor Napoleon at St. Helena, his conduct has been so fully and frequently canvassed, eulogised, and subjected, as a military officer in command, obeying the orders of his superiors, he was merely the agent of others. It is understood that some very interesting documents, together with a Memoir, drawn up by Sir Hudson Lowe's own hand, of the events connected with his custody of Napoleon, are in possession of a friend, to whom he intrusted them for publication, and that Lord Ashburton's orders as to the treatment of the ex-Emperor are among them. Sir Hudson Lowe was an Ensign in the East Devon Militia, and served as a volunteer with the 50th Regiment in 1785 and 1786, nearly sixty years ago; and in September, 1787, was appointed Ensign in the same Regiment, and Lieut. in Nov. 1791. He served at Gibraltar six years, and subsequently at Toulon, and in Corsica. He was present at the attack of Martello Tower, the storming of Convention Redoubt, and the siege of Bastia and Calvi. He was appointed Lieutenant-General in July, 1830, and obtained the Colonelcy of the 50th Foot Nov. 17, 1842. He was K.C.B. and G.C., St. Michael and St. George.

ANOTHER MODEL PRISON MANIAC.—Within the last few days another victim from this prison has been sent to Bethlehem Hospital. A convict named Cowle, sentenced to transportation in the spring of last year, and transferred to Pentonville, has become insane, and has been sent by an order from the Home-office to the Government department of the hospital. We should like to know whether this, which is the third case of insanity removed within one year, is that experiment which Mr. Wakley warned the keeper that the prisoner's brain was softening, and that the "portals of Bethlehem would soon open to receive him."

ROYAL FREEMASONS' SCHOOL.—On Thursday last a general court of the members and patrons of the above asylum took place at the Institution; Mr. Lewis in the chair. The report detailed at some length matters connected with the charity of no importance. Amongst the vice-presidents of the institution are his Grace the Duke of Leinster, K.G. and K.P. of Ireland; the Earl of Zetland, the Duke of Hamilton and Brandon, the Marquis of Salisbury, B.B. Cabbell, Esq., &c. &c. Francis Crew, Esq., is secretary. After the usual business was gone through, it was announced that there are six vacancies in the school, there being an equal number of candidates. The meeting then separated.

POSTSCRIPT.

A Cabinet Council was held at three o'clock on Thursday afternoon at the Foreign Office. The ministers present were, Sir R. Peel, the Duke of Wellington, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharncliffe, the Duke of Buccleuch, Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir J. Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Earl of Haddington, Earl of Ripon, Mr. Gladstone, Sir H. Hardinge, and Sir T. Fremantle. The council sat three hours.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer visited Sir Robert Peel yesterday morning in Whitehall Gardens.

The Factory Inspectors, viz., Messrs. Horner, Stewart, Saunders, and Howell, had a long interview with Sir James Graham yesterday morning at the Home Office.

The Education Commissioners had a meeting yesterday at the Council Office.

DEATH OF LADY BURDETT.—We deeply regret to announce the death of Lady Burdett, which took place yesterday morning in St. James's-place, at twenty minutes past eight.

PRIVATE BILLS FOR THE ENSUING SESSION OF PARLIAMENT.—The time limited by law for the close of notices of petitions for private bills to be introduced during the next session of Parliament closed yesterday (Friday). The total number of notices amounted to two hundred and thirty-one. Seventy-six of these are for railways, thirty for the improvement of towns, and twenty-five for docks for the port of London. Two notices have been received for bills for the erection of new metropolitan bridges, namely, one at the Horseferry road, Lambeth, and a suspension bridge from Chelsea to Battersea. A notice has been received of an intention to introduce a bill for the formation of a colonnade to Finsbury, and a bill is to be introduced to provide means for the redemption of the tolls on the metropolitan bridges—Southwark, Waterloo, and Vauxhall. A fresh notice has been given of a bill for bringing in a bill for the incorporation of a watch manufacturing company.

COLONEL SIBTHORP.—We understand that what may be considered a most gentle intelligence has reached town, to the effect that Colonel Sibthorp is still alive, and at large, though strictly watched, by orders of the Khan of Bokhara. We also learn that Capt. Conolly is dead; but whether he has fallen a victim to imprisonment and disease, or has been the executioner of a colonnade to Finsbury, and a bill is to be introduced to provide means for the redemption of the tolls on the metropolitan bridges—Southwark, Waterloo, and Vauxhall. A fresh notice has been given of a bill for bringing in a bill for the incorporation of a watch manufacturing company.

COLONEL SIBTHORP.—We understand that what may be considered a most gentle intelligence has reached town, to the effect that Colonel Sibthorp is still alive, and at large, though strictly watched, by orders of the Khan of Bokhara. We also learn that Capt. Conolly is dead; but whether he has fallen a victim to imprisonment and disease, or has been the executioner of a colonnade to Finsbury, and a bill is to be introduced to provide means for the redemption of the tolls on the metropolitan bridges—Southwark, Waterloo, and Vauxhall. A fresh notice has been given of a bill for bringing in a bill for the incorporation of a watch manufacturing company.

THAMES REGATTA.—Yesterday evening a meeting of the members of the above club was held at the British Hotel, Cockspur-street, for the purpose of electing officers for the year ensuing. J. D. Bishop, Esq., the chairman, opened the business of the evening by informing the meeting that their excellent friend and treasurer, James Layton, Esq., had sent in his resignation to the honorary secretaryship, in consequence of a serious illness. The meeting then proceeded to the election of chairman, when Mr. Bishop was again elected to that honourable post: Edmund Antrobus, Esq., M.P., treasurer; T. L. Jenkins, Esq., honorary secretary; and Messrs. Bishop, Jenkins, E. Ambrey, C. E. Mayhew, G. J. Selwin, A. Julius, A. Shadwell, E. Morris, and T. Meeson, the committee of management. Amongst the company we noticed Jas. Layton, Esq.; T. L. Jenkins, Esq.; C. J. Selwin, Esq.; —Shadwell, Esq., &c. &c. A general subscription having been entered into, a vote of thanks were passed to the chairman, who, in a neat speech, returned thanks, and the meeting separated. It was determined in the course of the proceedings to allow ten votes each to the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, for the subscriptions received from them.

GOVERNMENT FEMALE SCHOOL OF DESIGN.—It is stated that the wood-engraving department of this school has been abandoned. On the re-opening of the school after the Christmas holidays, the teacher was dismissed and the pupils told they were to discontinue their studies.

BETHLEM HOSPITAL.—At the last Quarterly Court of Governors, a resolution was passed for the admission of medical pupils to visit the wards of this institution, the same as at the other London hospitals. The physicians may also give lectures on mental diseases to students, and make pathological demonstrations in a room appropriated to such purposes.

SEAMEN'S HOSPITAL SOCIETY.—Yesterday (Friday) a general court of the subscribers to this society took place at the office, 74, King William-street, City. The society was established for the purpose of affording relief to sick and diseased seamen, and was incorporated by act of parliament in 1838. From the report read by the secretary, it appeared that the donations and subscriptions received were in amount £500 less than in previous years, thus making the total sum due by the society £705, although the expenses had been £200 less than last year. It further appeared, that the committee had resolved on establishing a museum of anatomy in connection with the hospital -the materials for the purpose being presented by Mr. Busbe, surgeon. The number of men received throughout the year had been 1,747; the number at present on board is 176. The total number received since the first establishment is 46,290. Of these, 2,843 belonged to her Majesty's navy, 1,727 to the Honourable East India Company, and 39,652 to vessels of all nations. A vote of thanks being passed to Rear Admiral Young, who presided, the proceedings terminated.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE THIS MORNING AT DEPTFORD.—On Friday morning last a fire broke out upon the premises of Mr. J. Sewell, linen-draper, 8, High-street, Deptford, which gutted the house, and destroyed all the property it contained. The adjoining houses are also much damaged.

ALARMING FIRES.—At a few minutes after five o'clock on Thursday evening a fire broke out in the residence of Sir William Curtis, situate in Portland-place, Regent's-park, which had a very narrow escape of being burnt to the ground. Although but a very short period had elapsed after the discovery, the fire had extended rapidly, and it was with some difficulty that the apartment could be entered, in consequence of the smoke and the intense heat. Water being plentifully supplied to the brigade men, it was thrown on the flames in considerable quantities. The damage done is rather considerable.—In about an hour after the above was got under, another fire broke out in the lower part of the mansion belonging to the Marquis of Anglesey, in Burlington-street, Burlington-gardens. Several engines were soon in attendance, but the firemen were refused admittance, consequently the extent of damage done could not be ascertained.

THE MURDER OF EARL DERBY'S GAMEKEEPER.—We are enabled to state that her Majesty has been graciously pleased to remit the sentence of death on all the prisoners convicted of the murder of the Earl of Derby's gamekeeper, except John Roberts, the party who fired the fatal shot. Roberts is left for execution. The others will, it is expected, be transported for life.

FOREIGN.

PARIS, January 8, 1844.—The news from Spain received last night is highly interesting, as I anticipated in my correspondence of yesterday The ministers to avoid answering unpleasant questions have thought proper to suspend—not prorogue or dissolve—the Chambers until further orders. This arbitrary act took place on the 27th. It appears certain that the ministers notwithstanding the suspension of the Cortes, intend to raise contributions to pass a municipal law, and to reorganise the National Guards. On the meeting of the Cortes, they will ask for a Bill of Indemnity!

FRANCE.—Cardinal Prince de Croi died on the 1st at Rouen. The Cardinal was born on the 12th of September, 1773, and was created Archbishop of Rouen, in 1823.

THE STATE PROSECUTIONS IN IRELAND.

PENCILLINGS IN THE FOUR COURTS, FROM THE SKETCH-BOOK OF AN IRISH BARRISTER.

(Continued.)

HIS EXCELLENCY THE LORD LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND.

Thomas Philip De Grey, Earl De Grey, of Wrest, county of Bedford; Baron Lucas, of Crudwell, county of Wilts; and Baron Grantham, of Grantham, county of Lincoln; and Custos Rotulorum for the county of Bedford, is now in his sixty-third year, having been born on the 8th of December, 1781. His Excellency is the third lord of the title, and is descended from William Robinson, a celebrated Lord Mayor of York in the days of Elizabeth. William's son was also chief civic magistrate of his native city in James the First's time, and his grandson sheriff of the county in the reign of Charles the First. Sir William Robinson, nephew to the sheriff, held the same office at the time of the Revolution, and sat in the Convocation Parliament, as he did in seven successive ones for York. His son, Sir Tancred, was Lord Mayor of York in his day, besides being Rear-Admiral of the White. From civic and parliamentary distinction we next hear of the family of the Robinsons achieving a high reputation in the difficult circle of diplomacy. Thomas, younger brother of the last-mentioned baronet, was sent, when Horace Walpole held office in 1725, on embassy to the French Court, and in 1730 he went to Vienna [illegible] considerable capacity. In 1754 he [illegible] of State, and in 1759 he was appointed one of the [illegible] in the absence of the King. He very soon, however, resigned his seals; and the simple circumstance of his resignation is another proof to the countless ones which crowd the history of the past and present times, that, on the one hand, there is no man, however upright in sentiment and faithful in the discharge of his duty, who may not, provided he be of a sensitive nature, be driven from public life by the constant and concentrated attacks of his political enemies; and that, on the other, from the highest to the lowest of our public men, there are too few who have not at some period of their career acted towards a political opponent from the impulse [illegible] prit. To this grand factor one of the safeguards [illegible] living shame to our sense of morality: The Religion of En[illegible] very malice and all uncharitableness;" our English justice is proverbial for the most candid purity in the ordinary affairs amongst man and man at home, and in our general communion with the nations of the world; and yet "we chanee all that" in our political relations towards each other. Without absolutely saying that [illegible] white, the spirit of party can give another [illegible] to the blackness of the crow and the whiteness of the dove.

Dat cen[illegible] censura columbas.

One of the most di[illegible] of the Robinson family, to whom allusion has last been [illegible] felt the combined influence of Pitt and Fox, afterwards Lord Grantham, and Frederick Robinson, for whom waged war on his [illegible]pointment because it was made under the auspices of the Duke of Ne[illegible] resigned it. He was then made Master of the Wa[illegible]ce he held [illegible] of George the Second [illegible] Lord [illegible] Thomas, the second Lord, who was created (in the year 1760) Baron Grantham, of Grantham, in Lincolnshire; ten years after which he died, and was succeeded in the family titles and estates by Thomas, the second Lord, who was born at Vienna during his father's diplomatic residence at that court. It appears to have been his good fortune to follow the parental example set him, and to follow it with not unequal steps. In 1761, we find him Secretary of Legation at Augsburg; ten years afterwards, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary at the Court of Madrid; then First Commissioner of the Board of Trade; and at length, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which capacity he concluded the preliminaries of the peace in January, 1783, and resigned his office in the March following.

This nobleman "married the Lady Mary Jemima Grey, second daughter of Philip, second Earl of Hardwicke, by the Lady Jemima Campbell, Marchioness Grey, representative of that branch of the ancient and noble family of Grey, which through twelve generations had borne the title of Earls of Kent. This lady by her marriage with the Earl of Hardwicke gave birth to two daughters, of whom the elder, the Lady Amabel, succeeded her mother as Baroness Lucas. She married Lord Polworth, eldest son of the late Earl Marchmont; but was for many years his widow without any family, and in 1816 was created Countess de Grey, with remainder to the heirs male of her sister, the Dowager Lady Grantham. Lord Grantham died in 1786, six years after his marriage, leaving three sons, Thomas Philip, (the present Lord), Frederick John, since created Earl of Ripon, one year his junior, and Philip, who died young."

His Excellency Earl de Grey received his earlier education under the superintendence of Doctor Glass, at his private establishment, and subsequently entered St. John's College, Cambridge, in the year 1799. Whether his Excellency took a degree at the University or no we are not known to the writer of the present notice, for his name is not with those of other noblemen inscribed in the Cambridge calendar. He may, however, have proceeded so far, although he had left the university and was travelling on the Continent when the Cambridge regulation of 1786, shortened the term of taking the B.A. degree in the case of noblemen and others who proceeded to it "tanquam nobiles" per year. At the renewal of the war, in 1803, he returned to England and devoted himself almost exclusively to the formation and discipline of one of the most celebrated corps of the domestic service of the country, the Yorkshire Yeomanry Cavalry, of which he was made, and continues to this day, Colonel. In 1831, he was appointed by William the Fourth, King's Aide-de-Camp for the Yeomanry service, an office created especially by his Majesty in compliment to his lordship's services. These latter, besides the efficiency, he displayed in the discharge just mentioned, consisted chiefly in rendering himself generally useful as a country gentleman, which tranquil and unostentatious path he pursued whilst his brother Frederick toiled along the far more arduous one of political ambition. Although regular as most of those who enjoy the church patronage in their neighbourhood duties, Lord De Grey seems not to have breathed of a congenial atmosphere in the Senate, for but two speeches are recorded of his Parliamentary life, one of which was against the Reform Bill. When Sir Robert Peel came into office, in the year 1834, his lordship accepted the appointment of a Lord of the Admiralty, and under the same auspices was appointed to his present distinguished post, which he fills to the satisfaction of the moderate men, at least, of both parties, although the number of these in Ireland is not "legion." With the violent on both sides of the political waters, he is, as a matter of course, unpopular. His administration does not go far enough for one party, and it goes too far for the other; and it is to be presumed that whenever a happier fortune may recall his Excellency into private life, that no man better than himself can tell how difficult it is to steer a fair course in the stormy sea of Irish affairs, and how very difficult it is to act safely in Ireland with Irish officials.

Earl De Grey has very much devoted himself to the improvement of the few literary and scientific institutions which Ireland has the means or the inclination to support. His attention to these important matters, and the amiable and generous manner in which, alone all former Viceroys, he seems to regain on all possible occasions to this natural ground as a place of pleasure and congenial retreat, have won for him the golden opinions of all those who have the honour and pleasure of meeting his Excellency on such occasions.

Earl De Grey married on the 20th July, 1805, the Lady Jemima Henrietta Frances Cole, fifth daughter of the late Earl of Enniskillen, by whom he has had several children. Of these two daughters only have survived; the elder married to Earl Cowper, and the younger to Henry, third son of the late Robert Vyner, Esq., of Grantley, in Lincolnshire.

LORD ELIOT, M.P.

The office of Secretary for Ireland has long been the one in which most of our statesmen have been tested on their entrance upon the difficult career of politics. It has seldom been other than a hard one to fill with credit, on account of the many jarring interests arising from the intensity of political and religious differences for which Ireland has always been remarkable, and which every one filling the situation of Secretary, the principal officer of the Government, must contend with, meet, soothe, reconcile, or compel, as the case may be. It was in this post that Sir R. Peel first exhibited his administrative talents, after the favourable impression he made in Parliament; it was also filled by Mr. Goulburn, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and its duties are now discharged by the subject of our present sketch, Lord Eliot. We never the difficulties of the office may have been in former years, few will dispute, and fewer still deny, that they are increased sevenfold at the present moment, when the peace are excited beyond all former example, and the power of the Government is displayed in military preparations which seem as formidable as the danger is great. Though long united to England, Ireland has never, like Scotland, become amalgamated with her, and absorbed into her social and political [illegible] interest, and how the breach is daily w[illegible] the empire seems threatened. In the mi[illegible] on prosecuting and [illegible] the terrible responsibility involved [illegible] Secretary must be indeed a trying one. [illegible] and, with much, a calm temper, and a sound and just intellect, can steer its way through the shoals and quicksands that beset his course, Lord Eliot is possessed of those qualities in an eminent degree. No one member of the present Ministry can be pointed out whose personal character has commanded such respect from all parties.

His lordship is the eldest son of the Earl of St. Germans. The family has been long a distinguished one, and was, in the fifteenth century, at the head of the gentry of the county of Devon; it subsequently removed its seat into the county of Cornwall, where the Priory of St. Germans, now a pretty village on the banks of one of the branches of the Tamar, the church of which was formerly the cathedral of the diocese of Exeter, and is the most ancient specimen of ecclesiastical architecture in England. Among the ancestors of the noble lord is one whose name cannot be passed over without notice, having left a renown acquired in the same struggle against the same power in which Hampden fell. Sir John Eliot was member for the county of Cornwall in the early part of the reign of Charles the First, and was a strenuous opponent of the tyrannical and impolitic measures which the King was so badly advised as to adopt. The time was not deficient in men of ability, and Sir John Eliot must have held a high position among them, since he was appointed by the House of Commons one of the managers of the impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham. The post was one of danger; in those days of prerogative, and Sir J. Eliot, with Sir Dudley Digges, the other manager, was committed to the Tower: they were soon released, but in 1628 were again committed to the same prison for refusing to account to the Privy Council for their conduct in Parliament. Several other members suffered with them for their independence, and the unwarrantable proceeding was followed up by other measures. On the 29th of May in the same year, an information was exhibited in the ever infamous Star Chamber against Sir John Eliot and his companions for their undutiful speeches and votes. They were afterwards brought to trial on the same charge in the Court of King's Bench, were convicted, of what was then considered a crime, and sentenced to be imprisoned during the King's pleasure, and to find sureties for their future good behaviour. In addition to this, Sir J. Eliot, having been more prominent in his opposition than the others, was fined £2000. But the growing feeling of the country set strongly against the King and his party, and the Court had reason to repent its step in thus imprisoning the leaders of the Opposition. They were not thus imprisoned were afterwards offered their freedom, on condition of their making submission. The proposal was rejected by all of them, and Sir J. Eliot died in prison, in 1632, after a confinement of four years, no less a martyr in the cause of constitutional liberty than Hampden, who perished in the field. The peerage was bestowed on Edward Eliot, Esq., in 1784. The Earldom was created in 1815, and the present possessor of the title succeeded to it in 1823. His son, the Secretary for Ireland, was born in 1798; his political career commenced in 1824, when he was returned for the borough of Liskeard, which he represented till 1832. In 1827 he was made a Lord of the Treasury. But the circumstance which gave his name an European celebrity, was one less conected with party struggles than with a measure that secured the observance of the common principles of humanity, when they were outraged during a condition of society in which they are seldom remembered—that of civil war. When the conflict between the Carlist and Christina forces was at its height in Spain—when the rules that govern even war were broken when not only no quarter was given during battle, but the prisoners taken were butchered afterwards in cold blood, and atrocities were committed on both sides, of which savages might be ashamed—Lord Eliot was commissioned by the Government, in 1835, to negotiate between both factions an understanding that mitigated these horrors, if it did not entirely remove them. He succeeded in procuring the proclamation of what was called the "Durango Decree," and in connection with it his name will always be recorded with gratitude, though none can think without abhorrence of the ruthless spirit that would exact such an interference between two sections of people calling itself Christian. In 1837, he was returned for the Eastern Division of Cornwall, and on the formation of the Peel Ministry was appointed Secretary for Ireland. In the general election of 1841, he met with a most able speech from the hustings, when closely pressed by Sir W. Molesworth, who proposed his opponent, Mr. Trelawney, to declare what was likely to be the policy of the head of the Government as to the corn laws. It was in the assize court of Bodmin, in his address after being returned, that he made his declaration of the policy that was to govern the administration of the Government in Ireland. It was to be that of equal justice to all—a measure of justice for parties, but for the nation. As far as Lord Eliot could himself carry it out, that pledge has been redeemed. His moderation and justice have never been impeached; indeed the strongest censure that has been cast on him has proved to be a guarantee that might have been least expected—from supporters of the Conservative party. His late dignified rebuke to the magistracy of Ireland for the intemperate manner in which some of that body have acted in carrying out the provisions of the Arms Bill, is an honourable testimony to his just and fairness. Would that all those by whom he is surrounded, and through whom he must act, were animated by his spirit; we might then see oil cast upon the troubled waters, and hope for peace where there is now such stern contention. He is an advocate of the whole of national education, which is doing so much good in Ireland, and his acute and intelligent defence of part of the system of training adopted in the College of Maynooth, when it was attacked in Parliament, was much admired.

His lordship is a fluent and graceful speaker. His personal appearance is very prepossessing; in bearing and manners he is a model of the English gentleman—easy, unembarrassed, and graceful, without any appearance of condescension. He bears about with him that charm of amiability that deprives party opposition of all personal animosity; we never heard his name mentioned but with that feeling of respect and attachment which is always secured by private worth. He is exceedingly popular in Cornwall, and rallies round him as enthusiastic a constituency as ever sent a member to Parliament. His return at the last election was celebrated like a triumph. Let us hope that he will be enabled to continue his public services in a country where the qualities he possesses are so much required.

THE CROWN COUNSEL.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR IRELAND, THE RIGHT HON. THOMAS BERRY CUSACK SMITH, one of the most distinguished members of the Irish bar, is a son of the late Sir William Smith, a Baron of the Court of Exchequer, and a grandson of Sir Michael Smith, in his day Master of the Rolls in Ireland. Mr. Smith was a very distinguished member of the Irish university, having obtained a scholarship, and other high academic honours. He was called to the bar in 1819, and appears to be not older than 45 or 46 years of age. His mother was a Catholic, and it is supposed that he alluded to this circumstance with the memory of a beloved parent, when he repudiated the notion in the House of Commons, during the debates on the Irish Arms Bill, that he could entertain a personal hostility to the majority of the Irish people, from whom he differed in religion. On that occasion Mr. Roebuck replied with his usual smartness and tartness, and made some remark concerning "a cock and a bull story about his grandmother," displaying more flippancy than feeling, and which, perhaps, the hon. and learned member for Bath would not have made if he had recollected that he himself had felt called on to talk to the house about his ancestors, when a certain great London newspaper attacked him, on which occasion Sir Robert Harry Inglis made rather a severe remark upon the circumstance. "The hon. and learned member," said he, "has appealed to the memory of his ancestors, but he has not told us who they were." Perhaps this circumstance was forgotten by the right hon. gentleman who had been present at Mr. Roebuck's personality; or, perhaps, had he remembered it, it would not have been parliamentary to allude to a former debate, which had nothing to do with the question then before the house. In Parliament, south to say, the Attorney-General was not pressed quite so freely of the atmosphere by which he was surrounded, which by no means detracts from his merits as a lawyer. "Non omnibus omnia," and forensic more than senatorial disputation is his forte. He gained a legal eminence at common law, and was pre-eminent as a pleader. For three or four years previously to his elevation to office as law officer of the Crown, he gradually forsook his former practice for equity, in which line he has been signally successful. Mr. Smith, although he has not been fortunate in the early stages of the present state prosecutions, has been always remarkable for the utmost diligence and anxiety displayed in behalf of his clients, and the general accuracy with which he gets up his cases, never allowing himself to be overpressed, and never taking more business than he can conscientiously do justice to. Independently of political views, one way or the other, on the matter, and looking on it legally, if the right honourable official has left himself open to a palpable hit or two from his opponents, it must be recollected who these opponents are, and their experience and their numbers—forming together one of the strongest and most brilliant bars that any officer of the Crown had ever to make head against on any state occasion. His ardent temperament might well be tried by the ordeal of combatting such an opposition. The high-blooded but light-limbed racer will fret and sweat when past his fellocks in a fallow on a rainy day, with the steady strong-boned ones picking him up quietly, the cry of the hounds becoming more faint, and the same getting further out of view. On lighter soil this high-mettled one is a dainty steed, and a regular daisy cutter. It has been said that the Attorney-General was not the man for such a responsible and momentous affair as the present Crown prosecutions, which, besides a first-rate knowledge of criminal and constitutional law, required the utmost dignity and equanimity, and at least the appearance of deliberation. If strong measures be deemed necessary for Ireland, the Irish are the very last of the overgrown who are likely to become "good children" for being punished in a passion by stepmothers or guardians, and the English people are accustomed to look upon fairplay as a jewel that ought to be placed in the very front of the crown. To do Mr. Attorney-General only ordinary justice, it should be stated that, during the latter part of the preliminary skirmishing, he had the misfortune to be was coming round a bit, and that his moral glass was improving with the state of the weather. His offering an extension of time to the 15th of January was a concession which the most sanguine of the accused parties could not have anticipated, and really had not from the former proceedings. As to temper or equability, therefore, it would not be fair to say more at present, but to await the great issue. The ground has been cleared; the skirmishing about pleas, demurrers, replications, and rejoinders is all over; the great battle on the merits is to be fought. The day has been named, the main bodies are in view of each other, and

A sight for warrior's eye
Hangs on the hoof decliviy;

Alas! it is by no means a pleasant one to those who look upon it with the eye of common humanity

Mr Smith's political life has been of a calm description. In former years he enjoyed the reputation of being a liberal and of agreeing with his father's political views generally. At present he is, and indeed for a long time back has been, Conservative, but not a violent one; having been remarkable for the same general views as the present leader of his party and head of the Queen's Administration. He would not disturb the grant to Maynooth College, nor interfere with the late Government system of national education, which may account in some measure for his unsuccessful canvass of Trinity College, when a vacancy not very long since occurred in the representation of the Irish university. He also was unfortunate when he contested the borough of Youghall against Mr. John O'Connell, the present member for Kilkenny. We are called a superstitious people in Ireland, and it was remarked as rather ominous at the time, that the Conservative candidate lost his seat when standing on horseback into the borough, the seat for which, it seems, (sic Dii voluere) he was not destined to obtain. But it has nothing to do with superstition, and is a remarkably positive fact, that the Attorney-General for Ireland represents an English constituency, being member for the borough of Ripon. If people say it has a political complexion, it should be remembered that the same thing has happened to the party to which Mr. Smith is opposed. In private life he is much beloved and respected.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL, MR. RICHARD WILSON GREENE, is a son of the late Sir Jonas Greene, who was Recorder of the city of Dublin, and an eminent criminal lawyer in his day. Mr. Greene's career at Trinity College was a very distinguished one, which he brilliantly terminated, as a medallist, in the year 1811. His father's legal mantle seems to have descended upon him at a very early period of his professional life, for we find him successfully engaged as a criminal lawyer in a variety of important cases. Lord Plunket though very highly of him, and when Attorney-General, he chiefly committed to his care and capacity the great ex-officio affair of the battle conspiracy in Lord Wellesley's time. Although very eminent as a criminal pleader, Mr. Greene practises as a first-rate lawyer in all the branches of the law. He was appointed Solicitor-General by her Majesty's present Administration, when Mr. Smith was made Attorney-General, consequent on Mr. Blackburne's appointment to the Mastership of the Rolls. Mr. Greene has very often been appointed, under both Administrations, Judge of Assize, to fill up vacancies, and on all such occasions his decisions gave the highest satisfaction. Mr. Steele declared in court, at the opening of the state prosecutions, that he had no objection to be prosecuted by her Majesty's Solicitor-General, for whom he would, I am sure, have no doubt, object on having his case submitted to him as a judge. The Solicitor-General has never yet taken a prominent part in politics, by which is understood a violent expression of political opinions at public meetings, or through the intervention of the press. His opinions are Conservative, although he has served both parties professionally, and served them well. Mr. Greene was called to the bar in the year 1814, and is about 53 years of age.

MR. ABRAHAM BREWSTER,

who stands third on the list of the crown lawyers, has been long distinguished at Nisi Prius. Few men, even at the Irish bar, are more famous for that which is called "hacking a witness," (a term borrowed from wool-carding, I believe,) or, where all other resources fail, for making an onslaught on the opposite attorney. Indeed his professional strategy in difficult ground, his proverbial resources in a sentence of case, and his admirable tact in concealing the weak points of his client, are almost unrivalled. In the attack which he made on Mr. Pierce Mahony, one of the solicitors for the traversers in the Court of Queen's Bench, he did not anticipate the warm reception which he then experienced. The solicitors were naturally indignant at being deemed worthy of disbelief, whilst a barrister was to be yielded the most courteous and enlarged credence, and a committee of the body took the matter in hand. They did not get up a testimonial to Mr Mahony, for they considered he only did his duty as a professional man and a gentleman, when he said in open court that "he respected the bench very much, but respected his client still more;" they put themselves in communication with Mr. Brewster, and an apology creditable to both parties very happily settled what might have been a rather disagreeable affair. Your Irish solicitor is not so easily put down, nor is he compelled to submit to any whatsoever degradation any ill-advised or over-ardent member of the higher branch of the legal profession may fancy himself entitled to subject him to. In general society he is on an equal with the barrister, and public opinion in Ireland, independently of professional etiquette, would approve of his vindication of his honour. Had Mr. Brewster refused to make the amende honorable to Mr Mahony, although the latter were not at the head of his own branch of the profession, and which, under any circumstances, as a gentleman, he would not—nor could he—have refused to do, it is quite certain that the aggrieved party's professional brethren would have made common cause, and stood by him to a man, and that Mr. Brewster's now well-filled brief-bag would have been relieved of its plethora.

Mr. Brewster is a man of independent fortune, which he spends liberally, especially on objects of public charity and general benevolence, and is very much respected in private life. He is in politics a Conservative, and something more; was called to the bar in the year 1819, and is about 50 years of age.

MR. ROBERT HOLMES

is one of the oldest and at the same time one of the most distinguished men at the Irish bar, having been called so far back as 1795. When Mr. Thomas Dickson, the father, goes to "that Bourne" (not the Irish Clerk of the Crown of that name, whose returns have been questioned by the traversers) but "from whence no traveller returns," Mr. Holmes will succeed to the paternal honours of the practising profession. He is a Bencher of the Queen's Inn, but wears no silk gown, although he was offered it over and over again by his successor. Governments; and he might have been on the bench years ago if he chosen. Whether it be that he prefers personal ease, and the undivided enjoyment of his professional emoluments to the dignities and honours, which enjoin no small amount of conventional responsibilities, or whether he has a dislike to be placed under obligations by men in power, to what party none but they belong, I know not; but this is certain, that "unplaced, unpensioned—no man's heir or slave" he presents the strange picture of a most able, successful, and highly popular lawyer, in his seventy-third year, being still at the head of his profession. It is said that he has declared in his own peculiar way, that it was better to be at the head of the juniors than at the tail of the seniors. There are those, on the contrary, who aver that the following circumstance—which, though painful in its, reflects no discredit on Mr. Holmes's character—influenced him in the decision which he long since came to, to stand aloof for ever from the Government dispensers of the honours of the bar, and to take the only honour which his own profession could bestow—a seat at the Benchers' table in hall. He is the brother-in-law of the unfortu-

---

* The British Peerage, Ryall's Conservative Portraits, &c., &c.

THE DUBLIN STATE TRIALS.

PORTRAIT OF LORD KITOT.

nate Robert Emmett, in whose case the Castle officials of the day ancied from neglected, from the mere fact of his personal relationship, and his popular political opinions, and subjected him to some months imprisonment in Newgate.

He has been for many years a widower, and by diligent application to the arduous duties of his profession, has succeeded in amassing a very fine fortune, not one penny of which has he had out a bad or any other species of security in Ireland, and all of which, whenever it be vested, will be inherited by his daughter, an only child, resident for a long time back on the Continent. Mr Holmes is chiefly engaged at common law, and is distinguished as a sound constitutional advocate. In the convivial circle he is a famous punster, and very often indulges his sparkling propensities in this line when engaged in forensic contests, on which occasions he seldom fails to set the court in a roar. There is always a quaintness of thought, a dryness of expression, and a not unamiable eccentricity of manner about him, for which no member of either bar affords a parallel. Some years ago, having been rather roughly handled by a celebrated member of the Dublin press, in the news paper which he conducted, Mr. Holmes sent Mr. Fitzgibbon, a brother barrister, to request the favour of his company, at his earliest convenience, upon such particular spot of earth within the area of the Fifteen Acres, in the Park, the Champ de Mars of Dublin, as the plenipotentiaries of both parties might think proper to measure and apportion, then and there to meet and confront each other in wager of battle, with "high and haughty defiance," to wound, maim, or kill, as the case might be, with pistols in their hands, at ten paces—or twelve it might have been fairly stepped Roman measure, and, Heaven defend the right, all have mercy on their immortal souls. The gentleman who, from the hiding of four or six pocket volumes might have been taken for one of the fighting department, returned for answer, in the first stage of these grave proceedings, that he would, if permitted, much rather go to his grave with out a fight, than fight so old a man. Mr Fitzgibbon unhesitatingly removed the objection by offering to stand in his principal's shoes; and the editor, finding that he had selected not exactly the cool end of the poker, or perhaps fancying himself in a cleft stick, took one of those great resolutions which prove the great man in difficulties. He resolved to fight neither; alleging as an excuse that he was bound to the peace of the country in recognizances to the amount of £500 lawful coin of the realm. One would have thought this to be a settler to punctilio, and that none but casuists of the most subtle habits of distinction could think of a further step in prospect of satisfaction. Not so in this memorable affair. Mr. Holmes instructed his friend to lodge £500, the amount of the editor's security, in any bank the latter might name, that all chance of future difficulty or misunderstanding between the parties interested might be prevented, in the event of his surviving or falling; by which arrangement it was pointed out that in the one case the editor's escape would cost him nothing, and in the other that the Crown should be put to no trouble in recovering from his heirs, assigns, and survivors. Even this offer had not the desired effect. The editor declared himself notwithstanding a "peace at any price" man, and the parties were left to the pensive public and their own reflections. Those who do not know Mr. Holmes might, judging from his political opinions, deem it rather strange that he took a brief from the present Government; but those who know him would be surprised if he refused it. He has never yet been known to reject one, from what quarter soever it came, provided the retainer came with it. And why should he not do so in this instance with as much justice and good grace as the chief members of the traversers' bar, who are Conservatives?

MR. HENRY MARLEY

is the leading member of his circuit, the North East, and a good general lawyer, practising with success in all the courts, and especially in the Rolls. He is brother-in-law to Mr. Blackburne, the Master of that court—is a Conservative in politics—took a very respectable degree at the university—was called to the bar in 1826, and is about forty years of age. The traversers intended to have had him for their counsel, but found that the Crown had previously secured his services.

MR. JOHN GEORGE SMYTH

is what in legal parlance is facetiously called the Attorney General's Devil, and is the son of an old and distinguished member of the North West bar. He stands in a respectable rank of his profession, and like the great majority of his brethren of the Irish bar, he practises in all the courts. He was called to the bar in 1820, and is about forty-years of age. He is nephew to the late Lord Chief Justice Bushe.

MR. JOSEPH NAPIER

is the son of an eminent Belfast merchant. He took high honours at the Irish University, from whence he proceeded to London, to keep terms, and prosecute his legal reading for the bar. He there became the favourite pupil of the present Judge Patteson, and before long conducted the chief portion of his business, which he continued to do for a considerable period. He is a first-rate Common lawyer, and admitted to be one of the first pleaders at the Irish bar. He greatly distinguished himself, very recently, in his defence of the celebrated northern Orangeman, Sam Gray, against the Crown officials; and, in every case of appeal, for some years back, to the twelve judges, he has been engaged on one side or the other. The traversers thought to retain him, but he returned the fee, alleging that he had been retained by the Crown. It seems that one fee had been sent to him to the country, where he was sojourning at the time, and another was sent to his town residence, and that he chose to accept the former one. Mr. Napier is a great favourite with the bar, and has the utmost attention and consideration afforded him by the judges. In private life he is a most estimable and much-respected person; and, as an instance of his religious character, it is said that he refuses to enter upon an iota of professional consideration on the Sabbath, devoting that day to the higher duties of worship, and visiting various benevolent institutions.

PORTRAIT OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE LORD LIEUTENANT.

It was Mr. Napier who discovered the inaccuracy in the bill about to be sent up to the Grand Jury against the accused in the present state prosecutions, and by his suggestion the word "affirmation," as specified by the act, was added. It will be remembered that there was a quaker on the jury. Had the bill gone up as originally framed the error it contained must have proved a fatal one.

 We have been reluctantly compelled, from want of space, to omit the biographies of several of the portraits which appear amongst the Crown Counsel this week, but we will endeavour to remedy this defect on a future occasion. It will be seen that our artist has taken the liberty of associating with these distinguished lawyers, Mr Latouche, the High Sheriff; Mr. Kennis, the Crown Solicitor, and Mr. Bourne, the Chief Clerk, for no other reason that we can see than that at the present critical period it might be dangerous to separate these faithful servants of the Crown.

PORTRAITS OF THE COUNSEL FOR THE CROWN, ETC.]

NEWSPAPER

FINE ARTS.

PAUL AND VIRGINIA—FROM A PAINTING BY SCHOPIN.

PAUL ET VIRGINIE,

AS RE-ENGRAVED BY EUGENE JAZET FROM A PAINTING BY SCHOPIN.

This is one of the most exquisite productions that ever came from the pencil of pictorial imagination. The ornamented foot of Virginia, contrasted to the naked one of Paul—showing that she was about to depart

From simple climes to where they live on dress—is in the highest degree artistical—nay, poetical. There is a quotation at the foot of this magnificent engraving, which we will attempt to render, with a few additions of our own:—

PAUL AND VIRGINIA.

"To be more happy than you have been here,
Whers would you fly?
Whoe'er could kiss from that sweet cheek a tear,
Or fondly dry
Its melancholy moisture like a mother"'
"Alas! I know not," said Virginia, weeping,
"My friends will have me go—
But something here more strong than tie of brother
My heart is keeping.
What 'tis I do not know!
We have been children here together
In summer—ay! and winter weather;
And 'tis not easy to forego
A thing we've known long, long ago"'
More difficult," said Paul, "'twill prove
To part from what we dearly love!"
The maiden blush'd!—Cupid's transgression
To cause her face make such confession.

The Neapolitan journals are teeming with accounts of the extraordinary furore excited there by a Signora Favanti. She is said to be young, with very beautiful; her voice is of a peculiar freshness and brilliancy, and possesses a facility, power of modulation, and extent which has astonished the connoisseurs. It reaches, in the greatest perfection, from C of the bass to F sharp of the soprano, comprising three octaves and a half—an extent unprecedented. She executes the most surprising and varied exercises, ascending and descending through all the notes of her extensive register with the greatest facility and precision. She is the rage in that city, every other theatre being deserted, whilst she nightly attracts overflowing audiences at increased prices.

DONIZETTI. This indefatigable composer has just left Paris for Vienna, to produce Don Sebastien in that city.

BALFE, the composer, whose opera has been enthusiastically received by the Parisian dilettanti on his return to the city that "first cradled his fame."

THEATRE ROYAL, LIVERPOOL.—This house, under the new lesseeship, continues to be highly attractive. The decorations of the theatre, by Messrs. G. Morris and Ireland, of the Haymarket, in the Louis Quatorze style, are extremely elegant; and a drop scene, by Marshall, has bestowed upon provincial connoisseurs a treat which had never before been "out of town!" We must not forget to state there is newise some cleverly painted scenery, by Mr. Johnson. Madame Celeste is the directrice, in the absence of Mr. Webster, the new lessee. We envy the good Liverpool folk the presence of such an actor as Compton—it is, indeed, a sad proof of the legitimate drama's decline when such an artist is obliged to provincialise.

A NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

FROM A COUNTRY SUBSCRIBER.

To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

Ne me time donum ferentem.

DEAR SIR!

Tho' 'tis the time to send
Kind wishes to each distant friend,
(The first week of another year)
It probably may strange appear
That one who never yet has seen
Thy face, should have emboldén'd been
To "book a parcel" (spare my Muse)
For "LONDON ILLUSTRATED NEWS!"
(My prosody I left at school—
In other things I'm not a fool!)
I don't presume to have believ'd
It is the best as yet receiv'd—
But this I'll stoutly fight for mine
Contains no underhand design
Of heartless compliment or bribe,
I am no Pharisee, by Scribe,
But honest country gentleman—
Who well the difference doth scan
'Twixt Cornet "Would" and Captain "Could"
As General Shakespeare's understood
To call them—Yes! I'm pretty keen,
To see the disproportion 'tween
One matter which originates,
And other, that but imitates—
I herewith send a thousand thanks
From friends of mine in various ranks
Of what is termed Society,—
Who, grateful, have commission'd me
To be their spokesman and express,
In my best way, their thankfulness
For all the pleasures they're enjoy'd
(Sweet pleasures that have never cloy'd)
At thy most bounteous hand, which sheds
Improvement both on hearts and heads,
And scatters wide, intelligence,
Without the slightest wound to sense
Of Virtue, or e'en Modesty,
(That rarest nymph we now can see!)
We wish thee, Sir! a happy year!
And hope thy future life's career
In "custom'd excellence won't lack"
But run its brilliant Zodiac
As brightly as it yet hath done
In the ecliptic of that Sun
Call'd PUBLIC FAVOUR, which o'er thee
Hath shed its beams so gloriously!
From time to time, at no great lapse,
I'll send thee, friend! some more—

PERHAPS!

MABEL MARCHMONT.

[BY THOMAS MILLER,

AUTHOR OF "GODFREY MALVERN," "GIDEON GILES," "ROYSTON GOWER," "RURAL SKETCHES," "A DAY IN THE WOODS," "BEAUTIES OF THE COUNTRY," ETC.

THE old Manor House, which we made mention of in a former part of our story, had of late years undergone a great change.

"A merry spot 'twas said in days of yore,
But something ail'd it now, the place was curs'd;"

for a cloud seemed to have settled upon it ever since the marriage of the unfortunate Amy. The ancient avenue of gigantic elms which led up to the stately and aristocratic entrance of the hall, appeared darker and more solemn than it used to look in former years; and the carriage way was overgrown with long grey grass, which stood white and bleached, and unmown, year after year. The noisy rooks, that suit built and cawed in "the windy tall elm-trees," were the only old familiar sounds that awakened the sleeping echo. Even the black old mastiff had ceased to bark, and only left her kennel to bask outside in the sunshine. The heavy coil of rusted chain looked as if it belonged to the wreck of a ship; and the old grey weather-beaten kennel stood like a portion of her wind-bleached hull.

How different the scene a few years before, when the young and the gay who are gave life and beauty to the landscape, when they threw open the doors and burst forth from the large doors of the old Manor House, like a pent-up stream, that sparkles and runs in every direction, giving a voice to the silence, and throwing back a look of saucy light upon the sunshine. But the race of romps was gone. The sedate couples that paraded that long avenue arm in-arm, beneath the stern eye of their stately governess, had vanished; their shadows no more broke the golden network of the velvet sward; the "smooth-shaven green" rebounded no longer beneath their elastic tread. Husbands, and children, and household cares had stepped in between; and some had pillowed their aching heads in the grave: the place they once had known, "would know them there no more for ever."

Yet it was not altogether deserted, for sometimes, when the sun shone, a superannuated deaf old woman (now sole mistress of that once noble mansion) would crawl forth slowly into the sunshine, and, bow-bent with age and crime, go mumbering along to herself through the grass-grown paths of the shrubberies, and the winding walks which departed youth and beauty had looked upon as their own, and there communicated to each other all those fond little useless secrets which make such a bird-like flutter within a woman's heart. And sometimes this deaf, half blind old woman would curtsey to the grey stems of the trees, and fancy that they were her boarders; and, when the wind was unusually loud, and the old boughs clashed together, with noise enough to strike the dull drum of her ears, then would she name one Miss after another, and request them not to talk so loud; she bowed to the tall white grass at times, as she passed along, mistaking it for the fluttering drapery of some passing pupil.

For more than half a century had she groped her way through the twilight cloisters of learning; and when she could no longer lead, she hired teachers—creatures who were made to move at her beck and bid, while she herself seemed to sit unseen; her cold grey sunken eyes strengthened by the shadows that screened her as she marked narrowly all that moved in the stronger and outward light. She had now made gold her god; every track that led to her abode was marked with gold; the very slime which encrusted the walls of the dark passages that led to her darling idol, glittered with the traces of gold. And so she added acre to acre, field to field, until the wide domain which had once been owned by a noble race, had become her own; and she laughed whenever her cold calculating eye fell upon the half-obliterated escutcheon, and thought of the proud possessors who were gone. Many a night had this cruel old woman sat up alone in that old Manor House, counting over her ill-gotten gold, and plotting new schemes to barter away the happiness of the unsuspecting and beautiful victims who slept their innocent sleep above her head. If an heiress eloped, and her enraged parents came, her "God-a-mercy" was ever ready; she would have the windows barred, and the walls sheet-ironed; it should never happen again. So the devil and her kept sentry for years, and winked at each other while they watched.

And now she could have built for herself a vault of gold—could have coffined up her crooked body in the very dross for which she had bartered her peace of mind; nay, had even purified her very soul. Then she began to think of death, and to wage war against the evil one, by giving loaves and blankets to the poor; but even the poor loved her not; the old paupers, on St. Thomas's day, accepted her doles, and cursed the hand that distributed it. Her name was Miss Crowley, and the poor had changed it to Cruelty, though to her face they called her "my Lady; and woe to the wight who wanted a favour, and addressed her by any other title than that of "My Lady Crowley, of Messingham Manor House."

She kept two affectionate female servants, who would have poisoned her if they dared, but they confined their malice to the old lady's favourite cats and dogs, even her old gardener never failed to leave a rake, or hoe, or roller in her path, over which he hoped she might some fine day break her neck. As for her coachman, he could scarcely see for fat and the want of exercise; so contented himself with eating and sleeping, and looking at his horses, as if only to see which got the fattest. The footman was her master, and only did what he pleased; gave her to eat what he himself disapproved of; heard her when it suited him, and stood grinning behind her chair while she rung the bell that summoned him to her presence. The old steward was the only one faithful to the last, for he had risked his soul too far to retreat; he thought it hard for the old lady to insure herself in the fire-office below without a witness, so insured himself for companionship. She was a stately old dame, and would have thought Death himself very ill-mannered if he did not offer her his bony arm whenever he might think well to conduct her to the grave.

And that man, whom she had been the chief instrument in getting imprisoned and maddened, was now her only boarder,—the only living wreck that pointed to the stormy and dangerous sea over which she had sailed for her ill-gotten wealth—the only thing, saving her rents, which apprised her of quarter-day, when the accustomed cheque came which paid for his board, lodging, and attendance, and which her steward always got cashed into gold, every piece of which the old lady weighed repeatedly, and sent back those which were the balance of a hair too light.

She little dreamed of the mischief she was doing, when eight years before she permitted Amy to marry a mere boy. For twelve years had her fair pupil remained at school. No one came to fetch her home at holiday-time. The man, now an idiot, was the only one who ever came, and that was but seldom. It was not enough for the old lady that her increased salary was paid regularly. She did not like boarders at holiday times. She wanted the money without the meals—the pay without the trouble. She liked to be alone then, to count her ungodly gains. And when notice was given for Amy to leave the school, she thought she must have a little more for her trouble, and so made the best bargain she could with the friends of Alfred Etherington.

Amy's mother had then long been dead. Her father died while she was but a child. Her mother had married again to a man who accepted her hand solely for the sake of her property—for her estate joined his own. Had the law allowed him any loop-hole through which he could have stepped in, and claimed it, he would have done so, but finding this no easy matter, he married Amy's mother,—broke her heart, and buried her in less than three years—sent his daughter-in-law to Miss Crowley's school, married another lady of fortune, and kept the very existence of Amy a secret from his coroneted wife. Amy might have succeeded the old lady, and kept her school on,—but she had nearly grown grey, had it not been for her ill-timed marriage with Alfred Etherington. For Amy herself knew not that when she gave her girlish-hand to her youthful lover, she also gave up thousands of broad acres, which until then the law allowed her step-father to claim as his own. That juvenile cutie, Miss Crowley, was the first to communicate the tidings. She was, as she expected to be, bought over. The pretended guardian came down and took away poor Amy.

Even then the gold-loving old governess proved too much for the ambitious step father, and the man who acted like a tool in the clever mechanic's hands, she cast sheer between them both. The letter from France announcing Amy's death, she handed over to Alfred, and then she demanded an account of what had been her pupil. It was soon rendered. A heavy cheque brought the earnest satisfaction; it tore the registry from the church book—proved the elopement of the guardian with her pupil—produced a trial in which the man now mad, pleaded guilty for a promised reward—ended in a forged certificate of Amy's death, and the imprisonment of a confiding fool, who was found guilty of a crime he was innocent of, and who went mad cursing the ingratitude of his patron. whose petition to the Secretary of State, stating the whole truth, was never allowed to pass the walls of his prison, for it was to the interest of his gaolers to believe him mad, and lest there should be a doubt, they brought all their horrible means to bear upon him, they gave him darkness and solitude, and finished their damnable work. Then his patron stepped in, sheriff like, and claimed the body; but was given up, when the mind was dead, when mischief had wrought its worst.

Amy's marriage was the last act of that old woman's long tragedy. Not that she might have brooded over it any more than the hundred other deeds she had her guilty of, had not the presence of the poor Idiot caused it at times to rise more distinctly before her, and that, too, when she found he was so constant a visitor at Abraham Marchmont's, and heard the rumour of the intended marriage between Mabel and Alfred. Sathanos himself (according to De Foe's history of that dusky gentleman) could not have been more attentive to tempt his host any, or a better God Christians by his footmark—so cruel Miss Crowley, either out of a love of mischief, or a reverence for the beauty and innocence of Mabel—whom she had often seen and admired at church—for Mabel had always curtsied to her grey locks as she passed from the porch—began to take an interest in the forthcoming marriage; and as old Abraham Marchmont had danced with her fifty years ago, and as Mabel's mother had been her pupil, she was married to Abraham's son, soon after she left school, she introduced herself, her gold-headed stick, and fat poodle, all at once to the old man, much to his astonishment, one fine sunshiny day. She began by talking about the balls she had given in former times at the Manor House; of the dead who then danced with her; of the few living, whose dancing days were over, like her own and Abraham's; and then her style of dress, and the decreased interest on money; regretted that she had not perceived the increase of the village of Messingham, but had let the leases of her lands so low; talked about the intended repairs of the church, and how inconsiderate it was of her to promise one hundred pounds towards the aforesaid; and ended by sallying forth to see if the church would not do without the repairs, adding, as she crossed old Abraham's threshold, "I say! he has stood five hundred years, and I compute see why it should not stand five hundred more; or, at least, as long as I live, without wanting any repairs. It has outstood the old De Laceys."

How many and varied are the emotions which a visit to a churchyard awakens—to all it looks not like the silent City of the Dead. The cheek of the young bride may blanch as her silken dress rustles by her mother's grave, and the footsteps of the bridegroom falter as he passes the spot where his forefathers sleep. Time brings the portly nurse with the baby christening—and the future dawns upon a new race of men and women, while the old grave-stones are gradually removed, and each new comer looks round and takes his rest, disturbing nothing but a few old and forgotten bones. So streets and houses pour out the old race of inhabitants, the mute passes from the door, and makes way for the upholsterer, the dress-maker, and the undertaker, who furnish and prepare the new bridal robes, the white and black waste strew the self-same floor, the room that one week echoed back the long heart-breaking sobs, in a few more days resounds with laughter, and ere we can say "that is the house of mourning," it has become the abode of mirth.

It might be that some such thoughts as these rose up in the memory of that old woman, as she entered the village churchyard, and gazed on the grey old pile, against the last of the De Laceys slept. Perchance other wrecks have up before her eyes and "dazzled sight, visions which she herself had hurried to their final slumber, beneath that still green sea of stationless waves, broken only by the vessel-spars of white grave stones, each of which seemed to start up like a wan and shadowy ghost, while the last red rays of sunset gilded their time-worn sum mits, as if their brows had been "dabbled in blood."

On one of those silent and grassy hillocks sat the poor Idiot, arranging a handful of wild flowers, which he had gathered in the neighbouring fields. The old lady walked up to where he was seated, and sat down on an adjoining bench, her thoughts divided between him, the surrounding dead, and the repairs of the old church.

"Fine morning ma'am," said the Idiot, unconscious that it was evening, which was of no consequence, as the old woman could not hear a word he said. "Won the prize at the flower show—seven hundred—this rose did it,' added he, holding up a faded buttercup, "grew it in the dark—no air—no light—went mad when they saw its colour—all ran off and were locked up—mad, mad! ah! ah! ah! all went mad!" and he laughed—such a laugh as would have driven the blood back cold into the heart to have heard him.

"Only seventeen when she died," muttered the old woman to herself, as she looked round amongst the graves, her eye gradually perceiving the objects that rose before her through the dim owl-light of her old age. "It was a pretty piece of plate her mother gave me, for attending on her through her long illness; but her shame was buried with her, and they were a haughty race. It was for the best, after all, perhaps; and Dr. Mori knew better than I did, so I haven't that to answer for, and he has long since settled his account. I did expect a better legacy from him—but he behaved very handsomely." And she drew her old cloak more closely around her, for she thought the air was colder about graves than it was in other places.

"I've a been a great traveller, ma'am," continued the Idiot—"was two thousand years on a solitary island, where a flower was never seen—took my tongue out, and had it by, because I had no use for it—This flower will win seven prizes—Barren country, ma'am—no light to grow anything—going over again soon—made a contract with the gas company—light it up, and have beautiful vegetation."

"And he seems very happy," said the old woman, now looking at the harmless madman beside her. "Perhaps it was all for the best; he was then very acute, almost too sharp for me even. He might have forged his name to a will, or made base sovereigns, and ruined many a poor family, and perhaps he might have got hung—who knows? After all, I haven't much on my conscience: now he can harm nobody, and he hasn't sense enough to feel trouble like me. Well, that's a blessing. If I give him a shilling, and tell him it's a guinea, he does'nt know the difference, and that's a great comfort, when it is so."

"Quite enough here ma'am," said the Idiot, remembering for the moment that they were in a churchyard, and still pursuing his task in arranging the wild flowers, for the golden chain of his thoughts was too shattered to hold together long. "Nice trade that of sexton; dig, dig, dig; cover all up in the same suit I find the flowers in now, beige—garden's bigger than the world. Pretty parents—May-blossoms for country maidens, lilies and roses for ladies, because they are pale and quiet; monk's-hood and black aloes for widows—forth-wormwood for the prizes. Hemlock and night-shade for old women, ma'am; and poison and prison for death-head moths—they died the living on the back of the dead, and so left them in the grave." And he made a horrible noise between his teeth, then began to bite the stalks from the flowers.

Meantime Mabel and Alfred had entered the churchyard, and approached the old woman, who was Mabel's godmother. She saw them come up, and motioned Mabel to sit beside her, an office which the latter deemed; but leant heavier on the arm of her lover.

"So you are about to be married," said the old lady; "well, well, I dare say you will be very happy, and you, sir," added she, addressing Alfred, "are but a young widower. But I dare say—let me see—eighty years has not left my memory quite so perfect as it once was. And Amy, I could tell by looking at my banker's book—for I gave up my school the quarter but one after. And her father sent me the first cheque for Mr.—— but Lord have mercy on me, I have no memory for dates now, and should forget when it was dividend-day did not Mary move the long calendar every morning. I am getting older, goddaughter."

Mabel Marchmont made some complimentary remark about old age and virtue for she, dear girl, believed that everyone who was old was as good as her grandfather, but what she said was lost upon the ears of her grandmother.

"Your mother lies there, and I sit here," continued the old lady—"Lord, Lord! who would have thought that I should have outlived her. She was so fond of green peas, and she died in June when the first lamb was coming into season. The last time she took tea with me you was not above this height," and the old woman raised her hand up as she spoke. "Miss Wainwright died the Tuesday after—she had a white coffin. I have the feather pillow yet that she wished to be buried in; it was swan's down, and I changed it for the best sheetman's flock. I did it all for the best. Swan's down! and so often as the young ladies were ill; besides, it felt so easy under my own head. But she died very happy—although it had been her mother's."

"What an old wretch," said Alfred, "to pluck the very pillow from the head of a dying girl. Ask her where poor Amy was buried. I would that we knew the worst, Mabel. There is something wrong, or her father would not now be here.

"I cannot," answered Mabel, in a very low, and tremulous voice, "ask anything of my future marriage might be a pain to her—it is to me, and yet I know not why it should." She then turned round, and taking the few wild flowers, which the Idiot presented to her, placed them in her boddice.

"You spoke of Amy's father just now," said Alfred, hollaing into the old woman's ear. "I saw him to-day! he was inquiring about a gang of gipsies who are somewhere near to Messingham. You are old, and away from the grave—does his inquiry concern me, or in any way affect my marriage with your god-daughter, Mabel? If it does, tell me, while Mabel is beyond hearing. I have heard strange things whispered of late. And her father has been hovering about here for several days."

"God-a-mercy, Amy's father here," exclaimed the old lady: "why I gave him a stamped receipt for his last quarter's account; my steward sent it back by return of post—he were ever particular in matters of money. The gipsies, I see," said she, thrown for a moment off her guard; "it may be something about her baby."

"What, said Alfred, grasping the old woman's wrist, for Mabel was engaged with the Idiot—"what baby? As you hope to enter that Heaven which you are so unworthy of, tell me what you hint at so darkly. Is Amy still alive?—what brought her father here?—where is the child you name? Answer me, old woman—I am not a boy, now."

"Dear me, no," said the old lady; "how you hurt me. Leave go, and I will tell you. Well, there was a child, and Amy sold it—no—they took it from her He there," pointing to the Idiot, "said it was his. But all was done for the best, although it drove him mad. Your wife Amy, the girl, was taken—but I cannot remember the names of places. They put her in a private asylum, and she made her escape. From that day to this her father knows not what befel her—he could not deceive me—I have not that on my conscience. She may be dead for aught I know. I did not know she was so rich when you married her; but I did it all for the best; for, poor thing, she had nobody who seemed to care for her. Wait awhile, and I will write. Mabel, you know, is my god-daughter. It may be worth your while to wait. I have no relation nor friend in the world. Her father is here, is he? Well, well! he is more to blame than I am, and I have enough to answer for for other people; marry have I."

"He is," exclaimed a deep manly voice, which seemed to come from the grave beneath the old woman's feet, while a tall gentlemanly-looking man emerged from the porch of the church in which he had been seated. "He is, old woman, and has now come to demand a receipt in full. We have long played a fast and loose game together. Tell me, old hag, to whom you consigned Amy's child." The sound of voices was, at this moment, heard without the churchyard wall, and as the old woman exclaimed, "another day, not now: another day," Mabel turned her head, and heard the terminis of a very old song, which ended with—

"Let others think of what they may,
We gipsies have enough to day,
And why should we not laugh and play,
Merry as the birds in May."

(To be concluded in our next.)

SIMPLE CURES.—Some two years ago, relates Mr. Guthrie, the wife of the Grand Master of the Ceremonies of the Autocrat of all the Russias, suffered for two days from inflammation of one eye, which gave her an agonizing pain whenever she attempted to move it. It was just dusk, and she had determined on having a consultation of three or four physicians and surgeons the next morning, when, as she was passing hastily in the domestic-street, my friend Count D'Orsay introduced her to let him go for me. He told me her story, and as it was too dark to see clearly, I assured her ladyship I did not mind having candles, that a very trifling needless operation and three magic words would remove her evil in a moment. I everted the upper lid, rubbed my fore-finger steadily along its internal surface, and declared she was cured, which she acknowledged five minutes after to be the case. Next morning her ladyship earnestly entreated I would remove a local irritation of the heart she frequently laboured under, and cure her son of a pain in his chest by the same simple means. I accomplished one by loosening a tight stay lace, and declined attempting the other as beyond even the aid of magic.—Medical Times.

It is good to be children sometimes, and never better than at Christmas, when its mighty founder was a child himself.—Dickens's Christmas Carol.

THE MAGAZINES FOR JANUARY.

(Continued from last week.)

BLACKWOOD opens with a paper on "The State Prosecutions," and closes with the "Position and Prospects of the Government." The sketches in Texas are continued; and "the Banking-House" is concluded. The number has but little seasonable life in it: one of its drolleries is a meeting of horses recently held for the protection of their interests in corn; it is a short, smart trifle, in the school of our faceate friend Punch.

THE NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE is full of vigorous writing; and, having told the reader that the stories of Agnes Strickland, Mrs. Trollope, Horace Smith, Eliza Cook, Peter Priggins, Barry Cornwall, and John Poole, figure in its pages, we need not add that the number is a good one. This strong array is, we suppose, to make up for the late secession from the editorship. The opening paper—"Prince Talleyrand," is cleverly and amusingly written; and a "Narrative of a Visit to the Courts of Vienna, Constantinople, Athens, and Naples," by the Marchioness of Londonderry, has more than the prestige of high rank. Miss Strickland's "Barn Johnson, or the Blind Witness," is a tale of the domestic class; and by aid of a stern hypocrite, a ruthless murderer, and some beautiful bits of description, this will be not the least popular paper in the number: the narrative is cleverly circumstantial. The "Visit to Rousseau's Favourite Residence" is Trollopized pleasantly enough, though the place is faded in interest. Horace Smith's contribution is a piece of poetry, entitled "Mord Runa," by turns quaint and eloquent. Mr. Poole's "Gentility-Virginity," extends but to four pages; and, like everything from his pen, is neat, polished, and full of point.

BENTLEY'S avant courier is Mr Albert Smith's "Fortunes of the Scattergood Family," a worthy successor of Ledbury's Adventures. The writer is evidently maturing, especially in "the descriptive:" thus—

It was cold, bitter cold. The wind came frozen as it swept in biting gusts over the fetid marsh, or whistled amongst the slender leafless trees of the pollards; and the very stars appeared shivering as they twinkled in wintry brightness in the clear blue sky. But, in the intervals of the wind's wrath all was dead and still. The spirit of Nature, being locked up in the icy bosoms of the frost, until the sun chose to heal her out, was aware that at present she could not well help herself, and so maintained a dignified and impressive silence.

The hero, Vincent Scattergood, is introduced: certain phases of London life are cleverly sketched: the market breakfast-house is well described: but the bank clerk's maiden entertainment, in the Kennington-road, is in the author's liveliest vein; and the spirit of the whole is well carried out by a pair of illustrations by Leech. Of the remainder of the number little can be said in praise: the papers want mark—as the "Fish-street Catastrophe"—eight pages of mediocre verse; "The London Hotel-keeper" and "The Physiology of London" are too much in the same track, and that by no means unbeaten track: the latter paper is by the author of "The World of London," in Blackwood's Magazine. Again, the "Few Thoughts on the Old Year" are so tame, that we wish they were fewer. The "familiar" is far more difficult to excel in than is generally imagined: hence, the frequent mistake of describing common-place things in a common-place style.

THE SPORTING REVIEW, in the present number, maintains its high position as the first periodical of its class. The Editor's "Hyde Marston" is full of sparkling reality, and the savoir-vivre. Mr. Vyner's "Notitia Venatica" is a paper of experiences, well seasoned with anecdote. Cotherstone has contributed a practical paper on Training the Race-horse: and of kindred value is a record of the past Racing Season, by Castor. There are likewise some sprited papers on Foreign Sporting; and the number, in each department, is inviting.

THE FARMERS' MAGAZINE is enlarged to the extent of sixteen pages, so as to enable the proprietors more completely to report the proceedings of farmers' clubs. This is a judicious measure, now that Agriculture has become a leading study as well as pursuit. Among the more important subjects discussed in this number are "The Investment of Farmers for Meeting Reduced Prices;" "Management of Fold-yard Manure;" "Manures, Experimental Farms, and Agricultural Chemistry," &c. The reports are valuable, especially those of the Royal Agricultural Society of England and the Smithfield Club. A practical paper on the Potato will be read with profit.

THE NEW MONTHLY BELLE ASSEMBLER numbers among its contributors Miss Camilla Toulmin and Miss Youatt. The mélange consists of nouvelette, tale, and sketch, interspersed with a few graceful poetical pieces. The embellishments are a portrait, and two plates of fashions.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND MAGAZINE continues to be an attractive miscellany of biography and Christian antiquities, sermon and sketch, interspersed with well-executed wood-cuts. It contains, likewise, a valuable record of ecclesiastical intelligence.

FRASER'S MAGAZINE contains a pleasant piece of gossip that might have been styled "the Domestic Life of Queen Victoria;" but, for obvious reasons, it is headed "Regina's Regime." The anecdotes are amusing, and we take their authenticity to be on a par with "the very best authority" of gossips; and scarcely a trait of royalty is related without this assurance. The number is altogether lively and attractive. The paper, "A Fine Day in Fleet-street," describes the haunts of genius, and the Johnsonian "animated appearance" of the metropolitan sorts: the tavern anecdotes are good, but would be better were the personal recollections somewhat nearer fact.

THE DUBLIN UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE is of somewhat sterner cast than usual. A promising series of Historic Tableaux is commenced with "The 18th Brumaire." There are three reviews, of which that of the drama of Henry II. is the soundest. In the notice of "Paris and its People," the author is treated "very martyrly," and then handed over "to the most insolent and sarcastic critic of all France." It is throughout a smart piece of breaking on the wheel. A long paper on Mesmerism, though very interesting, is somewhat late in the day. The portrait is that of the gifted Dr Maginn, and an admirable likeness it is. The accompanying biographical memoranda extend through some thirty pages, and contain a few sketches of the Doctor in his last year, transcribed from some letters written at that period by the biographer himself, and an application made by him on behalf of Maginn to Sir Robert Peel, and within a week the Premier took measures for the poor Doctor's relief, of which, however, Maginn was never apprised.—

In this occasion he again alluded to his poverty, and the ingratitude of his party: in fact, he seemed to have no other trouble on his mind. On Thursday evening I left Walton; I never again saw him alive. He died on the following Saturday, and, I firmly believe, died in ignorance of the splendid gift of the Royal Society of England—a gift that would have afforded him consolation in his dying moments.

This is a most lamentable circumstance. The memoir is full of literary secrets, and among them it is stated, that at least one-fourth of the "Gallery of Illustrious Literary Characters," which contains "Fraser's Magazine Scrap Book," while that book was under the guidance of Miss Landon, was contributed by Dr. Maginn. The number is wound up with a vigorous paper—"Repeal Movement—the Prosecution," in which parliamentary inference is confidently predicted.

THE SPORTING MAGAZINE is rife with seasonable novelties: as a Diary of Sport with her Majesty's Hounds; the Royal Visit to Belvoir; the Universities' Boat Races; Progress and Prospects of the Hunting Season; the approaching Racing Season, &c. One of the illustrations is a plan of the places of meeting of the Worcestershire Hunt.

THE HISTORY OF CHINA AND INDIA, by Miss Corner, has attained its 12th part, breaking off with the usurpation of Aurungzebe. The work continues to be be neatly compiled and liberally illustrated.

SYLVESTER SOUND, Part III., is full of amusing incidents and pleasant drollery. The story proceeds with the discovery of the guardian and the appearance of the "Spirit" on the Pastor and Jones; the Fearful Conjecture; and a very lively chapter—the Eggs and Exotics. The number is illustrated with four steel-plate engravings: and these, with the thickening plot, make up a capital modicum for the month.

NEW METHOD OF RAPIDLY RAISING A BLISTER.—M. Donné, of Stenay, (Meuse,) proposes the following method, which he calls blister with a watch-glass: pour eight or ten drops of concentrated ammonia in a flat watch-glass, cover it with a bit of fine rag, somewhat smaller in diameter than the glass, and then place it on the skin, keeping it in its place, by means of moderate pressure, with the fingers. Generally, in about thirty seconds, the end proposed is attained, which is indicated by a roseate zone of about three-quarters of an inch wide, which forms itself round the glass. The apparatus is then removed, the wound washed with tepid water, and the epidermis taken off.—Medical Times.

On Friday a coal engine belonging to the East Hetton Coal Company blew up, whilst proceeding up the Hartlepool Railway, and a poor woman who was upon the engine was killed on the spot. The engineman and stoker were severely scalded.

THE ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE. No. IX.

The recent visit of her Majesty to Chatsworth, doubtless, suggested the opening paper of this number—"Mary Stuart at Chatsworth Park," by Miss Costello: it pleasingly narrates Mary's attempt to escape by concealment in the great cavern at Buxton, which nearly cost the Earl of Arundel his life. "The March of Civilization" is a half-jest, half-earnest view of the colonization of Australia. "A Supper Scene in the Olden Time," sketches a racy meeting at the Devil Tavern, the favourite resort of Ben Jonson, and occupying the site of Child's-place, near Temple Bar. "The Stockings; or, Idle Inny," an Irish fairy tale, by the late John L'Estrange; and "The Heilsman's Dog, a Memory of the Rhine," by Miss Pardoe, lend graceful variety to the number. Our illustrated extract is from a paper of considerable graphic power, and it relates the mutations of an old inn.

OU might travel many a league, and never meet with village inn so picturesque or so achingue as ours. You might traverse many a broad acre of jungle, wood, and park, and yet not see so brave, so fair an oak, as that which covers with its mighty arms the time-worn sign that swings before our humble hostelry. It stands in solitary majesty, leafless and bare, a grim, gaunt skeleton, the huge anatomy of a long-lived giant, its summer bravery put off, its leafy garniture departed, its many-hued autumnal robe stript from it, and trodden down to mingle with the sodden soil beneath. Centuries have rolled over it, and generations passed it by, and still it towers in altitude, in beauty, and in bulk, the same. Lichens cling firmly to its rugged bark, and mosses drapery its hardy roots; but they become it, as hoary hairs become the veteran; they are gnomonic of a rare old age—old age without its concomitant decay. They must have been coeval—oak and house; and let who reared the one must surely have committed to the earth the tiny acorn from whose grave sprung up the Titan vastness of the other.

But the Inn! what ever see a crazier pile? —an edifice so nodding, tottering, curious and uncouth? Story overtopping story, and a row of heavy gables, sombrous and uniform, ornate with cunning carving, wormeaten and somewhat decayed withal, lifting their peaked summits above the sunken windows, the redundant cornices, quaint corbels, vacant niches, brackets and bas-reliefs, which diversify and decorate the motley aspect of the "Royal Oak."

It hath had its mutations—that way-side alehouse; and the rude effigies which rustle art hath traced upon its sign-board, have changed as often as the blazon of the royal shield. When its walls first rose, the farmer's strong oak arms was hanging through the realms of Christendom, and noble blood was shed like rain upon the thirsty soil of Palestine. Then, the "Red Cross" became the rendezvous for village gossips; and if, perchance, some humble palmer sought the shelter of its roof, day-spirit would dawn before the strong dispersed whom curiosity had convened to hear the wonder-teeming tales with which the wanderer regaled the greedy ears of that attentive company.

Anon, when many an eventful year had run its course, and the Crusades were numbered with the bygone things of an imperfectly remembered past, the "Harry Tudor" swung from before the village inn; and cripplèd veteran, who had been eye-witnesses of and actors in, the sanguinary and merciless wars of the Roses, met in the summer evenings beneath the verdurous roof spread out by that all-sheltering oak, and spun interminable recitals (that varied with the occasion and the audience) of Hexham's total rout—of Stamford's fierce, disastrous fray—of Barnet's Saltash fight, and Bosworth's bloody field.

Once more the sign was changed, and Harry Tudor's sharp and thoughtful face was hidden beneath a patch of sober, russet-coloured paint. True to the spirit of the age, the shuffling close-cropped hipster (of the period of the Commonwealth) scrawled on his board the haknayed watchword, which certain of the Republicans had adopted—"God encompasseth us!" That, we may be sure, was never destined to survive the Restoration; and in its stead, there was accordingly displayed (as to make up in resemblance of the oak of Boscobel as the painter's fancy could devise). And often renewed as it has been, still does the sign revive, while under it we read the well-known name of its hearty honest host, "John Summers."

We like the tone of this number throughout; and the papers are well chosen for variety of interest. The illustrations are clever and spirited.

LITERATURE.

SNARE'S BERKSHIRE ALMANAC, &c., for 1844. John Snare, Reading.

Although a local publication, this volume possesses a general interest, inasmuch as it shows that were equal pains taken in compiling such a work for every populous district in England, we might then arrive at a better notion of the resources of the entire country than could possibly be obtained by ordinary means. Here we meet with an annual containing all desirable information relating to Berkshire; next is a register of the officers of the country; and then, a post-office directory of residents, professions, and trades, in the several towns in the county. The calendar has been constructed by an astronomer, at his "house at Greenwich," for the meridian of Reading; and the directory is interspersed with well compiled antiquarian and topographical notices of the several towns. We like this admixture of the commercial and literary; since it may be the means of incidentally bringing historical data under the eye of those persons who have neither leisure nor taste for more extended reading of the kind. The work before us is an admirable specimen of provincial printing: it is very neatly worked in red, blue, and black, and embellished with wood-cuts: its production is honourable to the ingenuity and enterprise of the publisher, and we trust that the good people of Berkshire will not be slow to recognise so meritorious a labour of one of their townsmen.

CHINA; in a Series of Views, displaying the Scenery, Architecture, and Social Habits, of that ancient empire. Vol. I. Fisher, Son, and Co. 4to.

This is a truly superb volume, calculated to supply the place of the high-priced Annual, and by its more sterling character to maintain its pre-eminence of that much over-rated class of publications. It contains no fewer than 32-quarto plates, drawn from original and authentic sources by Mr. Allom; and engraved in the finest line style by Willmore, Prior, Bentley, Sands, Bradshaw, Redaway, Adlard, Topham, and other eminent masters of the burin: many of these plates are brilliantly executed, and the out-door scenes have the delightful atmospheric effect of Mr. Allom's pencil. The letter-press consists of historical and descriptive notices by the Rev. G. N. Wright, M.A.; they are written in a popular, readable manner, although here and there we detect a few fantasies which might have been spared—such, for example, as the attempt to cultivate tea in Brazil being attended "with tolerable prosperity." In his preface, Mr. Wright scarcely magnifies the importance of his subject, when he states of the Chinese that "their agricultural system is unequalled, their manufactures the models of other nations, their architecture elaborate and fantastic, and their plans for economizing labour and redeeming time, admirable. The first light of those three portentous discoveries printing, gunpowder, and the mariner's compass discoveries to which modern times owe all their boasted superiority over the earlier ages of the world—is known to have emanated from China" Until recently, our knowledge of this vast empire was very scanty; but, we are happy to learn that nearly all the works on China with which the press has lately teemed, have been very successful; and the volume before us has already partaken of this gale of favour, since the author speaks of the "unexampled patronage" which this enterprise has received; and, assuredly, it merits such encouragement.

FISHER'S DRAWING-ROOM SCRAP-BOOK. 1844. By the author of "The Women of England." Fisher, Son, and Co. 4to.

There is a melancholy interest associated with this annual in the recollection that it was introduced to the public by the lamented L. E. L., whose epigraph the title-page still bears:—

Gifts are the heads of Memory's rosary,
Wherein she reckons kind remembrances
Of friends and old affections.

The present volume contains thirty-six plates, the accompaniments to which are from the pen of Mrs. Ellis, the wife of the excellent missionary. The task of writing to plates is one of no mean difficulty, which has, in the present instance, been gracefully overcome. We have only space for a single specimen:—

THE SONS OF JACOB.

This have we found mysterious falsehood! why
Was evil blended thus with Heaven's own plan?
Was there no way but this most sinful lie
That in the semblence of fair Truth began?
No other means to bring about that end
Whose glorious fruits to distant worlds extend?
Oh, majesty of power! supremely high:
Inscrutable to human thought!
Great mystery of mysteries! never taught
To those who sit in darkness here below;
When shall the dawning of that morning be
When we shall dwell in light, and look on Thee?
Ever adoring, ever bending low,
From man's foul deeds God's purest mercies flow.

THE JUVENILE SCRAP-BOOK. 1844. By the author of "The Women of England." Fisher, Son, and Co.

Original tales, memoirs, and brief poems, are the accompaniments to as many plates, engraved in first-rate manner, for this instructive and amusing annual; which, at the same time that it delights the eye, improves the heart by the pious tone of every page.

SHAKSPEAREAN TWELFTH NIGHT CHARACTERS. Edlin, New Bond-street.

A very pretty set of twenty-four characters for Twelfth Night has reached us. They are taken from the most popular of the plays of Shakspeare—as Romeo and Juliet, Othello, Richard III., &c.; they are of the usual size, and each character is backed by a sketchy scene, smartly lithographed and coloured. With the pictures is given a sort of key, with the name of the character, and an appropriate couplet, &c. The object of the artist, in this seasonable novelty, has been to supply a set of characters, which, whilst affording abundant material for mirth and repartee, shall be entirely free from the coarseness and vulgarity which attach to the ordinary figures and mottoes; and we think the result entitled to the attention of all those who cater for the holiday circle.

PETER PARLEY'S ANNUAL. Darton and Clark.

This is another seasonable novelty for young people," and the fifth volume of the kind presented by Peter to his little friends. It consists of tales and sketches, and "something about" almost everything; with a thick sprinkling of woodcuts, and some plates. The tone of the book is kindly; and, although full of instruction, it never strays into dulness.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

There has been nothing new at this house since the new pantomime —constructed upon the story of old. Valentine and Orson continue nightly to "make war in onset," and at last shake hands, in most fraternal amity creating a corresponding good-humour on the part of a numerous audience.

COVENT GARDEN

This house is Full of mirth and harmony
As any one would wish to see,
JULLIEN, the head magician,
Wanding o'er each best musician
That the land, on pipe or string,
Can afford to forward bring.
Symphonies and waltzes all
Alike obey his potent call!

SURREY.

The vowel pantomime at this house continues to be quite consonant with public favour; it increases nightly in attraction.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

CHANCERY.

Thursday was the first day of Hilary Term, but, contrary to usual custom, the Lord Chancellor did not give any breakfast to the Judges, in consequence of an arrangement having been made that his lordship should not do so excepting at Michaelmas and Easter Term.

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT.
(Before Sir J. K. Bruce.)
DICKENS v. BERGER.

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd moved, on behalf of Mr. Charles Dickens, for an injunction to restrain the publication of a work by the defendant, which was a piracy of one published by the plaintiff. Mr. Dickens had published a work shortly before Christmas, entitled "A Christmas Carol," the principal character in which was an old man who had spent all his life in money getting, and who was converted to the genial influences of the season by means of certain ideal pictures or representations which were made to pass before him. The alleged piracy was published in the 16th number of a periodical, called "Peter Parley's Illuminated Magazine;" and with the exception of some vulgarities of expression, which he supposed were introduced on account of their supposed suitability to the readers of a twopenny publication, it was identically the same work as Mr. Dickens' "Christmas Carol." The scenes were the same, the machinery, whether natural, or supernatural, was the same; and the names even the same, with the exception of one, into which a new letter was introduced.—His Honour then granted the injunction.

SURREY SESSIONS.

(Before Thomas Puckle, Esq., Chairman, Messrs. Freshfield, Johnson, and a Bench of Magistrates.)

Henry Cox, aged 18; Joycille Hopkins, aged 23; and William Woolridge, aged 19, were indicted with stopping and robbing George Sligo and Hannah Sligo, his daughter, on the Queen's highway, at Camberwell, on the morning of the 24th of December. Mr. Locke prosecuted, and Mr. Scriven and Mr. Charnock defended the prisoners. A man of the name of John Beauchamp was also included in the indictment, but, on the application of the counsel for the prosecution, the court admitted him evidence for the Crown, it appearing the prisoners could not be convicted without his testimony. Sligo having given his evidence, Beauchamp, the approver, was next examined, and proved that the prisoners, Hopkins and Woolridge, proposed to Cox and himself that they should waylay and rob the old man and his daughter. This being acceded to, they changed dresses on the road, so that they might not be recognised. The witness detailed in an accurate manner the way in which the robbery was planned and effected. Hopkins and Woolridge were sitting on the old man on the ground, rifling his pockets.—Mr. Scriven called a witness on behalf of Cox, who gave him a good character, and said he was willing to employ him again. The prisoner had been in his employment for twelve months, and was so at the time of the robbery. Mr. Charnock addressed the jury at great length, but called no witnesses.—The jury, after a short consultation, returned a verdict of "Guilty" against Hopkins and Woolridge, and acquitted Cox. The chairman, in passing sentence, told the prisoners that where highway robbery was accompanied with violence and outrage, they would always award a severe sentence. The prisoners were then sentenced to ten years' transportation. The trial occupied seven hours.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—THE WILL FORGERIES.—On Tuesday the re-examination of the prisoners Barber and Fletcher, who were remanded on Monday week last, on two charges of forgery, was resumed. The prisoners, it will be remembered, have been frequently remanded on the charge of uttering a forged will, purporting to be the will of Anne Slack, and when they were last brought up they were charged, in addition, with uttering a forged will, purporting to be the will of Mary Hunt; they were on that occasion remanded on both these charges. Mr. Clarkson attended to conduct the prosecution; Mr. Chambers appeared for Barber; and Mr. Ballantyne for Fetcher. A number of witnesses were examined for the prosecution, after which Mr. Ballantyne renewed his application to be furnished with a copy of the depositions, but it was refused, and the prisoners, who were kept apart during the investigation, were further remanded until Monday week next.

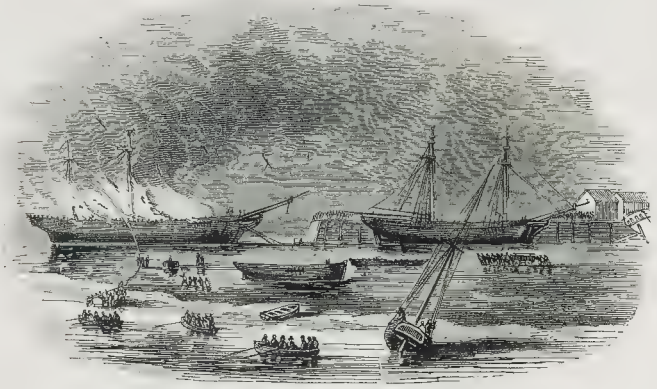
QUEENSBERRY-SERIES, Elizabeth, and Jane Hayward, three sisters, of repectable appearance were placed in custody, charged with having stolen a quart of table and bread knives, forkes, pocket and tea spoons, the property of Mr. Hague, Esq., the brother of Capt. Hague, a magistrate of the county of Middlesex. It appeared from the evidence adduced, that in consequence of the communication made by a lady, whose house was immediately opposite to the prisoners' residence, Mr. Hague was very desirous that the Mansion-house constable should be sent for, and in consequence of the receipt of this information Mr. Hague was very desirous that the Mansion-house constable should be sent for, and in consequence of the receipt of this information Mr. Hague's son gave directions that a police-constable should be sent to his residence. Mr. Hague's son gave directions that a police-constable should be sent to his residence. Mr. Hague's son gave directions that a police-constable should be sent to his residence.

THE NEW BRITISH MUSEUM.

FAÇADE OF THE BRITISH MUSEUM—FROM SIR R. SMIRKE'S DESIGN.

Considerable misrepresentation having been made as to the façade of the New British Museum, we have taken some pains to obtain for our journal a drawing of the actual design, obligingly furnished from the office of the architect, Sir Robert Smirke. Our readers will now have an opportunity of estimating with precision the actual architectural merits of the design in question; on which there have already appeared some very stringent criticisms. It consists of a central portico and two wings; the general objection is an excess of columns, and bareness of entablature. A writer in the "Civil Engineer and Architect's Journal," considers that the central Museum portico "threatens to be considerably inferior to that of the Post-office, and hardly better than that of the College of Physicians." The same critic observes that in the Museum portico—

> An advanced line of columns added to the general colonnade forms an octastyle, which will, doubtless, be crowned by a pediment; thus, besides some variety being imparted to the elevation, there will be some richness and a more than ordinary degree of perspective intricacy will attend the inner range of columns seen behind those in front, of which disposition of them we have as yet no example in any of our London porticos. Still it may be questioned if such arrangement of the columns is the very best suited for the occasion, because there is hardly sufficient space for so many columns in that direction within the portico, the latter being rendered thereby nearly as shallow as far as actual serviceableness is concerned, as the other colonnades. There will be no amplitude of space any where, the entire plan of the portico being subdivided into so many lesser squares of uniform size; whereas, had the hinder part of the portico been made to recede within the building—either wholly or to the extent of the three or the five centre inter-columns—then the effect of passing through two outer rows of columns would have been more striking;—there would have been sufficient space within, and also far greater variety in the general composition. As it is, we suspect that, however good it may be in itself, such display of columniation will be upon the whole rather prejudicial than otherwise, inasmuch as all the rest is likely to fall very short of the architectural pretensions made in regard to columns. The omission of the four centre columns of the second range might therefore be rather an improvement than the contrary, for at any rate then some space would be gained—perhaps some monotony also avoided, while the two remaining columns would give all the greater expression of solidity to the angles where the octastyle advances before the other colonnades.



THE BARQUE "CAMBRIDGE" ON FIRE

BURNING OF THE BARQUE "CAMBRIDGE," AT PLYMOUTH

We are indebted to a correspondent at Plymouth for the annexed sketches of an awful catastrophe which occurred in that port on the evening of Sunday last—the destruction of the newly-launched barque Cambridge, by fire. The larger engraving represents the vessel on fire, just after she was launched from the patent slip; the other her remains, after the fire was extinguished.

Our correspondent was an eye-witness of the catastrophe, which he thus describes —

The barque Cambridge, Turpin, master, about 300 tons, had been for some time lying on the patent slip in Mr. Gent's shipwright's yard, undergoing repairs in consequence of the damage she sustained by getting on shore in Batten Bay, in the gale of Sunday, the 19th of November last.

Immediately a-head of her lay the American barque Adario, likewise under repair; and alongside was the brig Victoria, laid up for the winter. The fire was discovered in the cabin about nine o'clock, but before any assistance could be rendered, the whole of the cabin was in flames, which continued to increase till half-past one, at which time she was on fire from stem to stern.

About a quarter before eleven she was launched from the slip into the mud. The spectacle at this time was very striking; the whole of the after-part was on fire, and the burning rigging added much to the impressiveness of the scene; the vessel in flames, gliding smoothly and slowly down the patent slip, could not but fill the most thoughtless with awe. Fortunately, the tide was low at the time, or the extent of damage would have been incalculable; for the Pool was full of shipping and fishing craft, which would certainly have ignited had there been water enough to float the burning vessel. Another favourable circumstance was the calmness of the evening, there being little or no wind at the time. About half-past eleven, her foremast was cut away, and fell with a tremendous crash on her larboard bulwarks; shortly after which, three small canisters of gunpowder, which were in the cabin, blew off with a loud report.

At this time the engines were at play upon the burning mass (the men working up to their waists in the water), but the fire had gained such an ascendancy that the efforts of the firemen availed but little, and that only in preserving her bows from the flames.

About half-past twelve her mainmast fell, and shortly after her mizenmast fell over her stern. The whole of the vessel was enveloped in flames, except the stern; and the fire continued to rage furiously till the advancing tide flowed in and extinguished it about six o'clock.

The Cambridge is now a mere shell; her timbers are destroyed, her outer planking is burnt, and her bows only, with the figure-head and bowsprit, are left to mark the remains of this once fine barque.

The cause of the fire is not correctly ascertained; but it is supposed to have proceeded from a burning lamp setting fire to the wood-work.

THE "CAMBRIDGE," AFTER THE FIRE.

AALBORG, Dec. 28.—A mahogany travelling-case, marked "W O" on the top, and containing papers belonging to William Alcaer, master of the ship Tempest; a boat, marked outside, "Tempest, Sunderland," and inside "William Almer;" and a case, marked "I R 26," containing snuff-boxes, have washed on shore near Ruren. A cask of linseed oil, marked on one end, "K & C (under a triangle), No. 27," has been picked up at sea, and landed at Farroe

AMSTERDAM, Jan. 4.—The Uranie, Vander Drift, lying at Sourabaya, taking in cargo for Amsterdam, sprung a leak at her stern, and must re-land her cargo to be surveyed.

WICK, ON FORR ISLAND, Dec. 29.—The wreck of a vessel, sunk in five fathoms, was discovered yesterday on the seaward side of the Island of Syit, name and nation unknown. The body of a man washed on shore near there, on whom ten sovereigns and seven pieces of other English coin were found.

PORT TALBOT, Jan. 5.—A clinker-built boat, 19 feet long, black outside, inside black and red, came on shore yesterday morning.

BORNHOLM, Dec. —.—The Jacht, — Grondahl, of Nexal, from Copenhagen was stranded on Holdeode'e Rup, on the 15th instant: crew saved.

CAHORE, Jan. 5.—The Minerva, of Kincardine, struck on Blackwater Bar, became unmanageable, and drove on shore at Cahore Point: crew saved. Mem.—The Minerva is supposed to be from the Clyde to Bombay.

The Sir William Wallace steamer, which left Boulogne on Thursday morning last for Folkestone, broke down and drifted into the Downs. The Duke of Wellington steam packet, coming to Dover, took some of her passengers. The others were brought into Dover by her Majesty's packet Princess Alice, Capt. Smithett, who fell in with the Sir William Wallace off the Goodwin Sands. Considerable dissatisfaction has been expressed with regard to the conduct of the captain belonging to the City of Boulogne, who refused to take the distressed vessel in tow until he had landed his own passengers, which left them in an unmanageable state, at the mercy of the elements, for several hours.

COPENHAGEN, Dec. 30.—The Bess, of Dundee, Anderson, was fallen in with in a sinking state, and abandoned by the crew, in lat. 56.N. long. 3. E. by the Oline Cecilie, Arndt, arrived here. The Aurora, Deek, from Nyksted to London, has put back here, with damage to hull and cargo, and must repair.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD IRELAND.

THE ROUND TOWER OF CLONDALKIN, NEAR DUBLIN.

On Lough Neagh's banks as the fisherman strays,
When the clear cold eve's declining,
He sees the ROUND TOWERS of other days
In the wave beneath him shining!

MOORE.

The Round Towers of Ireland (we mean the column towers) have long puzzled the most sagacious antiquarians. O'Brien, in a work of the most extraordinary learning, has clearly proved their origin and religious use—that they were oriental importations, and symbols of that worship which prevailed in the "Province of the Sun," Iran, whose daughter, like another "imago vocis," was Erin. We have not at present space to quote from the work just alluded to, but will gladly make it the subject of a future notice.

ROUND TOWER OF CLONDALKIN.

The Round Tower, or rather pillar, of Clondalkin, stands in a little village in the vicinity of Dublin, and was formerly almost surrounded by the premises of Powder-mills, which, a few years since, blew up, and left nothing standing in their neighbourhood but the Round Tower

"Alone in its glory!"

JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.

MR. JOSEPH RICHARDSON.

Richardson is prima flauto to all the world, and may thank his stars that he was not born in the time of the Mythology, for he might have been flead alive instead of Marsyas, having more power to contend with Apollo, and therefore more likely to be his competitor. We have heard all the great flautists of the last twenty years, but never heard "Il Flauto Magico," before "we listened enchanted" to the breathings of Richardson, who possesses every quality necessary to fill up perfection. Taste—tone—fluency of execution, accompanied by that sympathy with the delicacies of his art, which shows that he does not think it to be a mechanical one, all elevate him to the highest degree of Artisteship (licet facere verba) and make us feel proud that an English Academy of Music can vie with any continental one, in the production of great and original genius.

Joseph Richardson was born at Leeds in the year 1816, and was sent to the Royal Academy of Music by the late Lord Milton and the Earl of Liverpool about the year 1833. He is an Associate of the Royal Academy of Music, a member of the Amœbœntic Society, Dublin, also of the British and Foreign Institute, and, in fact, is or ought to be, free of every other musical society in the world.

SINGULAR ANECDOTE OF PAGANINI.—The Milan paper of 1805 contained the following curious anecdote of the Gran Maestro above named, which was afterwards republished by Mr. Gardiner, of Leicester, in his pleasant book called "Music and Friends," from which we extract it. Paganini kept a little shop as a violin-maker in one of the narrow streets of Milan. He was considered very handsome, and the Italian maidens often used to pass down the street to steal a glance at the young fiddle-maker. One day a gentleman called with a violin to be repaired, and accidentally left a book behind him on the transmutation of souls, a subject of all others that interested Paganini. He read it with avidity. In a small room at the back of his shop, lay, on her death-bed, his aged mother. Paganini had just finished a fine violin, and in the full persuasion of the truth of the doctrine contained in the work he had read, he placed a leathern tube over the mouth of his mother at the instant of her death, and received her last breath at the S holes of the violin—and this was the magical instrument with which he set out on his travels, and played upon all over Europe, until later in his career, when he usually performed on a magnificent Cremona.

MASTER THIRLWALL.

We are not over fond of being present at exhibitions of precocious talent; but there is such a wide difference between it and genius, that our feelings are quite in the contrary current when this latter appears, and we do not care where or how soon it developes itself. Mozart was a prodigy even in his third year, and we have now the pleasure—the national delight—of recording the existence of another, Young Thirlwall, who from his earliest infancy evinced the highest perception for music.

William Thirlwall was born in Nottingham in 1833. We can furnish some interesting facts relative to him.

In music, the minor mode from the ancients downwards, has been allowed to possess a greater influence over our sympathies than the major. We cannot here enter into a physiological enquiry of why it should be so, but so it is. When the Young Thirlwall was but a year old, on hearing his father play (and beautifully too), an air in the minor key, such as the second part of Auld Robin Gray (that falsely supposed Scotch tune) the baby would invariably weep. About this time he could sing "Fidelio," a melody of Mozart's, with the exception of the concluding notes, which were below his compass: his attempts to produce these notes occasioned much mirth, but he went on absorbed in his efforts with the utmost gravity, paying no attention to the laughter he created.

When four years or age he was taken to make choice of a toy, and he chose a sixpenny violin: when he got home he scraped on his miserable instrument until he was summoned to bed. The next morning he told his father that his fiddle was "too little to make tunes!" In a short time he was supplied with a real violin—his father undertook the task of instructing him, and his progress was extraordinary. When eight years of age, he played a solo at the Yorkshire Amateur Musical Festival with immense éclat, and shortly afterwards he played at a soirée where both Thalberg and Rubini were present, and who pronounced his performance to be most extraordinary. His execution of Paganini's "Carnival de Venise," at Covent Garden, Vogler's "Air Varié," and some other pieces, the composition of his father, have excited universal wonder and delight.

Mr. Thirlwall, the father of this truly clever boy, is a man of no ordinary genius himself. Independent of his being the sole instructor of his son, which argues "a foregone conclusion" of his own proficiency in the art and practice of music, he has courted, and not in vain, her sister poesy, who has bestowed some of her sweetest favours upon him; and although little known beyond the immediate sphere of his intimate acquaintance, can boast of having written some ballads in the choice vein of "venerable vernacular," or "English undefiled," which is more than can be said of a score of our Cockney jinglers He is an excellent violinist, but he can write a song as well as he can play a solo, or depute his son to do it for him.

The portraits of Master Thirlwall and of M. Baumann, are copied from photographic plates, taken by Beard's improved process, at his institution, King William-street; the portrait of Mr. Richardson is copied from an oil painting, but is, in our opinion, by no means so good as the other two.

PORTRAIT OF MASTER THIRLWALL.

MR. F. BAUMANN.

This distinguished artiste is a native of Ostend, and received his education in the Conservatoire de Paris. Belgium has been most prolific in the production of musical genius; not to mention the bygone worthies who were renowned in their day, and whose memory is yet "green in our souls," we have but to mention the names of De Beriot—Vieuxtemps—Berlioz, and a host of others of the present time, including last, though not least, the talented subject of the present notice Mr. F. Baumann, first fagotto, not only to the first orchestras in this country, but premier bassoon wherever he is present in any other of Europe. He possesses the happy power of pleasing everybody who has a soul for music—auloeti doctique are equally delighted by his exquisite performance, for unlike Ismenias of old, he has not been taught to despise public opinion, but contrives to infuse a magic into his performance which alike captivates all degrees of listeners. If he do not possess the full round tone of other performers on his delicious instrument, he has a greater power of delicate inflection, and a breathingness of sound that might "create a soul under the ribs of death!" His style is purity itself, and his facility of execution most marvellous. In countenance, M. Baumann bears a remarkable resemblance to Napoleon, and also something to what we recollect of the great tenor Donzelli. In manners he is as gentle and amabile as his own beautful style of performance.—A correspondent has favoured us with the following:—

ACROSTICAL IMPROMPTU.

B rightest amidst a galaxy of sounds
A ri sing great power of the "steady" Quire;
U nmatch'd in "Tone" (whose sweetness hath no bounds)
M atchless in Volume,—Pathos, and in Fire.
A las! when thou, "Time's" fearful "Pause" shall gain,—
N ature, Life's "Chord" no longer can "sustain,"—
"N e'er shall we look upon thy like again." T. W.

MADAME DULCKEN, the accomplished pianiste, gives a second series of three Soirees Musicales at her residence, 80, Harley-street, where she will be assisted by some of our first-rate artists, vocal and instrumental. We know of no performer, male or female, who so perfectly enters into the spirit of the works of Beethoven, Weber, &c., as this lady. To understand these masters is much, but to be able to render them in all the wonderful variety of their imaginings, is a gift possessed by but few.

Mr. Braham and his two sons sung at the concert at Brighton, on Wednesday evening, and attracted a numerous audience. Mr. Braham was encored in two of his songs, viz., "When the Trump of Fame," and "The Bay of Biscay;" and the duet of "Gallop on Gaily," sung by himself and his son Charles, was also encored. Mr. Hamilton Braham was quite new to a Brighton audience. He was much applauded in Bellini's "Sun of Freedom" and "The Wanderer" of Schubert, which he gave with powerful expression. We were also much gratified with the singing of Miss Alleyne, who was encored in 'Ah, bid my faithful Ariel fly." This lady is a pupil of Mr. T. Cooke, and she appears to possess all the requisites for a good concert singer

A YOUNG ORGANIST.—At Eldad Chapel, Stonehouse, on Sunday morning, the Rev. John Hawker arrested the attention of his congregation by announcing that his organist and choir had, on the previous evening, unexpectedly informed him that they would attend no more. As his advanced age, he added, the rest usually afforded by psalmody was needed, and therefore, if his congregation would sing, the child (though only nine years old) should attempt to lead on the organ. The child immediately engaged in the service, and gave every satisfaction.

PRINCESS' THEATRE.

That horrible story of Lucrezia Borgia, which only Donizetti's music could render tolerable, has been "done into English" at this house, and got up in a most creditable style. Madme. Eugenia Garcia is extremely energetic as the guilty heroine, and Allen sings most exquisitely, particularly in the serenade. The libretto of the Italian stage has not been rigidly adhered to, and perhaps the scene of our illustration is better in the version than in the original. The management deserves the highest praise for the manner in which the piece has been produced.

SCENE FROM THE OPERA OF "LUCREZIA BORGIA," AT THE PRINCESS' THEATRE.

WHOLESALE PANTOMIME INVENTING!—Talk of Lopez de Vega or the author of "The Arabian Nights," only think of the fecundity of Mr. Nelson Lee's brain, to have imagined and bodied forth the following numerous and different Pantomimes, ALL FOR THIS ONE SEASON:—Adelphi (in conjunction with Mr. E. Stirling), "Blue Beard, or The Fairy of the Silver Crescent."—Surrey, "Lindley Murray, or Harlequin Grammar and A, E, I, O, U."—Pavilion, "The Whitechapel Needle, or Harlequin and the Pretty Little Dickey Bird."—Queen's Theatre, "Pat-a-cake, Pat-a-cake, Baker's Man, or Harlequin Sugar Plum."—Olympic, "Jack the Giant Killer."—Astley's Amphitheatre, "Tam O'Shanter, or Harlequin and The Witches of Alloway Kirk."—Theatre Royal Dublin, "Baron Munchausen."—Theatre Royal Edinburgh, "Baron Munchausen."—Theatre Royal Liverpool, "Davy Jones, or Harlequin and the Sea Chest."—Theatre Royal Manchester, "Blue Beard, or Harlequin Curiosity."—Theatre Royal Brighton, "Charlie over the Water."—Cum multis aliis, Mr. Lee may be truly styled, the Genius of Pantomime!

MISS BIRCH.—It is highly gratifying to learn that this amiable lady and most distinguished vocalist is careering it gloriously in Germany. How delightful to find that the severest musical critics of the Continent receive with liberality, and even enthusiasm, that merit which was almost "damn'd with faint praise" in its native land!

KING'S COLLEGE.—Mr. John Hullah has been elected Professor of Music to this establishment. We hope that some "tempo rubato" may be stolen from the consideration of Latin inflections and Greek adrists, and that under this able professor's surveillance the Lockers-on will be gratified and improved in an art that has not any humbug about it, when either allowed to speak for itself, or is rightly interpreted, but which day by day is mystified and obscured by would be illustrators.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Si nunc te nobis ille aurens arbore nemus
Ostendat mentem in tanto. VIRGIL.

Oh! in this ample grove could I behold
The tree that blooms with vegetable gold.

People either become, or pledge themselves to themselves or to their friends that they will become, more sedate, cautious, and proper what time the New Year comes round to remind them in the most emphatic of whispers including to the stage on which they "strut and fret" (more's the pity), that life is like a pantomime, full of the grave and the grotesque, "and all the men and women merely players." For this cause, partly, and also that there may be a method in our mystery, we commence the season's labours with the first in the order of our catalogue raisonnée of those pleasant items, which, during its course, it will be our duty to offer to the reader's notice. First among the national pastimes of the English stands the turf—a sport infinitely the most popular, and for that especial reason one whose indulgence calls for the greater share of care and caution. It is scarce a poetic figure to describe it as a field sport, which "blooms with gold:" its fruits, too, are of the same material, but they bear no proportion to the blossoms. The course of the sport in its season is noble, most pleasant to the eye, and rife with promise; "but then there comes a blight." How may this be avoided? who shall guide us through that grove of palpable obscure?

Whose magic pen direct us to behold
The tree that bears the vegetable gold?

"Not the journalist," snarls the critic; "not the poor devils, who, like the donkey in the 'Sentimental Journey,' has not a friend in the world will give him a macaroon." Now this may not be true; your beacon serves a double purpose; and while, like the signal light, he warns others to avoid the shoals and quicksands of the turf, may not the poor journalist also serve as the pilot of the tide that leads to fortune, on which he is himself forbidden to float for the want of a cock-boat to swim in? By and by we shall come to "pastures new," which already have begun to put on goodly verdure. The recent entries for the stakes, whose nominations closed in London and York on the first day of the present month, were most gratifying evidences of the progress of the taste for racing. New matches, on account have lately been added to the old list of its staunch patrons; the campaign will be an early and an imposing one, and the fields encumbered with fewer mercenaries than on any former encounter. Thus their sport frests show, and with the order of battle, so far as we may judge from the positions occupied by the forces in their winter quarters, we proceed to deal.

Since the close of the last season nothing has been done in the market except upon the next ensuing Derby—because the Manchester inquiries about the Chester Cup can hardly be quoted as substantive speculation. For the great Southern race a very large field of horses has been "declared over," as the phrase goes, and although we do not say to the courteous reader "together let us range this field" in search after vegetable gold -we may not find it impossible to look over the hedge. The Ugly Buck, backed at 7 to 1, is an animal with crooked fore legs that can never be made intelligent enough -take—the Molecomb—at Goodwood: he was afraid to meet Rattan for the Criterion, for which reason he is the best fancied for the Derby! Another Coldrenick? Loadstone is a rattling third favourite -he has no engagement this year save for the Great Yorkshire Stakes in the autumn, so that where he is there is no reason he shouldn't stay. But he went—that is to say, he went be third favourite much longer. Fourth, at 25 to 1, is Cockamamy, the property of Scott's lot, and a rising fancy, probably destined to be the "card" of the stable. At 25 to 1 is Orlando, in all likelihood fated to see half that figure. These two are the buds most promising of golden fruit that the season has opened out. As a principle, the south-country horses should be backed in preference to the northerners they were the best last year in the field, and will be the best this year in the market. Running Rein—one of the improving division—should be backed with much assiduity from now to the week we shall have keep the reader an courant to the leading tactics at Tattersall's. The following is the quotation at which business may be averaged in London:—

LATEST BETTING.

11 to 2 agst Scott's lot; 12 to 1 Col. Peel's lot; 20 to 1 Lord Exeter's lot; 7 to 1 The Ugly Buck; 15 to 2 Rattan; 17 to 1 Loadstone; 20 to 1 Cockamamy; 25 taken); 25 to 1 Orlando; 25 to 1 Running Rein; 1000 to 30 Leander; 40 to 1 T'Auld Squire; 25 to 1 Voltri; 35 to 1 Campanero; 40 to 1 Saddle Bow; and the rest of the few outsiders backed at last year's prices.

THE NEW NAVAL REGULATIONS, which have at length been published, make the following alterations:—Captains: The pay of captains serving afloat formerly was according to six grades. By the new regulations these have been reduced to four grades: the pay of the largest rate being less and the lowest more, viz., Captains, commanding first-rates (not being flag ships), formerly received £61 7s. 4d. per mensem; the new rate of £60 per mensem, being the highest pay now given. Captains commanding sixth-rates formerly received £26 17s per mensem; they are now to receive £30 13s. 8d., the lowest class of pay to captains serving afloat: All officers are now to serve afloat as appointed by commission, including masters, surgeons, pursers, mates, and assistant masters. Warrant officers: The only warrant officers in the navy will be gunners, boatswains, carpenters, and engineers. Pursers (the appointment of pursers in future to be "pursers and paymasters." First class volunteers: Volunteers of the first class are in future to be known as "naval cadets."

THE ROYAL BUCK-HOUNDS.—Her Majesty's stag-hounds had one of the most severe and lengthened runs this season on Monday last, the fixture being at Maidenhead, at which upwards of 200 were present. The little deer Sweep was uncarted at Maidenhead Thicket, and he was taken within a mile of Stokenchurch, in Oxfordshire, after a three hours' run, over upwards of thirty miles of a hilly and extremely heavy line of country. The deer swam across the Thames, nearly opposite to Henley, and, upon the hounds being laid on, upon the opposite shore, the pace up to the finish was tremendous. Only twelve out of the numerous field at the meet were up at the take, including Mr. Davis (the huntsman, who had two fresh horses during the run), and a sprinkling of the right sort, who were well mounted. The field was pretty well weeded before the deer crossed the water at Henley. The distance from Stokenchurch to the kennel (where the hounds arrived the same evening) is twenty and forty miles.

GREAT FOOT RACE OF 100 YARDS.—The long-talked-of running match between John Smith and Willox, a first-rate pedestrian, from Newcastle-upon-Tyne, came off, on Tuesday, near the Bull Head, Whanstone, about a mile and a half this side of Barnet. The race was for £50 a side, the distance 100 yards, and Willox the favourite. So sanguine, indeed, were the friends of the latter that 4 and 6 to 4 were freely offered on Willox, which were increased to 2 to 1, and in one instance to 2 to 1, as the time for the race approached. The start was deferred until nearly five o'clock, when a gallant race took place. Smith dashed off on the signal being given, and a yard advantage he gained at the start his opponent tried his utmost, but ineffectually, to overtake him. Smith retained the lead at the most extraordinary speed, and won by three yards. There was a very large assemblage of sporting gentlemen on the ground, and, as betting was brisk, a very considerable sum must have changed owners.

NOVEL DEER-HUNTING.—The inhabitants of Woolwich were surprised, between two and three o'clock on Saturday afternoon last, to witness a fine full-grown deer run down the New-road, and along Thomas-street and Wellington-street, into Lower Market-street, and shortly afterwards followed by a field of sportsmen, with a pack of hounds in full cry. The deer took refuge in a timber-yard, in Lower Market-street, where it was secured, and taken to the Earl of Chatham public-house, until a cart was procured to take it home. The run after this fine animal must have afforded excellent sport. It was started at Lord's Bottom, near Tunbridge Wells, by the subscription pack hunting in that quarter.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE, Friday.—A very scanty supply of English wheat has been received up to our market since Monday, consequently the quantity to-day exhibited has a limited appearance, fully the late advance in prices. Foreign wheat was scarcely to be had, and prices fully the late advance in prices. Foreign wheat was scarcely to be had, and prices were steadily supported. The supplies of barley being large, the demand for all except the finest malting parcels was heavy at late currencies. Malt comes sparingly to hand, but in the present state of the barley trade, we can notice no advance in the quotations. The supply of oats being large, the inquiry for that article, as well as beans, peas, and flour, was inactive at barely yesterday's prices.

ARRIVALS.—English: Wheat, 4110; barley, 3140; oats, 1000 quarters. Irish: Barley, 1270. Oats, 28,980 quarters. Foreign: Wheat, 1230; Barley, 1000 quarters. Flour, 3626 sacks. Malt, 1980 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 50s to 56s; ditto white, 52s to 62s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 48s to 55s; ditto white, 54s to 58s; grinding barley, 25s to 28s; distilling ditto, 30s to 34s; malting ditto, 35s to 36s. Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 50s to 62s; brown ditto, 46s to 48s, Kingston and Ware, 60s to 65s. Clevedon, 63s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 21s to 23s, potatoe ditto, 22s to 25s; Youghal and Cork, black, 18s to 19s, ditto white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 30s to 34s; ditto, old, 34s to 36s; grey peas, 34s to 36s; maple, 35s to 37s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 38s to 40s; Essex and Kent malt, 46s to 50s; Suffolk, — to 46s, Stockton and Yorkshire, 28s to 40s, per 28 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 48s to 50s; barley, 24s to 28s; grinding barley, 23s to 25s; distilling ditto, 26s to 34s; malting ditto, 33s to 36s. Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 46s to 62s; brown ditto, 44s to 48s, Kingston and Ware, 60s to 65s. Clevedon, 63s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 21s to 23s, potatoe ditto, — to —; Youghal and Cork, black, 18s to 19s, ditto white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 30s to 34s; ditto, old, 34s to 36s; grey peas, 34s to 36s; maple, 35s to 37s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 38s to 40s; Essex and Kent malt, 46s to 50s; Suffolk, — to 46s, Stockton and Yorkshire, 28s to 40s, per 28 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 48s to 50s; barley, 24s to 28s; grinding barley, 23s to 25s; distilling ditto, 26s to 34s; malting ditto, 33s to 36s. In Bond.—Barley, 19s to 20s; oats, new, 12s to 16s, ditto feed, 11s to 15s; beans, 1os to 16s, peas, 23s to 26s, per quarter. Flour, America, 21s to 25s; Baltic, 21s to 23s, per barrel.

Per Sack. Market.—We have rather an extensive supply of foreign clover-seed on offer, yet prices are not depressed. In canary-seed very little is doing, and the same observation may be applied to most other kinds of seeds.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, 50s to 60s; Baltic crushing, 39s to 37 Mediterranean and Odessa, 32s to 33s. hempseed, 32s to 35s per quarter. coriander, 18s to 22s per cwt., brown mustard seed, 12s to 18s, white ditto, 16s to 20s. carraway-seed, 44 to 46 per bushel; English rapeseed, new, £23 to £26 per last of ten quarters. tared-seed cakes, English, £6 to £6 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, £5 5s to £5 10s per ton; canary, 38s to 40s per quarter.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 8d to 8d; of household ditto, 6d to 7½d per 4lb loaf.

Average Prices.—Wheat 49s 9d barley, 19s 7d. oats, 18s 2d rye 30s 8d. beans 28s 6d. peas, 30s 7d.

Imperial Averages of the Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 58s 6d; barley, 32s 1d; oats, 18s 7d; rye 30s 6d, beans 30s 11d; Peas 32s.

Duties.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 6s., oats, 3s., rye, 10s 6d; peas 10s 6d.

Tea.—Since our last report, a fresh demand for all kinds of tea has arisen, and a very active business has been done at rather improved rates. For pekoes competition, on Thursday next, 43,000 packages are declared, and for which higher rates are expected to be realized.

Sugar.—For all descriptions of sugar an improved demand has sprung up, and, in some instances, an advance of from 6d to 1s per cwt. has been realised for fine colony samples of West India and Mauritius. Nearly 5,000 bbls. and chests of West India, have found buyers.

Coffee.—This market is very firm; and prices have advanced fully 1s to 3s per cwt. for West India and Ceylon.

Cocoa.—There is very little doing in cocoa, and the rates have declined fully 2s per cwt.

Rice.—We have had but a limited demand for this article, the value of which remains unaltered.

Fruit.—As is usually the case at this season, the sale of fruit is slow, and prices have a downward tendency.

Oils.—Linseed oils in steady request at 32s per cwt. for foreign; but otherwise, the demand is inactive.

Tallow.—The value of the best P. Y. C. on the spot is 41s 3d to 41s 6d., of town tallow, 42s per cwt., delivered. Rates are expected to rule lower, owing to the large supply of tallow of home-make.

Coals.—Chester, 15s; West Hartley, 15s 6d.; Hotspur, 17s 6d.; Hetton, 17s 6d., Braddyll's Hetton, 20s. 3d; Hetton, 20s 3d.; Lambton, 20s 3d; Stewart's, 20s 3d., Kilo, 20s per ton.

Hops.—The supply of hops is daily becoming less, hence the demand continues to rule active, and an advance of from 1s to 2s per cwt. has taken place in the week in the quotations of Weald of Kent and Sussex hops in pockets. The prices of all other kinds of hops are firm supported.—Weald of Kent pockets, 60s 7s to 85 14s.; Mid Kent, 80 10s to 90s; East Kent, 85 15s to 95 5s; ditto Choice, £10 10 £11 10s; Sussex, £5 5 to £6 10s; Farnham, £8 15s to £11 15s., Mid Kent bags, £6 10s to £8 10.

Wool.—Fine qualities are in request at full prices; but, otherwise, the demand is inactive.

Potatoes. Nearly 8000 tons of potatoes have arrived at the eastern side this week. Fine qualities are selling steadily at full prices; but all other kinds move off slowly at 40s to 60s per ton.

Smithfield.—Our market-to-day exhibited a very scanty supply of beasts, yet it was fully adequate to meet the wants of the buyers. The fine prime lots, &c., on offer sold steadily at fully Monday's quotations; but otherwise the finest trade was very heavy. In consequence of very large arrivals of sheep, the mutton trade was dull, at unaltered rates. There was only a small supply of calves on sale. Prime qualities of veal sold freely; other kinds slowly at almost last week's prices. In pigs, for scarcely anything business was transacted, at previous rates. Milch cows sold at from £16 to £19 each.

Per 8lbs to sink the offal—Inferior beasts, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; middling, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; prime large oxen, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; prime Scots, &c., 4s to 4s 2d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; second quality ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 10d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 4s 0d to 4s 2d; prime Southdowns ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; large coarse calves, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; prime small ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 6d; large hogs, 3s 6d to 4s 0d; small porkers, 4s 2d to 4s 6d; suckling calves, 18s to 24s each; quarter old store pigs, 15s to —; beasts, 440; cows, 130; sheep and lambs, 6,000; calves, 120; pigs, 270.

Per 8lbs by the carcass—Beef, 2s 8d to 3s 8d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 4d; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 4d; pork, 3s 4d to 4s 4d.

Hay Market.—Owing to the Christmas holidays, the supply of hay has been very limited during the past week, and the demand has been extensive, the general demand was heavy, on the following terms:—Inferior beef, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; prime ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; coarse and ordinary sheep, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; prime ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; inferior mutton, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; middling ditto, 3s 10d to 3s 6d; prime ditto, 3s 8d to 4s 2d; veal, 3s 6d to 4s 4d; small pork, 3s 4d to 4s 4d; per 8lbs, by the carcass.

ROBERT HERBERT.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The operations in the money market have not this week been quite so brilliant as we observed them to be in our last publication; but still profitable channels for the investment of the large sums of money, at present unemployed, are as difficult to be found as ever, and the annual income to be obtained from loans of it, on fair securities, or in the discount market, is extremely small. Discounts have been unsuccessfully offered at the annual interest of three per cent. on mortgage, not to be withdrawn for twenty years, and it is little wonderful therefore that an augmented demand for British Public Securities continues to be experienced on the Stock Exchange. The flourishing condition of our colonial and foreign commerce must increase the amount of money in this country so long as the balances of our export trade, after paying those of our imports, and as there is scarcely a possibility of any alternation soon occurring to change this favourable state of commerce, the great capitalists and bankers must be satisfied by the receipt of ever-lower rates of interest for their property, into whatever departments of industry they may think proper to embark it, than they at present obtain for it. Hence the Three per Cent Consols have reached 97¾, after the deduction of the dividend due on the beginning of this week, nor did they undergo any reaction in their value beyond ¼ per cent. at the conclusion of the week's transactions. The opinion, therefore, very generally entertained by the financial author of the Chronicle will in the course of the ensuing Session of Parliament have a good opportunity presented to him of reducing the interest on the Funds to a lower rate than at our Christmas Half year Quote to a new Stock bearing a lower rate of annual interest.

In the money market, likewise, the pressure of money in want of profitable employment continues to create a fair demand for the best descriptions of mercantile paper, which has prevented any material reaction from taking place in the high prices obtained for them during the last three months. Bankers are also very desirous to be favourable, and lower the shares most with ready purchasers. Those of the Lancaster and Carlisle line, on which the payments have been all made, are the only ones which have not participated in the general advance. The directors who have the power to invest a part of their money in operations which must give additional employment to the industrious, and which present to them fair prospects of satisfactory profits.

On the Foreign Stock Exchange money continues to be invested in various descriptions of foreign securities, but their prices have undergone no material change since the report of last week occurred in many value. In Spanish bonds speculators find a vent for their gaining proportions, and the prices of the Thirties have been increased from 24¾ to 25, while the Deferred value of them, at the time of our going to press, was 20¾ to 21.

Last post day, on the Royal Exchange, no alteration occurred in the rates of the Foreign exchanges, which, consequently, will not require a further notice of the prices of the precious metals into the United Kingdom.

BANKING HOUSES, Monday, 187 to 190. India Stock, 3 per Cent. Reduced, [illegible] Bonds, 8s premium, Ditto, 1822, 3 per Cent. Consols, 97¾ to ¾. India Bonds, 8s premium, Exchequer Bills, 1000l, 1s to 2s premium, Ditto, 500l, 1s premium, Ditto, small, 1s premium, Bank Stock, 190 to 192, Long Annuities, 15 11-16 to ¾, Ditto, Expire 1860, 15 to 15¼, Ditto, Expire 1885, 14¾ to ¾, Reduced Annuities, 97¾ to ¾, New 3½ per Cents, 97¾ to ¾, Consols for Account, 97¾ to ¾, Long Annuities, 15 11-16 to ¾, Bank Stock, 190 to 192, Exchequer Bills, 1000l, 1s to 2s premium, Ditto, 500l, 1s premium, Ditto, small, 1s premium, India Bonds, 8s premium, India Stock, 187 to 190, Colonial Bank, 3 per Cent. Reduced, 97¾ to ¾, Spanish Threes, 20½ to 21, Ditto Passives, 4¾ to ¾, Portugal, 43 to 43½, Dutch 2½ per Cents, 64¾ to ¾, Dutch Fives, 109¼.

FOREIGN STOCKS AND BONDS.—Spanish Fives — to 21¼; Spanish Threes, 20¾; Passives, 4¾ to ¾; Portugal, 43 to 43½; Dutch 2½ per Cents, 64¾ to ¾; Dutch Fives, 109¼; Belgian, 103½ to ¾; Brazilian, 75 to 76; Buenos Ayres, 36 to 37; Chilian, 100 to 101; Columbian, 16 to 16½; Danish Bonds, 86 to 87; Mexican, 20½ to 21; Peruvian, 25 to 25½; Russian, 105 to 106; Spanish Deferred, 19¾ to 20; Ditto Certificates, 8¾ to ¾; Venezuela, 14 to 14½; Russian Bonds, 1½ to 1¾; Danish Bonds, 86 to 87; Neapolitan, 103; Chilian, 100 to 101; Columbian, 16 to 16½; Mexican, 20½ to 21; Peruvian, 25 to 25½; Buenos Ayres, 36 to 37; Portugal, 43 to 43½; Belgian, 103½ to ¾; Brazilian, 75 to 76; Austrian Bonds, 1¼ to 1½; Russian Bonds, 1¾ to 1¾; Span

MILLIONS
PREPARE FOR THE DEATH WARRANT.
"Shrieks and sighs unlimit."—Milton.
To be had of every Bookseller in Town and Country. Price Three Halfpence.

Just Published, 8vo., cloth, 6s.

ON the NATURE and TREATMENT of TIC DOULOUREUX, SCIATICA, and other NEURALGIC DISORDERS. By CHARLES HUNT M.D., Member of the Royal College of Physicians London; Physician to the Royal Metropolitan Hospital for Children, &c. &c.—London: John Churchill, Princes street, Soho

Price Six Shillings.
SEARLE'S TREATISE on AFFECTIONS of the STOMACH and BRAIN; showing that Indigestion and Impairment of the Constitution arise from improper regimen; and that Nervousness, Morbid Sensation of the Brain, Epilepsy, Paralysis, Apoplexy, and Insanity, originate in an impaired state of the bowels, and not in determination of blood to the head.—R. and J. TAYLOR, Red Lion court, Fleet-street.

In 1 vol. 8vo., with Map, Chart, and Plan, price 10s. 6d., cloth,
IRELAND BEFORE AND AFTER THE UNION.
Being a complete Exposition and Refutation of the Calumnies against England, and a Development—Political, Ecclesiastical, and Statistical—of the Past and Present State of Ireland. By R. MONTGOMERY MARTIN Author of the History of the British Colonies, &c.
London: Wm. S. Orr & Co., Paternoster-row; and J. Heywood, Piccadilly

BERKSHIRE.—SNARE'S BERKSHIRE DIRECTORY for 1844, contains Alphabetical Classified Lists of Persons and Professions in the Towns of Reading, Abingdon, Newbury, Maidenhead, Windsor, Eton, Slough, Hungerford, Wantage, and Wokingham, with lists of Residents, an Almanac for 1844, and an interesting account of John Belgrave, the great Actress Price 2s. 6d., elegantly bound in cloth.
Reading: Printed and Published by JOHN SNARE, 16, Minster street.

THE Second Number of the Enlarged Series of the MEDICAL TIMES is Now Ready, price Fivepence, containing Lectures by G. J. Guthrie, Esq., F.R.S.; MM Dauger and Flandin, Dr. De Besancon, Dr. Stewart, J. Bland, Esq. Mr. Williams, &c. &c., with about 50 other articles, of extreme value and interest to the Medical and Scientific Reader Price, Stamped, 6d.; or, by Post-office Order, in advance, 4s. 1s. per Annum.
J. A. GARRARD, 49, Essex s reet, Strand

CHAMBERS' EDINBURGH JOURNAL—New Series.
CHAMBERS' JOURNAL
To be continued Weekly. Each number containing sixteen pages of Amusing Information, in the form of Moral and Familiar Essays, Notices of Inventions and Discoveries, Sketches of Remarkable Persons and Places, Anecdotes, Tales illustrative of Interesting or Instructive kind.  The First Series, complete in 12 vols., will continue on sale, either in Numbers, price 2d. 3d., cloth, lettered, or Separate Volumes, at various prices.—Parts, as heretofore.—London: Wm. S Orr and Co., and Sold by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

THE CHURCH (SIXPENNY) MAGAZINE, a Monthly Remembrancer and Advocate for British Churchmen, with Ecclesiastical Illustrations. Vol. V., for 1843, may now be had, price 7s. 6d., and Cases for binding, price 1s. The principles of the present Conductors are fully developed in the pages of now nearly two years, We belong to no party but the Church, and to no party in the Church; and we trust we shall sympathize with those who would either unprotestantize or puritanize it. Attached to the Church to be Scripturally Evangelical, faithfully Protestant, and happy reformed: and so print we our Work. We must in turn, doctrine, and worship as now established Such are the Evangelical High-Church principles of our little Family Magazine. Published by G. REID, 183, Fleet-street, and may be procured through any bookseller.

MONTHLY BELLE ASSEMBLEE, a Fashionable and Literary Magazine, under the immediate Patronage of her Royal Highness the DUCHESS OF KENT, is beautifully illustrated with 8 gaily coloured PORTRAITS of the NOBILITY, and contains TWO COLOURED PLATES of the FASHIONS, finished in the first style, as they come from Paris.
"This magazine should find its way into every drawing room in the kingdom"—The Queen. "In every respect well worthy the distinguished patronage conferred on the work."—Exeter Gazette. "A great acquisition to the fashionable world."—Reading Mercury. "The elegant and amusing periodical deserves well the patronage of the fashionable Newcastle Courant
May be had by order, of all booksellers. Office, 24, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY OLIVER AND BOYD, EDINBURGH.
VOYAGES ROUND THE WORLD, from the Death of Captain Cook to the Present Time. 8vo. 8s.
ELEMENTS of UNIVERSAL HISTORY. By H. WHITE, B.A., Trinity College, Cambridge. Third Edition, 8vo. 6d.
3. TRACHAN'S AGRICULTURAL TABLES. 12mo. 3s. 6d.
4. PHAEDRUS LATIN DELECTUS, with a copious Vocabulary. By Geo. Ferguson, A.M., one of the Masters of the Edinburgh Academy. 12mo. 2s.
5. FERGUSON'S SELECTA e POETIS LATINIS ordine TEMPORUM DISPOSITA. 12mo. New Edition, revised. Price 4s.
For the Use of the Edinburgh Academy. 12mo. 2s. Pierce, London, Martial, Juvenal.
7. FERGUSONIS OPERA SELECTA. For the Use of the Edinburgh Academy. 2nd Edition, carefully revised 4s. 6d.
8. WATSONIANA CYCLOPÆDIA of COMMERCE. 8vo., 1s.
9. NICOLL'S INTRODUCTORY BOOK of the SCIENCES 18mo. 1s. 6d. Just ready
Sold also by SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, and C., London.

BY COMMAND.
UNDER THE SPECIAL PATRONAGE OF H. R. H. PRINCE ALBERT.
THE SPORTING REVIEW, for JANUARY, 1844, is beautifully embellished with Two SPLENDID STEEL ENGRAVINGS, viz.—
FRAME 1 "GONE AWAY," engraved by S. Allen, from a Painting by H. Alken; FRAME 2 "THE COVERT SIDE," drawn and engraved by J. Beckwith; And VIGNETTE TITLE PAGE.
CONTENTS:—Memoir of Mr. Marston, or Recollections of a Sportsman's Life; by the Editor—chapter XXXVI. Notitia Venatica; by R. T. Vyner, Esq. Reminiscences of Sport; by an Indian Officer. Sporting Mentor, by Major Calder Campbell Sporting Peregrinations; by Nimrod. Sportsman, on the Turf and in the Field. Sporting Anecdotes. Lord Wilton Lennox. On Training the Race horse, by Cotherstone. The Past Racing Season. The Coursing Season. Song, by Noel Mahaut. Sporting Intelligence. Sporting Memoranda. Literature and the Fine Arts. Public Amusements. Sporting Correspondence. Notes of the Chase, &c. &c. Published by Overton, Stockton, Harper, Radcliffe Bridge, Warwick, Cheadale, Morpeth, Rochester and Chatham-row, Carlisle. Copyright Secured by Entry at Stationers' Hall. Sold by all Booksellers, London Sporting Review Office, 24, Norfolk-street, Strand. May be had of all Booksellers

CHEAP RELIGIOUS AND ENTERTAINING MISCELLANY FOR GENERAL READING.
This day is Published, extra large 8vo., cloth, 4s. 6d., cloth embossed,
THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND MAGAZINE, Vol. XIV with Forty Wood Engravings. Contains Original Contributions by the Right Revs. the Bishops of St. David's, Peterborough, and Newfoundland; the Revs. Messrs. Raikes, H. Woodward, C. Kemeaux, Rowland, J. Marshall, Ayre, Kidd, Bird, Bowen, Jacob, Townsend, &c. &c. Biographies of Brandon, Leighton, Wetton, Sherlock, &c. Descriptive Accounts, with Views of Peterborough Cathedrals, besides a variety of Castles and Abbeys, and the restored Temple Church: Sketches of the Natural History, with Cuts; Months of the Year; Religion in other Lands; Recollections of a Town Pastor; Visits to Remarkable Spots Old Sarum, Winchester, &c.; Sacred and English Ecclesiastical Music; Amusing and Instructive Narratives; Anecdotes; Extracts from Voyages and Travels; Poetry, Choice Read-ings, &c. &c. The Part for July, 1843, is also now published, and forms a convenient opportunity for persons beginning a subscription to the work. Price 4s. per Part. The number of exchanges is intended still further.
London: JAMES BURNS, 17, Portman-street, Portman-square; RIVINGTON, St. Paul's Church-yard and Waterloo-place; and HOULSTON and WRIGHT, 65, Paternoster-row.

On Saturday, Jan. 6, 1844,
THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS commenced a SERIES of ROMANCES and DOMESTIC TALES, by writers of the highest literary reputation. Each story will be completed in two successive numbers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, and will contain, in each week's number a space of between two and three columns. The first Story is written by THOMAS MILLER,
Author of "Royston Gower," or Godfrey Malvern," "Old Gideon Giles," "A Day in the Woods," &c., and is entitled
MABEL MARCHMONT,
On January 20 will be commenced a highly interesting Domestic Tale, by MISS CAMILLA TOULMIN, entitled
IMPULSE, NOT PRINCIPLE.
Which will also be published and completed in two numbers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. The Series will be continued by authors of the first celebrity, and will appear in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS alternately with Tales by Original Writers. To add to the attractiveness of this new feature, each tale will be illustrated in the highest possible style, by Messrs. Meadows, Gilbert, &c.
A favourable opportunity for new subscribers commencing is now presented with the first number of the year 1844.
Terms:—Per quarter, 6s. 6d., half-year, 13s.; one year, 26s 6s. Orders received by all Booksellers and Newsvendors, or by letter, addressed to the Publisher, W. LITTLER, 198, Strand, enclosing a money order for the amount. Vol. I., price 21s., Vol. II. and III., price 18s. each, handsomely bound, gilt edges, are now ready.
Office, 198, Strand.
Price 6d. Stamped.
FOR SCHOOLS AND PRIVATE INSTRUCTION.
WHITTAKER'S IMPROVED EDITIONS.
WHITTAKER'S EDITIONS of PINNOCK'S ADAPTATIONS of GOLDSMITH'S HISTORIES, in 12mo.
HISTORY of ENGLAND The 34th edition, with numerous Embellishments, Maps, &c. &c., bound.
HISTORY of ROME The 22nd edition, with numerous Embellishments, Maps, Tables, Exercises, &c. &c. 1s. 6d. bound.
HISTORY of GREECE The 18th edition, with numerous Embellishments, Maps, Tables Exercises, &c. &c. 1s. 6d. bound.
WHITTAKER'S PINNOCK'S CHILD'S FIRST BOOK. 18mo. 3d.
WHITTAKER'S PINNOCK'S CHILD'S SECOND BOOK, or Memorials Primer. 18mo. 6d.
WHITTAKER'S PINNOCK'S FIRST SPELLING BOOK. 18mo 1d.
WHITTAKER'S PINNOCK'S EXPLANATORY ENGLISH SPELLING BOOK. 12mo. 1s 6d. bound.
WHITTAKER'S PINNOCK'S EXERCISES on FALSE SPELLING. 18mo. 1s. 6d.
WHITTAKER'S PINNOCK'S JUVENILE READER, for Children from Four to Seven Years of age. New edition, 12mo. 1s 6d
WHITTAKER'S PINNOCK'S INTRODUCTION to THE EXPLANATORY READER. 12mo. 2s., bound.
WHITTAKER'S PINNOCK'S EXPLANATORY ENGLISH READER, in Prose and Verse, for Pupils above Seven Years of age. 12mo. 3s. 6d.
WHITTAKER'S PINNOCK'S ARITHMETICAL TABLES, 18mo. 6d.
WHITTAKER'S PINNOCK'S CYPHERING BOOKS. 4to. Part I., 1. Parts II. and III., 3s. each. A Key, 3s. 6d.
N.B Care should be taken to order WHITTAKER'S IMPROVED EDITIONS, as, from the universal popularity of this series, unprincipled attempts have been made to substitute works of a somewhat similar appearance. Messrs. WHITTAKER and Co. having laboured at numerous eminent writers, parted of the various books to the very latest state of science and history, now tendered them, by copious additions, as complete as elementary works can be, are determined to pro ect their property, and, at the same time, to prevent the public from being imposed upon by spurious imitations.
WHITTAKER and Co., Ave Maria-lane.

Nos. I. to XIII. (price One Shilling each), to be completed in Twenty Monthly Numbers,
THE LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT,
By CHARLES DICKENS. With Illustrations by H. K. BROWNE
CHAPMAN & HALL, 186, Strand.

THE FARMER'S MAGAZINE
for January is published with Plate I. A HEREFORD BULL, bred by [illegible] Upton-upon-Severn, Worcestershire. Plate II. GARDENER'S DIBBLE, for Corn [illegible]
Contents: [illegible] Farmers possess for wanting the reduced Prices of [illegible] Thirty Years Manure. Agriculture and Chemistry. Notice on the Origin of the Potato, its vegetable and economical Qualities, the Soil, the Manure, and the Culture that suit it best; also the manner of laying the Seed-beds, to renew and improve the Species by Seed; the Gin Amazon. Rent Farmers' Association. To the Landowners and Agricultural Interests of the United Kingdom; by Robt. Baker. On Manures, Experimental Farms, and Agricultural Chemistry; by J. Coombe. London Farmers' Club. Grantham Agricultural Club. Statistical Tables. Agriculture and Manufactures. Farm Leases; by H. H. Loughborough Agricultural Society. Whitfield Example Farm. Royal Agricultural Society of England. General Meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society of England. The Smithfield Christmas Show of Cattle, Implements, &c. Southdown Claremont Agricultural Society of England, in 1843. (From the Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society of England.) On the Economy of Manure. Hints to those contemplating the Formation of Farmers' Clubs. On Draining. Temporary Pasture. Agricultural Queries. Answers to Agricultural Queries. Agricultural Reports. Ca ender of Horticulture for January Returns of the Corn Trade during the month. Prices of Grain, Hops, Seeds, &c.
Office, 34, Norfolk-street, Strand: and may be had of all Booksellers.

F. ARNOLD'S MILLIFLEUR VIOLET, VANILLE, and Hair, in Pots, with handsome Engraving on top. One Shilling each To be had of every Chemist and Perfumer. Wholesale Agents, 13, Curzon-street, May fair.

SIX Pounds of good sound TEA for Eighteen Shillings.—The EAST INDIA TEA COMPANY announce a further reduction of from 6d. to 6d. per lb., and are resolved, while the merchants continue to supply at the present Reduced Prices, that the public shall reap the benefit.—No. 9, Great St. Helen's Churchyard, Bishopsgate.

COUNTRY APARTMENTS.—A MARRIED LADY and GENTLEMAN whose children are at school, wish to meet with FURNISHED APARTMENTS in the family of a respectable Farmer They would not object to join the table if agreeable. Preference would be given to a good fishing neighbourhood. Terms must be moderate—Address (post paid) E Y X., Post-office, Dartmouth, Devon.

STOOPING of the SHOULDERS and CONTRACTION of the CHEST, are entirely prevented and removed by the occasional use of the patent St. James's Chest Expander, which is a simple, cheap, easily employed outwardly or invisible instrument for constraint or impediment to the exercise Sold by Messrs. Prosser, 287, Strand London, or full particulars on receipt of a postage stamp.

BALSAM of CAPIVI, Pill-case, and Cubes, offers to the public the most certain and safe remedy which has ever been discovered for a Farmer, A Watchmaker, a Grocer, a Dealer in Cheese, a Tailor, a Grocer, a Brewer, a Gardener, a Butcher, a Publican, a Baker, a Grocer, a Cheesemonger, a Draper, a Grocer, a Dealer in Cheese, a Tailor, a Grocer, a Brewer, a Gardener, a Butcher, a Publican, a Baker, a Grocer, a Cheesemonger, a Draper, a Grocer, Cup Sold by the sole proprietor, [illegible]

ALE of very superior quality, brewed entirely from the very best Malt and Hops, and in such proportions as persons of nice palates will be sure to appreciate. Sold in casks of 18 and 4 gallons each, at 1s. per gallon Sent to any part of town carriage free. Orders by post punctually attended to. Address to the JOHN BULL BREWERY OFFICE, No. 25, Philpot-lane, City

BAKER'S PHEASANTRY, 8, Beaufort-street, King's-road, Chelsea. GAME of every Description—Sold, Stuffed, Dressed, Fed, and Common Tame Pheasants, for Aviaries; Wild ditto, for Preserves; Black and Red Game; every variety of ornamental Exotic Fowl, Carolina Ducks, &c. &c. Many Pigeons, useful and ornamental Poultry, Bantams, &c.—And Half Moon-pattern Cages, Greenhouses, Stoves, Cup

JONES' £4 4s SILVER LEVER WATCHES are selling at the Manufactory, No. 76, Fleet-street. They comprise every improvement, are jewelled in four holes, and are warranted to perform more than half a minute per week. The Regulator, a Sketch of Watchwork, sent free for a 2d. stamp.

SALE OF A BUSINESS.—A Person possessing £500 can immediately obtain a respectable and remunerative concern in the best situation in London. It is at present realising £150 per annum clear profit retail, and is capable of increase by adding wholesale. Satisfactory references adduced for the disposal. Apply, by letter only, to Mr. Berry, 5, Berner's-street, Oxford-street.

PATENT LEVER WATCHES, London Made.—A. B. SAVORY and SONS, Watchmakers, 9, Cornhill, London, opposite the Bank.—Patent Lever Watches, mounted in silver cases, four guineas each, or in gold cases, ten guineas each. They have the detached escapement, jewelled, and measuring power for the watch is carefully regulated to the chronometer. The performance warranted.

MOULD CANDLES to burn WITHOUT SNUFFING.—KEMPTON'S PATENT.—THE CHEAPEST AND MOST REMARKABLE INVENTION that has been introduced for many years. Every article of this description is fully tested before it is sent out, and the Proprietor is determined to support the high character it has acquired for being thoroughly impervious to any rain whatever. The Candles are to be adopted by all who are exposed to the weather. By professional gentlemen, whose names and address can be had on application, it has been especially patronised. An extensive assortment of Wax and Composite Candles, of superior workmanship, and outside garments of all kinds, really waterproof.—W. BENSON, tailor, waterproofer, &c., 69, Cornhill, north side

TEAS.—WHOLESALE PRICES.

	s. d.
Good common Black	3 0
Strong Congou	3 6
Fine do., Pekoe flavour	3 8
Fine Pekoe Souchong	4 0
Superior do.	4 6
Finest do. imported	5 0

Goods delivered in all parts of town daily. Country Orders, amounting to 40s, sent free to all parts of Great Britain.
MANSELL and Co., 2, Bucklersbury, Cheapside.

COFFEE.

	s. d.
Good Common	0 0
Good Ceylon	1 0
Fine ditto	1 2
Finest ditto	1 4
Good Mocha	1 4
Finest do.	1 8
Very Mocha	2 0

G. T. MANSELL and Co., 2, Bucklersbury, Cheapside.

EXTRAORDINARY ECONOMY to TEA-DRINKERS. The PIQUA PLANT, so celebrated as the wholesome and nutritious afternoon beverage at it is fast supplanting the use of tea. It is highly appreciated by families of discrimination for its superior qualities over tea. It is less dear, one-fourth the expense, being three delicate health. Sold at 10½d. the quarter pound, at Mr. EVANS's Piqua Plant Depot, 1, Savoy-street, Strand London. One Agent wanted in each Town in Great Britain, where trade in each town and village. A good opportunity offers for distinct agents.

TO PARENTS and GUARDIANS.—In an establishment of the first respectability, in a most salubrious air, 100 miles from the metropolis (in vantages of a solid, English educat on, and will also receive instruction in Music, Singing, Dancing, Drawing, French, and Italian. Terms for three years 100 guineas. Youth wishing to be qualified for a governess will find this a desirable opportunity Address by letter, to Mr Lewis, 26, Essex-street, Strand.

WILLESDEN CEMETERY COMPANY. Willesden, Land The features to which the Duke are of the Company have given particular attention, independently of the important consideration of Drainage, Planting &c., at an economical arrangement for the purchase of land, and in those who do not choose to purchase outright, and a general improvement in the plans adopted at present. Capital £100,000, in 10,000 shares of £10 each. Deposit, £2 10s. per Share. Applications for Shares may be made to the Secretary, at the Company's Offices, 5, Haymarket; or at the Offices of the Solicitors, Messrs. ARNOLD and READE. Solicitors to the Company, 64, Lincoln's Inn-fields, at either of which places Prospectuses, with the scale of Charges, and every other information may be obtained.

CITY OF LONDON SCHOOL, Milk-street, Cheapside, Established by Act of Parliament, and under the superintendence of the Corporation of London. Head Master, the Rev. G. F. W. NORTHEY, D.D., of Queen's College, Oxford. The school will be re-opened for the next term on Tuesday, the 16th of January. The year is divided in three terms; fee for each term, £2 12s. The system course of instruction includes the English, Latin, Greek, French, and German languages, Writing, Arithmetic, Bookkeeping, Geometry, History, and Mathematics. Persons desirous of entering their sons as pupils may obtain prospectuses of the school, containing also particulars of the foundation scholarships and exhibitions to the universities who are entitled to it, together with forms of application for admission, at the secretary's office, between the hours of 10 and 4.
THOS. BREWER, Secretary.

COMBINATION ECONOMY, and QUALITY, VERSUS EXPENSE and INFERIORITY.—Mr. VINCENT and PUGH, Distillers and Brandy Merchants, of New Park-street, Borough, claim the attention of the Public to their series of BRANDY. The two essentials, QUALITY and PURITY, are hereby combined in the first analyzing chemists of the day, testimonials of which can be produced to prove its perfect equality with the finest Cognac Brandy Purity imports, the Proprietors can confidently defy competition to produce its equal. For the convenience of Families, the Proprietors have packed a three quarter cask, both Pale and Dark, of Paramount Quality, which have with a neat metallic capsule over the cork, and labelled "Vincent and Pugh's Champagne and Cognac Brandy." Sold in quantities of not less than two gallons equal to one dozen in bottles, at 44s. per dozen, bottles included. Agents wanted. Vincent and Pugh, Merchants, No. 14, Porter street, Newport Market, and No. 1, Great Newport-street, Leicester-square.

CLERICAL, MEDICAL, and GENERAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY, No. 72, Great Russell street, Bloomsbury, London The object of the Institution is to afford to all classes of Persons, whether in the Church, in the Medical Profession, the Law, the Army, the Navy, or in any other station of life, the utmost advantages that can be derived from the system of Life Assurance, which it is presumed is now fully confirmed by referring to the Prospectus of the Society, to the Principles upon which it is conducted, to the Regulations, denoting the peculiar advantages accruing to persons assuring at this Establishment, and in particular to the Tables of Premiums, which have been specially calculated for its use, apportioning the rates of assurance to the actual risk incurred at the several ages. A Third Division of Profits was made in January, 1837, and the Bonuses then declared amounted, on an average, to 28 per cent. on the Premiums paid. Bonuses are declared triennially, and the next Division of Profits in this Society, which is steadily increasing, now exceeds £37,500 per annum. Further information can be obtained from any of the Society's Agents, or by addressing a letter to the H. PINCHARD, Secretary.

FOREIGN WINES REDUCED on an average TEN SHILLINGS per dozen.

Sherry (pale or brown) as 21s. 25s. 30s. 33s. and 42s. per doz.
Port. Being the wood	30	36	42	60
Ditto roasted	28	30	36	40
Claret	27	30	42	60
Claret	30	40	50	60
Champagne (in pints 2s extra)	40	54	and	70

Bucellas, 27s; Vidonia, 24s.; Lisbon (dry or sweet), 30s.; Marsala, 21s; Cape, 18s. per dozen. Bottles, 1s. 6d. per dozen. Hampers at the rate of 9d per dozen. The question of Alcohol in Foreign Wines being now fully settled, purchasers need not hesitate about their supplies. The above prices (for quantities of one dozen and upwards) being reduced to the lowest possible scale, stand of no other terms than payment at the time of ordering or on delivery. All the wines are warranted of the genuine quality, and, when required by any one not a stranger, the finest imported. Orders from the country must be accompanied by a remittance, or an order for payment in London.
CORNWALL and Co., 14, Walbrook, City.

BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY DISTILLERY, No, 7, Smithfield-bars, Established 1793. The unabated demand for BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY during so many years past given to the superiority of its quality, has induced many persons to offer a spurious article for sale under the same name, or one of similar sound, to the great prejudice of the Proprietors. Their respective merits are fairly developed in the following Testimonials, to which they again beg to refer.

EXTRACTS FROM TESTIMONIALS.

"I do not hesitate to express my conviction that your Patent Brandy is fully as free from every thing injurious to health, and contains as pure a spirit, as the best varieties of Foreign Brandy. EDWARD TURNER.

"John T. Betts, Esq." "Professor of Chemistry in the University of London.

"I am happy to inform you, and do assert it with confidence, for purity of spirit, the cannot be surpassed; and that your Patent Brandy is also quite free from those acids which, though in small quantity, always contaminate the Foreign Spirit. "JOSEPH HUNT.

"J. T. Betts, Esq." "Chemist to his Majesty.

"Betts' Brandy is free from unconbined and and astringent matter which exists, more or less, in most of the Foreign Brandies." "JOHN THOMAS HERAPATH.

"To Mr. Betts" Lecturer on Chemistry

It is with a perfect freedom from the above objectionable qualities, and its agreeable similarity in flavour to the finest samples of Cognac Brandy, that consumers will appreciate the peculiar value of the PATENT BRANDY.

J. T BETTS and Co are at length enabled to give a distinct assurance that arrangements will be completed in the course of the present month, which will afford an unfailing protection to purchasers against the continuance of those frauds to which they have hitherto so extensively suffered, as each bottle will be secured by a Patent Metallic Capsule, covering the cork, and a solid cask, with the name, address, and the words "BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY" embossed upon it; the forgery of any one of which, through the public safety to be a felony. This valuable Spirit is manufactured only at the Distillery, No. 7, Smithfield-bars, near St. Sepulchre's Church, where it may be obtained, either pale or coloured, in quantities not less than Two Gallons at 18s. per Gallon, for Cash on delivery.

THE OJIBBEWAY INDIANS.
The "Ojibbeway Indians" visiting Britain
Is a matter concerning which much has been written;
Some like them, in essence, at a guinea the seat,
Why they ventured their own native country to leave.
They say 'twas to see the young Queen on her throne,
And such is the likely opinion we own;
But let us endeavour (for that will, we hear,)
To set the whole matter quite plain to your ear.
One reason, perhaps, why the foreigners came,
Was to show our wonderful power and fame.
Such a thing they would certainly never have done
Had they not been induced by E. MOSES AND SON.
We have often asserted, and now we repeat,
That our fame is so many a far-distant Coast,
And then the Ojibbeway Indians heard
Of the Warehouse by which the whole World appears stirr'd,
And hence, with curiosity smitten,
They, doubtless, determin'd on visiting Britain
Then success to the Indians! lasting success!
And may they be struck with the "dress!"
Our clothing is made on a more better plan,
And will do them more credit than their garments can.
And thus will they profit by what they have done
On coming to visit E. MOSES AND SON.

READY MADE.

Taglionis, velvet collar and cuffs, lined throughout, from	£2	9	0
Beaver Chesterfield, velvet collar and cuffs, lined throughout, from	0	10	6
Codrington, Petlocs, York Wrappers, &c., handsomely trimmed, from	0	15	0
Warm Winter Trowsers, lined, from	0	4	6
Any pattern Doeskins, do. from	0	6	6
Double breasted Winter Vests, from	0	3	6
Dress Coats, regd, &c., from	1	0	0
Frock do.	1	4	0

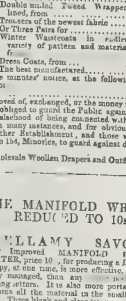
MADE TO MEASURE.

Winter Coats, of the most approved and fashionable materials, trimmed in the most fashionable style	£1	5	0
Double mixed Tweed Wrappers, lined, from	0	18	0
Trowsers, of the most fashionable variety of pattern and material, from	0	6	6
Or Three Pairs for	1	10	0
Winter Vests, from	0	6	6
Dress Coats, from	1	12	0
Dress Trowsers, from	0	15	0

Mourning to any extent can be had at five minutes' notice, at the following prices
Dress Coats, Dress Coat, Vest, and Trousers, from £1 16 0
Boy's do., Jacket, Vest, and Trousers, from 0 18 0
Any article purchased, or ordered, if not approved of, exchanged, or the money returned.
CAUTION.—E. MOSES and Son regret being obliged to caution the Public against imposition, as they learn that the untradesman-like falsehood of being connected with their establishment, in the same manner, has been resorted to in many instances, and for obvious reasons. They have no connexion whatever with any other Establishment, and those who desire genuine Cheap Clothing, should call or send to 154, Minories, to guard against disappointment, &c.
Observe E. MOSES and SON, Tailors, Wholesale Woollen Drapers and Outfitters, 154, Minories, and 86, Aldgate, City.

THE MANIFOLD WRITER REDUCED TO 10s.

BELLAMY SAVORY'S Improved MANIFOLD LETTER-WRITER, price 10s. 6d., comprising a Letter and a Copy, at one time, is more effective, and more easily managed, than any machine for copying letters. It is also more portable, as it is made of the material in the smallest compass. Three black and clear impressions can be written and finished at the same time, two of which can be sent in letters, and one kept as a



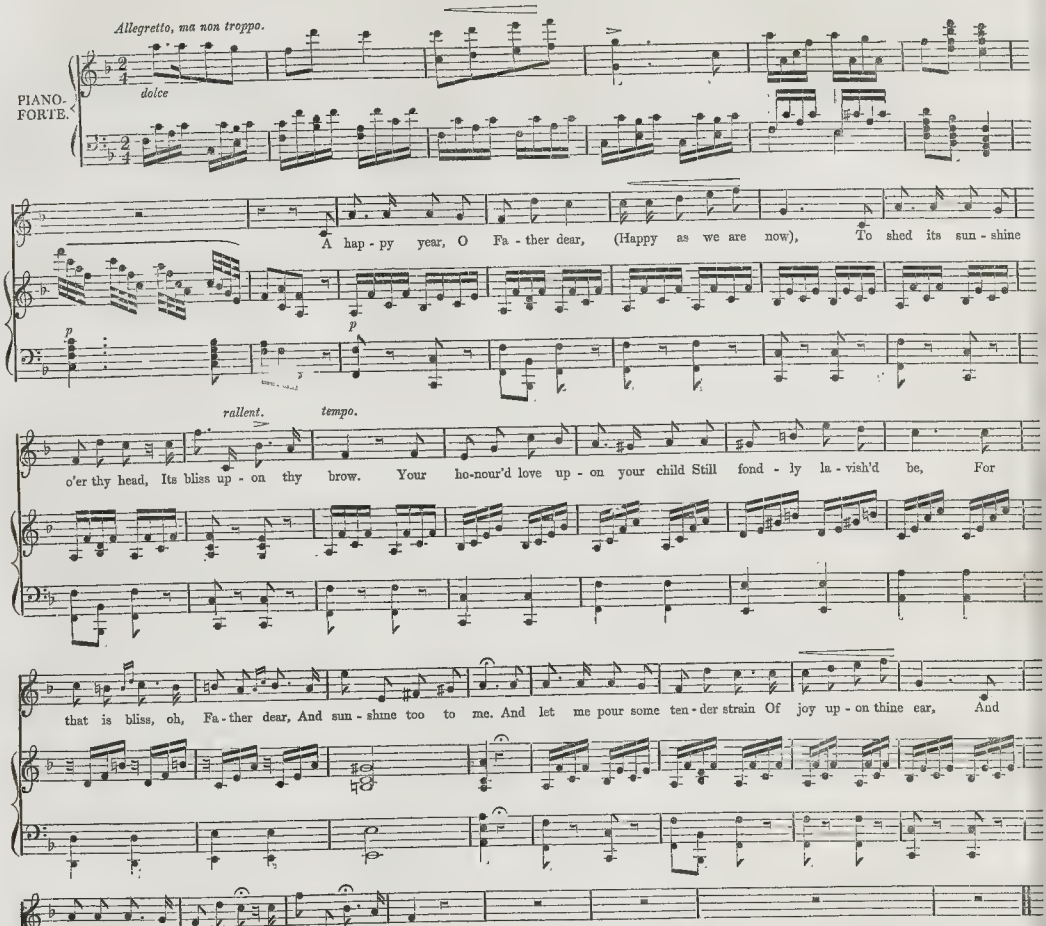
The MANIFOLD LETTER-WRITER will be forwarded, carriage free, on a remittance of the amount, viz., 10s. per; Post Office order, or other-

BELLAMY SAVORY, Stationer and Desk-maker, Nassau Bridge Paper Warehouse, Cornhill, London.

A HAPPY, HAPPY YEAR.

A Family Song.

WORDS BY F. W. N. BAYLEY, ESQ.; MUSIC BY M. W. BALFE ESQ.



Allegretto, ma non troppo.
PIANO-FORTE.
dolce
A hap - py year, O Fa - ther dear, (Happy as we are now), To shed its sun - shine rallent.
tempo.
o'er thy head, Its bliss up - on thy brow. Your ho-nour'd love up - on your child Still fond - ly la - vish'd be, For that is bliss, oh, Fa - ther dear, And sun - shine too to me. And let me pour some ten - der strain Of joy up - on thine ear, And wish thee o'er and o'er a-gain A happy, hap - py year!

2

A happy year! oh! mother dear!
Happy as you are kind—
My foolish eyes in that fond wish
With trembling tears grow blind!
For as the sweet past bids my heart
With grateful memories thrill,
Mother! I weep for very joy,
Because I have you still!
But tears can never dim the love
I warmly cherish here,
While praying for you, from above,
A happy, happy year!

3.

A happy year! oh! brother dear!
Happy as you are bold—
Brave heart!—bright youth!—we used to be Glad play-fellows of old!
Now you are grown a father's hope,
Mother's and sister's pride;
And when kind Heaven may bless you,
In the beauty of your bride,
May her pure, warm, enduring love,
Than outward charm more dear,
Wish thee—like me—from day to day,
A happy, happy year!

4.

A happy year! oh! sister dear!
Happy as you are fair;
Take, sweetest girl, affection's gift,
Though neither rich nor rare.
A watch!—to tell what hours are worth,
As old Time runs his tether,
All valued by the happy ones
That we have pass'd together!
And, sister! let us ne'er forget,
As o'er Life's sea we steer,
To wish each other, near or far,
A happy, happy year!

5.

A happy, happy, happy year!
To one who, though away,
Fills all my dreaming heart by night,
And all my thoughts by day!
As faithful now they cling to Him
As when he came to woo,
Oh! father dear! you gave me leave
To love him; and I do!
My lover!—speed him safely home!
Thank Heaven he is so dear!
His coming will make this indeed
A happy, happy year!

NOTICE.—All communications respecting the transmission or non-arrival of the paper, must be addressed to the person who supplies the paper, or who receives the subscription.

London: Printed and published by WILLIAM LITTLE, at 198, Strand, where all communications for the Editor are requested to be addressed.—SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1844.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 90, Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JANUARY 20, 1844. [Sixpence.

ENGLISH AND IRISH POOR LAWS.

AS the session approaches—as men begin to fix their contemplation upon the hope that Parliament will do something for the country, and that ministers will gird up their loins for action, and be prepared with some new enterprises for the general welfare—some projects for the true happiness of the people—some hope to which the land may cling—there is a question of speculation asked by the enquiring, the answer to which must have an influence over all policy, and be a matter of absorbing interest to all English hearts. This question is, "Will Government revise the Poor Laws?"—will they seek to mitigate the fearful atrocity of modern legislation, and bring back to the days of Victoria the fair and charitable, and lovely spirit, of that holy feeling which hallowed the reign of Elizabeth, and provided against the misery of destitution all throughout her realms? Are Ministers really blind? Is there no reason that will convince—no statement that will confound them over this great question of domestic legislation? Is such a Poor Law as we now have—bantling as it was, not of their own, but of another class and order of politicians—a foster-child which they will adopt and nurse out of the pure and wretched obstinacy of a political infatuation? Do they love their monster cruelty, and make it the ugly pet of their approval—caring for it in proportion to the hatred it engenders—and cherishing it for the wrong it achieves? Have they bound themselves apprentice to its principles, and will no amount of sorrow to be redressed, or popularity to be gained, induce them to cancel the indentures? What is there so fascinating in the gaunt, grim bugbear, that they should so hug it to their Ministerial souls? Are they ravished with transport at the domestic anguish which separates families from their natural home intercourse, and wards them with a prisoner shelter within those pretty Elizabethan buildings which assume the architecture of her period, but are a scorn and sneer upon the law which taught us to love Elizabeth's reign, and transmitted her greatness to posterity more than poetry or wisdom, or successful war? Elizabeth's Poor Law made her name blessed among her people. What Bacon sanctioned with his mighty learning, and all his contemporary statesmen applauded and sustained, planted a tree of charity within these dominions, lustrous with the light of virtue, and bearing fruit branches of brotherhood and love. The poor were finely cared for! Abuses crept down upon the first bright benevolence, and rusted the earlier blade of that immortal weapon; but the sword still kept a brightness within it, and modern improvements might have easily polished the steel!

But no! A system of political economy the most cursed in its spirit and operation—of philosophy the most foul, heartless, and hollow, set itself to work to overturn the spirit of the ancient law—and destroying that fair beauty which was before only corrupted and not consumed, erected that code which is now ruining the happiness and morals of the people, and those architectural sarcasms which—mocking their memory of a bygone benevolence—are become the prisons of their poverty, and the punishment-places of their distress.

Both in England and Ireland the New Poor-Laws have done more to distress the community than any other of the social mischiefs which attend the rapid progress of art and science—and corrupt too sadly while civilising too fast. The New Poor-Law in England was a cruelty, and in Ireland a crime! It was and is essentially degrading in all its features. It refuses to assist poverty without disgracing it. It says to patient and pining industry, "Come into the workhouse or you shall have no aid—break stones or you shall break no bread!" It banishes in principle from the breasts of the rich all sympathy with the domestic affections of the poor. It says in plain terms—"poor men, we will help you, but you must leave father and mother, wife and child, if you take our iron-hearted pittance—our State-charity that does not feel." It is a bad, bitter, brutalizing law. The mother execrates it—the wife regards it with horror—the child rushes for its assistance with a young but sickening disgust. It has throughout all its operation tainted the loyalty of the poor—tended towards democracy and discontent—engendered dissatisfaction and distrust, and been the means in hundreds of cases of despair and death. It is instinct with the very passion of cruelty, and refines the torture which Christianity most abhors. And all this is known. Men cannot be ignorant of it—Ministers know it well—it is the daily truth that forces itself upon our Magistrates, and fills the columns of our newspapers with tales of grief. Nothing has been more creditable to journalism than its opposition to this monstrous Act. The fire and eloquence, power and persuasion of the Times—the liberal spirit of the Sun—the hardy strength of the Standard—the humane tenderness of the Herald, and the consistent energy of the Post, have all been directed against it with sincerity, plain as pure. The most able and honest, and vigorous of the weekly journals have opposed, and only a few cold organs of its wicked economy have endued its life with praise. All the homely family of social English despise it—all the warm and fruitful generosity of Ireland recoils from it—revolts at it with mingled rage, hatred, and disdain.

It has nothing to keep it fair in men's sight—to make it reconcilable to men's scruples—it is all bad—bitter bad—bad hopelessly—bad to the core!

This being haplessly undeniable, why do Ministers maintain the grievance as a law? In England it entails misery every where—in Ireland it is like one of the most painful imposts of war. The collection of its mere tax is an absurdity—a difficulty, and a dread!—Government must know and feel its unpopularity, and how popular it would be possible to become by abrogating or revising it—by giving it modification, if not annihilation complete.

Then why not set Parliament to this fruitful task of popularity—why not open the session by declaring an intention to take the sting out of this dreadful law? In such a manifesto England would rejoice and much indeed would Ireland be conciliated by it. Nothing could tend more to relieve for Sir Robert Peel the difficulties of his English Corn-law and his Irish State Prosecutions than his addressing himself to the banishment of this one enactment of cruelty from English and Irish hearts and hearths. Expunge the Poor-laws, and forbid the model prisons, and see what hold a Minister would get over the affections of the poor, and over the sympathies of the best and most virtuous among all other classes of the people.

NEW LIGHTHOUSE, PLYMOUTH BREAKWATER.

NEW LIGHTHOUSE, PLYMOUTH BREAKWATER.

Although the efficiency of the Breakwater, as a protection to the harbour of Plymouth, has been proved in several severe gales which have occurred since its commencement, until recently, there remained to be provided a protection against a danger produced by the Breakwater itself. This lay in the constant accumulation of sand and other dilurium upon each side of the vast dyke, to such an extent as to render the opening of a light upon the western end of this stupendous barrier, a measure of safety for vessels at sea.

The lighthouse tower is now completed, and is a masterly piece of masonry; it is 122 feet in height from the level of the bottom of the sea, and 56 feet from the level surface of the Breakwater. It is constructed of 31 courses of large blocks of dressed granite, the first of which was laid on the 22nd of February, 1841. The lighthouse is divided into four stories, in which are an oil-room, a store-room, a dwelling-room, a bed-room, and a watch-room. It has 14 windows, 7 of which are in the watch-room; the frames being of bell-metal, as are also the outer doors. The lantern will be placed upon the crown very shortly; and the lights will be clustered, and revolving. The construction is altogether highly creditable to the masons of the Royal dockyard.

In times of old a tow'r of light
In France' island, bearing bright,
"For benefit of Sailors" rose
And prov'd, as faithful History shews,
To be a warning unto all
That 'neath its mercy-glance could fall!
This tow'r was one of that great seven
Call'd wonders midements high Heaven
We've fallen now on brighter days
We care not what Sesstratus says
About his building of the eclipse—
Nor wish we more to write a volume
About the ancients' happy knack
Of throwing moderns quite slack
And proving that their own desert
Is far beyond what we assert!
We only respect we can say
"Our Masters liv'd in other day!"

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARIS, January 16.

SPAIN.

The news received within the last few days from Madrid may with truth be considered the last act of the Spanish drama, the long-expected comedy. We are told Narvaez has refused to accept the dignity of a Captain-General in the army, equal to our Field-Marshal! Narvaez modestly declines the honour! On the other hand, Queen Christina has ordered her pension, which, by a decree dated on the 26th of October, 1841, was suspended, and has graciously consented to accept it! Both parties act with great judgment, and their resolutions have been justly appreciated by the people.

[illegible] an intriguer not to avoid the great fault common [illegible] a despotic [illegible] use to re- [illegible] capital and interest will accumulate [illegible] offers of the treasury, she will be the first to pay them a carcasing visit. Christina, I am credibly informed, hesitates returning to Spain; she thinks that the country is not sufficiently tranquil to suit her person," says the Queen Mother, "and, although remaining in France, Narvaez can govern the country, acting under my advice." The inhabitants of Madrid see through the ill-concealed manœuvres of Christina and Narvaez, and, to mark their sense of the present intrigues, they have resolved on electing to the Congress and Senate men decidedly Progressists, opposed to the Court Camarilla; and that their intentions may not be misunderstood, at the head of the poll will be found Arguelles and Olozaga. The last accounts from Madrid to the 9th, state that in all the meetings of electors the name of Olozaga was received with great enthusiasm.

It is said, but I do not vouch for its accuracy, that the Ministers, afraid of the hostile position of the Basque provinces, intend to restore to them their fueros (privileges).

The accounts received in the Spanish capital from the interior are anything but satisfactory—discontent and dissatisfaction prevail, and the judgment at the unconstitutional conduct of the Ministry: the Progressists inflame their minds. A serious convulsion may be expected—the mine is ready—the lighted torch will soon be applied.

M. Martinez de la Rosa, the new Ambassador to the Court of the Tuileries, was expected to leave Madrid on the 20th for Paris.

The cold has been excessive in the Basque Provinces and the kingdom of Navarre.

FRANCE.

The question of the Legitimist visit to London continues to occupy the Chambers. The address from the Deputies to the Throne contains a paragraph against the Legitimists stronger than that inserted in the address from the Chamber of Peers. Yesterday, at the opening of the Chamber of Deputies, M. Berryer announced the tribune, and—"Gentlemen," he said, "gentlemen, I have demanded permission to speak, because a paragraph of the address evidently applies to me, and such of my colleagues as have recently taken a journey to England thought it fit to speak at the commencement of the discussion, because, after having read the paragraph to which I allude, it is utterly impossible for me to remain with honour in my seat whilst this is going on. Charges are made on me—on the brand of with reprobation, as culpable. What more, I would ask, could be done if we convicted of a crime? And yet, what has been our conduct for the last 13 years. A series of pledges of our fidelity to the Charter—to France, and we always submitted to them. When you constituted anew the national sovereignty, we, the conquered party, believed in the liberty you proclaimed. We considered that even should we remain for ever on the benches of a minority, we could freely guard our convictions and our principles. We entered the Chambers and remained; and in doing so, I do not think we acted contrary to the honour and dignity of France, which, although we belong to the labour of so many successive revolutions, has comprehended that struggles by main force were not to be thought of. We endeavoured to avoid all violent measures. (A general laugh.) Do not laugh,—do not laugh at the misfortunes by your disdain make fortunes that might again take place. It is with these sentiments that we went to England, as we went to Holland, to Goritz, to Bohemia. Why has this journey to England a different character from the preceding ones? It is because the visitors were more numerous? This numerous concourse took place because the political union between England and France excluded more than any other country all idea of plot or conspiracy. I believe, I tell you the real truth! No; men of sense have not gone to enact the parody of a coronation in a drawing-room in a square of London. We went to England, first, to pay our respects to the heir of those Kings who presided so long over France, and under whose government France became the first of nations—the most civilized. Amongst those who presented their homage to that pure exile—pure, because exempt from feelings of resentment—there is not one but thought that, in using his rights nobly and proudly, he repelled all idea of civil or foreign war. This is the whole conspiracy; and it is for this that we are to be branded with reprobation! But if it is right that we should be reproached with conspiracy, does not lie in this place, and the right to prosecute us must be formally applied for. We have taken an oath in conformity with the Charter; God grant that the sanctity of an oath be always held in reverence! But if the questions of doubts sometimes been in London meetings round the person of a Prince who had been announced at one time as the King in future, at another, as the representative of the past. In the temporary States-General of the legitimist party, there had, there had, observed M. Guizot, been an apparent wish to unite the three orders. "But, continued the Minister, "let us see what took place in Belgrave-square. I will tell you. The persons there assembled were divided into two parties. The one tends to be superior to all others which claims to remain invulnable when all others are broken through. Gentlemen, I am, in principle, profoundly monarchical, because I am convinced immediately in the principle of government and monarchy is the hereditary right to the throne consecrated by time. A deplorable misfortune struck us and the Royal Family—the hopes of the disaffected revived, and future proceedings were deemed favourable when a much-lamented Prince perished. We saw what was going on, but we put no restraint upon any sort of liberty, we continued our moderate and liberal policy. We merely deemed it proper to make known to the country, and the King's sons, for that purpose, travelled through France. You then (regarding the Legitimists, also desired to let your Prince be seen, and to display another banner. Do not claim merit, for not having effected more? You pretend that you gave only good counsel at Belgrave-square. If that be the case, your proceedings were in vain, for good counsel never yet was wanting to the elder branch; the heard the most enlightened men in it speak, and they heard them in vain; they always fell back into the foolish ways, as is the custom of the blind and the senseless. At present, we are not called on to pronounce on the character of any of our colleagues. God forbid! We are called upon to pronounce on the sentiments of the country—its reprobation and its security. Should any necessary arise for measures of a more grave and serious character, the Government will do its duty, as the Chamber performed its duty from the beginning in making such commitments with the seal of national reprobation." M. Guizot sat down amidst loud and numerous marks of approbation.

The death of the Duke d'Angoulême is not confirmed, but all accounts agree in stating that his illness is most serious, and that little hopes are entertained of his recovery.

Yesterday took place the inauguration of the monument in honor of Molière. It was a miserable, cold, and frosty day, and such were the precautions taken by the police, that few, if any, of the Parisians could get a sight of the ceremony—every passage was barred by files of armed men and police officers. At 12 o'clock, the procession, composed of the several learned bodies, arrived at the spot, headed by Count Rambuteau, the Prefect of the Seine. The Count, the Presidents of the Academies, and of the Monument Committee, and one of the Company of the Comédie Française, took their stations on a circular platform, decorated with many flags. The Prefect, M. Etienne, in the name of the French Academy, M. Sauzac, the senior member of the Théâtre Français, and M. Aragof delivered speeches of no great length. The Prefect then deposited in the monument the box with the medal struck in honour of Molière, the historical account of the erection of the monument, the works of the great poet in one volume, and the history of his life. A crown of laurels was placed on the head of the statue by the Prefect. The procession then returned to the Théâtre Français, where it separated.

The entire expense of the statue, including the purchase of the house to make room for it, amounts to 450,000 francs, of which sum the city voted 255,000 francs: the rest was collected from public subscriptions.

We have had within the last few days excessive cold weather; the thermometer yesterday was down at 72-10 below zero, of the centigrade of Fahrenheit.

Last night was performed at the Théâtre Français, Molière's comedy "Tartuffe."—The Duc de Nemours, Prince and Princess de Joinville, Duke de Montpensier, and Duke and Duchess of Saxe Cobourg, assisted at the representation.

We are now more than usually dull in the musical world: our masked balls carry everything before them. M. Leon Pellet, the Director of the French Opera, is expected to return to Paris from Italy on Thursday next. M. Pellet has not succeeded in engaging Mdlle. Miss Falcon is now in Paris; she has recovered part of her voice, but not sufficient to appear on the stage. She intends to give lessons. Sabji has recovered from his late indisposition.

Meyerbeer is writing an Opera for the opening of the Berlin theatre on the 15th of October next. Mercadante's "Il Reggente" has been badly received at Trieste. Scmidt's new opera "La Fête du Sacrifice a Paderborn," has met with great success at Frankfort.

AMERICA.

The Hibernia, Captain Judkins, which has performed some extraordinary quick passages across the Atlantic, arrived at Liverpool on Saturday at one o'clock, having, with fifty-six passengers, left Boston on the afternoon of the 1st, and Halifax at noon on the 3rd instant, thus making the run from the latter place in ten, and from the former in twelve days, including the stoppage at Halifax in the mails, which, considering the severity of the season of the year, is one of the most successful trips on record. Her dates are nine days later than those brought by the Liverpool.

Congress dragged its slow length along. Nothing of interest has occurred in either House, if we except a furious onslaught which the southern members, headed by Mr. Wise, had made upon Mr. John Quincey Adams, for contending that Congress was bound to receive any petitions the people pleased against slavery, in accordance with the spirit of the American declaration of independence.

The annexation of Texas is discussed in the papers, but the project, which is by no means popular in the north, seems to excite but little enthusiasm.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BEDFORDSHIRE.—Early in the evening of Monday, a fire broke out upon the farm of Mr. Riseley, of Great Barford, Bedfordshire, and a great quantity of the produce of his farm was consumed. A servant girl, through spite, set fire to some premises in this village a few days ago, and some report has been raised to followed her example. About four years ago Mr. Riseley had nearly the whole of his farm buildings and property in a conflagration.

IPSWICH.—ALARMING FIRE. Last week the inhabitants of Ipswich were aroused from their slumbers by loud and continued cries of "Fire!" and most urgent appeals for help. Bells and knockers were suddenly and violently sounded to give the alarm, while a lurid flame lighted up the atmosphere and gave an added weight to the cry—"The White Hart is in flames!" On proceeding to the spot, it was found that a range of stabling, running parallel with the bank of the dwelling-house, and nearly eighty feet in length, was rapidly being consumed by the fiery element. Contiguous to the north end of the stabling are Mr. Hay's extensive premises for the sale of slight bath and plaster. These were soon burnt through in several places; at the south end the stabling joined Mr. Hooker's (chemist) warehouse, containing large quantities of inflammable materials; Mr. Smith's premises and others closely surrounded the burning mass. Providentially there was scarcely any wind at the time, and after about two hours persevering exertion all fear of further calamity was removed. Mr. Roby, landlord of the White Hart, is fully insured. The building destroyed was the property of J. Cobbold, Esq.

STAFFORD.—EXECUTION.—At eight o'clock on Saturday morning Sarah Westwood, aged 41, convicted at the late special assizes for the murder of her husband, in the month of November last, at Burntwood, by administering arsenic in some gruel, was executed in front of the county gaol, in the presence of an immense number of persons. She declared her innocence to the last.

SOUTH WALES.—We find that Shoni Scyborfawr and Dafy Canwyr, the persons who, at the late winter assizes, were convicted for Rebecca riots, and were severally sentenced—the former to transportation for life, and the other for twenty years—have made confessions to William Chambers, Esq., jun., of Llanelly. Shoni confessed to him that he was present at the burning of Mr. Chambers's two barns at Pennant and Tywyn. He also mentioned several nightly meetings which he had attended, where measures were taken to avoid the military, who at that time patrolled the country. He admitted that he was one of a party who pulled down a dozen gates, which he named, and the several nights on which they were demolished. He further gave the names of several farmers who were present with him in his destructive acts. It appeared from his statement that he and his companions were to be paid a certain sum a day for breaking down gates, and other misdeeds, and that he and many others were paid five shillings each for setting fire to Mansant, from a publican, who acted as treasurer. He further stated that the old woman at Hendy Gate was shot by a boy unintentionally—an fact, purely accidental. He also distinctly states that he was present with Shoni in many of his midnight misdoings, and was one of a party who pulled down a dozen gates, which he named, and the several nights on which they were demolished. He further gave the names of several farmers who were present with him in his destructive acts. It appeared from his statement that he and his companions were to be paid a certain sum a day for breaking down gates, and other misdeeds, and that he and many others were paid five shillings each for setting fire to Mansant, from a publican, who acted as treasurer. He further states

LITERATURE.

WANDERINGS IN THE HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS. By W. H. MAXWELL, Esq. Maxwell, Bailey and Co.

We promised to return to this very worthy sequel to the "Wild Sports of the West;" and we do so in the hope of affording our readers some idea of the almost exhaustless store of lively anecdote, characteristic trait, and animated description, which is pleasantly packed in the two handsome volumes before us. The author very justly observes, introductorily, "It is astonishing that the best resources which British genius possesses for the artist, the sportsman, and the idler, are little known, and lightly entertained. Within the four seas of Britain, and to the full scope of his bent, the man of science, and the man of adventure, may indulge himself; and the same corner of the island which affords marvellous enjoyment to the sportsman, be he ornither, aneops, or piscator, will also enrapture the painter, and puzzle the antiquary into death." This will lead the reader to anticipate much in these volumes that will delight the naturalist and the sportsman, and he will not be disappointed; and what better locality could be selected than the Scottish Border, the scene of many of our author's "sketches?" It is impossible for us to detail the many incidents, vividly and graphically narrated in the 'some forty chapters, of the results of the author's "truant disposition." Then we have traces of half-forgotten battle-fields, feudal keeps, Border peel-houses, and moss-clad ruins. Altogether, the book is the pleasantest work of the yet early season; and we doubt whether it will be surpassed in racy anecdote, lively experience, and sound information, withal.

GREAT CHESS MATCH.

The following are the moves in the 6th game. Mr. Staunton moved first, and played the white:—

Mr. S.	Mr. A.	Mr. St. A.	Mr. S.
1 Q B P two	Q B P two	16 Q takes B	Q takes Q
2 Q Kt to B 3d	K B P two	17 R takes Q	Kt to K 4th
3 K P two	Q P one	18 B to Q B 2d	K to B 2d
4 B to Q 3d	K P one	19 B takes Kt	P takes B
5 P takes P	P takes P	20 B to Q B 3d	K R to K sq
6 K to R 3d	K Kt to B 3d	21 K B P one	K R P two
7 Q Kt P one	K Kt P one	22 R to K sq	R to K 3d
8 Castles	B to K 2d	23 Q Kt P one	Q Kt P one
9 Q B to Kt 2d	Castles	24 P takes P	P takes P
10 Kt to R 4th	Q Kt to B 3d	25 R to K sq	Q R to K sq
11 Q Kt to Q 5th	Kt takes Kt	26 K Kt P one	Q R to K 2d
12 Kt takes Kt	B to K 3d	27 K R P one	Q R to K sq
13 Kt takes B, ch	Q takes Kt	28 Q R one	Q R to K 3d
14 Q to K 2d	Q to K B 2d	29 Q R P one	K to his sq
15 Q R to K sq	Q R to Q sq (a)	30 R to Q Kt sq	K B P one

After several more moves Mr. St. Amant resigned.

(a) Mr. St. Amant having approached the fire whilst his adversary was considering his move, overlooked, on his return, the attack upon the Bishop, and omitted to defend it. Of course, between two such players, the oversight must be fatal.

The following are the moves of the seventh game played between Mr. Staunton and M Saint-Amant —

Mr. St. A.	Mr. S.	M. St. A.	Mr. S.
1 Q P two	K P one	18 P takes P	Kt to K B 4 (d)
2 Q B P two	Q P two	19 Q Kt to K 2d	K P one
3 K P one	Q B P two	20 P takes P	R takes P (e)
4 Q Kt to Q B 3d	Q Kt to K B 3d	21 Q to her B sq (f)	Q takes Q
5 K Kt to K B 3d	Q Kt to Q B 3d	22 R takes Q	R takes Q Kt P
6 K B to Q 3d	Q R P one	23 R to Q B 5th	R takes R
7 Castles	K B to Q 3d	24 B takes R	Kt to K R 5th
8 Q R P one	Q Kt P one	25 Kt to K B 3d (g)	Kt takes K
9 R to K sq	Castles	26 P takes Kt	B takes P ch
10 K R P one	Q to Q B 2d	27 K to K Kt sq	R to K sq
11 Q Kt P one	Q Kt to K 2d	28 K to B 2d	B takes Kt
12 Q B to Q 2d (c)	Q B to Q Kt 2d	29 R takes B	P takes R
13 Q B P takes P (b)	K B P one	30 K takes P	B takes P
14 K to his R sq (c)	Q R to K sq	31 K to Q 3d	K B P two
15 Q R to R 3d	K Kt to K 5th	32 K to R 3d	Q Kt P one
16 B takes Kt	P takes B	33 K to Q 3d	Q Kt P one, and
17 K Kt to his sq	P takes P		wins (A)

(c) Better perhaps to Kt 2d.
(d) Black takes the Pawn to stop up the line of attack of the Q B.
(e) To allow his Kt to retreat, if attacked by the adversary's Q B.
(f) An exceedingly great strength to the attack.
(g) A masterly move, in fact securing White the game.
(A) The game was here given in by M St. Amant.

(b) Black takes this Pawn to stop up the line of attack of the Q B, and to allow his Kt to retreat, if attacked by the adversary's Q B.
(c) The only move which can draw off the attack from the Q B P, and with the view of ultimately playing Q Kt to Q B 3d, and then Q to her B 2d, with a powerful attack upon the adverse King's side.
(d) This move, in fact securing White the game, if Black takes either of the Pawns with the Q B P, as White gets check-mate with the Q B next move. Black, therefore, offers an exchange of Queens.
(e) Now Black is obliged to play this Kt, as if he sidetracked the Pawn with the R by removing the other Kt to Q B sq, the White could attack B and Kt together with his B.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

We have been informed that Major Eldred Pottinger, C.B., the heroic defender of Herat, is the bearer of the additional treaty from China, by which Sir Henry Pottinger has so wisely secured our future intercourse with China from the intrigues and cabals of a host of Ambassadors and Envoys from European States and the "Repudiated States."

According to letters from St. Petersburgh of the end of last month the Emperor Nicholas had left Moscow for home, which prevented him from receiving the corps diplomatique and official people with the usual compliments on his birth-day.

The Toronto Patriot states that a Royal pardon has been accorded to the five following transported prisoners, who are undergoing their sentence in New South Wales, in consequence of the part taken by them in the late rebellion in Canada, to wit: Pierre Hector Morin, Achille Morin, Charles Huot, Louis Pinsonnault, Rene Pinsonnault.

The official returns show that the quantity of coals imported into London during the month of December was 295,700 tons, carried in 1003 vessels. In comparing the return of the present month with the corresponding month of last year, we find an increase of 6779 tons, but on the whole year there is a decrease of 94,686 tons.

Mr. Nicholas Maher has retired from the representation of Tipperary. Our letters state that Mr. Daniel O'Connell, jun., is now to be called upon.

The applications to Parliament in the next session for railway acts will be more numerous than in any previous year since 1825. These applications relate to lines extending 600 miles in length; and so confident are the projectors of obtaining their bills, that they have been eager to make contracts, even before the bills are passed, and many such contracts have been entered into for the formation of railways, at an expense, including stations, of £10,000 per mile. A large demand for iron and materials must ensue.

A collegiate school was opened in Lambeth on Monday, to the head mastership of which the Rev. J. R. Barber, M.A., has been appointed.

The steam plough has been introduced in Scotland, for ploughing in morasses and boggy land, where horses cannot be employed.

The Scotch are, once more gathering strength from the rocks and cliffs of the Orkney Isles, and supplies of it are also being collected on parts of the Devonshire coast

The Countess Dowager of Clare expired, at her house in Belgrave-square, late on Saturday evening last. Her ladyship was the eldest daughter of the late Richard Chapel Whaley, Esq., and was married in 1786 to the late Earl of Clare, the Lord High Chancellor of Ireland, and father of the present Earl

The Gazette de France, which was convicted by default a few days since, for a libel on the government, and sentenced to fine and imprisonment, has had the good fortune to find that sentence reversed on appeal, and acquitted in accordance with the laws of France. The trial came on on Monday last, and, after an hour's deliberation, the jury returned a verdict of acquittal.

The West India mail steamer Tweed, Captain Sharp, left Southampton on Wednesday afternoon with a heavy mail for Madeira and the West Indies, and 45 passengers. The Peninsular steamer Pacha, Captain Wilson, left the dock on Thursday with the mails for the Peninsula, Malta, Greece, and the Ionian Islands.

The mother of the celebrated General Mina died at Pampeluna on the 6th instant, at the good age of 84 years.

Count Mazzinghi, well known in this country by a long and successful career as a composer, died at Downside, near Bath, on Monday last. His proclamation was in favour with both their late Majesties, George III. and IV. One of his operas, "The Chains of the Heart," the former Sovereign went twice in one week to witness. George IV. intrusted him with the superintendence of the concerts at Carlton House and the Pavilion.

A new and spacious entrance to the Greenwich Railway, adjoining St. Thomas's Hospital, is nearly completed, and will be opened in a few days for the passage of vehicles to the terminus.

The long contemplated improvements in that densely populated locale, the Mint in Southwark, are now it would seem at once to take place. The same plan for a new street, which was approved of at a meeting held at the Town Hall, on September 17, 1840, designed by Mr. Atkinsons, the surveyor, is to undergo talk or no modification or al eration.

The Lords of the Admiralty have purchased the "working model" from which the statue of Nelson upon the column in Trafalgar-square was executed. The model is five feet ten inches high, and is to be placed in a niche in the vestibule of the Admiralty, immediately facing the principal entrance to that building. The figure being so very much smaller than the colossal one worked from it, exhibits more finished detail.

Lord Morpeth has signified his intention of attending at the Great Free trade dinner which is to take place at Wakefield in Yorkshire on the 31st inst.

Lady Noel Byron has expressed her intention of having a considerable quantity of land on her estate at Wellsborough, Leicestershire, early in the ensuing spring, apportioned amongst the poor, for the purpose of being tilled under the allotment system.

The Earl of Cardigan has presented to the township of Bramley a site for a National School; and his lordship has also subscribed £100 towards the erection of a church at Woodside, in the township of Horsforth, near Leeds.

The Duke of Bedford and Lord Ducie have both abandoned the Northampton Farming and Grazing Society, on the grounds stated in Lord Spencer's letter.

Persons claiming exemption from income tax for empty property, for the year ending the 5th of April last, are required to make their claims on or before the 1st of February next or they will not be allowed.

At the Surrey Sessions last week Mr. Daniels appealed against a poor-rate for Mousley Hurst race-course, amounting to £6300. The ground of appeal was extreme poverty. Mr. Chambers argued that the Hurst was clearly rateable, and that the tenant was liable at the time the rate was made. The races had become exceedingly popular, and the ground was let for £6300, for two days. The complaint was disallowed.

The Glasgow East India Association has memorialised the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a reduction of the duty on tea, on the ground that the present impost exercises and injurious influence on trade generally, but particularly on the trade with China.

Sir Thomas G. Cullum, Bart., purchased the estate of Hanstead Lodge, near Bury, on Saturday, for £10,650, it being just a century that day since it passed out of the hands of his ancestors,

The Madrid Gazette of the 8th contains a royal ordinance, countersigned by the Minister of Finance, to restore Queen Christina to the enjoyment of her pension.

We regret to notice the death of Joseph Strutt, Esq., of Derby, who had attained the goodly age of nearly 80. He was, we believe, the head of the eminent manufacturing firm of that name.

The Augsburg Gazette states that the property left by the late Count of Nassau, has been estimated far too highly, the real amount being not more than seventy millions of francs.

An American paper states that General Jackson is in very infirm health. He never leaves his room, and is emaciated to mere skin and bone. He has a severe cough, and pain in the back and side, but his voice and intellect appear unaffected, and the lightning fire of former years yet flashes in his eye.

On Wednesday and Thursday last the Ross-shire rioters were put on their trial in the Justiciary Court. There were three convictions, and the sentences were lenient, two of the convicted having been sentenced to six, and one to nine months' imprisonment.

We may now congratulate the public on the certainty of there being a direct line of railway between Ipswich and London. The rival line has been abandoned. The Eastern Counties Railway express their wish to see the Ipswich line carried out; and still better, that all the money to form the Railway has been fully subscribed.

According to the resolutions of both Houses of Parliament, a scheme was recently adopted for the promulgation of the statutes, and from a return made in the early part of last session, it appears that, in the year 1841, no fewer than 4138 acts were sent out to public offices, to cities, counties, and boroughs, to sheriffs, and other persons. It seems that 1302 statutes were sent to the two Houses of Parliament—421 to the House of Lords, and 681 to the House of Commons. Others to sheriffs, clerks of the peace, &c., as well as to persons in Wales and Scotland.

The importation of foreign cattle has fallen off considerably—upwards of one-half for this year, as compared with 1842. In 1843 the importation only amounted to 317 oxen and three sheep, while in 1842, 1686 oxen, 24 cows, 439 sheep, and 335 pigs, were imported.

We have to record the death of Dr. David Ritchie, one of the ministers of St. Andrew's Church, which took place at his house in Broughton-place, Edinburgh, on Wednesday forenoon. The rev. doctor had attained the 81st year of his age. He succeeded Dr. Finlayson in the chair of logic in the University of Edinburgh, which he resigned five or six years ago, and was long colleague of the late Dr. Grant, in St. Andrew's Church.

The consideration of Mr. Wells's petition against the return of four of the Common Conceilmen for Farringdon Without, was on Tuesday postponed by the Court of Aldermen for a fortnight.

On Saturday a gentleman in London sold, for the sum of £75,000, a piece of land, on the Seacombe side of Wallasey Pool, which he bought, two years ago, for £6000. The sale is a good and extraordinary example of the rise, and when the grand plan of converting the pool into a dock is completed, it will be one of the most valuable estates on its banks.

Temple Hillyard Leyton, Esq., late of Cleeve Wood, Frenchay, has been appointed to the office of British Vice-consul at Chins. Mr. Leyton's long residence in China (to which country he went from his college in Cambridge), first in the service of the East India Company, and then in the superintendence of their commercial establishments, afforded him an ample opportunity of becoming acquainted with the character of that remote and remarkable people, and all the peculiarities of their commercial and civil system.

The funeral of the late Captain Fernyhough, the Governor of the Military Knights, took place on Monday, at the new catacombs at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, with full military honours. Captain Moore has succeeded to the vacancy thus created.

The Legitimist print, Gazette de France, states that a letter from Modena was received in Paris on Saturday, announcing that her Highness the Duke d'Angoulême, son of the late King of France, Charles X., and wife of his Royal Highness the Duke de Bordeaux, has died of a disease from which he had long suffered.

Within the last few days an extraordinary answer to a bill in Chancery has been filed. The answer is engrossed on "forty skins" of parchment, consisting of upwards of 1000 folios. In this document the defendant that an office copy of this answer will cost the plaintiff no less than "£49 10s. 1" which amount must be incurred before the suit can be proceeded with.

We understand that a steam-carriage has at last been invented, adapted in every respect for locomotion on common turnpike roads. The carriage for passengers is something like an ordinary stage-coach, and is propelled by an engine on two extra wheels, fixed closely to the rear of the carriage, but which can be disconnected at pleasure. The machinery is much simplified, and is rendered so compact that it can be placed upon patent springs of such a construction that its liability to derangement from the unevenness of surface on common roads is entirely avoided.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—FRIDAY.—Scarcely any English wheat has come fresh to hand here since MONDAY; hence it is rather difficult to ascertain its real value. Still, we may observe that for the few samples on show this morning the demand was active at prices fully equal to the currency of MONDAY last. Foreign wheat was in active enquiry, and the rates had an upward tendency. Barley was in a sluggish state, and anything below fine malting qualities would have difficult to sell. Upwards of 3000 quarters of foreign having come to hand, the trade was thus supplied. The sale for malt was extremely inactive—most of the largest brewers refusing to purchase except at reduced rates. Oats, beans, peas, and flour unaltered.

ARRIVALS.—English: Wheat, 1240; barley 6590, oats, 2 0 quarters. Irish: Barley, 620; oats, 3200 quarters. Foreign: Wheat, —; barley, 367 1; oats, 810 quarters. Flour, 1[illegible] sacks. Malt, 9160 quarters.

Average. Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 50s to 52s.; ditto white, 54s to 58s; Norfolk and Suffolk red, 48s to 50s; ditto white 48s to 52s., rye, 32s to 33s; grinding barley, 20s to 22s; distilling ditto, 26s to 31s; malting ditto, 32s to 36s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 62s to 65s; Ware, 66s to 70s; Kingston and Ware, 68s to 69s; Chevalier, 70s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 21s to 22s; potatoe ditto, 22s to 24s; Youghal and Cork, black, 18s to 19s; ditto white, 19s to 20s; fine beans, new, 28s to 30s; ditto, old, 34s to 36s; grey peas, 32s to 33s; maple, 31s to 32s; white, 32s to 36s; harrow beans, 34s to 36s per quarter. Town made flour, 48s to 50s; Suffolk, — to 46s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 38s to 42s, per 28 lbs. Seconds, 32s to 34s, per quarter. Flour, America, 21s to 23s; Baltic, 21s to 23s, per barrel.

Tea Seed Market—Trefoil is held firmly at late rates; but in all other kinds of seeds exceeding little is doing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 50s to 52s; Baltic crushing, 25s to 27 Mediterranean and Odessa, 26s to 28s, hempseed, 28s to 30s per quarter. Coriander, 7s to 20s per cwt. Brown mustard seed, 12s to 13s., white ditto, 10s to 12s; tares, 4s to 4s 6d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 42s to 43s per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £6 5s to £6 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, £5 5s to £5 10s per ton, cash.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 8d to 9½ d per household 4lbs, 6d to 7d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Averages.—Wheat, 50s 9d; barley, 32s 6d; oats, 18s 9d; rye, 32s 8d; beans, 34s 8d; peas, 31s 6d.

The Six Weeks' Average which ceases to govern Duty.—Wheat, 50s 5d; barley, 32s 3d; oats, 18s 7d, rye, 32s 10d; beans, 30s 7d, peas, 31s 2d.

Duties.—Wheat, 26s; barley, 6s; oats, 5s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 10s 6d; peas, 10s 6d.

Tea.—At the public sales this week, and at which upwards of 30,000 packages have been offered, the attendance of the trade has been numerous, and a large portion has been disposed of at, in some instances, advanced rates. The quantity of tea on which duty has been paid this year up to the 26th inst., amounts to 39,935,5 lbs, against 30,496lbs. at the corresponding period last year.

Sugar.—The market, especially that for West India produce, has ruled very steady this week, and, in most instances, the quotations have been fully supported. The stocks in warehouse still exhibit a decrease over those of 1843 at this time.

Coffee.—A good demand has existed for West India descriptions, at fully late rates, Mocha and Ceylon parcels have been somewhat neglected, yet the quotations may be considered supported.

Cocoa.—This article, though the amount of business doing in it has been only to a limited extent, has been held at full value.

Rice.—Prices are mostly supported, but without much doing. Middling white Bengal is quoted at 10s 6d to 11s

Indigo.—The quarterly sales have passed off heavily. On each day the attendance of the trade has been small, and the merchants have submitted to a decline in the prices of consuming qualities of 2d to 1s, and 3d to 1s 3d per lb. in those of other sorts Tallow.—This market is very dull. The highest figure for fine T.Y.C. on the spot is only 41s 3d per cwt.

Oil.—In linseed oil a steady business is doing, at full prices. Other kinds are rather heavy.

Provisions. We have to report rather a better demand for Irish butter, at a trifling advance in prices ✱ Foreign is still dull, on account of the larger quantity pressing forward. Hams, lard, and other kinds of provisions are unchanged.

Coals.—Adair, 17s; Wylam, 18s 6d; Stewart's, 2[illegible]s; Lambton, 20s 3d, Carsdoe, 19s; Adelaide, 20s per ton.

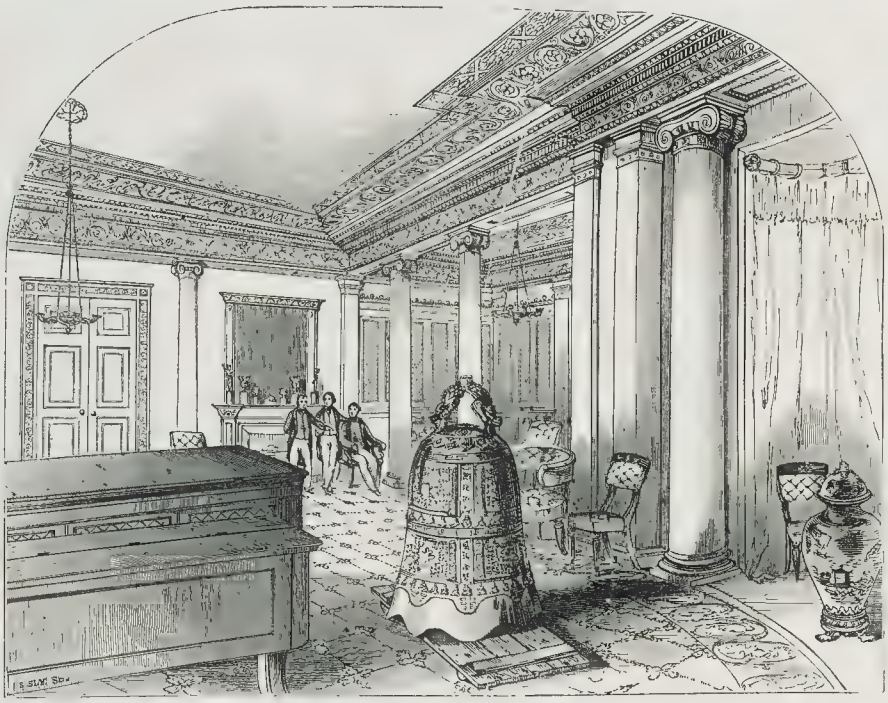
Wool.—Several public sales of wool are appointed to take place early in next month, and which declaration has produced a temporary depression in our market. Prices, however, are supported. The imports this week are 1800 packages.

Potatoes.—Nearly 3800 tons of potatoes have arrived at the water-side this week. The demand is inactive, at prices varying from 45s to 80s per ton.

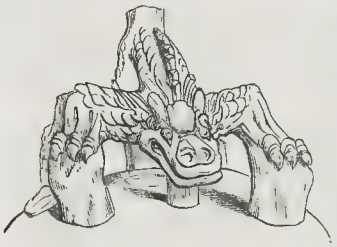
Hops.—Although the amount of business doing in hops, this week, has not been very extensive. The prices are finally supported in every instance. Weald of Kent pockets, 40s 3s to 5s 15s; Mid Kent, 46s 12s to 5s 10s, East Kent, 50s 18s to 6s; Sussex, 5s to 6s 15s; Farnham, 6s 15s to 8s 15s; Mid Hereford, 4s 10s to 5s 10s.

Smithfield.—Notwithstanding our market this morning exhibited a very limited number of beasts, the principal portion of which was turned out unsold on Monday, the beef trade was in a very dull state, and in some instances the prices had a downward tendency. The supply of sheep was small for the time of year. Prime old Downs maintained their value, but the long wools might have been purchased on easier terms. The veal trade was dull, at rather an advance on previous rates of quote 4d per lbs. In pigs a good business was doing at full prices. M[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [

EXTRAORDINARY CHINESE PRESENTS TO HER MAJESTY.



THE GREAT CHINESE BELL IN THE LIBRARY OF BUCKINGHAM PALACE.



TOP OF THE BELL.

Her Majesty is becoming rich in Chinese presents. A fortnight since we had the pleasure to direct the attention of our readers to the collection of military trophies in Windsor Castle; but we have now the satisfaction of presenting them with some examples of Chinese Fine Art, deposited in Buckingham Palace, which, in value, far transcend their warlike associates, and which are, in fact, the very finest specimens of Celestial civilization which have yet reached this country. They consist of a huge bell, and a pair of elegant vases, both taken from a temple at Ning-po.

The bell is about five feet in height and three feet diameter. Its shape is singularly elegant; its mouth is scalloped like the limb of a monopetalous corolla in flowers; and its general contour very closely resembles the bell of the campanula tremuloïdes — the harebell of Shakspeare and our country botanists. In the selection of this form —for the model is, beyond all doubt, a copy from nature—the Chinese artists have shown a refinement and elevation of taste greatly in advance of the national style, which glories in grotesque fancies, uphill perspectives, and impossible combinations of form and colour.

The metal of which it is composed appears to be a mixture of tin, copper, and silver in a very large proportion. The tone of the bell is consequently sharp, sweet, and calculated for "far distances." The exterior surface is entirely covered with inscriptions and bas-reliefs, of sharp and perfect execution. Round the bell are three bands, composed of figures of distinguished personages of the Buddhist sect. Between these, Chinese inscriptions on open scrolls are placed, consisting, for the most part, of lists of devout persons of both sexes. Several bands or ribbons of words divide and separate the tablets, and on these are inscribed sentences, descriptive of the doctrines and worship of Budh. One of these lines, in larger characters than the others, contains the name of the Peen ling pe sze, or Peen ling pe temple, where the bell was cast. This appears, from other inscriptions, to have been near the city of Shaou-ching (Shaon-ching). On other parts of the bell are some inscriptions in Thibetan or Sanscrit, in which the bell is stated to have been cast under the direction of persons officially connected with the temple and the fort Shaon-ching, on the eighth moon of the nineteenth year of the reign of Taou Kwang, the present Emperor, A.D. 1839. These Sanscrit inscriptions are deeply interesting, as they seem to intimate a more ancient and familiar intercourse with the peninsula of Hindostan than historians have yet found a place for in their conclusive chronicles.

The casting—the foundry work—of this bell is as remarkable as its literary character. The work is perfect, and must, without doubt, have resulted from a course of operations precisely similar in their details to our own. Many of our readers are acquainted with Schiller's "Song of Bell," and in reading its graphic lines, they would, without doubt, conclude that, as

—— by his work the master's known, this said process of bell casting was essentially European; but long and long before the FIGURES ON THE BELL.

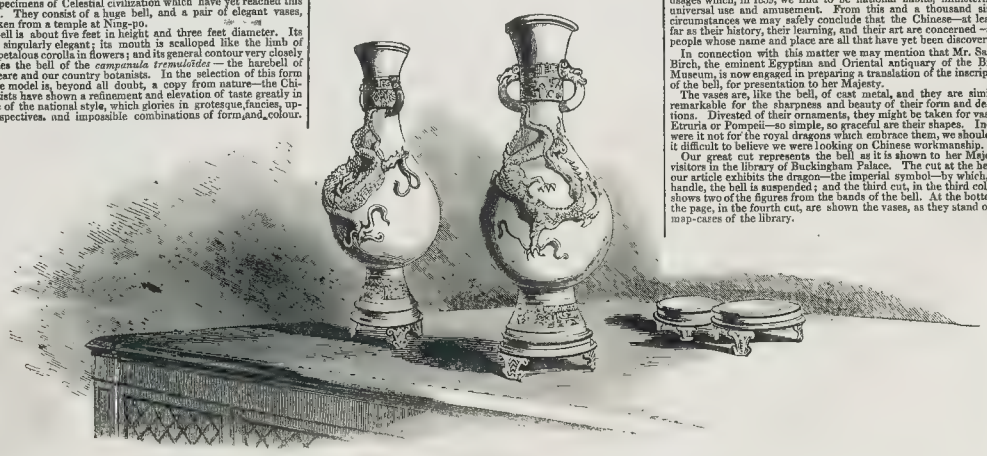
—— music of our village bells,
Falling at intervals upon the ear
In cadence sweet,

was heard in the oldest of the venerable lands of Christendom, the bells of Nankin, and of the Chinese cities generally, had tolled or chimed their independent melody, and laid the foundation of those usages which, in 1839, we find to be national habits, ministering to universal use and amusement. From this and a thousand similar circumstances we may safely conclude that the Chinese—at least as far as their history, their learning, and their art are concerned—are a people whose name and place are all that have yet been discovered.

In connection with this matter we may mention that Mr. Samuel Birch, the eminent Egyptian and Oriental antiquary of the British Museum, is now engaged in preparing a translation of the inscriptions of the bell, for presentation to her Majesty.

The vases are, like the bell, of cast metal, and they are similarly remarkable for the sharpness and beauty of their form and decorations. Divested of their ornaments, they might be taken for vases of Etruria or Pompeii—so simple, so graceful are their shapes. Indeed, were it not for the royal dragons which embrace them, we should find it difficult to believe we were looking on Chinese workmanship.

Our great cut represents the bell as it is shown to her Majesty's visitors in the library of Buckingham Palace. The cut at the head of our article exhibits the dragon—the imperial symbol—by which, as a handle, the bell is suspended; and the third cut, in the third column, shows two of the figures from the bands of the bell. At the bottom of the page, in the fourth cut, are shown the vases, as they stand on the map-cases of the library.



CHINESE VASES.

SINGULAR ACCIDENT TO A SPARROW.

The principal external ornament of the Rotunda, in Sackville-street, Dublin, is a richly carved freize, representing the heads of oxen, with festoons of flowers pendant from the horns; the frieze running round the entire building at a great elevation. In the hollow of the eye of one of these heads, a sparrow, this year, built its nest. But amongst the materials which it employed for that purpose, there unhappily chanced to be a woollen thread, with a noose at one end. By some accident the poor little fellow, unfortunately, got his own neck inserted in the noose; and in his efforts to extricate himself, fell from his nest, and hung suspended below it. He was observed for some time making prodigious exertions to escape, but in vain; and his remains are now to be seen, gibbetted at his own door and fluttering in the wind, whilst the straws of his nest project from the eye-hole above his head.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

CRANOE, LEICESTERSHIRE.

This pretty parish, situated on the Gartree road, between Hallaton and Leicester, on the south side of a steep hill, has received a great addition by the completion of a school for the education of children of both sexes, in the principles of the Established Church, built at the sole expense of the Earl of Cardigan. It is fitted up in a superior style, having every convenience for the master and mistress; the school-room is thirty-two feet by eighteen, and twenty-five feet in height; it is built of stone and covered with Welsh slate. Over the front door, in the pediment, are the Brudenell arms, with their supporters, surmounted by a coronet in relief, executed in first-rate style by Mr. Hull, of Leicester. The building was from the design of the Rev. John H. Hill, the Incumbent. The Rector's house, near the church, has been built about five years, and to its erection, the noble Earl liberally contributed.

CRANOE, LEICESTERSHIRE.

In addition to the above school, which will contain about a hundred children and is endowed, Lord Cardigan maintains one at Deene, another at Corby, a third at Stanion, and a fourth at Glapthorne; thus educating at his own private expense many hundred children.

AGGREGATE MEETING OF THE ROMAN CATHOLICS OF IRELAND.

A meeting of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, convened by a numerously signed requisition, at the head of which was the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor, was held on Saturday last at the Music-hall, Abbey-street, Dublin, for the purpose of "petitioning the Queen to direct her attention to the conduct pursued towards her loyal and devoted Catholic subjects by her Majesty's present Government." The place of meeting is a very handsome room, surrounded by a gallery, and lighted by a magnificent chandelier. As the hall was densely filled in every part, there could not be less than 3,000 persons present. The centre compartment of the gallery opposite the stage was set apart for the accommodation of the ladies, a considerable number of whom were present. Shortly before one o'clock, the hour announced for holding the meeting, Mr. Thomas Steele, the "head pacificator," entered the room, and was received with loud plaudits; shortly after, Mr. O'Connell, accompanied by Mr. Reynolds, the City Marshal, made his appearance, and was greeted by three rounds of applause. Mr. O'Connell appeared to be in excellent health and spirits.

At twenty minutes to two o'clock the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor was called upon to preside. Having briefly stated the object of the meeting, he said that it was a most extraordinary fact, that although he was deemed worthy to hold the proud position to which he had been elected by his fellow-citizens, it was quite clear, from the proceedings at the Crown-office within the last few days, that the Government of the country looked upon him as unfit even to serve upon the common juries of the land. It had been stated elsewhere that Irishmen were aliens in blood, aliens in language, and aliens in religion. It appears that the Catholics of Ireland were in a worse position than aliens, as they were deprived of the rights that every alien had at common law; for if an alien were to be tried, he would have the power to demand that half of the jury who were to adjudicate upon his case should be composed of aliens. (Hear, hear.) As the meeting would be addressed by many old friends, to whom he was indebted for his present honourable distinction, he should not trespass further on their attention. (Applause.)

Mr. Alexander M'Carthy having read the requisition convening the meeting, observed that it had received the sanction of the Earl of Kenmare, who, as soon as he heard of the insult offered to the Catholics of Ireland, felt it his duty to come forward and identify himself with the great body of the Roman Catholic population of Ireland, although he had taken no part in Irish politics since the passing of the Catholic Relief Bill. (Hear, hear.)

Sir Thomas Esmond was then introduced to the meeting, and received with loud cheers. He said he came to the meeting to vindicate his character and conduct. He had for many years acted alone with Roman Catholics, and regretted that the foul imputation cast on them of being unworthy of belief was now about to be sanctioned by those in power. What they had to do, in furtherance of religious liberty, he hoped would be done with temperance and discretion. He concluded by moving "That we, the Roman Catholics of Ireland, yield to no portion of the Queen's subjects in true loyalty to the throne, and respect for the obligations of an oath."

Sir John Power seconded the resolution, and it was carried unanimously.

T. Wise, Esq., M.P. for Waterford, came forward to move the next resolution. He commenced by reminding the meeting of what were the sentiments and feelings of the Roman Catholic population of this realm at the time of the passing of the Relief Bill. In the first resolution which was moved on that occasion, they declared that they regarded the Emancipation Act as a great measure of justice and sound policy, not only in removing the badge of inferiority from the Catholics, without encroaching on the rights or privileges of the Protestants, but by destroying those invidious distinctions and unjust preferences which poisoned the intercourse of both alike, and sapped the foundations of public prosperity, which put an end for ever to every pretext for dissunion between the subjects of our common sovereign, and combined the virtues and energies of the entire community in a general effort to maintain with honour and promote the universal prosperity of the country. The Catholics of Ireland had GREAT AGGREGATE CATHOLIC MEETING, AT DUBLIN.

THE MUSIC HALL, DUBLIN.

the apprehension of danger and immediate peril. (Hear, and cheers.) Those who had carried the measure had shown by their acts that they gave it reluctantly; and, while they placed it on the statute-book, they retained the power of making it in reality wholly nugatory. (Cheers.) They had been taunted, in the last session of Parliament, with insinuations of the same kind, but the minister who dared to throw out the imputation on the honour of the Roman Catholics, was compelled, in the face of the House of Commons, and the empire at large, to apologise for its injustice. (Cheers.) The Roman Catholics had borne testimony by deeds, not by words, of their respect for oaths; they had given that testimony by sufferings, by bondage, chains, and death. (Applause.) No one had dared to substantiate the calumny that a Catholic could not be bound by his oath; and if it could be substantiated, that circumstance should also form a ground of legitimate exclusion from every office, civil, religious, and military, as well as from the duties of a juror. (Cheers.) The very same ground that would legitimate the exclusion of a Catholic from this panel, would also be a ground for re-enacting, in all its terrors, the penal code. If necessary, the Catholics of Ireland were again ready to stand in the same fight for the vindication of their rights (cheers) —and the vindication of their honour, which they prized above their property and their lives. (Applause.) They had every element of power and greatness among them, and they would not sit down tamely under such imputations they would make themselves felt and known in the great incorporation of the British empire. (Cheers.) After some further observations to the same effect, Mr. Wise concluded by moving a resolution, the substance of which was that the officers of the Crown had inflicted an injury on the country by striking from the jury panel all the Roman Catholics placed thereon, and that they the meeting—the Catholics of Ireland—were determined to vindicate their character for truth, loyalty, and order.

Mr. J. H. Talbot seconded the resolution.

Mr. Ford, Town Clerk, then addressed the meeting at some length, and stated several instances of the exclusion of Roman Catholics from juries since the passing of the Emancipation Bill. He compared the conduct of Government to that of the Roman Catholic people of Ireland, who had returned so many Protestants to Parliament, and to corporate offices; all complained of the conduct of the law officers of the Crown in the prosecutions now going on, in striking the panel, and also of the Recorder, in keeping back the revised jury list until the 29th of December last. The last act of which he complained was the omission of sixty-three names from the list. He did not know whose fault it was, but the fact was that that number had been removed from the list.

Mr. Sheil then rose to move the next resolution, and was most enthusiastically received. He said that it was not his intention to say more than a very few words, as he should ere long have an opportunity of adverting to the very conspicuous incidents which had occurred in reference to the pending trials, and of meeting his antagonists face to face. It was a fact on which he reflected with very great pride, that he was the first person who signed the requisition that had called that meeting. (Cheers.) He saw that a time was come for making a great popular demonstration of feeling, a demonstration of feeling as also a demonstration of power. (Hear.) The nation was aroused, and in a just cause. (Hear, hear.) The facts were with them (the meeting), and his advice to them was this, to present a memorial to the Queen, and a petition to both Houses of Parliament, setting forth those facts with clearness and without exaggeration. (Cheers.) Exaggeration might be resorted to in a weak and imperfect cause, but the truths which they would have to press on the attention of her Majesty and of both Houses of Parliament were of such a character as called for inquiry. He would advise them to confine themselves to a clear statement of facts, such as had been given by his excellent friend the Town Clerk of Dublin. In reference to the grand jury list, supposing that all those parties who had been struck off were members of the Repeal Association, that circumstance would relieve the prosecutors from the just imputation which they had occurred; for allowing that there were an indictment for conspiracy to carry Parliamentary Reform, what would he said of the Crown Solicitor were he to strike off every member of the Reform Club, or the members of any other association for the attainment of that object? (Hear.) He was convinced that there were individuals among the Roman Catholics struck off who were not members of the Repeal Association. (Hear, hear.) He begged them again to set forth facts prominently in their petition. The Times itself, although strongly opposed to what is called the Repeal Association, admitted that if a considerable portion of the jury list had been suppressed, a case was made out that deserved the most serious consideration. There was another matter to which he desired to advert. Yesterday, in open court—he mentioned the fact that it might go forth to the British Empire—yesterday, in open court, one of the Judges of the land, Mr. Justice Perrin, whilst he declared that he concurred with the rest of his brethren in thinking that on legal grounds the Recorder could not be called on by Mandamus to amend the writ, added, that circumstances had been disclosed, calculated to awaken deep suspicion. He repeated that he announced the fact now that publicity might be given to it. The learned gentleman then moved a resolution to the effect, that the absence of certain names from the grand jury panel afforded ground for more than suspicion that foul dealing had been practised; that Parliamentary investigation was therefore requisite. The right hon. and learned gentleman, having read the resolution, said he did not think that the Minister of the Crown was ever more embarrassed than he would be ere long. (Hear). He had declared "that Ireland was his great difficulty." He (Mr. Sheil) was sure that he would not only find Ireland his great difficulty, but his insuperable impossibility. (Hear, hear.) The Minister was embarrassed by many things. He was embarrassed by the eloquence, the energy, and the fearlessness, by the indomitable spirit of Daniel O'Connell. (Loud and enthusiastic cheering; in the midst of which a voice exclaimed, "Richard's himself again." This was followed by much laughter, in which the right hon. gentleman joined.) "I hope," said Mr. Shell, "that that gentleman won't add, 'conscience avaunt.'" (Hear, and laughter.) The Minister was embarrassed by that circumstance, the bare mention of which made the word vibrate through their frame. He was embarrassed by the devotion of eight millions of the people of Ireland to the Liberator of his country. He would be embarrassed by the array of the Irish Members in the House of Commons, who would oppose and confound the last measure, and who would, he had no doubt, be sustained on the occasion by the Liberal English members. (Hear, hear.) But, more than all, he would be embarrassed by a circumstance which would operate more effectively than the opposition of eight millions of people—more than the eloquence and energy of Daniel O'Connell—more than the hostility of the English and Irish Liberal Members; -by the mean and paltry trickery of these proceedings. (Loud and enthusiastic cheering.)

THE GREAT AGGREGATE MEETING IN THE MUSIC HALL (DUBLIN).

Mr. J. Maher seconded the resolution.

After a few observations from Mr. Steele,

Mr. Kellington proposed the next resolution, the substance of which was, that a petition be at once presented to the Queen, praying for mjury.

Mr. O. Kelly seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. M'Gill, of Belfast, proposed the next resolution, and was followed by

Mr. O'Connell, whose appearance was the signal for bold and enthusiastic cheering. He said that he had been told that he had no business there that day, but others had said that a Catholic meeting from him would be the play of Hamlet with the part of Hamlet left out by particular desire. He complained that in the case the Emancipation Act had been repealed. The hon. and learned member continued to address the meeting at considerable length, and proceeded to say, people from all parts rose at once with indignation at the indignity offered to the Catholics. The Parliament emancipated them, but the Executive deprived them of the benefit of that emancipation. But no one could be surprised at the proceedings taken by the Attorney-General, when Sir James Graham was the Secretary of State. Mr. Smith had made the same charge against the Catholics that Sir James Graham formerly had made, but which he had been compelled to retract. Sixty-three Catholics were out of the lists that ought to have been upon them; and it was not right that his case should be adjudicated upon when men who ought to have formed part of the panel were excluded from it. A fair jury was denied upon the plea that they were Repealers. It was all hypocrisy from beginning to end. They had indicted his son; they might have been satisfied by indicting the father, without indicting the son. The Catholics were proclaimed to be inferior to their fellow-countrymen. He appealed to them all to rally and let their voices be heard from one end of the empire to the other, and hurl that atrocious sentence from office who could treat the Catholics with so much injustice. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded by saying, there might be defeat—there might be martyrdom—there might be injustice—but there should be no shrinking. The hon. and learned gentleman resumed his seat amidst loud applause.

The motion was put and carried, after which the Secretary read a draft of a petition to the Queen.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK,

SUNDAY, Jan. 21st.—Third Sunday after Epiphany.
MONDAY, 22nd.—Lord Bacon born, 1561.
TUESDAY, 23rd. Pitt died, 1806.
WEDNESDAY, 24th.—Fox born, 1749.
THURSDAY, 25th.—Prince of Wales christened, 1842.
FRIDAY, 26th.—Jenner died, 1823.
SATURDAY, 27th.—Duke of Sussex born, 1773.

High Water at London-bridge, for the Week ending Jan. 27.

Monday.		Tuesday.		Wednesday.		Thursday.		Friday.		Saturday.
M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.
h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.
3 44	4 5	4 31	4 52	5 17	5 36	6 2	6 22	6 45	7 5	7 30	7 48

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.
TERMS, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

	£	s.	d.
Per Quarter	0	6	6
Half Year	0	13	0
One Year	1	0	0

May be had of all Newsmen and Booksellers, or at the Office, 198, Strand.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CENSUS.—"R. C. K.," Kensington.—The population of the parish of Market Drayton, or Draytown-Hules, in the counties of Salop and Stafford, will be found in our list, under Drayton-in-Hales.
"J. D.," Newcastle, is quite correct in his statement. The chapelry of Huntonworth is still considered to form part of the parish of Edmondbyers, in the county of Durham, and the population is so included. Edmondbyers parish, exclusive of Hunstonworth, contains 438 inhabitants.
CENSUS EXTRA.—Omitted in list:—Long parish, Bucks, pop. 891.
"B. Z."—Roland's "Art of Farming," published at Edinburgh.
"A. B. Clerk."—1. We do not know. 2. The charges are arbitrary.
"G. P., Woodstock.—Hardingʼs Short-hand.
"C. S."—The price of the View of London is 1*s.*
"A Constant Reader."—"The Committee is to meet" is correct. We do not know.
"S. H. S."—We think not.
"L. D. S."—There were five Sundays in February (Leap Year) 1840.
"X. Y. Z."—See future numbers.
"Q. O. N."—No. 89; Messrs. Remnant and Edmonds will bind the volume—charge 4*s.* 6*d.*
"An Old Subscriber," Wolverhampton, should write to Oscott College.
"W. R.," Hampstead, should consult the novel of "Arabella Stuart," lately published.
"R. G. P.," City. We shall be glad to receive the details.
"Dan."—We think, connection.
"Q. O. Z." The admission to the Tower is 6*d.*
"J. K. J."—We cannot promise.
"M.," a Regular Subscriber.—The cab back fare is half price.
"J. G.," a Subscriber.—The children are liable for the funeral expenses only.
"Verlam."—The history of Gog and Magog, in the Guildhall, London, is a long story. They represent two giants; one, Corineus (Gog), a follower of Brutus, the great grandson of Æneas, the conqueror of Albion, which, with reference to his own name, he called to Britain, Corineus receiving " The land of Cornwall for his service done."
Mogog (Goegmagog) is a Cornish giant, whom Corineus slew in a desperate battle. This story is from Jeffery of Monmouth. We think the subject too old for illustration.
"W. X.," Wolverhampton.—By the act of Parliament for regulating theatres, 6 and 7 Vict., c. 68, pictures are to protect the Lessee, elsewhere than in the Metropolis, Brighton, Windsor, Oxford, and Cambridge. Application to be made to the clerk to the magistrates, whose fee is not to exceed 5*s. a month.*
"J. W." should consult the Cambridge University Calendar for the information he requires.
"J. D. F."—The Infantry Cap is, we presume, to be changed on account of its unsightly fashion.
"P. S." Leeds.—We do not think the Aerial Machine has yet made any progress towards completion.
"A Subscriber,"—The heir is the Earl of Burlington.
"An Amateur," Bristol.—The new Patent German Flute is scarcely entitled to illustration.
"The White Red," a sonnet, will not suit.
"Clericus" will find an accurate engraving of the Martyrs' Memorial, at Oxford, in No. 33 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.
We have received a circumstantial statement of the case of Mr. John Dufresne, an English merchant, who has been confined in the Queen's Bench prison 31 years for a pecuniary demand of upwards of £7000. The case has so lately been before the public in detail, that we cannot enter into it.
"J. H." We do not know to what our correspondent refers, unless it be to a chart by Dr. Barrington, reviewed in a late number.
"R. A. F."—The equestrian statue of George IV. shall be engraved in our next.
"P. S. T. S. F." Area is correct.
"N. A. P."—It must be published in our journal is perfectly original.
"J. B. K.," Windsor, is thanked, but the occasion is not of sufficent importance for illustration.
"H. D. G."—We have repeatedly expressed our condemnation of the silent system at the Pentonville Prison, but we cannot print our correspondent's long letter on the subject.
"An Admiral's Subscriber."—The subject shall not be lost sight of.
"J. R.," Ballina, should order Vol. III. of the nearest bookseller, when he may obtain it free of carriage.
"A Subscriber," Rutland-square, should apply to Messrs. Johnstone, Edenquay, Dublin.
"A Constant Subscriber," Thorney.—The plan would be of little interest at present.
"E. C.," Liverpool.—Certainly.
Corruhienus."—"First and second bells."
"J. H.," Cathcral Hall.—The Bread is not steel.
"A Constant Reader," Manchester.—The title of Esquire is given by courtesy to all professional men.
"An Admirer."—We have not room.
"J. G.," Rotherham.—We do not lend our engravings, as they are continually required for reprints.
"Fan." Knaresbrough.—The numbers shall be forwarded on the receipt of the remittance.
"H. E."—Certainly.
Mr. Butler, of the gas-works, Brighton, is thanked for his description of his Gaslight and Lamp Ventilator.
"Hibernia."—Her Majesty will in all probability visit Ireland next summer, if the country be peaceable.
"R. M."—The Conservatory at Chatsworth will appear.
"E. H. C.," Southampton.—No.
"Cog-hu-ask."—Charivari is rough music. The accent is on the third syllable.
"Juvenis."—To become a wood-engraver of moderate talent, an apprenticeship must be served.
"C.?"—We are not aware of our correspondent's cupabilities.
"An Old and Constant Subscriber," Stafford, should consult the Next of Kin List, at Deacon's Coffee-house, Walbrook.
CURSS.—"Civo Victor."—That is the correct title: we do not know the publisher. The games will all appear. You will find several problems in Polish draughts in Walker's "Philidorum," published three or four years since.
"Edward."—We have not room, nor should we like to point out errors in other publications. Write to the editor, and let him rectify it: mistakes will occur.
"Tyro" shall be answered early.

 The completion of Mr. Miller's tale of "Mabel Marchmont" will be found at page 46.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1844.

In another part of our paper will be found reports of the Roman Catholic Aggregate Meeting, and also of the commencement of the State Trials—together with a letter from the correspondent whom we have sent over to Dublin for the purpose of watching the present momentous proceedings. We shall not here meddle with the religious question of Catholic exclusion from the jury; we have already said that, were they all Protestant or all Catholic, the obligation of their oath will be sufficient, and that they will conduct their most responsible investigation in the true spirit of that noble citizenship which contemplates the administration of justice, and justice only, without distinction of party or of creed. Nor have we heard from Ireland the slightest complaint of the jury that has been struck. They are Protestants, but all moderate men as politicians—and as citizens of undoubted respectability; and we were glad to find Mr. Fitzgibbon, when advocating the challenge for Mr. O'Connell, emphatically declaring his perfect reliance in their integrity, and his perfect conviction that justice was as attainable at their hands as at the hands of a Jury selected by the traversers themselves. His objection was, that they were selected from an incomplete list—and one, therefore, contrary to the spirit of the Act of Parliament.

Now, in the spirit of fairness, which we hope always to see a characteristic of this journal, we have a few words to say upon this head; and at once we confess that we have grave doubts whether, if the literal law had been administered without the intrusion of other considerations, the O'Connell challenge was not really good. The Judges, with one dissentient, disallowed it, and permitted the demurrer; and to the wisdom of their decision we must defer, without, however, admitting a positive conviction that it was law. It is perfectly compatible with circumstances that it might have been justice, and yet not law—and that is what we think it was.

We hold it to have been justice, because in so grave a matter as this great trial, we do not think it would have been well or wise to have destroyed an un-impugned jury on account of any mere lapsus of the law. We are as convinced that the traversers will get justice from the present jury, as we are that they have life and hope; and, therefore, we do not think that a challenge, built upon a blunder, ought to be the means of delaying so solemn and serious a trial. We feel certain that the accused cannot be injured by the refusal of the challenge; and, therefore, we feel that its refusal was justice, and that the judges exercised a fair discretion in making their own law under the circumstances, and crushing the mischievous power of a quibble in such a cause.

But while declaring our impartial conviction in this matter, we have a bitter complaint to make against the commission of the grossly neglectful and careless blunder which admitted the possibility of that quibble being mooted at all. It would appear that one slip of names, in the long list which was struck by the Recorder, was dropped in a public office, and that, consequently, those names were omitted from the general roll, from which the forty-eight persons, from whom the jury are ultimately selected, are balloted. A good and sufficient jury was obtained, notwithstanding the omission, and no doubt the traversers remain unscathed. But the omission itself was disgraceful, and public officers who allow such accidents to damage the efficiency of their office, ought to be dismissed. It is quite true that, if all the names had been on the list, it would, most probably, have made not the slightest difference in the ballot, but that the same men would have come out that did come out as it was; but that consideration furnishes no excuse for a public officer's dropping fifty or sixty of the citizens of Dublin upon the floor! It is the second blunder that has occurred in respect to these trials, and although the Attorney-General is not in this instance to blame, yet we declare that the fact of any blunder occurring at all is most seriously and severely reprehensible. It tends most certainly to degrade the Crown, and to excite suspicion in partial minds—and remember that nearly all minds are partial, at such a crisis—and that every straw will naturally be caught by those who side with the accused. And this present mistake has been so caught at—has formed the basis of an important public meeting, and of law proceedings of tedious magnitude and ruinous expense—has delayed the trials one entire day—filled men's minds with suspicious animosities—and created a sensation anything but favourable either to the cause of justice or the conduct of the prosecution. We write this regretfully, but we also write truly—and although our frankness may create in some quarters a not unnatural displeasure, the spirit of this journal is a spirit synonymous with a fearless enunciation of the truth.

In most countries where distress and destitution prevail, the warmest sympathy and readiest relief are generally to be found amongst those classes who border nearest upon indigence; but in England this "fellow feeling" appears not to exist, for, whilst the benevolent wealthy are engaged in devising schemes for the amelioration of the condition of the poor, the small tradesmen and shopkeepers are everywhere employed in perpetrating the most heartless and diabolical robberies on those whose emaciated forms might well awaken feelings of humanity in the most depraved. We are aware how exceedingly unjust it is to judge of classes by the "scoundrel few," who are detected. But the proceedings in the Court of Aldermen last week, which will be found in another part of our paper, betray such a wide spread infection of fraud and chicanery, that one can hardly contemplate with patience the existence of such a general conspiracy to cheat the poor. It is not, however, in the matter of false balances, or in defective weight or measure alone, that this nefarious hostility to the indigent poor prevails, for wholesome food or liquor, administered in quantities, however small, might still in some degree palliate the stealthy acquisitiveness of the dealer; but when we find them poisoning, by wholesale, articles of consumption of daily necessity to the poor, we cannot hesitate to expose such unblushing villany, or lend our assistance in procuring retribution. Tea, coffee, cocoa, sugar, tobacco—in short almost every exciseable article susceptible of adulteration—as well as bread, butter, milk, and other articles not exciseable—are presented to the poor in the most nauseous and disgusting state. This is an evil which almost everybody knows of, but no one tries to remedy. Here and there, perhaps, we read of a detection or two, but we find invariably that the sneaking cheat is allowed to depart from the presence of the magistrate after the infliction of a merely nominal fine. We are glad to perceive, however, that since the exposure of the Custom-House robberies, another branch of our public service, which is seldom employed usefully, or for the benefit of the public—we mean the Excise—has been exerting itself in bringing to punishment the fraudulent dealers who indulge in the shameful practices of adulteration to which we have here alluded. The system disclosed under this increased supervision shows the most wicked and appalling disregard for human health, and forms a foul blot on the national character. Indeed, to such an extent does it exist, that it has been found necessary to erect an extensive laboratory at the Excise-office, in Broad-street, and a number of practical chemists are kept in constant and successful employment, detecting the spurious ingredients of samples of all kinds of commodities sent for analyzation from all parts of the country.

During the past week, prosecutions under the authority of her Majesty's Commissioners, took place at the following places, and in every case a conviction, with the penalties annexed, was obtained:—For spurious pepper, in Worcester, six informations, penalties £250; in Sunderland, twelve informations, penalties £350; in Durham, two informations, penalties £100; In Bristol, three informations, penalties £100. The adulterations to the above cases were, red and white mustard husks, rice, chilies, saw-dust, earthy matter, sago, linseed, rapeseed, and wheat bran. In Manchester, Thomas Raingell was fined £200 for adulterating his stock of tobacco with turmeric and yellow ochre. A great number of other prosecutions for tobacco are expected to follow, several lots of which are adulterated with tar and sand, to the extent of 14 per cent.

Cocoa, properly a most wholesome and nutritious accompaniment to the breakfast table, has also come in largely for its share of adulteration by the dishonest tradesman. A species of fine brown earth is mixed with it, and to render it invisible to the casual observer, and effectually prevent its being separated from the genuine ingredient, a portion of mutton fat is introduced, which binds the earth with the cocoa, and at the same time gives it the characteristic richness of good cocoa, and only to be detected by the experienced eye.

These tricks, however, are too numerous to be detailed; but we call upon the local authorities throughout the kingdom to increase their vigilance, in order to put down such a gross and disgraceful pestilence.

We understand that, in the House of Commons, Viscount Clive, the member for North Shropshire, will move the address in answer to her Majesty's speech; and Mr. Cardwell, member for Clitheroe, will be the seconder.

FOREIGN PROVISIONS.

Some fresh importations of American and Colonial provisions, advertised for sale on Thursday, has excited considerable interest in the City. Samples were on view during the previous day, at the office of the brokers, and were inspected by several members of Parliament, and gentlemen from the Board of Trade, Victualling Department of the Navy, &c. &c. In the American beef, pork, and cheese, there is a very obvious improvement, both in the selection of qualities, and the care manifested in curing. Not only are they well adapted for ships' stores, but they will undoubtedly be afford a wholesome and nutritious aliment to numbers of our working-classes, who have seldom the felicity to taste animal food of any description.

RETIREMENT OF SIR HENRY POTTINGER.

We learn on good authority, that Mr. Davis, who formerly acted for a short time as successor to the late Lord Napier in China, has been selected by the Government to relieve Sir Henry Pottinger as the Queen's Representative and Governor of the new British colony Hong Kong. Mr. Davis will depart very shortly on his highly important mission by the overland route.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

CLAREMONT, Sunday.—The Queen and Prince Albert, and the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal suite, attended divine service at Claremont. The venerable Archdeacon Wilberforce officiated. Archdeacon Wilberforce arrived at Claremont, on Saturday, on a visit to the Queen, and had the honour of dining with her Majesty.

MONDAY.—Prince Albert went out shooting, attended by Sir E. Bowater, Lord Rivers, and Mr. G. E. Anson. The Royal party left Claremont on horseback, at eleven, for the preserves, and, after remaining nearly four hours, returned to lunch. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal were taken an airing in Claremont Park. Archdeacon Wilberforce took his departure from Claremont. Sir Robert and Lady Gardiner had the honour of dining with her Majesty at Claremont.

TUESDAY, Tuesday.—The Queen and Prince Albert returned to the Castle from Claremont. In the carriage with her Majesty and his Royal Highness were her Royal Highness the Princess Royal, and also the Marchioness of Douro, Lady in Waiting. The Royal party arrived at the Castle at five minutes before five o'clock, her Majesty and her illustrious consort being escorted by a party of the Life Guards, under the command of Lieutenant Clifton.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert took their accustomed walk in the grounds about the Castle. The Royal Family were taken for their usual airings. The Earl and Countess of Jersey and Lady Clementina Villiers arrived on a visit to her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and had the honour of joining the royal dinner circle at the Castle in the evening.

THURSDAY. The Queen, attended by her lady in waiting, the Viscountess Canning, walked on the Castle Terrace and in the slopes during the morning. His Royal Highness Prince Albert went in the forenoon to enjoy the sport of shooting at Bagshot, accompanied by Sir Robert Peel, and attended by Mr. E. Anson, Captain Maynell, and the Honourable C. A. Murray. The Duke and Duchess of Buckingham arrived at the Castle on a visit to her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent and Lady Fanny Howard joined the royal dinner circle at the Castle in the evening.

A Cabinet Council was held at three o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, at the Foreign Office. The Ministers present were—Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharncliffe, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Earl of Haddington, Earl of Ripon, Mr. Gladstone, Sir Henry Hardinge, and Sir Edward Knatchbull. The Council broke up soon after five o'clock, when Sir Robert Peel immediately took his departure for Windsor Castle. Lady Peel also accompanied the right hon. Baronet on a visit to her Majesty. The Duke of Wellington had an interview with Sir Robert Peel during the forenoon.

The Earl of Cambridge is expected at Arundel Castle in the course of the ensuing week. The Duke of Sutherland and a select circle are invited to meet his Royal Highness.

Lord Brougham has arrived in Grafton-street from Paris, where his lordship remained two or three days, en route from his chateau at Cannes, to pay his respects to the King of the French, with whom he dined.

HANTHAN PARK.—A splendid entertainment was given by Mrs. Conolly, on Tuesday evening last, to a numerous assemblage of the nobility, gentry, and principal residents of Wiltshire. Dancing commenced shortly after ten o'clock, which was prolonged to a late hour.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge arrived at her residence at Kew on Tuesday evening from the Continent. Her Royal Highness the Princess Mary accompanied the Royal Duchess. Baron Knesebeck left town on Saturday night for the Continent, to meet their Royal Highnesses.

ROYAL VISIT TO WARWICK CASTLE.—We have reason to believe that her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Albert, intends to honour the Earl and Countess of Warwick with a visit at Warwick Castle. The precise period of the visit has not yet transpired, as the day is not determined on. From the interior of that noble castellated residence being in an excellent state of repair, and its commodious and splendid apartments having, since the present earl succeeded to the honours of his ancestors, been elaborately re-rated, and re-embellished, but strictly preserving intact its ancient characteristics, no preparations are necessary for the comfort and accommodation of the Queen and her august Consort. The Earl of Warwick and other Majesty's subjects residing [illegible] the contemplated visit will be gratified to learn that the spacious and splendid suite of rooms with the celebrated [illegible] which, when last occupied by royalty, will be seen in much greater advantage than it was on that occasion, when, [illegible] was cast its decorative magnificence around.

Sir Robert Peel and Earl Jersey are to be at a grand parliamentary dinner on Wednesday, and are expected at which the Right Hon. Baronet will read the Royal Speech on opening the Parliament [illegible] next session.

The Right Honourable Lord Stanley and the Right Hon. F. Ellice, M.P., have arrived at Rome from Naples. They are expected to leave that city on the 9th of this month, [illegible] for the Papal States. The Earl of Leicester and his family have passed [illegible] the winter, which, we [illegible] much greater advantage than it was on that occasion, when, [illegible] was cast its decorative magnificence around.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer and several of the cabinet ministers had interviews with Baron Rothschild, [illegible] with Sir Robert Peel, at the right hon baronet's residence, Whitehall Gardens.

The Duke of Bordeaux, accompanied by a brilliant suite, left London early on Saturday morning, by the General Steam Navigation Company's ship Earl of Liverpool, for Ostend.

SIR AUGUSTUS D'ESTE.—We hear that no opposition will be offered to the application of Sir Augustus D'Este, for being allowed to take the title of his late father, his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, and that her Majesty has expressed a desire that the question should be settled as speedily as possible.

A marriage is on the tapis between a gallant officer, son of a noble and learned lord, and the accomplished sister of an M.P. for one of the midland counties. The Earl of Enniskillen will be shortly united to Miss Charrington. Lord Newport's marriage with the Hon. Mis Forester will take place at the close of the present month.

DEATH OF THE MARQUIS OF HASTINGS.—It is with regret we announce the death of the Marquis of Hastings, which took place on Saturday evening at Southampton, where the Marquis, accompanied by his amiable Marchioness, had arrived from Bournemouth, for the advantage of medical advice. The late George Augustus Francis Rawdon-Hastings, Marquis of Hastings, in the peerage of the United Kingdom; Earl of Moira, county Down, and Baron Rawdon, of Moira, in the Irish peerage, was second son of Francis, first Marquis of Hastings, distinguished Governor-General and Commander-in-Chief of India—by Flora-Mure Campbell, in her own right Countess of Loudoun, who died in 1841. He was born on the 4th of February, 1808, so that the deceased had not attained his 36th year. On the death of his gallant father, 28th November, 1826, whose elder son died an infant, he succeeded to the honours of the family. The late Marquis married, on the 1st of August, 1831, Barbara Yelverton, in her own right Baroness Grey de Ruthyn, by whom his lordship leaves issue one son, Paulyn Reginald Serle, Earl of Rawdon, born June 2, 1839, who of course becomes Marquis of Hastings by his father's death; and, we believe, four daughters, who have thus early in life to deplore the loss of an affectionate father. The families of Lord and Lady George William Russell, Marquis of Ailesbury, Mr. Hamilton Fitzgerald, and many others of distinction are placed in mourning by the Marquis's demise.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CHURCH AUXILIARY MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.—On Tuesday, the general meeting of this association took place at the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle-street, John Labouchere, Esq., in the chair. The chairman having demonstrated at some length the objects of the association, the secretary read the report, from which it appeared that the operations of its members had extended with considerable success to India, Africa, and New Zealand, the island of Ceylon, and the foreign continents. The report was received.

NEWSPAPERS TO CHINA.—The following notice was issued on Tuesday at St. Martin's-le-Grand and the branch offices:—" General Post-office, January, 1844. The Postmaster-General has reason to fear that some newspaper proprietors exists with regard to the transmission of newspapers to China not addressed to Hong Kong, and he considers it necessary therefore to point out that such newspapers are liable to a postage of 2d. each, when forwarded to China by private ships or by packet ad Southampton and Bombay, and to a postage of 3d. when forwarded ad Marseilles. This postage must be paid in advance, or the newspapers cannot be forwarded. This regulation does not apply to the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamers, which may be forwarded ad Southampton free of postage; when, however, they are transmitted ad Marseilles, or by private ships, they are subject to a postage of 3d. and 1d. each respectively. By command, W. L. MASERLY, Secretary."

COURT OF ALDERMEN.—At a Court of Aldermen held at Guildhall, on Tuesday last, for the despatch of general business, a report was presented in regard to the practices of fraudulent tradesmen in the City of London, which presented the following disgraceful details:—The report specified that 90 publicans had been in the year 1843 summoned and convicted; 9 butchers; 10 bakers; 4 dead dealers and general shopkeepers; 17 greengrocers, cheesemongers, and tallow chandlers; 3 oil and colourmen; 10 greengrocers; 4 marine-store-owners; 4 tobacconists; 15 provision-merchants, and 8 wharfingers. The total number of delinquents in the year had amounted to 379; unstamped weights and measures, 136; false balances, 168; the total number summoned, 247; the total number fined, 349; and the number suspended to be heard, 30. The report, which was signed by Mr. Knott and Mr. Harvard, the city inspectors, was ordered to be entered on the journals of the Court.

IMPORTATION OF WINE IN 1843.—The total shipment of port wine during the past year, as reported by the Custom-house returns just received from Oporto, amounted to 26,460 pipes. Of that quantity, 21,426 pipes were exported to Great Britain; 1,741, ditto, to Hamburgh, 979; to the Baltic ports, 1,000; to Faceten and Sudes, 1,000; to France, 63; and to other ports, 1131 pipes. The principal shippers were Messrs. George Sandeman and Co., 2092 pipes; Hunt, Roope, and Co., 1303; Mortimer, Sandeman, and Co., 1260; T. J. Smith, 1112; Feuseca and Co., 1069; and Quarles Harris, and Co., 1016 pipe.

SIR KATHARINE'S DOCKS.—The annual meeting of the proprietors of the St. Katharine Docks Company took place on Tuesday at the Dock House, Tower-hill, and it appeared from the accounts and statement then made, that the credit balance brought forward on Jan. 1, 1843, was £7121,184 12s. 9d.; the balance brought forward on the 1st January, £7125,911 18s. 8d. The net profits during the past year have therefore been less than in the preceding year, although by the official returns it seemed that the business transacted in the docks during the year, as regards the shipping and the quantity of goods landed, was more than prepared with 1842. Mr. Tooke, the chairman, stated that the decrease in the amount of earnings was therefore not attributable to a diminution in the extent of business, but arose from the circumstance of the description of articles landed having been of a less costly character, and the rates, consequently, not so productive. The directors, therefore, upon mature consideration, determined to recommend the declaration of the usual dividend of £4 per cent for the half-year ending Dec. 31. The amount of income-tax to be defrayed by the company.

A deputation from the parishes of St. Marylebone and St. James's, Westminster, consisting of the Rev. Dr. Ward, Mr. Hall, Mr. H. Mackenzie, Esq., and J. H. Pope, Esq., had an interview with Sir James Graham, on Wednesday morning, at the Home Office, on the subject of Sir John Cam Hobhouse's Vestries' Act.

FAILURE OF A LARGE HOSIERY HOUSE.—Messrs. Nevil, Son, Rossal, and Co., of Cary-lane, London, have produced a great sensation in the hosiery trade by their failure, and some fears are entertained that the effect from the last report it appears probable that there will not ultimately be any loss.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

AWFULLY SUDDEN DEATH.—On Saturday last, about half-past twelve o'clock, a person employed in the service of Mr. Smith, silk-dyer, at the Eagle, silk dyeing house, Mile-end-road, suddenly dropped dead within the premises. Wilson, 230 K, an active and intelligent officer, called in Mr. Lake, surgeon, of Mile-end-road, who at once pronounced that life was quite extinct. The deceased died of apoplexy.

An inquest was held on Saturday, at the White Hart, Turner-street, Commercial-road, on the body of Captain William Moore, who died suddenly in a house of ill-fame, No. 8, Frederick-place, Commercial-road. The wife of the deceased resides at Liverpool. According to the testimony of Ann Smith, the deceased complained of a pain in his head, and leeches were applied, but he found no relief. The surgeon deposed that the cause of death was delirium tremens. Verdict—" Died by the visitation of God."

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—Soon after two o'clock on Monday morning nearly the whole of the brigade engines in the metropolis, were called out to an extensive fire raging in the vicinity of Clerkenwell, which, for a considerable time, illuminated nearly the whole of London. On their arrival at Turnmill street, it was discovered to have originated on the premises in the occupation of Mr. Downes, poulterer and egg-merchant, (consisting of a warehouse, chiefly occupied with wood, situate in the rear of the dwelling house). No. 92, in the above-mentioned thoroughfare. The first object of the brigade, after the alarm had been raised, was to attempt to save a large stock of live pigeons, to the extent, it was said, of one thousand three hundred, but it was found impracticable, consequently the whole of them fell a sacrifice to the ravages of the flames, as also a valuable horse that was in a stable at the basement of the burning building. Directly the engines arrived they were got to work; and there appearing little chance of saving the warehouse, the operations of the brigadiers were directed to preventing the adjacent property igniting, which, after some time, they succeeded in, although it was near six o'clock before the fire was safely subdued. Several other houses were more or less injured.

AWFUL INSTANCE OF SUDDEN DEATH.—On Monday morning, at 11 o'clock, a vestry was held at St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, Mr. Pepper in the chair. The respected vestry-clerk, Mr. Simon Stephenson, who has held the situation for fifty years), recorded the names of the gentlemen present, and read the minutes of the last vestry in an audible and clear voice, and was in the act of taking the book for the signature of the chairman, when he fell senseless, and in a few moments expired without a groan. Dr. Todd, and several medical gentlemen were on the spot within five minutes, but their exertions were of no avail. His loss will be deeply felt by his numerous family and friends.

CAUTION TO MOTHERS.—An inquest was held before G. Ireland Mills, Deputy Coroner, at the Phœnix, North-street, Lisson-grove, on the body of Henry Petre, an infant, whose death took place under the following circumstances:—It appeared from the evidence of Hester Petre, the mother, who resides at No. 49, Salisbury-street, North-street, that the deceased was a twin child, aged seven weeks. On Thursday evening last the mother of the deceased was called upon by a lady connected with the District Visiting Society attached to the Rev. Mr. Hughes's chapel, in Aberdeen-place, Maida-hill. The deceased infant at the time was restless. The lady then left in attendance on the unhappy sufferer, and the mother with some of Dalby's cardial, at the same time recommending her to dissolve the infant a tea-spoonful of it, which was administered accordingly. In a short time the child grew worse, and subsequently expired in a state of torpor. The Jury, previously to returning their verdict, admonished the lady who recommended the cordial, as to the impropriety of supplying a medicine, of the properties of which she was entirely ignorant. Verdict—" Accidental Death."

CORONERS' INQUESTS.—Mr. Baker held an inquest on Mrs. Alice Burgess, 55, residing with a relative at No. 8, Cross-street, Old-street-road, having killed herself by an excessive indulgence in gin. Verdict—" Apoplexy, brought on by excessive drinking." On the same day Mr. Baker held an inquest on a newly-born infant, in Clark's-row, Bethnal-green, which had died soon after the administration of some gin and water by a nurse. The Jury returned a verdict that "the deceased died five hours after birth, the cause of death not being clearly proved."

FIRE.—About nine o'clock on Monday night, the stables, coach-house, loft, and other outbuildings, the property of Mr. Hollis, surgeon, Jewisham, took fire, and being an old wooden building was speedily consumed together with three favourite and valuable horses, harness, &c. The ground of the poor animals were exceedingly distressing, but such was the fury of the flames that it was impossible to extricate them. The fire is said to have been occasioned by the carelessness of the coachman.

FATAL ACCIDENT IN THE NEW-ROAD.—Tuesday as an elderly widow lady was crossing the New-road, near Euston-square, in her hurry her foot slipped, and she pitched headlong under the wheel of cabriolet 924, which was rapidly passing at the moment. The driver immediately pulled up and rendered every assistance, but a medical gentleman, who happened to be present, declared life to be extinct; both wheels had passed over the unfortunate lady's neck. As there was no means of recognising who she was, she was conveyed to the workhouse. The deceased was very respectably dressed, and apparently about fifty years of age, and very healthy appearance.

FIRE.—On Wednesday morning, at two o'clock, a cabman on the stand in Cumberland-market, Regent's-park, discovered flames in the two-pair of the King public-house, Somerford-place, Somerford-street. An alarm was instantly given, when Mr. Dennis and the other inmates succeeded in rousing the family. In a few minutes after the outbreak engines arrived, and, as there was plenty of water, they were set to work; but, owing to the inflammatory nature of the materials, the exertions of the firemen were abortive, and the house was gutted and all the property destroyed. The cause of the fire is unknown.

HORRIBLE DEATH OF A BELIEVER IN FIRE.—On Wednesday Mr. Baker held an inquest at the London Hospital on the body of Catherine Levy, Jewess, aged 54 years. It appeared by the evidence that the deceased resided with her brother in a room, at No. 16, Fitchall-court, Houndsditch. She was totally blind, and such was their extreme state of destitution that they were unable to pay any one to attend upon her, and her brother was compelled to leave her at home by herself whilst he sold matches and cigar-lights in the streets to support them. On Monday morning last he left her, as usual, about ten o'clock. At one the landlord of the house, Mr. Nertz, heard a scream of " Oh, I am on fire!" proceeding from deceased's room, and upon going up stairs to ascertain the cause, he found her lying on the floor enveloped in flames. By great exertion he extinguished the fire, and the engines having arrived, one of the firemen got deceased out of the room, and having placed her in a cab took her to the above hospital, where she died on the following morning, the house surgeon said from the effects of the severe burns she had received. Verdict—" Accidental death."

THE DEPTFORD MURDERS.—The wretched woman, Dickenson, who destroyed her infants, and afterwards made an ineffectual attempt on her own life, in Giffen-street, Deptford, on the 10th instant, remains in a very precarious state. The wound on her throat is going on as well as can be expected, but, from the fact of the windpipe being seriously injured, her recovery is very much doubted. On the Rev. Mr. Finch, the rector of the parish, is constant in his attendance, and the Rev. Mr. Powell has been frequently

STATUE OF SIR DAVID WILKIE, IN THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

This very interesting statue of the late Sir David Wilkie, has just been completed by Mr. Joseph, and placed in the National Gallery, in Trafalgar-square. It represents the late eminent painter in an attitude of contemplation; in the right hand, which crosses the heart, is a pencil, whilst the left holds a book of designs or drawings. The figure is in modern costume, the angles of which are kept down; the whole being rendered classical by a cloak or robe falling in broad folds over the shoulders. The likeness is good; the figure is dignified and simple; and the drapery is admirable. It is placed upon a pedestal of polished marble, and is altogether not only an elegant embellishment to the National Gallery, but a noble memorial of one whose genius has contributed to it some of its proudest ornaments.

MR. JOSEPH'S STATUE OF WILKIE.

The following lines were written in memory of Wilkie, on seeing the above statue:

Thou Poet-Painter! thou whose art
Could charm the eye of ev'ry heart
That feeling had for Painting's beauty,
A worshipper of thine in duty
(Or rather Gratitude for pleasure
Giv'n at thy hand in e- diess measure)
Some tribute verse would sadly try
To consecrate thy memory!

Though thou, like Lycidas of old,
Sleepest beneath the waters cold—
Unhoused, where friends can never come
To pay fond visits to thy tomb
And mourn the cruelty of Death
That snatch'd away too soon such breath—
Thou livest here in marble truth,
As when thou went in very youth
Of thy eternal muse's spring!
Genius (to Genius offering)

Here raises what is best tomb-stone,
The semblance of a GREAT MAN GONE!
A man?—a wizard—who could reach
The inmost thought with silent speech
Of his mute poems, and like Burns,
Could be both grave and gay by turns!
Thou limner of a various kind,
A Hogarth with more gentle mind—
Peace to thy manes!—for thy name,—
'Tis in th' eternal care of Fame!

W.

THE STATE PROSECUTIONS IN IRELAND.

PENCILLINGS FROM THE SKETCH-BOOK OF AN IRISH BARRISTER.

THE CORPORATION OF DUBLIN.

This civic body has been so identified with the state prosecutions, Mr. O'Connell himself being an Alderman of it, the first Lord Mayor that was elected since the Irish Municipal Reform Bill, and the extraordinary fact occurring of his going in civic state to the Queen's Bench on Monday, that very little excuse need be offered for introducing it amongst our notices of men and things connected with the Irish State Trials, which now absorb so much of public attention. The great majority of the members of the Dublin Corporation are Liberals, and of these there are few indeed, if any, who are not Repealers. The late Lord Mayor, Mr. Roe, is a Whig, and opposed to a Repeal of the Union. He is one of the most respectable and wealthy distillers in Ireland, and in his public and private life has endeared himself to persons of all political shades and parties by his kind and affable bearing, and his sentiments of liberality in the true sense of the word. His hospitality, and that on a very splendid scale, has been also long spoken of; and at his table may be met whatever is most agreeable in the rank and talent of the Irish metropolis.

CIVIC PORTRAITS.

TOWN CLERK. ALDERMAN BUTT. THE LATE LORD MAYOR. THE RECORDER. TOWN COUNCILLOR M'LAUGHLEN.

His successor, Mr. O'Brien, is a very worthy honest man—the architect of his own fortune, which is now an ample one, and a man, whether standing in the square of the Commercial Buildings, or sitting at the head of his own hospitable board, is equally respected as respectable. He is a Repealer, like the vast majority of his civic brethren; and if he were one of O'Connell's jury, there can be little doubt—and his Lordship would not feel offended if he were told that he would eat his robes and the mace, if possible, piecemeal, before he would consent to find his political leader guilty.

Mr. M'Laughlen has led a noiseless, blameless life; has realized considerable wealth, and is highly respected as a Dublin merchant The Town Clerk, Mr. Forde, has a separate notice amongst the solicitors for the defence. As the Recorder, and Alderman Butt, who is a Professor of Trinity College and a Barrister-at-Law, have been more prominently before the public on various occasions, and in more prominent situations, separate notices of them are subjoined.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE FREDERICK SHAW,
RECORDER OF DUBLIN AND M.P. FOR THE IRISH UNIVERSITY.

was born in the year 1799, in Merrion-square, Dublin, and is the second son of Sir Robert Shaw, Bart., who married the sole daughter and heiress of Abraham Wilkinson, Esq., of Bushy Park, in the county of Dublin. Sir Robert was member for the city of Dublin in seven successive Parliaments, and was a man much beloved and esteemed in public and private life. The distinguished subject of the present notice entered the Dublin University in the year 1816, and distinguished himself in science during his first academic year, after which he took a "Bene Decessit," and was admitted of Brazennose College, Oxford. At the latter university he graduated in 1819, and took his master's degree subsequently at Dublin. When in London, keeping terms for the Irish Bar, it was remarked that, instead of spending his nights in gay or fashionable society, he devoted the best part of them, whilst Parliament was sitting, to hearing the debates in one or other of the houses, fancying, in a very laudable and natural spirit of ambition, that he might one day be called by his destiny to succeed his father in the representation of his native city. He was called to the Irish bar in the year 1822, being then in his 23rd year. From an early period of his forensic life he gave fair promise of future eminence. His first success was in the Court of Exchequer, on a demurrer, some of the chief members of the bar being divided on the point in question. On that occasion he was highly complimented by the Chief Baron, since Lord Guillamore. He also distinguished himself in the Courts of Chancery and Common Pleas. In 1828 Sir Jonas Green, the Recorder of the city of Dublin, died, and a most extraordinary canvass took place for the vacant office, there being no less than twelve candidates in the field, of which Mr. Shaw was one. His mild and gentlemanly bearing, industrious habits, and high talents, together with the great respect which the Corporation of Dublin always entertained for his father, enabled him to triumph over his competitors. Unfortunately for his prospects at the bar and the high hopes which his numerous friends had entertained of his future forensic success, an act of Parliament, passed but four years previously, excluded the Recorder of Dublin from practising as a barrister. There exists but little doubt in the minds of all who knew him at the bar and had been witnesses of his early successful efforts, that had he not sought this appointment, but pursued the steady drudgery of the Four Courts, he would in all probability have been to-day one of the most distinguished ornaments of the Irish Bench. In 1830 he was called into active political life, and was returned to Parliament that year with Mr. George Moore for the city of Dublin

SIGNAL FIRES.—See preceding page.

LEGAL PORTRAITS.

MR. CLEMENTS. MR. HATCH. MR. PIERCE MAHONY. MR. GARTLAN. MR. CANTWELL.

on the Conservative interest, Mr. Henry Grattan being defeated on the occasion. He was not long in Parliament before he broke a spear in a very graceful and spirited style with a rather dashing and showy opponent, no less a personage than O'Gorman Mahon, the member for Clare. The latter had presented a petition from some person confined in the Green-street prison, Dublin, complaining of lengthened incarceration in consequence of the Recorder being absent, attending to his Parliamentary duties. Mr. Shaw's answer was smart and striking, and his pleasant humour and lively wit, displayed in personal allusion to his assailant, who had been rather personal in his attack, it was thought on the Conservative side of the House, afforded much amusement at the time. He was re-elected at the general election in 1831 with Lord Ingestre for the city of Dublin, the defeated candidates being Mr. Latouche, the eminent banker, and Mr. O'Loghlen, afterwards created a baronet and Master of the Rolls in Ireland. After the passing of the Reform Bill he was returned with Mr. Lefroy for the University of Dublin, the defeated candidates on that occasion being Mr. (now Judge) Crampton, and the Hon. George Ponsonby, brother-in-law of the premier, Earl Grey. Amongst his many successful efforts as a parliamentary orator, that which he made in defence of the late Baron Smith against Mr. O'Connell's charges, in 1834, stands pre-eminently the first, and placed him at the head of the Irish Conservative party in the House of Commons. During Sir Robert Peel's short administration that year, he refused official station; but accepted the rank of a privy councillor. The Right Honourable Frederick Shaw, now in his forty-fourth year, is of an extremely dignified appearance, of manly figure, with a fine handsome countenance, of engaging manner, most gentlemanly address, cool and collected in thought, and intrepid in delivery. He has incurred the enmity of his former friends and patrons, the old Corporation of Dublin, and has displeased the violent portion of the Conservatives of that city generally, by standing by Sir Robert Peel's policy, and yielding to what he considered the expediency of the times and the wisdom of his political leader; but with the right hon. baronet, the Duke of Wellington, and the chief men of his party in both houses of Parliament he is a great favourite, whilst by the members of the opposition he is much respected, and by none, it is said, more so than Mr. O'Connell himself. The right honourable gentleman married Thomasine Emily, daughter of the Honourable Judge Jocelyn, uncle to the present Earl of Roden, by whom he has five sons and three daughters, and between himself and his eldest child there is only a difference of twenty years.

ALDERMAN BUTT, BARRISTER-AT-LAW.

Mr. Butt is the son of a clergyman who held a benefice in the north of Ireland. After his entrance in the university of Dublin, his course was distinguished in both science and classics. Among them may be noticed an university scholarship, in 1831. He was elected, on a strict examination, against distinguished competitors, Professor of Political Economy, in 1836, and in 1838 was called to the Irish bar.

His success in the university proved him a scholar; his contributions to the "University Magazine" made him known at the same time as an elegant writer; while his speeches at public meetings, on the stirring events of the time, gave him another claim to a distinguished reputation.

During the debates on the subject of Irish corporations he had warmly attached himself to the party of their defenders, and for this reason the Corporation of Dublin selected him to be their advocate at the bar of the House of Commons when their dissolution was threatened, in 1840.

Without referring to the policy of that measure, it must be admitted by all that Mr. Butt fulfilled the utmost expectations of his clients, and received most flattering compliments from members of both houses of Parliament.

After a display of great talent in a position so distinguished, it might be supposed that his after course was a series of triumphs. Such has not been the case.

Mr. Butt seems to have identified himself personally with his clients' cause, and to have regarded as personal enemies those Conservatives who did not uphold the old corporations. Hearing some over-heated expressions used by inconsiderate members of both houses, as warmly did he repeat them to the disadvantage and disparagement of the Recorder of Dublin, one of the representatives of the Dublin University.

Mr. Butt no doubt supposed that his rising name was sufficient to balance the reputation of the Recorder, and, urged on by the disappointed corporators, he raised a storm of odium against Mr. Shaw.

The elections of 1841 succeeded, and a few thought it not improbable that, under the circumstances, the Recorder might be ousted; but a short canvass, producing nearly 1300 adherents, including the heads of the Irish church, university, and bar, proved at once how rash the charges had been, and, at the same time, a sad blow to Mr. Butt's growing reputation. Since that period his conduct has gradually won the approval of the moderate men of his party, and his silence on the subject of his charges has evinced good sense, as well as that he was in some degree sorry for his rashness.

Of late he has been noted for eloquent addresses in the new Corporation of Dublin, of which he was elected an alderman; and in particular, by the prominent part which he took in an interesting debate on the subject of the Repeal of the Union, against the great Dan himself. Both parties came to the case full of their subject, and the result, in the estimation of the anti-repeal party in Dublin, was deemed anything but the "impar congressus Achille," and gave the utmost satisfaction to Mr. Butt's friends.

MR. FORDE, TOWN CLERK.

has enjoyed for many years a high rank in his profession, and, although a political attorney, connected with the Liberal party, his clientele was not altogether confined to it. His father, who was prominently connected with the same party in far more disastrous and trying times, drew the attention of the Irish Government authorities towards him in the year 1796, and, having lived through the troubles which followed, died, unlike many of the leaders of his party, in his bed, in the year 1800. On one occasion, in the dead of the night, a magistrate—a clergyman, too—broke into his bed-chamber, with the purpose of arresting him; but he escaped, by the heroism of his wife, who held a dagger to his assailant's breast, whilst he made good his flight from the house. He afterwards, however, gave himself up; but Mrs. Forde never recovered from the effect of that frightful night, but gradually drooped and died. Their youngest son, Mr. William Forde, the town-clerk of Dublin, and one of the solicitors for the traversers, took a leading part in the agitation which preceded the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act, and afterwards confined himself chiefly to professional pursuits. He never sought Whig patronage, when that party were in power; and I am not quite sure that he ever thought much about them as a party. A time arrived, however, when he thought he might honestly appeal to the good feelings of his political friends, amongst his own fellow-citizens; and their recollection of his past services caused his election, on the 8th November, 1842, to the important civic office which he now fills, with great credit to himself and advantage to the city of Dublin. This fact has been not long since acknowledged, at the close of his first year of office, by an unanimous vote of thanks awarded to him by the Corporation; which vote, proposed by a Conservative alderman, and seconded by Alderman Boyce—both Conservatives. It may not be uninteresting to mention, after this public acknowledgment, that Mr. Forde was elected last year without the aid of one Conservative vote, and that Mr. O'Connell had previously thrown his influence into the opposite scale. When attacked at law, however, and within the same year that he opposed Mr. Forde's appointment to the civic office, he selected him as attorney for his defence. This fact, singular as it may appear, reflects no discredit on either party; but, on the contrary, only affords another proof of the characteristic sagacity of the one, and says much for the professional talent of the other.

O'CONNELL, HIS SONS, JOHN AND DANIEL, AND PARTY, ON THEIR WAY TO THE FOUR COURTS.

THE SOLICITORS

come next, men of mark, and of the first rank in their branch of the legal profession. The solicitors' body in Ireland stands, for the most part, very high, the black sheep, or scamps of the profession being—not as in other parts of the empire—the exceptions. Hence it is that the attorney in Ireland mixes on terms of equality in the friendly social circle with the majority of the bar. The esprit du corps of the Irish solicitors has now and then been put seriously to the test, and never more so than on a recent occasion when it obtained an apology from an eminent barrister for what the body thought an unjustifiable attack on their character.

THE SOLICITORS FOR THE DEFENCE.

MR. MAHONY,

for general business, long standing, and eminent rank in his profession, may, without exciting envy, be placed at the head of these. His head is a very finely developed one, and, to look at it, you would at once say, without pretending to great phrenological skill, that there was more in it than you'd learn in a twelvemonth and a day. He has filled a large space in the public eye in his time, and, although much more engaged against agitators than for it, it is a singular fact that whenever the great agitator perceived the waves swelling mountain high, the winds blowing great guns (greater even than the present Attorney-General), and his troubled bark driving on the iron-bound shore of legal prosecution, he has generally called in his friend to assist at the helm, and Pierce was the pilot to weather the storm. Mr. Mahony assisted, in the year 1829, in getting up the great Protestant meeting in Dublin, before the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act, and wrote the resolutions, which were submitted and agreed to on that occasion. He has been always opposed to the repeal of the union. In October, 1830, he got up the celebrated Leinster declaration against it, and at the last summer assizes he led the way in a similar one from the grand jury of the county of Kerry. In April, 1829, when Mr. O'Connell went to take his seat in the House of Commons for Clare, and it was contended by the Crown lawyers that the Emancipation Act had a retrospective effect against his recent return, the committee decided that he was legally and properly returned. He then went to demand his seat. Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald petitioned against him, and Mr. Mahony was agent for Mr. O'Connell against the petition. A friend of mine, an Irish member, told me, not long since, that he never shall forget Mr. Mahony's activity and tact on that occasion. Whilst O'Connell spoke at the bar, he merely used a small slip of paper, on which was written the heads of his address, and he looked and referenced every handed to him one by one by his solicitor. The seats at the back were rather thinly occupied on the occasion. When Mr. O'Connell had terminated his address, however, the seats were filled with stars and foreign orders. In front sat Louis Philippe, his son, the Duke de Orleans, and some members of the French embassy. Louis Philippe and O'Connell! What peculiar destinies have pursued them since the eventful evening! What strange ones may still await them!

Mr. Mahony was returned member of Parliament for the borough of Kinsale, in 1837, and was unseated on petition. The point in question was one of residence, which the twelve judges had previously decided in the Coleraine case; but the parliamentary committee law decided it against Mr. Mahony. He could have sat for Limerick had he consented to a droll request made of him by the repealers of that city, not to vote against repeal, although they gave him full permission to speak against it. This delicate compliment he paid alone to his political consistency, but to his oratorical powers, Mr. Mahony refused to accept. There has scarcely been a great work undertaken for the benefit of Ireland, for many years back, with which Mr. Mahony has not been connected. Under his auspices were commenced the Provincial Bank, the Drogheda and Kingstown Railroads, the Ulster Canal, and the Government plan of railroads for Ireland. He possesses considerable property in the counties of Limerick, Kerry, Cork, and Wicklow. He is the leading Grand Juror of the county of Kerry, the office of High Sheriff of which is held by his son, Mr. Mahony's profession being a bar to its being filled by himself. The important affair of the grand jury presentments of that county, which it was thought would have a great effect on the result of the present prosecutions, was got up by Mr. Mahony, and was under his supervision. He is a gentleman of large and liberal views, excellent education, gentlemanly bearing and amiable disposition, and as such it is almost needless to add, that although he belongs to the "Juste Milieu" party in Ireland, he is much respected by even the most violent on both sides of the political waters.

MR. CANTWELL.

If men are to be judged according to their descent, and to be made answerable for the sins of their fathers, this gentleman is more Sassenach than the Saxons themselves, for he comes in a direct line from a Norman lord, the Baron Cantleon, who came over with Strongbow to Ireland "to help himself," accompanied at the same time by his brother, the Baron De Carew, another also anxious to take share of the plunder. From the latter of these early adventurers all the present Catholic Bishop of Meath, who too is a Cantwell, derives his origin. The Baron Cantleon is supposed to have been one of the eighteen of Strongbow's knights who fell on the plains of Kildare, and whose bodies are buried in the Black Abbey in Kilkenny. The Cantwell arms, inscribed over one of the tombs, has led to the supposition. Irish romance has a great many legends connected with this family. Upon settled in Tipperary. There is a romantic story, which mentions the chiefs of the sept "took to wife a Butler maiden," owing to which circumstance their descendants for a long time claimed consanguinity with the Ormonde family. One of the last of the chiefs, called the Black Knight, took an active part in the civil wars which raged in his time, and having been taken prisoner, was executed, and his lands forfeited to the Crown.

The subject of my present notice is a young man very much beloved and respected in private life, and of first-rate reputation in his profession, or he should not have been selected as an attorney for the defence in the important state affair now at issue. He is the grandson of a barrister of some eminence, who was a contemporary of Lord Clare, and who at that convivial time went by the name of "Facetious Peter." The latter died in 1794, very shortly after the Government of the day had signified its intention to elevate him to the bench. His sister was married to Mr. Archbold, the owner of the celebrated Padlireen mare. Owing to the circumstance of Mr. Archbold's being a Roman Catholic, and according to the disgraceful penal law of the day, a Roman Catholic's horse, if worth a thousand pounds, could be claimed by a Protestant for the price of fifty pounds, and the claimant to be confirmed in his property by letters on his favourite public grievance in the Irish press, under the signature of T, caused public attention to be drawn seriously towards it, and brought about in course of time the consummation which he had wished for so long and so devoutly. His son seems to have imbibed no small share of his anti-tolls-and-customs propensities, for in the year 1829, when he could have only been just out of his articles, and not more than about 21 years of age, we find him doing battle with the then Lord Mayor, Sir Jacob West, who made the bold attempt to remove the fish and pig markets from their ancient classic sites. This led to a series of conflicts, personal as well as legal, in which the youthful Cantwell was a prominent and principal actor. The civic functionaries had in the end to beat a retreat. One of these occasions was celebrated in an exceedingly clever lyric production, which appeared in Mr. Sheehan's paper, the Dublin Evening Mail.

MR. GARTLAN,

the youngest of the five attorneys concerned for the traversers, is connected with one of the most respectable Catholic mercantile families in the north of Ireland. Like many members of his profession, he graduated at the Irish University, and had, whilst there, a respectable standing amongst his fellow-students. He possesses a good professional fame and political influence in the county of Louth, in which he resides. During the past summer he was employed to prosecute certain Orangemen, accused of riots, and attended specially at Clones, Monaghan, Belfast, and Carrickdergus: for his professional exertions on these occasions, he received the thanks of the Repeal Association, at the instance of Mr. O'Connell. Some years since a fierce and well-sustained contest as to the privileges of the two professions, the bar and the attorneys, was waged in his person. Upon that occasion, he claimed a right to argue a case, reserved from the Louth or Monaghan Assizes, before the twelve judges. Messrs. Napier and Alcock attended on behalf of the bar, and protested against an attorney being heard. The judges, after a long consultation, concurred with the bar, and Mr. Gartlan was excluded. A meeting of the attorneys of Ireland was immediately called. It was attended by members of the profession, of all shades of politics. The thanks of the profession were voted to Mr. Gartlan, for his spirited and manly conduct; resolutions were also passed, declaratory of the rights and privileges of the profession. A high tone of independence was taken at that time by the Irish attorneys, which they have since maintained — and in no instance more so than in the step which they have recently taken to vindicate the honour of their body, which they considered had been attacked in Mr. Mahony's person, by Mr. Brewster. This I allude to in my notice of that eminent barrister. Mr. Gartlan is a very fair specimen of a well-educated Irish attorney, a fluent speaker, a good cross-examiner, and possessing the pen of a ready writer: indeed, in his early career, he was connected with the London periodicals, and some articles of his, under the signature of "Paddy Blake," may be recollected by many who read them with much pleasure at the time. In the division of labour necessary in the arrangement of a case of such magnitude as the defence of the traversers in the present state prosecutions, it is understood that to Mr. Gartlan and Mr. Cantwell has been committed the getting-up and arrangement of the evidence for the defence; and it is only fair to Mr. Gartlan also to state, that to him, jointly with Sir Coleman O'Loghlen, is due the credit of having made the point, that the witnesses on the indictment were not sworn in open court: both parties suggested the objection contemporaneously to their respective friends.

IRELAND, DURING THE STATE TRIALS.

(From a Special Correspondent.)

Well, I have swept the seas (as the broom said when it crossed the Atlantic) and am in Ireland. A short spell of railway brought me on Thursday last, from Kingstown to the City of Dublin, and a fair city it is. What a fine sense of the value of space—that chief element of grandeur in street architecture—is everywhere preserved. How lofty and majestic are even the common houses, and what a noble presence have the public edifices, whether regarded from the interior or from without. Yes, Dublin is certainly a grand place, and at present, though it would be hardly credited in England, its tranquility is equal to its grandeur; and, strange anomalous contradiction in terms!—where all is politics, all is peace!

In the midst of a profound and important crisis—of a struggle upon which the heart of Ireland is fixed—of daily bustle and the presence of the food of strife—there is a lamblike quiet, a still repose, a sort of gentle nonchalance in fact, which goes about every thing as a matter of course; and, while manifesting in words and thought and expression a lively energy, an intense interest, and an absorbing curiosity—preserves in action an ease and facility approaching almost to languor, and having nothing in common with that wild, burning, enthusiastic excitement, which in England we all imagine so powerfully to pervade the whole grand array of military in the city—troops galore!—five thousand of them perhaps; but they go about leisurely and at intervals; are not more frequently seen than in London, and do not at all force upon you the notion of a garrison town. You may bow, if you like, to the field officer of the day as he is riding his rounds, and for the nonce your military obeisance is done. The police are most effective—too effective in fact, and the "order of the city" is much more strictly preserved than in London—nevertheless, I will endeavour to avoid the station, and keeping myself upon my good behaviour, seek to vindicate the purity of the Illustrated London News.

But though even at this moment there is in the "manner of the city" and its people (if I may so speak) a reposeful bearing, yet the political movements are rapid, orderly, and complete; and although they act quietly, their "words do burn." Political business seems to have grown into their existence, and perhaps it is because they have so much of it that they do it so well—with so much constancy of purpose—and with so little noise.

No stranger in Dublin would recognise the immense importance of the present trials, if he were a mere watcher of the outward world, if he did not exercise thought, philosophy, and observation over that vast and deep sea of social commotion, which, with its large body of waters—its strong tide and its wild current—has neither waves nor spray, and in its rolling silence and power never ever swells. But the true watcher knows that half the destiny of Ireland is written upon the heart of the present calm—that the wondrous struggle at issue has every eye in Ireland drawn towards it as by some basilisk charm—that its progress daily towards some great and but mysterious result which men do not dare to speculate upon—that it is all in all to the social world of Erin and that its end is what no wisdom guesses, and no prophecy retells. Such and so vast do I believe the interest and importance of the present trials.

Of course everything here—placidly as I tell you matters are conducted—is connected with them. It is one moment an address from the Corn Exchange; next a motion in the Four Courts; and a third, a meeting at the Music Hall. About the Corn Exchange I will not trouble you. You know already that O'Connell is the spirit of every storm that rages there, and that he directs the waters: nor need I speak to you of the "Four Courts;" for although motion after motion has been made in them with reference to the trials, yet "all has been lost" to the traversers; and with one day's interlude, which I shall by-and-by have to describe, the business of the prosecution is at last earnestly commenced. My present matter must have reference to the GREAT AGGREGATE MEETING of the Roman Catholics of Ireland which took place on Saturday at the Music Hall, and of which I send you the four drawings that will illustrate this letter. I am only going, however, to give you outlines and characteristics, as the London papers will supply you with faithful reports, which you can well afford most abundantly to condense.

What this aggregate meeting then was a great affair. It arose out of the fact of the Corn Exchange legal validity, and afforded no ground for such a plea as that which had been put in by the traversers.

Sir Coleman O'Loghlen argued in support of the challenger; and was followed on the same side by Mr. Fitzgibbon, Queen's Counsel.

The Solicitor-General (Mr. Green) replied. He contended that there were no legal means pointed out in the Act of Parliament, or otherwise, to amend the jurors' list in such a case as the present, and strongly insisted that the traversers could suffer no injury by the hasty manner in its present state. The counsel as the other side had expressly declared that they had no fault to find with the gentlemen in attendance to serve as jurors on their trial

Mr. Moore, for the part of the traversers, to send back the lists to the Recorder by consent, and to have the omitted names inserted in it, and the trial to be postponed till after this arrangement had been effected.

The Attorney-General rejected this proposition with great indignation, as one utterly illegal.

The Chief Justice then announced that the majority of the Court were of opinion that the challenge to the array was bad, and that the demurrer of the Attorney-General must be allowed.

His Lordship and the other Judges then delivered their judgments seriatim - Perrin, dissentiente. The other Judges said that they were clear in their decision, and Mr. Justice Perrin said that he gave a different judgment from his brethren with considerable doubt.

The Court adjourned at a quarter to 8 to next morning.

TUESDAY.—SECOND DAY.

The Court assembled on Tuesday at ten o'clock, and the jurors and traversers were called over. The jurors all appeared; but two of the traversers, Messrs. Duffy and Barrett, were absent. The Court waited with exemplary patience for some time, but neither of these parties appeared. Their solicitors offered an undertaking that they should abide by anything done in their absence, and then counsel argued that, this being merely a case of misdemeanour, there was no absolute necessity for the parties accused to appear in person.

The Attorney-General, however, and he could not accede to this arrangement. The traversers were bound in recognizances to appear personally throughout the whole of the proceedings, and their appearance by attorney could not be accepted —particularly as it might be necessary in the course of the evidence to establish a case of identity, in which they were concerned.

After some further delay, the missing parties at length came into court, and having got a gentle hint as to the necessity of a more punctual attendance in future, the swearing of the jury to try the case was commenced, and, after a few excuses for non-attendance, on the ground of ill health (which were all allowed after a sufficient investigation), it was completed. The jury to try O'Connell and others was sworn.

Mr. Napier opened the pleadings, and briefly stated the heads of the several counts in the indictment.

At half-past eleven the Attorney-General proceeded to state the case for the Crown. He commenced by recapitulating the several counts of the indictment, which charged the traversers severally with conspiracy and confederating to raise discontent and disaffection in the minds of her Majesty's subjects, to excite hatred and ill-will towards her Majesty's Government, introduce discontent and disaffection in the army, cause large bodies of people to meet together, and, by means of physical-force demonstrations, effect changes in the law of the land, bring about a dissolution of the Legislative Union; and, finally, by means of arbitration courts, bring the administration of justice into contempt. He then proceeded to explain the law of conspiracy to the jury, which, according to his construction, consisted in a combination or agreement to effect legal objects by illegal means. The traversers, he asserted, had been guilty of a common design to effect the objects specified in the indictment. He then laid it down, as a principle of the law of conspiracy, that the acts and words of any one of the conspirators were to be taken as the acts and words of all; and, in support of this proposition, he proceeded to show, from various eminent law authorities, that it was not necessary to have positive evidence of overt acts against the traversers, or any of them; it was only necessary to show that they were banded or associated together, in order to prove that all were guilty of the acts and crimes of any one. After this he proceeded to notice the stress laid upon the peaceable assemblage and dispersion of the monster meetings, which, he contended, was only an ingredient in the conspiracy, and could only be regarded as an aggravation of the offence; for, what were they told by one of the traversers, "the man who commits a crime gives strength to the enemy;" and again, "England's weakness was Ireland's opportunity." For his own part he deemed and held that the peaceable assemblage and separation of such immense bodies were inconsistent with the ulterior objects of the leaders, and then he proceeded to quote various law authorities in order to show that the assemblages themselves were inconsistent with the law of the land.

With this he closed what may be considered the first part of the case, and then he entered on a long history of the Repeal agitation, commencing with the first Association established by Mr. O'Connell for the furtherance of Repeal, during the administration of Lord Grey, in 1831. In tracing of this portion of his subject, he referred to the speech of Lord Grey's Administration on the question of Repeal, and quoted an extract from a speech delivered in the House of Commons by the present Earl Spencer, in the course of which his lordship (then Lord Althorp) stated that he would prefer war to the dismemberment of the Union. He then referred to the course taken by the Irish Government of that day, and the proclamations issued by Lord Anglesey to put down the agitation; and, after giving a brief history of the Repeal agitation, commencing at the session of 1839, he alluded to certain speeches delivered by Ministers of the Crown, who avowed that the object of the Repeal agitation was to give unlimited power to O'Connell, as the avowed leader of a separate republic in terms of the British empire. He next alluded to the establishment of the General Association in 1836, part of whose object was the levy of a justice-rent, spent, nobody knew how to prevent the payment of tithes, and to carry on the Repeal agitation which had been the bane and curse of unfortunate Ireland.

After referring to the establishment of the Precursor Association, he entered into a history of the present Repeal agitation and Association, which he described as consisting of members, associates, and volunteers, whose bond of union consisted in a common design to organise the poorer and more ignorant classes in favour of the great object of the Association, viz. the dismembering of the Legislative Union. He then exhibited and described the several cards issued to associates, members, and volunteers, and in doing so called particular attention to the motto on the members' cards, namely, the words "Conciliation, Final Settlement," "Clontarf," "Limerick," and, in order that the ignorant might be made fully aware of the meaning of these words, the card was accompanied by a printed explanation, which consisted in a description of battles in which the Irish had been successful, and which was clearly intended to stimulate the people of Ireland into hatred of the Saxon monarchy. He next proceeded to describe the membership card, one portion of which contained an extract from the resolutions adopted by the volunteer delegates at Dungannon, in 1782, when they declared that "No power on earth, save the King, Lords, and Commons of Ireland, had a right to make laws to bind the people of Ireland." This he described as the most illegal and unconstitutional declaration ever promulgated, when it was recollected that there was no analogy between the situation of Ireland now and the situation of Ireland when that declaration was adopted. Another of the mottos on the member's card was an extract from a speech delivered by the Right Hon. Henry Saurin, in opposition to the Union, in the Irish House of Commons, viz.—"You may make the Union the law, but you cannot make it binding on conscience." He then proceeded to describe and exhibit the card of another class of members, the volunteers, who must either have subscribed or collected £10 for the funds of the association. One portion of his description having elicited a very general laugh, his Attorney-Generalship waxed warm, and forthwith expressed his surprise and indignation that at that early stage of the case such a feeling had arrived at a certain feeling, when a solemn statement of counsel would elicit such a demonstration of merriment on the part of the audience, but he promised, before the conclusion of his statement, to lay such a case of conspiracy before the jury as would be considered anything but a laughing matter. On this portion of this case, he referred to the fact of districts subscribing a certain sum to the funds of the Association, being entitled to a newspaper; and from which he inferred that the intention of the leaders of the Association was to follow the example of the French Jacobins, who promulgated and taught sedition through the columns of the press.

He next referred to the Repeal Association, commencing with the meetings in January, 1843, and read a number of extracts from speeches delivered by Mr. O'Connell and others, all of which were calculated to excite hatred and ill-will towards England in the minds of her Majesty's Irish subjects.

He then discussed the attendance of the jury to the statement of the Nation newspaper, which he asserted was got up for the special purpose of promulgating sedition throughout the land. In proof of the object and tendency of the Nation newspaper, the right hon. gentleman read the following article published in that paper, entitled—

"THE MEMORY OF THE DEAD."

Who fears to speak of Ninety-Eight?	The dust of some is Irish earth;
Who blushes at the name?	Among the exiled they rest;
When cowards mock the patriot's fate,	And the same land that gave them birth
Who hangs his head for shame?	Has caught them to its breast.
He's all a knave, or half a slave,	And we will pray that one day dear
Who slights his country thus;	Full many a race may store
But a true man, like you man,	Of true men, like you men,
Will fill your glass with us.	To act as brave a part.
We drink the memory of the brave,	They rose in dark and evil days
The faithful and the few—	To right their native land;
Some lie far off beyond the wave,	They kindled here a living blaze
Some sleep in Ireland, too;	That nought could withstand.
All—all are dear—but most the love	Alas! that Might can vanquish Right—
The fame of those who died;	They fell and pass'd away;
All true men, like you, men,	But true men, like you, men,
Remember them with pride.	Are plenty here to day
Some on the sheers of distant lands	Then here's their memory—may it be
Their weary hearts have laid,	For us a guiding light,
And by the stranger's heedless hands	To cheer our strife for liberty,
Their lonely graves were made;	And teach us to unite.
But, though their clay be far away	Through good and ill, be Ireland's still,
Beyond the Atlantic foam—	Though and as theirs your fate;
In true men, like you, men,	And true men be you, men,
Their spirit's still at home.	Like those of Ninety-Eight.

The learned gentleman then proceeded to read several prose articles, all of which, he contended, were seditious and revolutionary, both in intention and effect. He next entered on a long exposition of the feelings of her Majesty's present Government on the Repeal question, in proof of which he quoted extracts from speeches delivered in both Houses of Parliament on the 9th of May last. He then proceeded to bring the monster meetings before the Court; and from one to near five o'clock was occupied in reading extracts from speeches delivered by Mr. O'Connell, all of which he denounced as calculated to bring the law and the constitution into contempt. Mr. O'Connell's doctrine, that the Queen could of her own accord repeal the Union, without reference to the British House of Commons, by the issue of writs for the assemblage of an Irish Parliament, he denounced as illegal and unconstitutional; and the quotations from the speeches of Plunket, Saurin, and Burke, which Mr. O'Connell was accustomed to deliver in public, in order to convince his deluded followers that those great men regarded the Union as null and void, and in no respect binding on the people of Ireland, he had also established to pronouncing to be a total and unjustifiable perversion of the meaning of the speakers, not one of whom had expressed an unfavourable opinion of the Union subsequent to the passing of the measure.

The learned gentleman was then about to refer to the meeting at Baltinglass, but said that as he had now come down to August, probably that would be the best time for him to come to a conclusion for the day.

The Chief Justice said that the Court did not wish to distress the learned gentleman if he was desirous of concluding then. He wished to know what was to be done with the jury?

The Attorney-General said that that was a matter which rested entirely with the Court, and he begged to hand up a case on that point—it was that of Kennan and others. If necessary, the jury could be accommodated with comfortable accommodation at an hotel.

Chief Justice.—Have you taken the subject into your consideration, Mr. Moore?

Mr. Moore.—I have not, my Lord.

The Foreman.—It will be a very serious thing for men of business if they are to be locked up during the whole of these proceedings. (Laughter.)

Chief Justice.—I hope there is no danger of what you describe. (A laugh.) Then addressing the Attorney-General, he said—I expected to be assisted on the subject by the gentlemen at the bar.

The Attorney-General thought that, considering the serious question at issue, the jury ought not to be allowed to separate.

A Juror here observed that the duty imposed on the jury was a very arduous one, but that it would be made much more so by their not being allowed to go home.

Mr. Rigby said there were many of the jurors who were persons of active habits. For instance, he himself had sat more for the last two days than he had done for the last six months. (Laughter.) Although that observation of his occasioned a smile, he would just observe that he was a person who was in the habit of being on his feet nine or ten hours a day, and that the change from such a course of life had already a serious effect on him

The Attorney-General said, that if the jury were allowed to separate, he trusted they would not be allowed to communicate with persons, or to do anything that wish he had no intention of casting the least imputation on the traversers.

Mr Moore expressed his concurrence as to the jury being saved from every possible inconvenience.

The Lord Chief Justice requested the jury to hear in mind the suggestion of Mr. Moore. If any of the jury should hear of a party being so ill-advised as to venture to communicate with any one directly or indirectly on the subject matter of the trial he should at once complain to the Court

The Court then adjourned till ten o'clock next day.

THIRD DAY.—WEDNESDAY.

The court was again thronged at an early hour to hear the continuation of the Attorney-General's opening speech.

At five minutes past ten o'clock their Lordships took their seats on the bench.

Mr. O'Connell and his son, John O'Connell, attired in the bar costume, were in punctual attendance

The Clerk of the Crown called the traversers, who severally answered to their names.

The Attorney-General commenced by alluding to the proceedings which took place at the Repeal demonstration which was held at Baltinglass, in the county of Wicklow. On the 6th of August there was held this meeting at Baltinglass, at which the traversers, Mr. O'Connell, Dr. Gray, and Mr. Steele, were present; and the paper of one of the accused stated the numbers present to be 150,000. The Attorney-General having read numerous extracts from the speeches made, said that it was material to consider what was the effect of those speeches on the populace; and he would be able to prove such expressions used by the people on this occasion as follows: "We must have Repeal, and we will get it; let us wait a little longer, for the time is nigher than you think;" and "that all their part of the country was ready to turn out, but they were afraid of the sea-side fellows." Another said "that Father Lalor, at the chapel, told them the Council had gone too far to be stopped, and that the people will get it, but not without blood." (Sensation.) Others declared that they must get Repeal; that there would not be a stroke of work done in the country during the year, and that the people would rise to a man; another declared that they would not repeat disturbances, but, if they were refused, "foreign power" would strike the blow. The Attorney-General next referred to the speech of Mr. O'Connell at the dinner at Baltinglass, where he praised the Spanish sergeants for having "pronounced," and hurled Espartero from his power; and the English sergeants who had not justice done to them, would be benefited if the Repeal cause were to succeed. The next date which was mentioned was the 15th of August, on which day appeared in the Nation an article, entitled "The March of Nationality." Having read this composition, the Attorney-General dwelt on the nilegality of the meeting which had been held on the Hill of Tara on that day. The next meeting was held in a few days, on the 15th of August, at Tara, and this was a very remarkable demonstration. Tara had been selected because the Irish Kings used to be crowned there; and because a battle took place which fought there in 1789, in which the rebels had been defeated, and the object was to exasperate the people of Ireland, by recalling scenes of former contests, and, to prove that this was so, numbers of the people were seen kneeling on the spot where the rebels of '98 had been buried, and gathering wild geraniums of a red colour, which they believed were stained with the blood of the slain. At that meeting Mr. O'Connell spoke, and told the people that the Saxons of Ireland alone would beat the British soldiery: he asked the people there if any were cowards, and stated that all the magistrates who had been deprived of their commissions of the peace should be appointed arbitrators by himself. Now, to whom the people should go to have their disputes settled there. This was a plain usurpation of the prerogative of the Crown, for although the parties were required to sign a consent, these courts were illegal. They being in the habit of issuing summonses, under the decree of entering into a consent to abide by the decision of the arbitrators, did not prevent those courts being illegal, and a usurpation of the prerogatives of the Crown, the foundation of justice. At the dinner in the evening Dr. Gray spoke, and alluded to the memory of the patriots of 1798, whose grave he had visited that day. At the dinner Mr. O'Connell spoke, and alluded to the submission of the people,—but this circumstance was a formidable one, because if they obeyed a single man, and kept the peace now, they would be ready to take the field also at his command. "When I want you I shall find you again," as Mr. O'Connell said, "the sooner the better," was the response. The next meeting was held on the 20th of August, at Roscommon, and Mr. O'Connell himself described the effect of these meetings to be "to strike terror into their enemies. They bring in the habit of friendly to British connection, "and to give confidence to their friends." On the 22d of August there was a meeting of the Association, at which a plan was read for the "renewed action of Irish agitation." At that meeting Dr. Gray's resignation took place on the 23d of August, at which were present all the traversers but the Rev. Mr. Tierney and Mr. Duffy. On that occasion Dr. Gray submitted his plan for the appointment of arbitrators in every county, without having exercised its prerogative by dismissing magistrates who thought fit to attend those repeal demonstrations. It was perfectly clear from Dr. Gray's observations in prefacing the reading of the report that his appointed arbitrators were to usurp and vest in the Association—thus usurping the administration of the law. The report was long, but it would be given in evidence in the course of the trial. He next called the attention of the jury to a publication called the Nation on the 26th of August, which he described to be one of the most powerful engines of the Repeal press for working out Mr. O'Connell's views. It is entitled, "The Crisis is upon us." Our union with England was not merely an unjust and iniquitous, but an illegal and invalid act. The natural rights of the people were trampled down, in utter disregard of the forms and spirit of the constitution. The statesman's wisdom and the lawyer's learning were abhorrent to the instinctive repudiation of the patriot. Saurin, among others, declared that resistance was a question of time and prudence, and would become a duty, whenever strength and opportunity might concur in justifying the effort for its abrogation. A greater than Saurin has at length given forth the irrevocable voice RESISTANCE TO THE UNION HAS BECOME A DUTY. The honourable and learned gentleman then laid before the jury the objectionable language which was uttered at the Roscommon, Loughrea, and Cashel meetings, as well as at other meetings at the Repeal Association. In adverting to the Clifden meeting, where Mr. O'Connell had complained of the absence of manufactures and commerce in Ireland, the Attorney-General asked, why did he not tell the misguided people that the want of them was owing to the pernicious system of taxation which so grievously oppressed Ireland? Why did he not tell them that the reason of English capital not being employed here was the insecurity of life and property? Why did he not tell them that if Ireland had not such manufactures and commerce as the latter country to no man wereby more indebted for it than himself? In referring to the Mullaghmast meeting he complained of the selection of the locality, where, according to his newspaper statements, by the reign of Elizabeth had combined the Geraldines of Kildare, and which had been the scene of the most horrible massacre. After

THE ADOPTED;

OR,

IMPULSE NOT PRINCIPLE.

BY MISS CAMILLA TOULMIN.

PART I.

T was the scene of an election; and though the young remembered many candidates for the honour of representing the good people of C——, and more than one or two elections; never "in the memory of the oldest inhabitant," had the town been in such a commotion. It had used to boast a set of voters so nearly of one mind, that for years they always returned, by a large majority, a member staunch to a certain line of politics—we will not stay to particularise which. But latterly the people had run into the opposite way of thinking, and like most of us, when we have seized on a new opinion, were violent in the extreme. Grey heads were shaken, and dark forebodings breathed, and the present mania attributed, by the oracles of the place, to everything but the simple cause, that during the last seven years many fresh young minds had shed their influence upon the community, while the most active supporters of the old cause had sunk, one by one, into the grave, without leaving a successor. Whatever the cause, however, the fact remained, that Mr. Aimington, who, seven years before, had been returned almost unanimously, and carried from the hustings in triumph by his boisterous constituents, was now not only defeated with scorn, but pelted, maltreated, and his very life placed in danger by the excited mob. Even his friends were, for the most part, lukewarm, only voting for him to keep out his opponent. They did say, indeed, that he had wavered in his opinions, and to own that he is wiser now than he was a year ago, may require moral courage in a politician, but somehow or another is never estimated as a virtue in him. Perhaps, however, had he changed more decidedly, he might have pleased the other party; as it was, he gave satisfaction to none.

Yet in that angry excited crowd, there were many honest men who cried "Shame, shame!" when they saw the fearful missiles flung at poor Mr. Aiming ton, who was now a grey-headed man in the decline of life, and moreover of a slender frame, and apparently in delicate health. Loudest in these vociferations, most active in his endeavours to calm the furious mob, was Richard Greyleigh, a miller, a high-hearted yeoman, and a man of Herculean power. A stone had cut Mr. Aimington's cheek, and the sight of that blood trickling from it, roused the indignation of the honest fellow to fever heat. Armed now with triple strength, he parted the crowd as if it had but consisted of school-boys—hurling, however many a full-grown man to the ground on either side, till he reached the feeble friends who surrounded the unsuccessful candidate; when he placed his burly figure—he was six feet two, and a model of manly symmetry—before him. He wore his miller's coat, and was a fine mark for the discontented; but though he continued to shield Mr. Aimington with his own person till that gentleman reached his carriage, Greyleigh escaped without any serious injury, though he certainly bore evidence of the fray.

"How can I thank you my brave protector—to whom is it that I am so much indebted?" exclaimed the persecuted one, as he cordially shook the hand of the weather-beaten miller; "one I am sure who has voted on the right side."

"That have I, Sir, these five elections—I stick to my father's principles, and his father's before him; but as for being indebted to me, Sir, I must have been something more contemptible than a coward to have stood quietly by. Those precious rascals! I wonder they are not ashamed to call themselves Englishmen. Such as them to talk of choosing law-makers—it wasn't so when I was a lad."

"But your name, my good friend? I remember you well enough, but forget whereabouts I saw you."

"Richard Greyleigh, at your honour's service; we live down by the mill yonder, t'other side the hill."

"Oh, the pretty farm-house, and the rosy children. I remember them all well."

And it was quite true that amid the hundreds of constituents Mr. Aimington had visited during the canvassing, the miller's family had made sufficient impression to be distinctly remembered.

It was a bright June day, that following the election; when, about the hour of noon, the miller and his family were seated at their homely dinner. The children, eight in number, seemed of all imaginable ages, varying really from a well-grown notable girl of fifteen, to an infant six months' old, who slept in its rustic cradle through the no small din of knives and forks. Beans and bacon formed the sumptuous fare, but it might have been observed that something more dainty still had been provided for the youngest at table, a little girl of four years old. Partly, because she had been so long the youngest, and partly because, being of a slighter make, she had been considered the most delicate, little Ellen had grown to be the acknowledged pet of them all. The truth was, she only looked delicate by comparison with her yet more roddy and robust brothers and sisters. A stranger who looked at her brilliant complexion, sun burned where not shaded by the rich brown hair which waved—not crisped—naturally; or marked her finely-cut lips, red as the field poppy just then stuck in her russet frock; or more than all peered into her full soft eyes—the hue of the violet when the sun shines on it through its bath of dew—would have owned that her beauty did not all arise from the uncommon intelligence of her face; but owed a fair half its lustre to the pure animal health and enjoyment which beamed through all.

This was the party—seated in the farm house kitchen—disturbed by the unexpected visit of Mr. and Mrs. Aimington. So briskly had the carriage driven up, and so quickly had the visiters alighted, that there could be no preparation for their reception. Nature, however, is an excellent teacher of manners when people feel rightly; especially when difference of station is so distinctly marked as to prevent either party taking up a false position. Thus, though the miller's wife bethought herself that her guests should have been shown into the Sunday parlour, she did not insist on their retiring to it, after Mrs. Aimington had drawn her Indian shawl more tightly round, and assured her that though it was summer she did not find the heat of the fire at all disagreeable. It was an exciting meeting for all; a proud moment for the miller's wife. Mrs. Aimington struggled for composure, but when she saw Greyleigh's bruised face, one eye by the way blackened and swollen up, she burst into tears, and taking the honest miller's brawny hand between both her own, poured forth the strongest expressions of gratitude. Mr. Aimington was little less overcome, while he besought Greyleigh to look upon him as a friend, and point out in what manner he could serve him. Nothing, however, touched the parents' hearts so much as the kindly notice they took of the children; nor was it, as is so often the case, an assumption of manner, for, bereaved years ago of their only two, love of children was with them almost a passion. Little Ellen, neglected for a few moments, had yet scrambled from her high chair, and seeming to understand that it would be very uncourteous of the house dog to bark or growl, had clasped her arms round Punch's neck as if to keep him quiet. Punch, be it known, was a faithful, sagacious creature, though about the ugliest cur in the parish; having, in fact, been named from his grotesque appearance.

"Come and give me a kiss, little darling," said Mrs. Aimington, in the winning voice which children so easily recognise; and Punch was released, though he chose to follow Ellen and plant himself near the strangers. She took the child upon her knee, and, attracted by some trinket the lady wore, it showed no inclination to leave her. Not, however, till Mrs. Aimington had expressed her intention of calling again shortly, and had placed a purse containing twenty sovereigns in Dame Greyleigh's hand, saying—"Mr. Aimington cannot bear to offer your husband money—between us wives, you know, it is different—you must accept this from me"—did they talk of leaving.

Ellen prattled away fearlessly—"Love Punch too," she lisped, as a sort of answer to the lady's caresses—"Punse, Punse," and Punch came, and was patted and noticed.

"So you love Punch very much?" said Mrs. Aimington, evidently amused with her artless manner, "do you know I have a pet dog in the carriage; will you come and see him?" she continued, and, of course, the chatterbox was delighted at the idea.

Bijou was a thoroughbred King Charles; and, certainly, with his bright eyes and long silky ears, formed a very striking contrast to honest Punch. Ellen found him lying on a pile of shawls, one side of the carriage being devoted to his accommodation.

"Love Bijou too," cried Mrs. Aimington, parodying the child's own words as she was lifted in, and really so very well did little Ellen seem inclined to obey, that the difficulty was to separate them. "Let her have a ride with us," said Mr Aimington, "we will bring her back in an hour." And so they did.

Summer had deepened into autumn. Without puzzling themselves to trace cause and effect, the children noticed that the shadow of the mill at noon grew every day longer and longer, just when they would most have enjoyed the sun shine; and that the early sun-set was now behind the church, instead of through the elm trees. And while the sun narrows his journey, and lengthens the noonday shadows, do human hearts stand still?

The day's toil was over. The little ones were in bed, and the miller and his wife, with the elder children, were sitting round the cheerful fire—some of them within the old fashioned chimney corner—the comfort of which the biting air of early November made them fully appreciate. Yet the party were more than commonly grave. Twice had Greyleigh's pipe gone out from mere absence of mind; and thrice had his wife laid down her knitting to wipe away the falling tears.

"But, Peggy, woman," said Greyleigh, after a pause, "are you sure of what you say—are you sure they want to take our Nelly from us, and make a lady of her outright? She's a prettier plaything than them dogs and parrots, and I don't wonder at their liking to have her up at the Hall for days together, as they've done so often—but she'll grow out of being a plaything, and what then?"

"I only tell you, Richard," replied the mother, "what Mrs. Aimington's own maid said to me when she brought her home to day, by way of preparing me, as she said, for what was coming. Though, I believe, she expected me to be out of my wits with joy, instead of bursting into terms of sorrow. It is because they've been so good to us, that I am so unhappy; otherwise there would be nothing to do but to say, 'we won't give up our child'.—I know they've set their minds upon it and we shall be called ungrateful; and even the child herself, oh! it is that which makes me so unhappy," and sobs again impeded her utterance.

"Ellen herself!" returned the miller, "what is it you mean?" and he laid his hand affectionately on his wife's shoulder.

"I mean that when she does come home, she pines after the playthings and sweetmeats, and all the fine things up at the Hall; even after the fine clothes, for what I know, for the maid told me Mrs. Aimington has got a regular set of things for her, and that when she goes out in the carriage, she looks for all the world like one of the tip-top gentle folks."

"Our Nelly! well, we always said she ought to have been born a lady."

"I wish we had not said so."

There was another pause. For a little while the miller smoked vigorously away at his pipe; but it would not do, he threw it down and passed his sleeve across his eyes.

"Peggy," said he, in a husky voice, "for seventeen years you've been a good wife to me, and all that time we have never been parted for seventeen hours together. As the children come, they clung round us, and have never been parted either, and whatever people may say about 'good luck,' this will be a hard trial to us. If times were altogether thriving, it might be right of us to refuse this offer for our Nelly; but you know I have not yet paid off all the mortgage with which my poor father encumbered the farm. If I live a few years longer, I may hope, with God's blessing, to do so, and leave Dick a free man. Yet when seasons are bad, you know it is as much as we can do to live and pay our way, and I doubt if we have a right to refuse this good thing for our child; for her, too, who never looks as if she would be able to work like the others."

The mother wept on, and Greyleigh continued:—"Mr. Aimington, too, has been the most generous friend we ever had; how could we have apprenticed John to the nursery business but for him; and the lad had so set his heart upon it, that I doubt if he would have steadied to anything else. Ah! and he goes away next week: that will be another parting, though a very joyful one. But to lose little Nelly!"

"I wonder," murmured the wife, after another pause, "I wonder if she will grow proud and despise her poor father and mother?"

"If I thought she would ever be so wicked," said the miller, in a firmer tone than before, "she should never run the chance of being corrupted. Yet human nature is human nature, and we must make up our minds that she won't seem like one of us."

'I feel as if she would be dead to us," returned Dame Greyleigh: then, continuing, as if a new train of thoughts had arisen, "I wonder if riches make the heaven they seem to do"

That night the tearful parents bent over the rude bed of their darling. An elder girl slept by her side, and it chanced that Ellen had turned away from her sister, and had fallen asleep, clasping tightly a richly-dressed doll she had been allowed to bring home.

"God bless her!" exclaimed Greyleigh, in a husky voice; "may she never blame us for giving her up to the stranger."

But the mother sank upon her knees, and woke the unconscious child with her loud sobs and passionate tears.

Yes, Ellen Greyleigh was given up to "the strangers;" and there is no need to describe minutely the conflicting feelings and duties which struggled for the mastery in the hearts of her honest parents. If some there be who consider the trust of a parent one too sacred to be, on any pretence, transferred to another, many would have accused the Greyleighs, had they used such an argument, of adopting it as a cloak for their own selfishness. Yet, right or wrong in the abstract, they did well; for they acted from principle, giving up their child because they believed their doing so was every way to her advantage, and because, had they refused that which was urged as a favour by their benefactors, they would have accused themselves of the blackest ingratitude. How far Mr. and Mrs. Aimington were actuated by principle, events will best show. And yet it may as well be owned at once that their offer was prompted by nothing more worthy than a good impulse; if that can be called good which was three parts selfish. They were fond of children; fond, as many people are, with a sort of animal instinct, and, as the father had hinted, preferred the beautiful and intelligent little Ellen for a pet, to the dogs and parrots. But it did not sink into their minds that in removing her from the guardianship and guidance of her own humble parents, they had in reality taken upon themselves the duties, and incurred the responsibilities, of father and mother. Nor did they even clearly define to themselves whether they intended educating "The Adopted" in her own sphere, or raising her, by education, companionship, and the bestowal of fortune, to theirs. They were almost content to think of her only as a present pet and plaything.

As, however, they were "kind hearted" people, they neither wished nor intended to separate little Ellen entirely from her parents. On the contrary, it was arranged that, for the present, she should visit them every Sunday, after church time, accompanied by Mrs. Aimington's maid, Johnson by name. The first meeting was not a very trying one. The child looked so beautiful in the elegant dress in which she was attired, and pleased with three days' petting at the Hall, and too young to understand the holy ties which had just been sundered, she smiled so joyously, and prattled away so happily, that the unselfish parents almost forgot their own loss in looking at and listening to her. One little week, however, worked some change; the smile came and went, but the prattle was less; and when the parting moment arrived, her lips trembled, and the deep blue eyes looked yet deeper, through her tears.

"Oh, fie, Miss Ellen," said Johnson, "what will mamma Aimington say to see you crying? Nobody loves little girls who cry."

But the MOTHER caught her to her heart, and—rocking to and fro in a paroxysm of feeling, while the child's arms were looked round her neck—showed that she at least loved her none the less for her "natural tears."

The following Sunday the case was worse; and then the parents, with that quiet heroism which is the very essence of true courage, resolved that they would for a while sacrifice the joy of seeing her, with the hope and belief that she would grow reconciled to her new home, when not reminded of her old one. It would be doing Mr. and Mrs. Aimington injustice to say that they were not touched by the instance of devotion in the miller and his wife (for the suggestion was theirs); but the conduct of "the benefactors" not having the root of principle, there was nothing in their hearts to be strengthened by the fast, though impulse led them to indulge the child even more than heretofore, the surest way, as they believed, to make her love them.

Yet had they been actuated by the severest principles of duty, well do we know that the natural feelings of affection in such parents as the Greyleighs, would have been the same; and the wrench from all home ties, even to the childish heart of little Ellen, would have been as violent. But in this case the circumstance of witnessing the struggle, would have made yet more clear the duties which devolved on Mr. and Mrs. Aimington; as it was the effect was but temporary. Only once more was Ellen brought to the farm house, before she accompanied her "Mamma and Papa" (in distinction to Mother and Father) to London for the season. It proved to them a long one, and when after six months they returned to the Hall, a change in their protegée was indeed perceptible. The heart of a child of four years old is very flexible—she soon accustomed to her new home! The parents saw the truth at a glance, and though they sighed they would not for worlds have had it otherwise. But when she shrunk from her boisterous brothers, and smoothed her white frock after the clasping and kissing of her sisters, they felt she was no longer one of them, and as they were simple specimens of human nature, neither better nor worse than the average, something like envy crept into their minds. Poor Punch even seemed almost forgotten—at all events, she was afraid of him now.

Three years passed swiftly away unmarked by any striking event; unless, indeed, it be worth noticing that one, after an illness—some malady which children usually encounter—which attacked little Ellen in London, change of air was recommended, and she was sent home for a few weeks to recruit. Great was the joy of the parents, and the second parting; and even the child showed that her affectionate feelings had rather been frozen over than their springs dried up. Perhaps it was the happiest thing for all parties that, at the end of three years, Mr. and Mrs. Aimington determined on leaving England for an indefinite period, travelling in the south of Europe having been recommended by Mr. Aimington's physicians; and Ellen, of course, accompanied them.

Notwithstanding she had paid a visit to the farm-house the preceding day, to take leave of her relatives, the parents asked yet for one last lingering look. At the carriage, with its closely-packed imperial, and many travelling appendages, passed down the high road, about a mile from the mill, two anxious watchers might have been noticed, and there, indeed, had they loitered for a couple of hours. But, alas! as it whirled rapidly by, they saw but the back of a little pink silk bonnet—Ellen was standing looking out at the opposite window!

An outline of the events of the next eight years will be enough; for how, like dissolving views, does one scene of human life shift almost imperceptibly into another. Children at the farm had grown into men and women, and some had gone out into the world to seek their fortunes "in service:" for times had not become better, and the mortgage was still unredeemed. Eight years of care, more than of labour, had shewn their work both on Greyleigh and his wife; both seemed to have turned the hill, and to be in the decline of life. They had lost, too, something of the cheerfulness which had supported them amid the struggles of earlier years; it might be they began to distrust home, which had so often deceived them. They had received many letters from Ellen, and great were their pride and amusement at her beautiful writing, and, as they considered it, wonderful learning. Yet, truth to tell, her education had been woefully neglected; for Mr. and Mrs. Aimington never having quite made up their minds as to her future position in society, had neither systematically afforded her the opportunities of acquiring a solid and refined education, such as would have fitted her for their sphere, nor given her the useful information which would have rendered her a happy and respected member of her own.

Still Ellen Greyleigh, at fifteen, was very far from ignorant. In the first instance Johnson had, at Mrs. Aimington's desire, taught her to read, and being like an only child, without playmates or associates, she had taken to reading as an amusement. At the Hall a well-stocked library was always accessible, and thus at a very early age she acquired much desultory information. The best books—sterling works—were naturally selected for travelling companions, and of new ones, only those of approved merit were ordered to be sent from England. This narrower selection was, however, a great advantage to Ellen, for it in some sort directed her reading; while intercourse with persons of refined manners formed her own, and the habit of hearing her own language spoken correctly, prevented herself from falling into any very glaring errors. She had even picked up a little French and Italian, and having shown great facility in acquiring them, had been indulged with a few lessons at distant intervals. For music she had a decided ear, and thus was able to improve the very trifling instruction she had received, though after all she played chiefly by ear.

Such was Ellen Greyleigh, with her taste more cultivated than her mind, when she returned to England, a beautiful womanly girl of fifteen. She was too grateful, as well as too young and inexperienced, yet to feel how undesired was her position—one to be treated as an equal, and the most perilous employed in some office, which though nothing more menial than a child in the highest rank of life might perform for a parent, yet lost that sanctity when required from her in the absence of strangers, and as a constant duty, not at distant intervals. For music she had a dread rather as a humble dependent or an equal, and one lady, an intimate friend of the family, was rather surprised to find Ellen seated next herself at dinner, after having observed that she had answered Mrs. Aimington's bell to assist her at her toilet. This occurred in London immediately after the travellers arrived from the continent, and before they returned to the Hall, where, during the autumn, they expected several friends to visit them.

Perhaps it was Ellen's first meeting with her family—who were still remembered with affection, and the consciousness that the little presents she had brought them, purchased with her own pocket allowance, were quite inappropriate—which taught her to think of and feel her own different position.

(To be Concluded in our Next.

NEW MUSIC.

SWEET ERIN ALANNA ASTHORE. A new Irish ballad; the Poetry by Dion Bourcicault, Esq.; the Music by T. German Reed. Reed and Sons.

The sentiment of this song could well afford to wear a more fashionable dress. It contains many a happy idea, which should not be obfuscated by an affectation of vulgar simplicity. The melody is graceful and fluent, and the harmony clear and correct, except where the composer uses the diminished sixth and fifth, instead of the diminished seventh. C sharp is not D flat in certain notations, although it be identical in sound.

THE FORD HOPE. Ballad; the Poetry by Lady Flora Hastings—the music by Miss Clarkson. Ollivier, New Bond-street.

The melody of this ballad is graceful and flowing; but when will ladies study counterpoint, or abstain from blotting paper until they know how to harmonize correctly? As to the words, there is a spirit of devotion in them which could only emanate from an elegant mind and a feeling heart.

MONUMENT TO MOLIERE, AT PARIS.

The inauguration of this superb monument to the Memory of Molière (just completed at Paris) took place on Monday last. It was generally apprehended on Sunday that this ceremony might be signalised by an émeute. Thanks to the firmness of the Government, and the wisdom and sufficiency of its precautions, nothing of the kind occurred. The affair passed off in the best possible manner. The celebration we intend to detail to our readers, from our own correspondent: the monument has been raised at the expense of the French Government, and by public subscription: there were to be an oration and other solemnities, and the day was to conclude with the performance of Le Tartuffe, and Le Malade Imaginaire, at the Théâtre Français; with a commemorative address between the pieces.

MONUMENT TO MOLIERE, AT PARIS.

MADAME DULCKEN.

This splendid pianist belongs to "a family of sweet sounds!" Her brother, David, is one of the first violinists of the day, and her sister, Maddle. David, bids fair to rival her elder sister's wonderful and delightful performance on the pianoforte. There is a great charm resulting from seeing a performer evidently pleased with that which he is doing; and certainly a more good-humoured, or sweeter face, never smiled over most dexterous fingers than Madame Dulcken's—

"Winning her own and nations' plaudits."

All styles are alike welcome to her; from the serious majesty of Handel down to the graceful legerité of Chopin, she has ability at her fingers' ends! In solo playing she is delightful, but it is only in a generous rivalry that the powers of this fair artists are strongly put forth. It is quite enthusiastic in concertante music to hear her emulate the strength and elegance of a Lizst, a Thalberg, or the quiet grace of a Cramer and a Benedict. Her fingers are "like the sweet south," they at once "steal and give odour," and impart a new beauty to everything they touch. Madame Dulcken has done much to improve the musical taste in this country. Her soirée on Wednesday evening, at her own residence, was a delicious treat, and a lesson at the same time, to all students of that instrument of which she is "regina."

Madame Dulcken's first soirée musicale (second series) took place at her residence in Harley-street, on Wednesday evening, and was attended by a brilliant and fashionable audience, who, throughout the evening, testified their satisfaction by their applause, more particularly directed to the charming concert-giver herself, whose performance of some extremely difficult music must have contented the most fastidious of critics. The concert commenced with Mozart's beautiful quartet, in G, exceedingly well executed by Messrs. Willy, Goffrie, Ella, and Lucas. Weber's scena from "Oberon" followed, sung by Mr. Manvers. This is by no means a fine song, let the admirers of Weber say and think as they will. That it contains fine points, there cannot be a question, but as a whole, it is common-place in materials, and defective in construction. The slow movement in A minor, "Mourn, ye maidens of Palestine," must be admitted as an exception to the opinion we have given, for it is one of the most lovely hits we know of.

MADAME DULCKEN

We would advise singers to be more cautious in their selection of songs for concerts. The one in question was sadly out of place. In the first instance, it requires the orchestral, instead of the pianoforte, accompaniments; and in the second, it ought never to be sung out of its intended situation in the opera. Mr. Manvers sung well, and made the most of it; perhaps a little too much, as he took upon himself to alter several passages, especially in the last movement, whenever the word "victory" occurred. This calls to our remembrance an anecdote of poor Weber and Mr. C. Bland, who played "Oberon," in the opera of that name. At one of the last rehearsals at Covent Garden, this gentleman, instead of singing the notes the composer had written, substituted some florid roulade of his own. Weber stopped the band immediately, and, rising from his chair on the stage, tottered up to Bland (for he was within a few weeks of his death, and exhausted from his violent cough), and laying his hand gently on his shoulder, said—"Ah! Mr. Bland, I am so very sorry you should take so much trouble——" But the rest of the sentence was cut short by Mr. Bland, who, in a shower of compliments, interrupted him, saying, among other things, "Oh! my dear sir, how can you speak of trouble? Trouble! with such magnificent music?—Impossible!" "Stop, stop, my good Mr. Bland," Weber replied, "hear the rest of my sentence; I meant to have said, if you had let me, that I was sorry you should take so much trouble to sing what I had NOT written for you." Poor Bland never got over it, but always vowed "Oberon" was a very inferior opera (for Weber!).

Onslow's Sonata in F minor by Mdme. Dulcken and her sister, Madlle. David, followed, and was beautifully played by both ladies. The latter possesses much of the delicacy of touch of her talented instructress, but wants the force and extreme finish which characterise her playing beyond that of any other performer we ever heard. As a composition, this sonata is rather dry, but it gradually improves towards the end—the last movement being almost fine. Miss Sara Flower sung Beethoven's glorious, though somewhat unequal, scena "Ah Perfido" very well, but we must repeat, as our often-given opinion, that this young lady is not, as yet, in a sufficiently forward state of musical education to do justice to her really fine voice. We should like her to have two years' hard practice, with good instruction, before she again appeared in public. The grand feature of the evening was Mdme. Dulcken's performance of Weber's immensely difficult Sonata in C (not E, as stated in the programme). Her execution of the first movement was forcible and grand in the extreme. The andante was characterised by that distilled style, if we may be allowed the term, which is so peculiar a feature of this player's excellence. The perpetual motion of semiquavers in the finale was wonderfully kept up. The other pieces which claim particular notice were the trio of Mendelssohn, beautiful in itself, and beautifully played, and the duet "See the Conquering Hero," by Madame Dulcken and Mr. Lucas, which seemed to give very general pleasure. Misses S. Novello and Steele added considerably, by their finished singing, to render this one of the most delightful concerts we ever heard; and we heartily wish Madame Dulcken success in the laudable undertaking of bringing before the public, in so acceptable a shape, the choice, but little known, works she gives us on these occasions.

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

The revival of "The Merry Wives of Windsor" at this home of Thalia has been crowned by the most triumphant success. Though the fat knight is not so amusing on the stage as in the closet, we must say, in justice to Strickland, that he is the best Falstaff we have ever yet seen. Stephen Kemble, whose obesity physically qualified him for the part, never made much of it; Bartley, and (proh pudor!) Mrs. Glover made excellent attempts at it, but Strickland is at home in it, and luxuriates in his unctuous style of acting, to the delight of the audience, and, apparently, his self-gratulations. Madame Vestris and Mrs. Nisbett are a most merry pair of wives; two sweet syrens that enchant the public as well as poor Sir John. The play is well produced and well received, which proves that the author was not "For an age, but for all time."

PRINCESS'S.

On Wednesday evening the opera of "The Maid of Judah" was produced at this theatre for the purpose of introducing Mr. and Mrs. Wood, after their long estrangement from the metropolitan boards. Their reception was most enthusiastic. Mrs. Wood has lost somewhat of Miss Paton's voice, but is as brilliant otherwise as ever; and her better half is in the possession of the same volume of strong, sentimental, but unrefined voice as quondam. Their announcement in the bills rather amuses us. It states that these celebrated vocalists will "play for a short engagement." What is the meaning of this?

MISS RAINFORTH AND MR. HARRISON, IN BALFE'S OPERA OF "THE BOHEMIAN GIRL,"—THE GIPSY'S DREAM.

DRURY-LANE.

The second act of Balfe's opera ("The Bohemian Girl") opens with an interesting incident—that of Arline, the stolen child, aided by the influence of a dream, imagining herself in the "marble halls," to which, by right, she had inheritance, but of which she as yet has no knowledge. The situation, interesting in itself, is rendered doubly so by the simple and natural acting and singing of Miss Rainforth, as Arline, who is all that could be desired in the part. The manner in which she vocally recounts her dream is most exquisite; there is an enthusiastic ecstacy expressed at the probability of its reality, and

A hope indulg'd in, that, like summer clouds
In autumn evenings, promises good morrow,

We have already chronicled the great merit of Mr. Harrison, in Thaddeus.

MABEL MARCHMONT.

By THOMAS MILLER.

AUTHOR OF "GODFREY MALVERN," "GIDEON GILES," "ROYSTON GOWER," "RURAL SKETCHES," "A DAY IN THE WOODS," "BEAUTIES OF THE COUNTRY," ETC.

THE old woman halted not until she had reached the outside of the churchyard wall, where her further progress was interrupted by a long line of gipsies, who, with their donkey-carts, dogs, horses, children, and baggage, were journeying onward on a fresh summer encampment. The old woman waited until figure after figure glided by—an almost endless succession—the children swinging and singing in the panniers, while their black-haired and olive-complexioned mothers joined in chorus, and cheir swarthy fathers occasionally chimed in with a blow or an oath, to hasten the lagging pace of their jaded and over-driven animals. Kettles and camp-poles rattled against each other, and on trudged women in men's coats, and children vilely buried beneath their father's garments, the buttons of huge velvet breeches knocking against their little brown scales; some bare-headed, and others with their dark curly locks buried in large old hats—such as might once have covered aching heads—but they knew no pain but that of hunger—so onward they went, laughing and singing, untroubled by the thoughts of either rents or taxes.

That aged woman never once raised her eyes as the long train passed by, but stood motionless, gazing on the ground, while the tall stranger—partially hidden by a turning of the wall—stood with his arms folded on his breast, watching her narrowly. The last cart rolled by; then came a group of loiterers on foot, and amongst these was a young woman, who, halting suddenly, pointed to the old lady, and said to an aged woman behind her, "She is here; we shall not have to call at the old Manor House now."

They exchanged a few curt terms with each other, then beckoned to a tall athletic young man with hair dark as midnight, and a countenance bronzed by sun and wind, who sprung forward with giant strides, and in a few minutes returned, leading a white pony, on which a little boy was seated, his bare legs rough as rasps, and the soles of his feet hard as horn. Alfred and Mabel stood ... specta-tors of the scene

"This is the child," said the elder gipsy, beckoning Amy's father to approach, and there stands the old lady, who has taken him from us, and left us nothing but silver pounce-box I snatched from her mantel-piece on the very night I took away the child. Here is one of the bills she had printed the next day, offering a reward for her trinket. I have carefully preserved it, and would advise her to keep the new tin an old blanket to wrap the infant in, lest it should some day or another be pro-duced as a proof of his birth.

Half unconscious of everything around her saving the lost box, the old woman made one desperate spring, and seized it in her trembling hands, exclaiming, "It was my mother's, and was stolen on the night I ——"

"Carried off the baby from the Manor House at midnight, and a sentence bronzed by sun and wind, who sprung forward with giant strides, and in a few minutes returned, leading a white pony, on which a little boy was seated, his bare legs rough as rasps, and the soles of his feet hard as horn. Alfred and Mabel stood ... specta-tors of the scene

"This is the child," said the elder gipsy, beckoning Amy's father to approach, "

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Advertisements cannot be received after Seven o clock on Thursday evening.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI. — Holiday Entertainments—Twelfth and Positively the Last Week of the Bohemians!—The Best Pantomime of the Season! - Gorgeous Scenery, Magnificent Processions, and Irresistible Comic Effects.—MONDAY, January 22nd, 1844, and during the Week, (by Command,) THE BOHEMIANS After which, HARLEQUIN BLUE BEARD; or, THE FAIRY OF THE SILVER CRESCENT. Clown, Mr. T. Matthews; Harlequin, Mr. Wieland; Columbine, Miss Bullen. Boxes, 4s.; Pit, 2s.; Gallery, 1s. Doors Price at 6. Doors open at half past 6, commence at 7 o'Clock.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.—The Grimaldi School for Ever. The Giant above all—and 80th Night of the most Original Drama in London MONDAY, and during the week, THE ROAD OF LIFE. After which, a Farce in one act, entitled MY UNCLE'S CARD, Principal Characters by Mr. J. Webster, Mr. Turnour, Mr. Scott, Mr. G. Wild, Miss Le Batt, Miss Bowen, and Mrs. Gerrick. To conclude with for the 20th time, a New Grand Comic Grimaldi School of Pantomime, entitled HARLEQUIN JACK THE GIANT-KILLER, or THE OGRE of St. MICHAEL'S MOUNT. Harlequin, Young Bologna; Pantaloon, Mr Harland; Harlequina, Miss Cubitt; Le Batt, Columbine, Miss Rina Gates, Clown, Mr Jefferies. Boxes, 3s. 6d.; Pit, 1s.; Gallery, 6d., Private Boxes, £1 11s. 6d.

THE SHRINE of NAPOLEON, or GOLDEN CHAMBER, containing the cameo bed on which he died in exile, late the property of Prince Lucien, for which Madame TUSSAUD and SONS paid 600; the Cloak of Marengo; the Coronation Coat of the King of Rome; the original picture of Napoleon, for which he sat to Isabey; Marie Louise, by Gerard, his masterpiece; the King of Rome, from Life; Louis, by Lethiere, the celebrated Military Carriage, purchased by Mr. Bullock, with the authority of Government, from the French Regent, for 3000, the Table of the Marshals, valued at 12,000 the Clothes he wore as an exile—being altogether a matchless exhibition. Madame TUSSAUD and SONS, Bazaar, Baker-street, Portman-square. Admittance, one large room, 1s., two rooms of Napoleon and Chamber of Horrors, 6d. Open from eleven o'clock in the morning till dusk; and from seven in the evening till ten

CAN Only be Obtained at the Manufacturer's Establishment, 130, Strand, GROSSMITH'S READING SHAVING SOAP, Wash Cake, Hair Nourisher, Tooth Powder, Hand and Lip Preserver, the highest prize Otto Sealing, not to be equalled at any price.

STATIONERY of really good quality, at a remarkably Low Price.—Thick Satin Note, note, 5s. 3d. per ream; good serviceable Hath Note note, 3s per ream, or 6s. per 1000; the most beautiful best Satin Envelopes, 1s. per 100; Block Borderes ditto, 1s. per 100, Steel Pens, from 1s. per 12 dozen; Ribbes, well bound, 1s. 6d. each, ditto, large print, 3s. 6d., Testaments, 18pd. each, Prayer Books and Altars, 1s. each. Every variety of Church Services published, from 2s. 9d. each. A complete set of Engravings, published within the last two years, at about half price.—H. BROOKS, 87, New Bond-street, corner of Oxford-street

EDE'S NOT-TO-BE-WASHED-OUT NEW MARKING INK without preparation. Possesses every good quality requisite in a Marking Ink, and is sold in all parts of the Civil and World in bottles at 1s. each. "I, the Proprietor, hold myself responsible for its durability, writing sure, and directly after the application of a hot iron ironing to a NEW BLACK, without the possibility of running, being obliterated or washed out.—H. EDE." Manufactory at Dorking.—London Depots, BARNY and SON, 4, Ryegrass Hall, Piccadilly, & 122, Bishopsgate Within.—H. E. DEAN, Wholesale and Export Agent, 50 and 51, Bishopsgate Without.

TEAS.—WHOLESALE PRICES.

	s. d.		s. d.
Good Common Black	3 0	Fine Pekoe Souchong	5 0
Strong Congou	3 4	Superior do.	4 6
Fine do., Pekoe flavour	4 0	Finest do. imported	5 0
Finest ditto	4 6	Finest Gunpowder	5 0

Goods delivered in all parts of town daily. Country Orders, amounting to £5, sent free to all parts of Great Britain.

MANSELL and Co., 2, Bucklersbury, Cheapside.

COFFEE.

	s. d.
Good Common	0 9
Good Ceylon	1 0
Fine ditto	1 2
Finest ditto	1 4
Finest Java	1 6
Finest Cuba	1 8
Finest Mocha	2 0

G. T. MANSELL and Co., 2, Bucklersbury, Cheapside.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN INSTITUTE, PATRON: H.R.H. THE PRINCE ALBERT.
PRESIDENT.—RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF DEVON.

HIS Royal Highness the Prince Albert having graciously honoured the Institute by becoming its Patron, the preparations for a Public Opening of the Establishment will be proceeded with as rapidly as a due regard to the completeness of the arrangements, and to the comfort and convenience of its visitors, will allow.

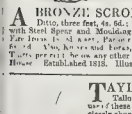
In order to effect the, and at the same time to admit of the attendance of the noble Founders, and those Peers and Commoners who have been assisting the earliest friends and supporters of the Association, the Opening will be deferred till the Meeting of Parliament; but this will make no change in the dates of the First Lecture or the First Soiree of the Season, each of which will be given on the Evenings originally announced, namely, the Lecture on the 7th of February, and the Soiree on the 13th.

The Members who are not actively engaged in their Cards of Membership by personal application to the undersigned, at the Hanover Square Rooms only (and not at the Institute, where no admittance can be had on the Evenings originally announced) between the Hours of Twelve and Four, after Monday, the 15th of January, the Number of the Thousand Members will have been completed.

JAMES S. BUCKINGHAM, Resident Director.

Jan. 10, 1844.

AN ELEGANT MOROCCO LADY'S COMPANION, price 16s. (see engraving), Elegant Rosewood Writing Desk, 11s. 6d.; Lady's Box, with secret drawer, 21s.; Lady's Rosewood Dressing Case, with brushes and cutlery, 30s.; Gentleman's Mahogany ditto, 21s.; Lady's Rosewood Work Box, full size, and fitted complete, 31s. The largest assortment of Paper Maché Ecgs.nces. An Elegant Envelope Box, a Pocket Book Case, and an Inkstand, en suite, price Three Guineas for the three. These articles are of the newest design, in Papier Maché manufacture, beautifully painted with flowers on rose grounds. Show rooms upstairs. BELLAMY SAVORY, Stationer, and Dressing Case Maker, Britain Paper Warehouse, No. 46, Cornhill, London



A BRONZE SCROLL and SPEAR FENDER, 15s. Iron Ditto, three feet, 4s. 6d.; Three feet six inches, 5s. 3d.; Handsome Bronzed Fenders, with Steel Spear and Moulding, 21s.; Bright Steel Fenders, with Ormolu Ornaments, 42s.; Fine Ditto, 3 feet 6 inches, 52s.; Ditto, 4 feet, 63s.;

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XXXVIII.

CAMBERWELL NEW CHURCH.

CAMBERWELL CHURCH.

The old parish church having been destroyed by fire early in 1842, designs were received for the new erection by public competition, and that of Messrs. Scott and Moffatt selected. A rate for £20,000, in addition to the amount received from the insurance of the late church, was voted for the work; and the tender of Messrs. Webb, the builders, was accepted by the committee. At this time, the church was intended to accommodate 2000 persons, and an addition was to have been made to the churchyard to render it capable of receiving it. The church, if executed according to this design, would have been one of the most highly decorated churches of the present day—the spire, which was to have been very richly ornamented, would have been above 225 feet high, and the whole carried out in a style which modern funds rarely admit of—indeed, the architects had made it their study in preparing the voluminous working drawings to render it, so far as they could, the most perfect parish church of modern time.

Unfortunately, however, when every preliminary was completed and every thing ready for the commencement, a protest was entered against the rate by a malcontent parishioner, founded on some alleged want of technicality in taking the rates at the vestry; and the objection being in some measure confirmed by legal opinion, it was thought most prudent to appeal again to the vestry, when, to avoid needless disputes, a compromise was agreed to, reducing the rate to £12,000 and the accommodation to 15,000 persons. Though the first design was thus relinquished, the same architects were unanimously appointed; and a new design having been prepared, and the work being offered to Messrs Webb, whose tender for the first design had received the preference, it was undertaken by them at the architect's estimate of £13,000, exclusive of the spire. The present design is in the style of the latter half of the thirteenth century, being the transition between the "Early English" and the "Decorated Style." The plan is cruciform, having a central tower and spire. This plan has been adopted, partly as the most suitable to the present site, in which a western tower would be much hidden by surrounding buildings, and partly as being the usual form in ancient times for the Mother Church of a large district containing other subordinate churches.

The reduced funds have rendered it necessary to make the details very plain and simple; but it has been the main object of the architects to obtain as much as possible of that substantial and genuine appearance in which the ancient churches, however plain, so far surpass those of the present day.

The mass of the walls is built of rubble work of Kentish rag stone, mixed with the materials from the old church; and which has the advantage of giving great thickness at a moderate expense. The exterior is faced with hammer-dressed stone from Yorkshire, with dressings of the Caen stone. The relief produced by the two descriptions of stone gives a pleasing and antique effect to the whole, and in a great measure compensates for the simplicity of the details. The buttresses and other projections are bold and massive; and throughout, solidity, reality of construction, and boldness of outline and proportion have been studied rather than highly ornamented finish.

The roof, which is of a high pitch, is covered with slab slates, which have the same general effect with lead. Though the details are in themselves simple, they have considerable variety; and the windows to the east end and to the transepts are of large size, and possess considerable ornamental character. The capitals and other features display much excellent carving, which has been executed by Mr. Cox, who was employed by the same architects for executing the principal parts of the carving to the Martyrs Memorial at Oxford. The entrance through the north porch is also rather richly ornamented, and the porch is groined with stone, the carved boss bearing the arms of the present vicar. The nave is supported on each side by five arches, resting on alternately round and octagonal pillars, with carved capitals. The tower is supported by four massive clustered columns of the hardest and most solid stonework, and the space below the tower is groined with stone. The remainder is covered with high pitched open roofs—plain in their design, but of massive construction. The doors, windows, string-courses, corbels, pillars, &c., are all finished internally with stone. The fittings of the nave will be low open seats or pews, chiefly of oak. The pulpit will be of oak, and considerably ornamented; the panels containing paintings on porcelain slabs of Our Saviour and the Four Evangelists, which, with the splendid encaustic floor of the chancel, are presented by Thomas Garrett, Esq., of Herne Hill. The chancel will be fitted up with oak stalls in the sides. The altar table will be of stone, on pillars of the same, behind which will be an altar-screen of stone, containing the commandments in illuminated letters. The west window will contain beautiful stained glass, chiefly ancient, but restored by Messrs. Ward and Nixon, and presented by the Vicar. It is probable that the east and transept windows will also be of stained glass.

A very fine organ is being built by Mr. Bishop. The spire, which was a part of the first design, but deferred from the uncertainty of the funds, has now happily been completed at a cost of about £1400, and is about 207 feet in height. The extreme length outside is above 153 feet; the nave about 80 feet by 55 feet; extreme width across the transepts about 87 feet; the chancel about 42 feet by 28 feet 6 inches; the tower 30 feet square.

THE REV. HENRY MELVILL.

A very gratifying testimonial of the high merits of this distinguished clergyman is now in progress. It appears that the congregation at Camden Chapel, Camberwell, have determined on presenting Mr. Melvill, on his resignation as minister of that place of worship, with a splendid service of plate. The subscriptions already received amount to a very large sum, although the proposed memorial has been only privately mentioned, and no general meeting of the seatholders has been convened.

Mr. Melvill's career is a striking instance of eminence obtained solely by great abilities. He was not originally intended for the church; but, in consequence of the early exhibition of great scholastic attainments, his friends enabled him to enter as a Sizer at St. John's College, Cambridge, where, in October, 1817, he commenced his University career. Here he became the first man of his year, and continued to head the list of college examinations until 1821, when he took his bachelor's degree. In his Senate House examination, he stood bracketed with two others for the first place, but was eventually placed as Second Wrangler. In a succeeding examination, (that for Smith's Prize,) he obtained the first prize, an event of very unusual occurrence.

On his being ordained, such was his character for learning that he was offered a Fellowship at St. Peter's College, and became one of the Tutors of that house: in discharge of this duty he remained many years, during which period he fulfilled successively the offices of Public Examiner, Proctor, Examiner in Hebrew, and Select Preacher before the University; and, in addition, was offered the Hulsean Lectureship, which he declined, having determined upon leaving the University and devoting himself to more active clerical duties.

He accordingly soon afterwards vacated his Fellowship, and became the minister of Camden Chapel, Camberwell, where his extraordinary eloquence is remembered with admiration and delight.

Here, in the exercise of the active duties of his holy vocation, Mr. Melvill continued for some considerable time, till his great powers and exemplary conduct having attracted the attention of the Duke of Wellington, that great man, upon the chapelry of the Tower becoming vacant, with his accustomed disinterestedness, offered the promotion to Mr. Melvill, who accepted it, and who has since fulfilled the duties of his office in such manner as to entitle him to general esteem.

We do not intend here to enlarge upon the character of Mr. Melvill's eloquence or attainments; they are both too well known, and too well appreciated, to require any remarks from us. It is therefore only necessary to add, that they have lost nothing of their force, their beauty, or their brilliancy, and are in keeping with his exemplary life and his assiduity in his holy calling, qualities that have endeared him to all who admire learning, who love piety, and respect honourable conduct.

PORTRAIT OF THE REV. H. MELVILL.

The retirement of this justly esteemed minister from Camden Chapel is the more to be regretted, as difficulties have been suggested as to the appointment of a successor. The vicar of Camberwell, it is said, claims the right of nomination, to which the trustees will not consent. The chapel was licensed by the Bishop to Mr. Melvill, but was never consecrated. It was previously used by a congregation of Dissenters, and, in the event of a dispute respecting the appointment of a minister, might revert to them.

Mr. Melvill has just received the appointment of the Principal of the Hon. East India Company's College at Haileybury, which has led to his secession from his attached flock at Camberwell.

ERUPTION OF MOUNT ETNA.

Etna has lately been in terrific eruption for three weeks; and many interesting particulars of the spectacle have been received. In a letter from Palermo, we find the following:—"A new eruption took place on the western side of Etna on the 17th of November. The crater opened near Monte Rosso, not far from the eruption of 1832."

In a subsequent letter, dated Catania, Dec. 5—"Inquiries have been instituted immediately by Government as to the cause of the unexpected and sudden explosion which, on the 25th of November, when the lava reached a pond or morass, occasioned the death of so many persons; it is, however, more than likely that nothing positive will result from it, as it is impossible as yet to approach the disastrous spot. Thus far it appears to be proved, that the glowing mass, composed of so many ingredients, falling from a not inconsiderable height into the water mentioned, spread itself, instead of being extinguished, foaming in every direction, burning to death some 30 persons, who had considered themselves protected by that sheet of water, and wounding 25 others so dangerously, that 15 of them have died since, and the remaining few give very little hopes of recovery. For the last few days the volcanoes (three were in activity) had been more quiet. On the highest cone, the eastern part, or the side wall of the crater, has fallen in, and the opening is greatly enlarged. The crater is without intermission throwing out clouds of black smoke; and on the eastern wall a small stream of lava is flowing down, partly visible only during the night, and losing itself under the snow, which lays more than three feet high. The new eruption of the 17th November is likewise not yet extinguished, but continues to send forth smoke, stones, ashes, and dross, although with less vigour than at the commencement; also from this crater continues to flow some lava; it, however, soon turns to clods, and it is no longer able to push forward the lava stream, which has not yet reached the bed of the Simeto. The third eruption, more to the north of the Mount, which commenced on the 23rd of November, in the evening, still throws out smoke and dross; but, upon the whole, the eruptions appear to be over. The top of Mount Etna is covered by a thick layer of snow, and it would be useless to try an ascent at present; several travellers, venturing upon the task, were obliged to return without attaining their object."

Etna was in eruption about a year since, and an engraving of the phenomenon will be found in our No. 37. The annexed view of the mountain and the adjacent country (sketched very recently, from opposite Catania) is one of the series of illustrations of "A Pictorial Tour in the Mediterranean," by Mr. J. H. Allan, just published.

MOUNT ETNA, FROM CATANIA HARBOUR.

Mr. Allan tells us, that a visit to the damp excavations in the lava and scoriæ, that have covered the remains of ancient Catania, affords but little gratification. The principal are two theatres, and some vapour-baths under the Cathedral. The streets of this city are magnificent, being both broad, long, well paved, clean, and filled with large fine houses. From Monte Rosso, a small volcanic excrescence at the foot of Etna, the lava issued, which nearly destroyed Catania in 1669. The road to the village of Nicolosi, at the foot of Etna, ascends gradually the whole way, frequently crossing beds of lava and cinders, amongst which were flourishing, with wonderful luxuriance, fields of corn, vineyards, the cactus indicus, and aloe, the two latter of enormous growth, their stems sometimes the size of forest-trees. A walk to that part of the harbour where the lava ran into the sea, affords an excellent view of the town and Etna; the annexed sketch is taken from this point.

NOTICE.—All communications respecting the transmission or non-arrival of the paper, must be addressed to the person who supplies the paper, or who receives the subscription.

London: Printed and published by WILLIAM LITTLE, at 198, Strand, where all communications for the Editor are requested to be addressed.—SATURDAY JANUARY 20, 1844.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 91, Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JANUARY 27, 1844. [Sixpence.

FEMALE LABOUR.

MONG the many sad social evils which the bad practice of a false and ungenerous political economy has engendered—to be contemplated, and we would fain hope, corrected, by the warmer and nobler spirit of Christian philanthropy—there is no one of more pressing and urgent importance for its extent—of more deep and lasting consequence for its iniquity—than that which concentrates into its wicked system the worst agonies of female oppression, the bitter degradation of woman's mental patience and physical frailty to labour the most grinding, and sickening, and harrowing that it is possible for any human body to endure. We shall address ourselves for a few moments to this interesting theme, and in so doing we appeal to all women for their sympathy—and to gentlewomen especially, for they have many of the means of remedy around them—on behalf of the poorest and most suffering of their sex. We ask the ladies of England to meet the miseries we are about to describe—miseries multiform and horrible—with private charity, public benevolence, the absence of selfish considerations in commanding the labour they employ, and the exercise of piety of heart and thought in confessing fellowship with the needy;—but more than for any—more than for all of these generous exercises, we implore them to use the best influence of gentleness over the love of man, to plead to fathers, brothers, husbands, with the most winning and beautiful of all eloquence, that with which generous sympathy inspires the voice of fond and faithful affection. Let the mothers, wives, and sisters of those who have the power to remedy—a now unmitigated wrong—plead their plea of love, and the sternest legislators will not deny them their holy reward. The women of England are powerful during the excitement of elections, and more powerful individually than they collectively know, in influencing nearly all the political questions that are brought under the consideration of more lordly tribunals. Why then should they not be powerful—and, oh! with what angelic grace!—to persuade the weakness which yields to them in all things, to put on the strength of justice, and legislate against the oppressions which are blinding the eyes, and breaking the hearts, and consuming away the bodies of thousands upon thousands of their sex?

Now, let us see where these oppressions lie. It must not be imagined that we are averse to honest and industrious female employment, even when pushed to something like a hard struggle against the contingencies of the world, for the principle of endurance is chastening, and is one of the virtues which affliction beautifully evokes; but here we are directing our remonstrance against female labour, in that sense in which it passes the bounds of endurance, and becomes crime in the employer and cruelty to the employed.

And this kind of cruel labour is, as we have said, multiform exhibiting itself chiefly in the horrid coal mines of the north in the factories of the manufacturing districts, in lace-making, in nail-making, in the millinery houses of the metropolis, in the grinding tailoring business, the Jew slopsellers' extortion from destitution, and the sad alternatives of suffering which are resorted to, to avoid the cruelties of the Poor-law Bill.

Of the latter order of human suffering we have a remarkable example during the present week in the fact (adduced upon a coroner's inquest) of the death of a mother and child from hopeless destitution, and of the miserable circumstances which led to that death. Mother and child were found dead in "a cabin about the size of, or perhaps rather less than, an ordinary summer-house, and composed indiscriminately of wood, bricks, and mud. In this place lay the bodies of the mother and child. The interior of the cabin was five feet six inches wide, and twelve feet long. It consisted of an apartment, with a fireplace of bricks at one end, and a dirty-looking mattress was resting against the wall. The bodies of the woman and child were in an advanced stage of decomposition, and presented all the appearances of having been literally starved to death. In the place resided the father and four children, who had actually slept on their wretched bed, within two feet of the body of their relative."

It was in evidence that this wretched family had endured gradual starvation for twelve months! The father was powerless—the mother followed the calling of a shoebinder, and earned eightpence a day. Four shillings per week to support six persons! They had not received parochial relief, for out-door relief is not the fashion now—and rather than be separated in the workhouse, they had preferred to starve together in their mud cabin even unto death! So the poor workwoman died in giving birth to her last offspring—and the starved mother and child have been ere now buried in one common grave! God have mercy on their survivors.

HALL OF THE FOUR COURTS DUBLIN.

When Mr. Ferrand, a day or two ago, described to the Protestant operatives of Dublin the cruelty of female labour in England, he drew a strong and dreadful picture of the miseries that are endured in the manufacturing districts. In the case of the poor shoebinder which we have just recorded, it will be seen that the afflicted husband lived, or rather starved, upon the earnings of his wife: Mr. Ferrand stated that the hapless and degraded men in the factory districts nearly all live upon the wretched pittance which the women and children earn. He narrated that formerly men only were employed in the factories, until avarice discovered that women and children were more pliable—more manageable—more easily goaded—more silently crushed! They would not so often strike for wages—so loudly murmur—or surlily forsake their work. No! women—with more endurance and tender recollections of domestic ties and wants—would toil and suffer on—and helpless children would bear an early sorrow and obey.

So female labour is now the staple of factory employ; and while the better class of unemployed husbands are to be found in their little hovels, mending the family rags, and degraded into the performance of women's household occupations, the less thoughtful and domestic—the more impatient and reckless—forsake the cottage for the beer-shop, and heap tenfold horror and misery upon their wretched homes. Thus it is that the natural order of labour is reversed, and that women are heartlessly oppressed. The amount of toil they suffer is beyond belief—the time at which they turn to their sickening task almost forbids the luxury of sleep; nor dare they even give natural rest to their children, for they must wake them even during the hours of darkness for the loom. They stint and deform their offspring—they emaciate and consume themselves—they break hope, heart, and spirit; and with all this they still stand only upon the verge of beggary, and starvation seems ever grimly ready to get them within its grasp.

So much for female labour in the factories; of what it has been in the coal-mines we have had the most revolting pictures—scenes described, ay, and painted, too, that have made the soul shudder and the heart bleed. We will not revive those horrors upon this page; Christianity cries to God for their extinction, and they must be legislated away.

But we turn to the condition—less absolutely revolting, though not less absolutely distressing—of the sempstresses and milliners of London. Of the poor creatures employed by the grinding clothes-warehousemen, we have already declared the destitution and pleaded the cause of relief; let us now see what is endured by the toiling and wasting beings of their own sex who work to gratify the caprice, to sustain the fashion, or to adorn the beauty of the charitable gentlewomen of England. We take a few facts as we find them recorded in the Edinburgh Review, partly upon its own authority, and partly in quotation from an excellent report upon the subject. They are ranged in numbers, after the manner of a report, but we take a few at random:—

"622. It is estimated that there are in London, in the millinery and dressmaking business, at least 1,500 employers, and that the number of young people engaged by each employer varies from two or three to twenty-five or thirty-five is the average in each establishment. Some about making the whole 15,000; but this does not include journey-women who work at their own houses, of whom also there are great numbers.

"623 In some of what are considered the best regulated establishments during the fashionable [illegible] the regular hours of work are fifteen, but on emergencies which frequently occur, it see hours extend to fourteen. In many establishments the hours of work during the season, are unlimited, the young women never getting more than six, often not more than four, sometimes only three, and occasionally not more than two hours for rest and sleep out of the twenty-four; and very frequently they work all night.

[illegible] first hand,' which signified that [illegible] business as overlooker of the [illegible] half-past six, A.M., till twelve at night. During the [illegible] from April to the end of July, it frequently happens that the ordinary hours are greatly exceeded; if there is a drawing-room, or grand fête, or mourning to be made, it often happens that the work goes on for twenty hours out of the twenty-four, occasionally all night. Every season in at least half the houses of business it happens that the young persons occasionally work twenty hours out of the twenty-four, twice or three a week. On special occasions, such as drawing-rooms, general mournings, and wedding orders, it is not uncommon to work all night; has herself worked twenty hours out of the twenty-four for three months together. [illegible] that time she was suffering from illness, and the medical attendant remonstrated against the treatment she received. He wished witness to remain in bed at least one day longer, which the employer objected to, required her to get up, and dismissed the surgeon. It frequently happened that she was sometimes carried on till seven o'clock on Sunday morning. If any particular order was to be executed, as mournings or weddings, and they left off on Saturday night at eleven, they worked the whole of Sunday; thinks that happened fifteen times in the two years. In consequence of working so late on Sunday morning, or all that day occasionally, could very rarely go to church, indeed it could not be thought of, because they generally reared in bed."

"639. The correctness of these representations is confirmed, among others, by the medical witnesses:—Sir James Clark, Bart, Physician to the Queen: 'I have form the mode of life of these poor girls such as to consume them in a very short long bear. Worked from six in the morning till twelve at night, with the exception of the short intervals allowed for their meals, in close rooms, and passing the few hours allowed for rest in still more close and crowded apartments—a mode of life more completely calculated to destroy human health could scarcely be contrived, and this at a period of life when exercise in the open air, and a due proportion of rest, are essential to the development of the whole [illegible]."

"644. Of the general treatment and condition of these young people the subcommissioner reports:—'The evidence of all [illegible] the last point there is no class of persons in this country [illegible] ness, health, and lives, are so unscrupulously sacrificed as those of the young dressmakers. It may, without exaggeration, be stated, that, in proportion to the numbers employed, there are no occupations, with one or two questionable exceptions, such as needle-grinding, in which so much disease is produced as in dressmaking, or which present so fearful a catalogue of distressing and frequently fatal maladies. It is a serious aggravation of all this evil, that the unkindness of the employer very frequently causes these young persons, when they become unwell, to conceal their illness from the fear of being sent out of the house; and [illegible] that disease often becomes increased in severity, or is rendered incurable. Some of the principals are so cruel as to object to the young women obtaining medical assistance.'"—(No. 626).

Now in these remarks and examples we believe we have grasped the whole question of female labour, although we have not been able to go into its many ramifications of detail. And have we not said enough? Have we not made out a case sufficiently strong to justify the appeal that we addressed to the gentle hearts of Englishwomen at the commencement of this article—to warrant our claim for the exercise of private charity and public benevolence on behalf of the female poor, and to support our demand for legislatorial relief, and that the Parliament shall apply its attention, in extenso, to the whole subject, until, in the natural exercise of a glorious generosity, it shall devise some blessed law to protect the constitutions, promote the happiness, and secure the rights of the thousands and thousands of human beings who are now—to the shame of humanity and their country—in the forced pursuit of their cruel labour, the most gentle, the most unresisting, and the most oppressed?

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARIS, January 23.

SPAIN.

The news from Spain is totally void of interest. My private letter from Madrid stated the Progressists were pleased with their success in the elections of the capital, had sent agents into the different towns to superintend the nomination of their partisans. M. Cortina, the chief of the Opposition, presided at a meeting held in the garden of the convent of La Merced, at which a protest against the unconstitutional conduct of the Ministers was unanimously agreed to. A report was circulated in Madrid that a Carlist conspiracy was organising in the Basque provinces, with the view of forcing Isabella to marry the eldest son of Don Carlos. I can state, in a manner the most positive, that the Basques are not conspiring in favour of either Don Carlos or his son; it is true they are dissatisfied, and may revolt against the Government, but be assured their banner will be, "Our privileges or death." This information I have received from persons on whose authority I can place implicit reliance. Much has been said about a loan, which the Government was on the point of contracting, for the purpose of keeping up a large standing army. There is little doubt that Narvaez is desirous of being at the head of an imposing force, and that the Minister of Finance would be glad to get money at any sacrifice; but the funds cannot be obtained. Many persons have been appealed to, but all have refused. As a last effort, and in the hope of getting English or French capitalists to loosen their purse strings, the Spanish Government has appointed M. Laffite their financial agent in Paris. I trust none of my countrymen will have the folly to advance a farthing to the bankrupt Government of Madrid, or dabble in any way in their funds.

Mariano de la Rosa has received a letter from Bulwer, daily conference with Christina and M. Guizot; he receives £5000 a year as Ambassador to the Court of the Tuileries!! Don Juan de la Concha goes as Minister Plenipotentiary to Belgium, and Don Garcia Villalta as Charge d'Affaires to Greece. Ameller, having signed the capitulation of Fort Figueras with Baron de Meer, has quitted Catalonia, and reached Perpignan on the 14th. I believe I am correctly informed in stating that the celebrated General Prim is in Germany, born at Tungermunde on the Elbe. He was a sergeant-major in the army, and deserted from the garrison of Potsdam.

GERMANY.

A rumour was current in Vienna on the 15th, that Count Appony, the Austrian Ambassador to the French Court, was about to be replaced by Prince Schwartzenberg, and that the Count was to be named to one of the most eminent posts. In diplomatic circles it was generally believed that Prince Metternich was on the point of retiring from public life. M. Sprenger had been sent to Paris to examine M. Jouffroy's new railroad. A letter from Stuttgard of the 14th gives an account of an accident which occurred to the King the previous day. Driving along the banks of the Neckar, the horses took fright and rushed towards the river, and in all probability would have plunged into it, had not the son of a butcher stopped them. The King of Wirtemberg alighted from his carriage, and made the man a present of 100 ducats, about £50, and ordered him to call at the palace the next day.

SWITZERLAND.

Tranquility is once more restored to the Cantons, the long-pending religious question having been satisfactorily arranged. Count Reinhard, the French Chargé d'Affaires, reached Lucerne on the 16th; he was the bearer of a note from M. Guizot to the Federal President, requesting, in the event of the Duke of Bordeaux visiting Switzerland, he might only be received as a private nobleman.

FRANCE.

The debate on the address continues in the Chamber of Deputies. I am sorry to say it in a discussion yesterday. M. Guizot showed much weakness, and a great desire to keep his place, even at the sacrifice of his opinions. The subject was this: in the speech from the Crown beyond all doubt the work of M. Guizot—a paragraph stated "that the best understanding existed between the Courts of England and France." The answer to the address somewhat modified this part of the paragraph, by saying, "that the best understanding exists on the Spanish and Greek questions." A M. Billault, one of the chiefs of the Opposition, proposed an amendment, which was debated yesterday. M. Thiers made a long speech against England's nonimity. He was followed by M. Dupin, a Conservative, and legal adviser to Louis Philippe, who declared that he did not believe in a good understanding with England; it was probable that the two Governments might understand each other, but he was certainly of that not; and that if the address went any further, he would vote for the amendment. The Ministers became alarmed, and M. de St. Marc-Girardin, the reporter and author of the address, immediately satisfied M. Dupin, by assuring him that the intention was only "that a good understanding existed as regarded Spain and Greece." M. Guizot, after hesitating, professed to be of the same opinion as M. Dupin; and finally drawn overboard the opinion solemnly set forth in the King's speech, the amendment was rejected. Another such a victory, and M. Guizot must retire from office.

Letters were received yesterday from Gorita to the 15th. The Duke d'Angoulême was fast recovering from his late serious indisposition.

We are barren of news since my last; whether owing to the bad weather, or the Chamber of Deputies, the fact is, Paris is dull, very dull—few parties, few balls badly attended. I hate scandal, and yet I cannot help noticing a report that at a ball given by Lord Cowley a few evenings back, a celebrated Duchess and Viscountess, both ultra-Legitimists, invited the pursuit of Queen Victoria; one of them called her "a forward brisette." Lady Cowley acted with becoming dignity on the occasion, and the offence will not be repeated.

The lion of the day is the new Turkish Ambassador, Reschid Pacha. I understand he is to be presented to Louis Philippe this afternoon. His state carriages [illegible] extremely handsome—were visited yesterday by a great number of our fashionables.

The Roumbourg and Baise railroad is in a most prosperous state; during the month of December the receipts were 17,857f. 67c., rather more than £6,200 a The Lyons Railway Company is constructing a second line of the kind, has been passed in England, one is in Paris, and one-third in the towns through which the line passes.

Mr. Watt, a son of the eminent engineer, has presented to the Academy of Sciences a model in bust of his father, by Chantrey.

A discovery of some interest has been made by Count Anatole de Jerigni; on examining some old family papers he found several original letters from Voltaire to Madame de Grafigny, who translated Hume's "History of England," into French.

Grisi took her benefit last night at the Italian Opera. The house was crowded with the élite of Paris. The opera given was "Otello," in which appeared Mario, Salvi, Ronconi, Lablache, and Grisi. The Grand Opera is decidedly falling off. M. Leon Pellet, as I expected, has returned from Italy without a farce, and consequently Meyerbeer's "Prophet" is adjourned sine die. Between-the-by, the opera Meyerbeer is writing for the opening of the Berlin theatre is only in one act.

Auber's new opera, the Lbretto by Scribe, was read in the Foyer of the Opera Comique on Wednesday. Report speaks highly favourable of it, and it is expected that it will surpass "Fra Diavolo," being in the same style. The principal characters have been confided to Mlle Lavoie, and Messrs. Roger and Grard. Adam's "Cagliostro" will be brought out the beginning of next month.

We had two brilliant soirées last week, one given by Madame Aguado, at which were present all our first-rate musical talent. Miss Brumbilla sang a duet from "Tancredi" with Corell. Salvi sang a romance. The other soirée was that of the Duchess Agnado, where Miss Brumbilla was the delight of the evening; after singing a ballad from "Maria de Rohan," the applause lasted for several minutes; this artiste is decidedly à-la-mode this season. Grisi, Lablache, and Salvi sang a scene from "Anna Bolena." Grisi produced a great sensation in the air from "Puritajus."

Dreyschok is expected next week in Paris, from Brussels. The Carnival at Milan is very gay. Fanny Elsler and Lucile Grahn are the great attractions at the Scala.

The Vienna Italian Opera is likely to be very splendid. The director has already engaged La Grisi, Pasta, Viardot, Ronconi, Vanesi, Rovere, Albertini, Ivanoff, Ferretti, Gardoni, and Marini.

"La Lucerita" is being nightly played at the theatre Nuovo at Naples. The pieces most in vogue in Italy are "Fedantesa," "Corsa," "Maria d'Inghelterra," and "M——."

The "Grenouilles" of Aristophane has been put to music, and will shortly be presented at Berlin.

DUCHY OF BRUNSWICK.

"PROCLAMATION.—We, Charles, by the Grace of God, Sovereign Duke of Brunswick and Lunenburg, do hereby declare as follows:—It has come to our knowledge that the present revolutionary government of Brunswick is endeavouring to persuade the European Powers, and their subjects at large, that we do not from time to time, and on all given occasions, protest against whatever in the present unlawful state of things in our Duchy of Brunswick. We, therefore, hereby positively deny such pretence, and say that we have never let any lapse of time or any occasion pass without most solemnly vindicating our legitimate rights of our Sovereign Duchy and private fortune. That we last publicly did so by proclamation, dated 'London, the 1st day of May, 1840;' and now again repeat it, and hereby protest most solemnly against the present unlawful state of things in our Duchy of Brunswick, which we will never recognise or countenance in any manner by reason of those rights secured to us by the treaty of Peace at Vienna, and guaranteed by all the powers of Europe. And that we never have abdicated, and never shall abdicate, our hereditary legitimate rights to the sovereignty of our Duchy of Brunswick, so recently recognised by every Government in Europe. In proof of which, we have hereunto set our hand and large state seal, at London, this first day of the month of January, in the year of our Lord 1844, and of our reign the twenty-ninth.

"CHARLES D."

PORTUGAL.

No business of any consequence has been transacted in the Chambers since their opening. The Peers have been occupied in discussing the answer to the discourse from the Throne; the Deputies, with the usual preparatory ceremonies, which, according to custom, will take up another week or two previous to any legislative affairs being entered into. Senor Silva Sanches moved that all the documents, notes, and official communications relative to the negotiation of the commercial convention with Great Britain, should be laid on the table, which motion was carried unanimously.

Complaints against the Ministers, and petitions to the Throne for their dismissal, continue to pour in from all quarters, but little or no notice appears to be taken of them. On Friday last, the fact of a fire having broken out in the convent of Xabregas, was announced to the capital by the tolling of the bells of the churches. This fine edifice, a short distance from Lisbon, had been converted into a manufactory of cotton goods, belonging to the Company Lisbonense. It appears that, from the alarm having been given in time, the flames were got under; not, however, until nearly all the looms were consumed, together with a large quantity of manufactured goods.

RUSSIA.

A St. Petersburgh letter of the 8th, in a German journal, mentions a report that the Russian government has addressed remonstrances to the Porte, relative to the passage of the Dardanelles. The Russian Government complains that foreign vessels, laden with arms and ammunition, are allowed to pass, contrary to the stipulations of the treaty.

TURKEY.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Jan. 3.—Sir Baldwin Walker was last Saturday unceremoniously dismissed from his employment in the Turkish navy. Two officers came to his residence at Therapia, and demanded from him the decoration which he wore, as distinctive of his rank. With this civil request Sir Baldwin declined to comply, stating that he held a patent from the Sultan, in virtue of which his rank was, with the decoration attached to it, made hereditary in his family. For the present, therefore, he positively refuses to give up his decoration, and will, in all probability, seek an interview from the Sultan, in order to learn from his Highness's own lips whether he has sanctioned an affront not only offensive to him personally, but derogatory to the dignity of the Government which has sent him here. His services were originally sought for by the Porte, which addressed itself on the occasion to the British Government, and it was considered at the time a proof of great kindness and condescension on the part of the latter to allow so skilful and meritorious an officer to leave the British for the Turkish navy. Much of the odium of this affair, no doubt, rests with Halil, the Capitan Pacha, though his malignity has been converted by Riza Pacha, now the de facto Sovereign of this country, into a means of annoyance and insult to the British Government.

GREECE.

General Colocotroni, who had been, it may be remembered, sent from Greece, upon expiration of an attempt to excite a counter-revolution, and who had incressed the public excitement against him by going to Munich, instead of to Naples, is returned to Athens from his short exile. The feeling against him appears to have subsided, for his return has been unnoticed.

It was understood, at the date of our last advices, that the last acts of the committee appointed to draw up the constitution were terminated, and that their report would be submitted to the National Assembly on the 8th inst. The question which has been most warmly discussed is the proposal to give the King the power of naming the members of the upper house for life, and there was little doubt that it would be met by a most violent opposition in the Assembly. It is known that the Governments of England and France are desirous that such a measure should be adopted, and Sir Edmund Lyons is employing all his influence, in concert with M. Piscatory, the Minister of France, in furtherance of this object. Indeed so little secrecy is observed on this head, that Lord Aberdeen's diplomatic note to Sir Edmund Lyons, in which full instructions are given, has been published in the Gazette d'Augsburg of the 10th inst.

LITERATURE.

FRIENDSHIP'S OFFERING OF SENTIMENT AND MIRTH. Smith, Elder, and Co., Cornhill, London.

The great objection which prevailed against the Annuals after their first year's rage had passed away was that they could boast of more beauty than sterling reputation, an extremely fascinating outward appearance and a decidedly meretricious interior. They were surpassingly splendid to behold studiously placed amongst other trifles on the rosewood table or curiously enchased cabinet in the drawing-room, or scattered with graceful negligence on the rich satin fauteuil of my lady's boudoir; but to take them up and hold converse with them for a very few minutes, was to lay them down again. The work before us seems this year at least not to "stand by its order," but to have made a successful effort to emancipate itself from the general "namby-pamby" of the class of periodicals to which it belongs. It has not only had new blood infused into it; but that of a very good and gentle description. We must not be understood in making these preliminary observations as underrating such contributors as the Editor, Mr. Leitch Ritchie, Miss Landon, Miss Emmeline Stuart, both of whom enjoy in a high degree the friendly regard of the clientele of the "Friendship's Offering," and appear in more than one place in its pages to advantage before us. The former is light and graceful in his composition, and the latter equally so, in addition to which she displays a genuine delicacy of thought, and an unobtrusive yet wholesome moral vein, which are as wholesome as they are rare and delightful. A brief review of the contents will be found very tersely borne out in her prose sketch entitled "The Secret," one of the best contributions to the "Friendship's Offering," 1844.

"The Well of St. Keyne," by Miss Anna Savage, gave the young bride power over her husband's temper if she could only drink of its magic wave before the gentleman. In this instance the lady succeeds, as, indeed, "the gentle sex" generally do when they wish it, and "set about it in earnest." The story is very agreeably told in numbers of the sweetest caldron, and there is much fresh and smooth as the limpid waters themselves. She thus winds up her pretty tale:—

> Nor is, they say, that crystal well a legendary dream,
> For such there be of virtue rare beyond the Tamar's stream;
> And many a bridegroom, when he finds his wife should only think of it,
> But hastes to drink of freedom's draught—some Margaret drank before!
>
> And when he thinks, most proud and free, he has dominion shown,
> He dreams not who has stolen the spell and made the charm her own!
> Yes kingdoms fall and tottering thrones rise from the fresh statues hurled,
> But woman's wit and woman's will supreme still rule the world.*

IMPROMPTU LINES ON THE ANNIVERSARY OF MOZART, THE 27TH JANUARY.

Genius, natale comes qui temperat astrum, &c.

HORAT:

> On such a day as this, long years ago,
> (Some scores of years,) did Music's self bestow
> A gift on Man to charm his head and heart—
> A gift! what was it? 'TWAS DIVINE MOZART!
> Death and Oblivion envied him the treasure,
> The mine of countless, constant, endless pleasure
> That present and that future days should find
> In the recesses of his tuneful mind.
> And said condoline: this is one more name
> That we've been robb'd of by ETERNAL FAME! W.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

I never saw a critter that had good action that was a bad beast.

SAM SLICK.

Such was the opinion of the philosophic clockmaker of Slickville, and being inclined to a similar theory, we took recent occasion to apply it to the reader's behoof—with a hope that the attempt might not be altogether without administering to his amusement withal. For months past, as in duty bound, we have duly reported the state of the market for live horseflesh at Tattersall's, a commodity dealt in both wholesale and retail, by chapmen who know nothing of it, save by rumour. That at least the small subscribers might know what they are buying, we set ourselves about gleaning information wherewith to supply their wants. The principal parcels in the great mart for speculation at Hyde Park Corner are the Derby lots, and leading favourites; to kill the greatest number of these with one stone, or rather, to "bag" the largest share possible with one coup d'œil, we set forth rejoicing for Newmarket on Monday last. A season without parallel in men's memories, has, of course, had its effect in the training stables. Many of the trainers are in and around the metropolis of the turf, have been doing regular work since Christmas; and sweats and gallops are the order of the day. But, apropos of order, we will begin at the beginning, taking our classification from the precedence awarded at Tattersall's.

The leading Derby favourite—certainly the nomination for that event backed for the most money—is Rattan, trained by Rogers, whose stable is one of the strongest in the town, numbering at least thirty horses, and going, one and all, very well: indeed, there was not a cough current in the whole neighbourhood. Rattan is what would be called leggy—he is a chesnut, with two white heels; stands over a great deal of ground; looks full of speed, but deficient in substance. His action is good, but he is far from flippant in his walk—the peculiarity, however, of the Queen of Trumps, the best mare, or thereabouts, this generation has seen. He is as well as he can be, but he is not our fancy: he is not "a bad beast," but it is leaf thirty good one and five half way over the Derby course. Next to Rattan, in the Newmarket division, we come to Colonel Peel's "lot." This consists of Zenobia, Orlando, and Ionian; the two last only regarded as their Derby nags. The filly is a splendid goer, and a racer all over, to the eye; indeed his performances were about the best of the past season. They say Orlando has been tried to beat her, giving half a stone; if so, Diana forbid we should lay 25 to 1 against him for Epsom. Orlando is a very short necked horse, bay, with two white heels and a white nose, with prime legs and feet. Ionian is too compact a nag for our taste; his stride is short, and his going mean. The pair are as sound as steel, and, come what may, will be a match for Cooper's strong system of training: we wish his gallant master better luck than we dare hope for him. Lord Exeter's lot has found a few friends at 22 to 1—it consists of five, the noble Marquis's team amounting to thirty-five in active work. Anterior (the Mammella colt) is the best thought of; we did not see him, as he was not one of the string on the Saturday of our visit to the heath. The most racing-like item of this team was Phlegon that, as the Lucetta colt, made a sensation for the last Leger. As usual he had his winkers on; over the Flat he will be a dangerous antagonist yet. There are several other "strings" on both sides of the town Hoyce's, with some nice nags of the Dukes of Portland and Rutland and others; Fisher's, with Lawyer Ford's rare collection of young ones—not forgetting Poison, who will physic some of her foes this season, as she did

* Les femmes peuvent tout parceque elles gouvernent ceux qui gouvernent tout.

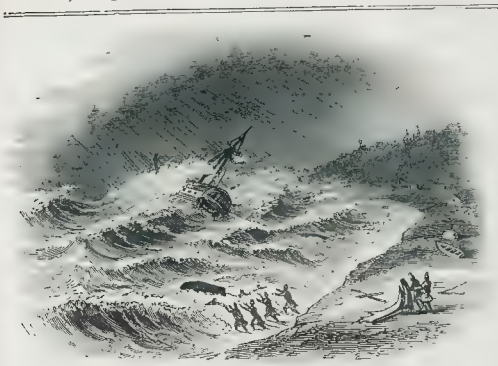
FUNERAL PROCESSION OF THE LATE EX-KING OF HOLLAND.

1. A squadron of Dragoons, which had escorted the hearse from Rotterdam.
2. Two Companies of the Delft National Guard, under command of a superior officer.
3. The Purveyor-General of the Palace, followed by two Grooms, all three on horseback.
4. The Chamberlain Master of Ceremonies.
5. The Staff Officers of his Majesty, officiating as Assistant Masters of Ceremonies.
6. The Officers of the Households of their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Orange, and his brothers, the Princes Alexander and Henry.
7. The Officers of the Household of his Royal Highness Prince Frederick of the Netherlands.
8. The Officers of the Household of his late Majesty the King.
9. The Officers of the Household of his late Majesty, King William Frederick, Count of Nassau. All without swords, and in deep mourning, with long hat crapes, two and two, the youngest foremost.
10. The King-at-Arms.
11. The Royal Standard, covered with crape, borne by a General Officer, Adjutant Extraordinary to his Majesty, followed by two pages
12. The Privy Councillor attached to the Cabinet of his late Majesty.
13. The Marshal of the Palace and Chamberlains of his deceased Majesty.
14. The Hearse, hung with black velvet, ornamented with silver trimmings, surmounted by eight white plumes, and drawn by eight black horses, with velvet coverings. Upon a cushion above the coffin were placed the crown and decorations of the deceased. Major-General Baron Van Omphal and Col Van Sprengler, Adjutants of his deceased Majesty, supporters of the Pall. On either side twelve Chamberlains, mounted to bear the body, assisted by a like number of subaltern officers of the line and the Delft National Guard the latter forming the outer line between the hearse and the Chamberlain.
15. The Staff Officers of his Majesty the King.
16. His Majesty the King and his brother Prince Frederick, the trains of the mourning mantles of each supported by two pages.
17. The Prince of Orange and his brothers, the Princes Alexander and Henry of the Netherlands (the King's sons), in mourning mantles, borne by pages. The Ordinary and Extraordinary Adjutants and Ordinance Officers of his Majesty and the Princes.
18. Four Chamberlains.
19. The Marshal of the Palace, and the Chamberlains in Ordinary of the Princes.
20. A Battalion of Grenadier Guards.
21. A Squadron of Dragoons.



WRECK OF "THE PREMIER."

"THE PREMIER," AFTER THE WRECK.

TOTAL WRECK OF THE TRANSPORT "PREMIER."

(From a Correspondent.)

Intelligence has been received of the total wreck of the transport Premier, which sailed from Quebec for the West Indies on the 30th October last, with the head-quarter division of the Royals.

The navigation of the St. Lawrence is at all times attended with danger, from the intricacy of its channels, its numerous reefs and shoals, and from the sluggishness and uncertain variation of the compass; but these perils are greatly increased at the commencement of the winter, by the gales which frequently prevail at this season, the fogs and snow-storms, and strong currents, which, from being powerfully acted upon by the winds, are so irregular in their force, as well as their direction, as seldom to be calculated upon with accuracy. Innumerable accidents, accordingly, to the late full-ish ppons, occur annually in this noble but dangerous river. Last year no less than nine vessels were lost between the 1st and 30th of November.

The total number of persons embarked in the Premier was about 350, including officers, men, women, and children, and the crew of the vessel.

We parted with the pilot off Green Island on the morning of the 3d Nov., the wind blowing fresh and squally from N.W., with occasional falls of snow. Towards evening the wind freshened to a gale. After passing the lighthouse on Bic Island, the course steered was E. by N., the master of the vessel intending to sight the lighthouse on Point des Monts, the northern boundary of the river's mouth—owing to the thickness of the weather, however, this land-mark was not made, and after running, as the captain supposed from the reckoning, within five miles of the Point, at midnight the ship's course was changed to E.S.E., thus making, as it proved, an insufficient allowance for the force of the southerly current, which often sets, during strong northerly gales, towards the opposite shore, at the rate of five and six knots an hour.

At ten o'clock all on board (except the master and watch on deck) had retired to rest, and were buried in profound repose, and fancied security, when, about three hours after midnight, the ship suddenly struck the ground with great violence. Several successive shocks quickly followed, and all was instantly a scene of confusion and dismay that can more easily be imagined than described. A heavy gale was blowing, with thick driving snow, the night intensely dark, the sea running mountain-high, and bursting in floods over the decks; the ship ploughed and laboured dreadfully—like some mighty animal struggling to free itself from the waves of the hunter—her bottom violently striking at intervals against the ground with a most frightful and indescribable sound; while the shrieks of the women and children mingled with the howling of the wind.

Our actual position at this time could not be ascertained; and the three hours of total darkness that followed seemed a century of anxiety and deep suspense. Blue lights were burned and signal-guns fired, though with great difficulty, owing to the plunging of the gun under water; and to ease the ship, which was threatening momentarily to break up, the fore and main masts were cut away, and went over the side with a tremendous crash providentially, without the occurrence of any accident, although the decks were crowded with people.

Day dawned at length, and we were cheered by the near vicinity of land. It was then ascertained that the ship had driven into a small bay, in bay where she lay in comparative security, but that reefs and masses of rocks lay above and below, and a tremendous surf rolled on the beach, which was at this time apparently no more than a quarter of a mile distant. Here, in the grey light, we discerned three or four fishermen's huts, and a few solitary individuals gazing at the wreck, but unable to render any assistance.

Our situation was still exceedingly critical, and indeed perilous. The ship was making water rapidly, and had already so far settled down as to render the main deck, which was necessarily crowded with women, children, and soldiers, wound are long burst upwards, and as her back was apparently broken, and the sea still breaking incessantly over her, it was not known how soon she might go to pieces.

Several hours were lost, and all the boats but one disabled in fruitless attempts to effect a communication with the shore. The launch, in one of these attempts, was capsized in the foaming surf, and an officer of the regiment, Lieutenant Lysons, and three seamen, narrowly escaped a watery grave.

The long-boat, carrying a rope, at length reached the shore, the ship having drifted somewhat nearer, and the sea and tide having partially fallen; and, by means of the hawser, which was now stretched across, hosts were hauled to and from the ship with comparative security. The women and children were first landed: an operation of considerable risk and difficulty, which occupied above three hours. The men and officers then followed, in small parties of ten and twelve, and by eight o'clock in the evening every soul was once more on terra firma.

For eight days we remained on this bleak and almost uninhabited coast, huddled together in huts and hun leeds, in the barns and huts of a few poor Canadian fishermen, whose hospitality and kindness were more than commensurate with their scanty means. The sufferings and privations of the unfortunate women and children during this period were very great, as well as of the soldiers, who, for the eight days, were incessantly soaked in the freezing water, in their arduous and unwearied exertions to recover property from the wreck, and whose general conduct throughout, steady discipline, and ready obedience to orders, were key and all praise.

The scene of the shipwreck proved to be the south shore of the St. Lawrence, about three miles east of a bold rocky promontory called Cape Chats, and about three hundred hewer Quebec.

On the morning of the 11th November, the mail steamer Unicorn, sent to our assistance from Quebec, appeared most unexpectedly in the offing; the day most fortunately proved unusually fine and calm; all the boats that could be mustered were put in immediate requisition, and by five o'clock in the evening, all were again embarked but an officer and twenty men left behind as a guard for the stores and luggage that remained. At nine o'clock the following night, we reached Quebec, from whence our departure had lately been taken under circumstances so different; and where (unless marched overland to Halifax —709 miles) the regiment must now remain till the ensuing spring.

Quebec. ROYAL.

ERUPTION OF MOUNA ROA, IN THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

VOLCANIC ERUPTION AT THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

In the Auburn (United States) Journal appears the following —

Extract from a letter from the Rev. Titus Coan, dated Hilo (Sandwich Islands), May 16, 1841. God is not only working wonders in the moral and evil, but also in the physical world around us. You have heard of the great volcanic eruption near our station in 1840. Another scene, of a similar kind, has recently taken place about the same distance from us, but in a different direction, and directly in the rear of our station. On the 27th of January of the present year, just at the dawn of day, we discovered a rapid segregement of land and fire from near the summit of Mouna Roa, at an elevation of about 14,000 feet above the sea. This eruption increased from day to day for several weeks, pouring out vast floods of fiery lava, which spread down the side of the mountain, and flowed in broad rivers, throwing a terrific glare upon the heavens, and filling those lofty mountainous regions with a sheen of light. This spectacle continued till the molten flood had progressed 20 or 30 miles down the side of the mountain, and across a high plain which stretches between the bases of Mouna Roa and Mouna Kea. After many weeks, in company with Mr. Paris, the missionary for Kau—a station south of Hilo we penetrated through a deep forest, stretching between Hilo and the mountain, and reached the molten stream which we followed to the top of the mountain, and found its source in a vast crater, amidst eternal snow. Down the sides of the mountain the lava had now ceased to flow upon the surface; but it had formed for itself a subterranean duct, at the depth of 50 or 100 feet. This duct was reached, and down this fearful channel a river of fire was rushing at the rate of fifteen or twenty miles an hour, from the summit to the foot of the mountain. This subterranean stream we saw distinctly through several large apertures in the side of the mountain, while the burning flood rushed fearfully beneath our feet. Our visit was attended with peril and inconceivable fatigue, but we never regretted having made it, and we returned deeply affected with the majesty, the sublimity, the power, and the love of that God who "looketh on the earth and it trembleth, who touches the hills and they smoke; whose presence melts the hills, and whose look causes the mountains to flow down."

Mouna Roa is situated in Hawaii, the largest of the Sandwich Islands: it lies towards the south-west corner of the table-land, and its summit is 13,175 feet above the sea. No eruption of this mountain has hitherto been recorded: the crater has a circumference of about six miles and a quarter, and the ancient orifice is not less than twenty-four miles round. There are three other volcanoes in the island, besides conical peaks, which are, evidently, extinct volcanoes.

M. THIERS.

The prominent position taken up by M. Thiers, in the debates on foreign policy, in the French Chamber, induces us to present our readers with the annexed portrait and memoir sketch.

PORTRAIT OF M. THIERS.

Louis Adolphe Thiers was born at Marseilles, on the 16th of April, 1797. His mother belonged to a good family, but his father was a humble locksmith. He was educated at the Imperial College of Marseilles, and studied civil law at AIX. During his residence at Aix (1815) he made himself notorious by his violent language against the Government, and his praises of the Republic and empire; indeed, to such an extent did he carry his language, that he had frequent interviews with the Commissary of Police. It is related of him, that, whilst a student, the Academy of Aix offered a prize for the best composition, the subject being "the praise of Vauvenargues." Thiers produced an elaborate and well written work, decidedly the best, but the judges refused giving the praise to the young Jacobin. Before, however, any decision was come to, an article was sent from Paris, with a request that the letter accompanying it, which contained the name of the author, should not be opened until after the prize had been awarded. The judges were unanimous, and the prize accorded to the Parisian composition. The letter was unsealed, and the author's name appeared to be Thiers. This mystification created him many enemies.

M. Thiers practised for some time at Aix, but without success, and determined on seeking fortune in Paris. He took up his lodgings in the obscure Passage Montesquieu, and his furniture consisted of a deal bedstead and chest of drawers, two chairs, and a black pantechable. How different the residence of M. Thiers at the present day—one of the most sumptuous hotels on the Place St. George, most gorgeously furnished.

Thiers was now taken by the hand by Manuel, the great Liberal orator, expelled from the Chamber of Deputies during the Administration of M. Villele, in 1823. Manuel introduced him to M. Lafitte, and he soon became one of the editors of the Constitutionnel, a paper then most powerful. M. Thiers's contributions were soon noticed, and he was admitted into the saloons of M. Casimir Perrier, Count Flahaut, Baron Lowe, and Prince Talleyrand, the most eminent politicians of the day.

M. Thiers now produced his work of the French Revolution, which, although it created him many enemies, yet ranked him amongst the most celebrated historians. About this time an obscure German bookseller, named Schubert, made the acquaintance of Thiers, and introduced him to Baron Cotta, another German bookseller, immensely rich. M. Cotta took a great fancy to Thiers, and made him a present of a share in the Constitutionnel, then very productive—now worth nothing! M. Thiers, having thus become a newspaper proprietor, descended from the fourth story became a man of fashion—frequented Tortoni's, paraded the Bois de Boulogne on horseback.

In 1824, Thiers, in conjunction with Armand Carrel, founded the National, a most violent paper, declaring everlasting war to Prince Polignac until the lay the unfortunate Ordonnances appeared. On the morning of the 26th of July, 1830, the editors of the different papers held a meeting at the office of the National, and agreed to sign a protest. M. Thiers was the first who put his name to this important document, an act by which he risked his head. The Revolution now broke out, and M. Thiers with much favour by the House. The Lafitte Administration did not last long, and was replaced on the 13th March, 1831, by Casimir Perrier. The politics of M. Perrier were decidedly opposed to those of M. Lafitte, who became head of the Opposition. M. Lafitte and his political friends naturally thought that Thiers was with them; but what was their astonishment on the first day of the opening of the Parliament to hear a speech from him against them, and in favour of the new Minister. M. Thiers excused himself for thus brashly ratting, by saying that he sacrificed his private opinions to the public good. At the death of Casimir Perier, on the 16th of October, 1831, Thiers became Minister of the Interior, and Marshal Soult President of the Council. Thiers and Soult soon began disputing, and Soult was obliged to retire, and was replaced by Marshal Gerard; but, not agreeing with Thiers, he retired, and shortly after the Ministry was broken up

In 1833 M. Thiers again took office as Minister of the Interior, under Marshal Mortier; disputes arose, and the Ministry was dissolved. M. Thiers for a few months office, under the Duc de Broglie, having M. Guizot for Minister of Religion. It was under this Administration that Fieschi fired at the King: Thiers was at the time by the side of his Majesty. Soon, serious dissensions arose between Thiers and Guizot, the result of which was, the Duc de Broglie and M. Guizot retired, and Thiers became President of the Council, and Minister for Foreign Affairs. Thiers, differing with the King relative to a Spanish intervention, retired, and was replaced by Count Molé. The coalition of Guizot and the Ultras next compelled Molé to retire, and Thiers once more took the office of Minister for Foreign Affairs, and M. Guizot was Ambassador to the Court of St. James. Lord Palmerston and the affairs of the East then compelled Thiers to retire, and he was replaced by M. Guizot.

M. Thiers has a great flow of language, but a squeaking, disagreeable voice; he possesses much imagination, but no solidity of conception; in one word, M. Thiers is what the French call a "Brouillon."

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK,

SUNDAY, Jan 28th.—Fourth Sunday after Epiphany.
MONDAY, 29th.—Day 8 h. 52 m. long.
TUESDAY, 30th.—King Charles I. Martyred.
WEDNESDAY, 31st.—Hilary Term ends.
THURSDAY, Feb. 1.—Partridge and Pheasant shooting ends.
FRIDAY, 2nd. Purification. Candlemas Day.
SATURDAY, 3rd Blaise.

HIGH WATER at London-bridge, for the Week ending Feb. 3.

Monday.	Tuesday.	Wednesday.	Thursday.	Friday.	Saturday.
M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.
h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.
4 15	8 51	5 2	19 38	11 31	4 31	5 0	0 7	5 0	0 ..	1 28	1 45

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

TERMS, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

	£	s.	d.
Per Quarter	0	6	6
Half Year	0	13	0
One Year	1	6	0

May be had of all Newsmen and Booksellers, or at the Office, 198, Strand.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Calchus" is thanked; but the desirable subjects are those of contemporaneous interest.
"J. O. S.," Gosport.—The subject is too antiquarian, except for incidental illustration.
"Trotcoddle," Coleford.—We think not.
We have received, from the members of the Council of the Ward of Walbrook, a copy of the accounts of the Churchwardens of St. Stephen's, in which we find Mr. Alderman Gibbs to be a creditor to a considerable amount "The First Subscriber," at Reading.—See No. 51 of our journal for an engraving of the residence of the poet Moore.
"C. T. F. South"—We have received a sheet of Parliamentary Predictions
"Edinburgh."—The article referred to appeared only in a small portion of the impression.
"A Subscriber" from the Isle of Man and "W. H. B." will perceive that we have availed ourselves of their obliging communications.
"C. H. Mayhew," Secretary to the Metropolitan Drapers' Committee.—We received in due time the ticket of admission to the meeting at Exeter-hall on Tuesday last, but could not, on account of inadvertence, give any present there with the interior of Exeter-hall, which has already been more than once engraved in our journal.
"A Lover of Music." Yarmouth.—Of any use earlier.
"R. S. V. P." At present we cannot find room.
"W. C.," "Strood.—See next Stamp Returns, which will be published in about a month, which will, we think, prove our paper to command the largest circulation in the kingdom.
"Bob Cratchit."—If our correspondent will obtain for us from the Edinburgh manager copies of the address and prologue, we will insert them
"J. E. H.," "Great Swanton Rectory, is thanked for the suggestion, which, however, we cannot at present entertain.
"A Lady."—We do not recommend either.
"A Constant Reader," Ilnlesworth.—"Mabel Marchmont" can only be obtained in our journal.
"Piper" should try.
"Three of Us," Manchester; "A Saxon Settler in Ulster."—We do not denote our approval of the conduct of parties by illustrations.
"John."—The West Indian voyage is now usually performed in three weeks.
"Jones E." is too credulous in believing the promises of persons whose object is too flimsy for the many. The price of Vols. II. and III. is 18s. each.
"C. B. S."—We will not last until Lent.
"C. F. S.," Northampton-terrace.—The Mechanical System is better suited for a scientific journal than the columns of a newspaper.
"A Working Man," Lanchouse, is thanked for his praise of our special correspondent in Ireland.
"A Constant Reader."—The portrait of the Rev. B. W. N. shall appear soon.
"P. C.," Lutterworth.—Will our correspondent favour us with a sketch?
"A Clergyman," west of the banks of the Tamar, wishes to correct an error in our last week's paper on the number of Sundays in February of Leap Year. The last year, our correspondent is right in, which there were five Sundays in February was 1836, and the next will be 1852.
"Verax." We have not room for the translation.
"C. E.," Bath, is thanked for the suggestion, but the incident is of too old a date. We shall be happy to hear again from our correspondent.
"A Pupil." Camberwell.—The informant is reached us too late for insertion in our present No. of Camberwell New Church.
"L. L. W."—The subjects are good of their kind, but, through pressure of news, we can rarely avail ourselves of them.
"J. M. B.," Liverpool. Declined.
"B. Z."—Our reply was correct. The work recommended was Roland's work on fencing.
"J. G. K.," Blanchville, Kilkenny.—Mr. Delaporte, pruntseller, of Regent-street, may possibly have the print.
"R. G. P.," Cork. The Yorkshire society's schools would not be a reasonable illustration; but a more fitting opportunity may occur.
"W. D. M."—At present we have not room.
"Capt. S.," Newry.—The Lord Mayor of London (Sir John Pirie) received his baronetcy in consequence of the birth of the Prince of Wales.
"A. G. P.," Dublin. See the first page of the present number.
"J. T. C."s "St. George's East" ingenuity is too laudatory.
"A Novice."—The announcement was inadvertently made, but the portrait shall soon appear.
"J. J.," Castle Bromwich.—Will our correspondent forward a sketch?
"A Scotch Liberal."—We are unapprised of the slightest feeling of party." We should no doubt soon separate the cause of humanity
"G. C." (Nemesis.) We have not room for long political contributions.
"A Subscriber," Macclesfield.—Write the line.
"J. M.," Oswell College. The comparison of the powers of the Haarlem, York, and Birmingham (Town-hall) organs, published about 1830, placed the latter nearly equal in power, if not in tone, to the first named instruments; and, as several improvements have since been made in the Birmingham organ, we should say it is not inferior to any organ in the world.
"J. J."—See our present number.
"R. S. T. S.," Greenwich.—We cannot insert the petition, but will not relax in our advocacy of its prayer.
"H. P. J.," Wallington. Certainly not
"I. S."—The new arrangement for inserting the Fashions once a month, instead of weekly, has been already explained.
"A Subscriber."—The articles on Floriculture will be resumed in the spring.
"J. N.," Manchester.—The letter has been forwarded.
"Spratt," Edinburgh.—We do not know, but we were much concerned near of Capt. Basil Hall's attack of paralysis some time since
"F. J." Dudley.—Marshal Soult visited England on the coronation of her Majesty, in 1838, and once previously. Eight shillings would be high.
"T. P." Manchester.—"A Constant Subscriber," "Yorke."—Intangible.

CHESS "M."—1. The pawn can give check immediately on being exchanged for the queen. 2. You must mate him in fifty moves, or the game will be drawn.
"A Constant Subscriber," "Latruncular," you can have two or more queens on the board at once.
"A Young Beginner."—You cannot castle when in check.
"Some Subscribers," "J. S. P." —Want of space has compelled us to omit the games between Messrs. St. Amant and Staunton for two or three weeks, but we will endeavour to make up for lost time.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 27, 1844.

TRIALS IN IRELAND.

It will be seen that our Special Correspondent has amply recorded the progress of the State Trials in Ireland, and reflected something of the tone of public feeling about them in the sister kingdom. We deem it better, while the prosecution is pending, to abstain from leading remark either upon the gravamen of the charge against the traversers, or how far—as the evidence advances—it appears to be or not to be substantiated. But with the exception of those blunders of circumstance of which we had last week gravely to complain, we must confess that we cannot find in the modus operandi of the Crown—in the practical conduct of the case—any of that virulence, malignity, and anxiety for conviction with which the Government, and particularly the Attorney-General—(as its chief law officer in the prosecution)—is aspersed by the traversers and their friends. During the preliminaries to the trial we had to complain, and we did so in a strongly rebukeful spirit, that the Attorney-General did not grant the four days extra time to plead, which he might have given with such perfect grace and propriety, without allowing the point to go to needless litigation; but since the commencement of the real drama, of the actual trial, we have not for the life of us been able to discover either petulance, violence, or want of dignity in the conduct of the proceedings on the part of the Crown.

When the Attorney-General opened the case, he made use of strong language in declaring that he would prove the existence of a foul and extensive conspiracy, and that onus probandi rests upon him still; but in the whole course of his simple, and, as we thought, temperate statement in detail, he did not evince the slightest desire to exaggerate—he plunged into no fiery declamation—he made no appeal to the fears, the passions, or the politics of the jury—he did not rave against the acts of the traversers, or use strong denouncements to excite or to inflame, but calmly and blandly he conducted his statement to its conclusion, and so far as his manner was concerned (we leave his matter to its proper test of proof), if it was not forcible, it was certainly fair. The Standard characterizes it as a masterpiece of Bar eloquence; but in this matter we do not pin our faith to the Standard. The Post thinks it was not half powerful enough—that it did not make as much of the business as it should, and in this matter we do not pin our faith to the Post. The fact is, that it was not very eloquent; but for being the less eloquent it was the more just. It avoided exasperation, and that is just what it ought to have avoided, as we believe.

On the other hand it must be confessed that the traversers have tried their utmost at provocation. We have strongly advocated fair play for them, and strenuously we will advocate it still. But we are not quite sure that they do not expect it all on one side, and that there is a sort of Irish reciprocity in the fair play they want They have left no means untried, either without or within the court, to make the trial unpopular, and to get up an execration against the law-officer of the Crown. They have applied smarting-rods to the Attorney-General, both at public meetings and through the press. In squib-verse, sarcastic prose, and violent personal invective, he has been lashed from one end to the other of Dublin town; and really he has taken the abuse with very dignified complacency, notwithstanding the irritability of temper which is said to be his ban. On the part of the Crown there have been no political demonstrations in Dublin to counteract the agitation, which is listlessly allowed to take its course. And again, we cannot conceal the fact, that in the Court of Queen's Bench every possible expedient has been hit upon by the traversers to achieve the purposes of delay, which would be almost equivalent to defeating the ends of justice, inasmuch as the avowed object is to bring Parliamentary discussion to bear upon the trials, and so create external influences and impressions, which might affect, not only the minds of the jury, but the tone of feeling of the whole people of Ireland. It seems, therefore, to us, that the traversers are the more violent party of the two, and that the charge of practical animosity to them, on the part of the Attorney-General, is laid at the wrong door.

We shall be glad to find the Crown as mild in its temper, through the whole of this remarkable prosecution, as it has been hitherto. The trial itself was a necessity. There is no escaping from that fact. It is its end that is a mystery—its result that is vague and undefined—whether conviction or acquittal ensue. All we pray is, that, come what may, it may terminate in the cause of justice and the good of Ireland, and without caring, politically, either for the traversers or the Government, we again ejaculate—May God defend the right!

There is a case reported this week of the conviction of some delinquent persons for keeping a gambling house, in which the evidence adduced by the prosecutor is of itself of the most revolting nature; and, as it generally happens that persons frequenting gambling houses are as lewd as persons keeping them, the profligate testimony we allude to need excite no emotion of surprise. There is a detail in the case of just such heartless schemes of robbery as are commonly concocted, either to perfect the ruin of the play-spendthrift, or to lure new victims into the infectious den; there is a display of ready slang, chuckling over a career of debauchery and crime; there is an exposure, that persons of rank and station have degraded themselves by foul contact with sharpers and knaves; in short, there is such a picture as honesty shudders at, and virtue loathes; and we point to it from this page, that its warning may not be lost upon society. We feel a sort of regret in reading the case, that the prosecutor, who participated in the crime and lost, could not be punished as well as the wretches who participated in it and gained. But, in any event, it is satisfactory to know that punishment did ensue, and that thus another inducement is held out to parishes to root out the gambling houses from their streets, and send the scorching retribution of offended justice into those pestilent caverns of crime, ruin, and remorse.

We beg to call the attention of our readers to that part of the letter of our correspondent in Ireland which touches on the conduct of the Morning Herald newspaper, in reference to the confidential communications from Dublin of a person in its employ which that journal betrayed, without his sanction, to the Government, and handed over, without permission of the writer, to be used for the purposes of a Crown prosecution. For the honour of journalism, we hope we may assert that such a gross breach of trust could not have occurred in any other establishment in the world; and as the proprietorship of that paper has changed hands, we hope that the whole press of the country may never have blushing occasion to feel itself degraded and dishonoured in that quarter again.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The usual routine of healthful exercise has been observed at Windsor Castle during the week, her Majesty and the infantine members of the Royal Family frequently taking carriage airings, whilst his Royal Highness Prince Albert enlisted himself with increased avidity in the sports of the field.

We regret to learn that Baroness Brunnow, the lady of his Excellency the Russian Minister, has been taken suddenly and seriously ill.

Lord Stanley had a Cabinet dinner on Wednesday evening at his residence in St. James's-square. The Lord Chancellor and Earl of Ripon were prevented by indisposition from dining with his Lordship.

The Duke of Wellington's annual official full dress banquet, on Wednesday next, is to be given to a party of forty-six ministerial Peers, including the mover and seconder of the Address in the House of Lords

A Cabinet Council was held on Wednesday afternoon at the Foreign-office. The Ministers present were Sir R. Peel, the Duke of Wellington, Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir J. Graham, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Earl of Haddington, Earl of Ripon, Mr. Gladstone, Sir H. Hardinge, and Sir Ed. Knatchbull. The council sat three hours.

The Earl of Aberdeen returned to town on Tuesday morning from a visit to her Majesty at Windsor, and visited Sir R. Peel after his arrival. A number of the Cabinet Ministers dined with the Noble Earl, at his lordship's residence in Argyll-street, in the evening.

The remains of the Marquis of Hastings were interred at Donnington with great funeral state, on Monday last.

The Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank had an interview with Sir R. Peel and the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Thursday morning, at the official residence of the Chancellor, in Downing-street.

PRESENT FROM HER MAJESTY.—We gave an account some ago of an accident which occurred to her Majesty on the preceding afternoon near Horton, by being nearly thrown out of a pony phaeton, which was turned upon its side in a ditch, owing to the bank sinking away in consequence of the rottenness of the earth after a sudden thaw. Upon that occasion her Majesty returned to Windsor in a four-wheeled chaise belonging to Mr. Holderness, of Horton, whose lady was driving close to the vicinity of the accident at the time. Her Majesty has graciously condescended to be remembered by Mrs. Holderness, a very elegant pair of silver candlesticks highly chased, bearing her Majesty's initials, surmounted with an imperial crown.

ROYAL BETROTHAL.—ST. PETERSBURGH, Jan. 8.—The solemn celebration of the betrothal of her Imperial Highness the Grand Duchess Alexandrina Nicolaevna, youngest daughter of the Emperor, with his Royal Highness Prince Frederick Charles Nicholas of Hesse, the Danish Crown, took place yesterday at the Winter Palace. After the ceremony the august betrothed presented their thanks to their Majesties, who then joined in their congratulations, with all the other members of the Imperial family.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD, Jan. 24.—The Reader in Experimental Philosophy will commence a course of lectures on Hydrostatics and Pneumatics, at the Clarendon, on Wednesday, the 31st inst., at one o'clock. The Regius Professor of Modern History will read his lectures on the Life of Cromwell during the present term. The days of lecture will be Tuesdays and Thursdays, at two o'clock, P.M., to commence from Thursday February 1st.

The following appointments have taken place The Rev. Edward Lane Sayer, M.A., of St. John's College, to the living of Pulloxhill, Bedfordshire (patron, Sir Culling Carrington Smith); the Rev. Fowler, B.A., of Magdalene College, to the rectory of Theydon, Garnon, Essex. The Rev. Thomas William Beesley, M.A., of Trinity College, to the perpetual curacy of Woodbridge, Suffolk. The Rev. Charles Hamilton Bowen, B.A., of Trinity College, to the perpetual curacy of St. Luke's, Liverpool. The Rev. John Hodgkinson, M.A., of St. John's College, to the vicarage of Stronsal with Rousay, near York value, £195.

An ordination will be held on Sunday, the 28th of January, by the Bishop of Norwich, at Norwich.

The Bishop of Winchester will consecrate a new church and burial ground at Barton Village, near Newport, in the Isle of Wight, on the 1st of February.

On Saturday, the 20th instant, the Rev. Henry Harding, M.A., rector of Aldridge, was collated by the Lord Bishop of the diocese to the prebendal stall of Dernford, in the cathedral church of Lichfield.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

DEATH OF MR. HOBLER.—We regret to state that the venerable Mr. Hobler, who was clerk at the Mansion House for fifty-four years, died on Monday morning last at his residence in Queen's-row, Pentonville. He was in his 89th year. He had only recently retired, and his portrait had within a few weeks past been hung up in the Justice-room at the Mansion House, as a mark of respect for his long services. An excellent portrait with a correct biographical memoir of this useful and respected public servant, may be found in Number 80 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

FEVER AND SMALL-POX IN SOUTHWARK.—At an inquest which was held on Monday before Mr. Payne, it was stated that small-pox and fever were very prevalent in the lower parts of Southwark, particularly at Bankside. A jury was sworn, and proceeded to view the locality, when there in one family lying dead, and that nine had recently died there, though there were but few inhabitants in it. The Coroner asked if vaccination had been resorted to? The parties said that it had, but he suspected that it had been imperfectly performed. Another juror said, that in some parts there were above half the inhabitants affected by small-pox or fever, which was attributed to the present unseasonable close state of the weather.

THE MASONIC BALL.—The annual ball in aid of the funds by which the asylum for the aged and decayed Masons is supported took place on Tuesday night in the great room at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields. The attendance of company was more numerous than on any previous occasion, and the dancing was carried on for many hours with great spirit. The assemblage at the noon at 12 o'clock was particularly lively and gratifying. In the large room adjoining the ball-room, refreshments were furnished to the company on a scale of liberality and elegance. This festival, as a whole, was excellently well conducted, and reflects praise on the stewards and directors of the festivities.

ORPHAN ASYLUM AT CLAPTON.—On Monday the annual general meeting of the patrons and friends of this institution was held at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, for the election of a number of children to be received into the asylum, and for general purposes. J. Capel, Esq., in the chair. The number of children receiving benefits of the charity at the date of the last report was 384, but the present number, including those elected on the present occasion, the report stated to be 401. The report was received with great satisfaction, and unanimously adopted. The meeting then proceeded to the election of additional children of the asylum, when candidates for 23 boys and girls were elected.

THE POOR NEEDLEWOMEN.—At the annual meeting of the subscribers to the North London Ophthalmic Institution, which took place on the 18th instant, at the Freemasons' Tavern, it was stated in the report, that, out of 669 patients relieved during the past year, no less than 91 were poor needlewomen, whose eyes had been materially injured by the incessant application at the work required to earn a precarious subsistence. This was strongly dwelt upon by Sir George Staunton, Professor Owen, and others, as an evil arising out of the grinding system pursued by the cheap warehouses, which has not been sufficiently noticed, especially as it is a question concerning the eyesight of thousands, who, if rendered blind, would become burthens upon the parish.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The following notice was posted on the door of the Court of Chancery, on Wednesday:—"January 24th, the Lord Chancellor will not sit to-day." We understand that the noble and learned lord is suffering under a slight attack of lumbago, but it is expected he will be able to resume his official duties in a day or two.

MR. ALDERMAN GIBBS AND THE ROYAL SEA-BATHING INFIRMARY.—An extraordinary general meeting of the members of the above charity, established at Mar[illegible] he relief by se[illegible]bathing of persons suffering from disease, &c., [illegible] on Thursday last at the London Coffee House; R. B. Cabbell, Esq., [illegible]. Newspaper reporters were admitted, a favour never before extended to them. Mr. Alderman Gibbs was not present; but a paper was handed in, purporting to be an audit of the accounts, from which is appeared that the accounts as examined were found to be strictly correct, there being a sum of £. 41 1s. 2d. due to the charity on the general account, and £323 1s. 8d. on the permanent account. After some discussion, the report was agreed to. The Rev. Mr. Hodgson addressed the meeting at some length, with reference to the irregular manner in which the affairs of the charity had been managed; and after some observations from Mr. Pye, Mr. Alderman Copeland, Mr. Hutchinson, Mr. Fairbrother, and other gentlemen, thanks were passed to the chairman, and the meeting separated.

BUILDING FOR THE DESTITUTE, HACKNEY-ROAD.—The annual meeting of [illegible] members of this society took place on Thursday last, at the London Tavern, [illegible]-gate-street, Mr. Foster in the chair. The object of the institution is to [illegible] place of refuge for young persons of both sexes during their term of imprisonment, &c. &c. From the report, it appeared that during the past year there have been 262 applications for admittance, of which number there were selected 172, which, together with 20[illegible] persons previously in the institution, made the total number 376, and since the commencement in 1805, 5998. The receipts for the year amounted to £4388 13s. 1d., there being, deducting the expenditure, a balance remaining with the treasurers. The report having been received and adopted, the usual business was gone through, and the proceedings terminated.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BRISTOL. EXTRAORDINARY RESULT OF MEDICAL SKILL.—On Wednesday morning, Mary Cribb, aged forty, servant to Mr. Stone, in St. James's churchyard, was discovered by her fellow-servants suspended over a staircase by a rope, her master being immediately called, but no time in rescuing her from her awful situation, when she was found in a state of insensibility. Mr. Prowse was sent for, and bled her, after which she was taken to the infirmary, where the following events were resorted to, for restoring animation:—Bleeding from the jugular and bronchial veins, salts of ammonia applied to the nose, ginger-wine with cold water to the head and chest, and a long-continued and powerful stream of electricity. Every one of these means was applied from a quarter before nine till one o'clock, without intermission, at which latter hour she evinced some symptoms of recovery, but it was not till a quarter to six o'clock that consciousness was restored to enable her to recognise her sister. From that hour to the present time she has been gradually getting better, and strong hopes are entertained of her ultimate recovery, although as yet she has no recollection of any circumstance subsequent to the preparing of the dinner on the forenoon of the previous day. She appears to think that her illness was occasioned by her having fallen down the stairs. Mr. Stone had heard a noise similar to that made by the woman, when rescued, for ten or fifteen minutes previously, from which it would appear that she had been suspended during that time. The coroner has since been [illegible] to have had to her to commit the rash act.

DARLINGTON.—WHITE SLAVERY.—A circumstance which strikingly illustrates the effect of protracted factory labour on the health, occurred a day or two ago in Darlington. A female, named Mary Thompson, aged twenty-three years, died suddenly, on her way from the factory of Messrs. Pease and Co., where she had been employed for several years, and latterly from six in the morning till nine at night. It appeared that she was leaving her work, with three other females, when she was heard to give an hysterical laugh, and shortly after she fell to the ground, and, on being lifted up, gave a heavy groan, and immediately expired.

EPSOM.—EXTRAORDINARY CASE OF ARSON.—Two men, named Edmund Langley and Alfred Amsden, the former keeping a petty chandler's shop at Langley Broom, between Slough and Colnbrook, and the other a shoemaker, lodging in the same house, with whom was rented by Langley of a person named Dewley, were brought before the Eton bench of magistrates on Monday morning in custody of the police, charged with arson. It appeared from the evidence of the several witnesses who were examined, that a strong light was observed in two or three rooms in the house, between five and six o'clock on Sunday morning, by some persons who was passing by. The persons who lived next door were immediately aroused from their beds, and upon their entering the house of the prisoner Langley, it was found to be entirely stripped of its furniture, with the exception of part of a bedstead, which was tied up behind a door. Upon going up stairs a large fire was found in the grate, with a bed-post, one end in the grate and the other resting on the floor, in flames; and also, piled up on the side of the fireplace, and likewise burning, an old picture-frame and a boot-tree, partly consumed, and several pieces of dry wood. The mantel-piece, composed of wood, had also ignited. A fire was also found in the grate in the back room of the ground floor, the chimney in flames, and upwards of two bushels of burning soot on the floor. In the front room on the same floor there was likewise a fire in the grate, but not a single person was found in the house. On the top of the [illegible] were [illegible]

THE DUBLIN STATE TRIALS.

THE PROCESSION THROUGH DAME STREET.

IRELAND AND THE STATE TRIALS.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

Dublin, Jan. 24

Here is another letter de omnibus rebus, but, most of all, as it should be, about the absorbing topic of the state trials. As far as I can judge here, these remarkable prosecutions appear to be creating a profound sensation in England; and the tone of English opinion with regard to them is even here more looked to than the strong party articles of the Dublin press. The presence of so strong a corps of London reporters and correspondents as we have here at present fixes the eye of curiosity upon the results of their mission, and there is a great cacoethes to know what "my masters" of the leviathan journalism of London will have to say about the Irish row. The great space, too, which the metropolitan papers have devoted to the trials—almost to the exclusion of other topics of public intelligence—tests the importance in which they are held in England, and how deeply those "who hold the Union dear" believe the peace of both countries to be involved in their conclusion. When that conclusion may arrive it would be indeed hard to speculate upon. Unless the jury should fall sick, and I am inclined to think that none of them will feign to do so, six weeks, at least, seems to be their very shortest limit. I know that the Crown has subpœnaed more than a hundred witnesses, and that one who stands about eighty on the list (at present not twelve have been examined), has got leave of absence to go into the country for a few days. So that, what with the Crown phalanx, the traversers' own army of evidence, and the ponderous interruptions of counsel upon points, there is pleasant prospect of an eternal dilatory dalliance; and we may say "avez vous fini?" to this trial long before it will be able to answer in the affirmative! What you will do for efficient Parliamentary reporters in London, when the Session arrives, or what effect the opening debates of the Legislature will have upon the trial itself, are other speculations, which have each their share of puzzle in the solving; but, indeed, for straightforward people, the whole business affords a very pretty labyrinth as it stands.

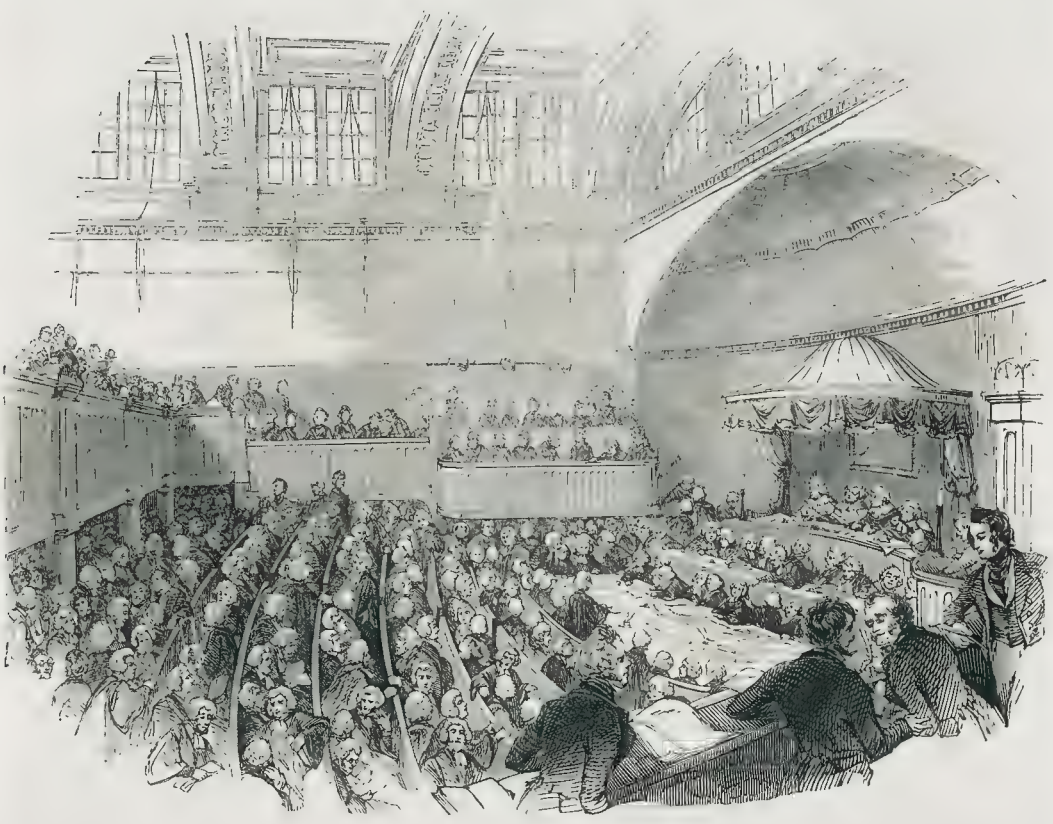
Whatever the result, the agitation itself has a very mischievous effect upon social Dublin—ay, and upon Dublin commercial, too. I have been here long enough to discover and to regret this. I told you that the Dublin people evinced more quiet and less excitement than we do in London over great topics of national disturbance—and the fact is so; but, nevertheless, men's minds are absorbed in the contemplation—though it be comparatively a passive one—of their religious and political position; their hearts dwell upon it, their thoughts cling to it, they leave their homes and business to run after and to watch, they whet their appetites and season their punch with it, they carry it into the bosom of their families and bring its spice and flavour into their home discourse, they present it from a newspaper or over a snuff-box to their companions and their friends—in a word, it is their public idol and their household god, and no considerations of worldly interest or advantage can ever eradicate it from their spirit till some climax shall bring a period of repose. Thus it is, that, without noise, without fussiness or needless turmoil, without any vivacious or boisterous hurry, without any apparent flurry of the spirit, Dublin devotes itself entirely to religion or politics, and absorbs its being in these state prosecutions. But really trade is in a great measure paralyzed by this; and although there are plenty of rich capitalists in the city (who, by the way, ominously refuse to lay out their money in the present state of things), yet there is a startling amount of poverty pervading the daily trade, and the only sort of people who seem to be really flourishing are the newsvenders, the lawyers, and the proprietors of lodging-houses and hotels. Living is cheap, rents are dear; but, otherwise, there is nothing stirring but "stagnation" and the state trials.

In fact, the chief business of the inhabitants seems to be the running backwards and forwards to and from the Four Courts, asking each other on the road who is under examination, or whether the Crown or the traversers are addressing the bench, or what fun is in court (for there is none out of it), or what came of the meeting at Lord Charlemont's (of which anon), or how the "Protestans" got on at the Rotunda, and such like effusions of curiosity, until the courts close, and then it is "home to dinner," with a running commentary upon the town hearsay until the papers are out, and then a running commentary upon the evidence when the papers are read. And so poor trade ponders over its depopulated counters and its empty tills, and business shakes its drooping head at agitation, as much as to say "Arrah, when will ye be done wid me, ye unconscionable baste?"

And this is felt by all classes—or rather by the only two classes there are—Protestants and Catholics—Conservatives and Repealers—alike. One party says that agitation is the killing mischief, and wish Dan at the Devil; the other sees a revival of commerce and endless prosperity in Repeal—and pretty animated women in the shops (who have nothing else to do, like Molly Bawn's stars), will tell you, in a sweet whining brogue, and with eyes half subdued by sorrowfulness, or half lit up with smiles, that it's "only that wretch Dan," or that it's "nothing under Heaven but the lack of Repale that's ruinin' them entirely." All the ladies here are politicians, and full of vivacity and partizanship in private—tinging their generous festivities and profuse hospitality with sparkling episodes of feminine enthusiasm, which, before general society, none but your high-spirited and uncurbed Irish gentlewoman would have the courage to display. Several laughing and startling instances of the sharp and warm political sallies of the Irish ladies have half amazed, and quite delighted me, during the short time that I have partaken the charm of their society in "Dublin Town." Apropos of the ladies, may I not, before abandoning "the darling theme," just hint that "it is a glorious sight to see" them on a fine day pouring out a bevy of beauty into Sackville-street promenade, their eyes sparkling with political fervour—their rosy cheeks of health (for as they ride about at other times in the open cars, the lovely tinge of freshness wooes them through the glowing air) deepening their colour under the excitement of political curiosity—stopping friends here—forming groups there—with the trials, and the trials only, in their looks and upon their lips; and the dear, resistless brogue enquiring after "wicked Dan," or "darling Dan," according to the predilection of the enchanting querist's heart! Yes, I tell you that the tableaux vivants which Irish beauty gathers in noble Sackville-street, under the animation of political excitement, might warm old Nelson from his column'd height, and certainly afford a sufficient excuse for my momentary digression from the active and earnest business of the absorbing trials themselves.

O'CONNELL LEAVING THE ROBING ROOM FOR THE COURT.

THE DUBLIN STATE TRIALS.



THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH—THE TRIAL.

Revenons à nos moutons, however, and let us come to the PROGRESS OF THE PROSECUTION.

The public papers—and the later communications of your own reporters here—will have made you acquainted with the routine of the trials, so far as they have proceeded; it will, therefore, be my business only to hold a sort of free commune with you upon the personnel of the evidence, and the impression it has made upon different parties'—and upon my own—minds.

You will see that the first witness examined was Mr. Frederick Bond Hughes, the Government Reporter. Oh! what a cruel tearing was expected for this hapless gentleman! What eternal rolls of castigatory parchment were said to be hidden in the traversers' bags—what brief of torture to be lying under the traverser's noses for him! He was to be put upon the rack with a vengeance—he was to be ill-Hughes'd indeed! Pity had already crept into people's bosoms on his behalf, and Vengeance was half satisfied before his slaying began!

Oh! Mr. Hughes,
I'd not be in your shoes,

was the street impromptu that made the bridges echo and the Liffey bubble with dismay!

But all this was the "parturient montes, nascetur ridiculus mus," not that we mean to make a mouse either of Mr. Hughes or his examination; but it soon became evident that the frog had swelled before the bull, and that the "bubble on the Liffey had burst!" Mr. Hughes was calmly examined, his torture was abrogated, and he was permitted to go through his arduous task like a self-possessed and straightforward gentleman. He spoke to the point, made no palaver; enunciated his answers with clearness, and, we notice, read his documents beautifully. He had avowed himself a Government Reporter at all the meetings he attended spoke out in that capacity and applied for documents in that capacity only. He cleared up the mistake he had involuntarily made as to identity in his first depositions by stating that he had immediately corrected that mistake to the Crown Solicitor and his head clerk—he repeated upon oath his declaration that Tom Steele had really quoted—

"Behemoth, biggest-born of earth, Upheaved its vastness."

And from all I can gather elsewhere, as well as from the prestige assumed from Tom's half-phrenzied poetical declamation, I have no personal doubt of the fact. At all events, the traversers did not think proper to examine him upon this point, but he was let down quietly, and left the court with golden opinions from all parties.

The evidence next in importance was that of Mr. Ross, who also sustained himself with considerable self-possession, and evinced some smartness of reply; but this gentleman did not come quite so well out of his ordeal as Mr. Hughes. Still he did not get the unmerciful flogging which it was expected would be administered, and the anticipation which made his examination an object of so much attraction to the audience, for what would have been "death to the witness would have been sport to them." Mr. Ross was a gentleman, I know of deservedly high reputation on the London press for his reporting qualifications, and was, respectively, one of the most efficient men upon the Times and Chronicle. No more able person could have been selected for the purposes of Government, and so Government seems to have imagined, for it has paid him four hundred pounds. Mr. Ross sees no reason why a newspaper reporter should not be examined, if properly subpœnaed, nor, I confess, do I. I cannot agree in the protest of the Dublin press, to the effect that the responsibilities of a reporter should exonerate a man from his duties as a citizen; and I think that either in his capacity of newspaper reporter, or Government reporter. Mr. Ross might have given evidence sans tache. But the complaints here, among the liberal press, and all the friends of the traversers, is, that Mr. Ross veiled one capacity in another, and procured, avowedly for the public journals, documents really meant for the private information of the Crown. Of this charge being true there is, to say the least, colourable suspicion, and I cannot regard the position of Mr. Ross as at all enviable in this respect. Upon the whole, however, he escaped "not much scathed," although he had to answer questions concerning his personal affairs, which were, I think, ungenerously, if not unfairly, put by the traversers' counsel. He rather beat the Bar, however, over the questions about his politics, and created a great deal of laughter in the court. He was much exhausted with the fatigue of long reading, and, at the instance of the judges, was more than once relieved by the Clerk of the Court. Then he assumed, for the nonce, the character of an Orangeman, and sucked away at a genuine St Michael with refreshing vigour.

THE REPORTERS' BOX.

The next "pressman" examined was the correspondent of the Morning Herald, Mr. Jackson, who, when the Crown had done with him, was taken in hand by Mr. Fitzgibbon, who lashed him, con amore, for nearly an entire day. I would not willingly witness a repetition of that flagellation -it was crucifying. The witness was alternately vexed, bullied, and confused by it, until, I fear, he nearly ruined his evidence, damaged himself, and placed the former proprietors of the Morning Herald in a position degrading and disgraceful in the extreme. I have no word to say against the present dynasty of that journal, but I will speak my mind, as every one in Dublin is doing, about the disclosures of this curious evidence. I can almost more pity than condemn Mr. Jackson, whose weakness and indecision are but too apparent, and seem, moreover, to have been externally controlled, but I can find no terms of reproach too strong for the journal, which not only controlled but betrayed them. Mr. Jackson was a chance contributor of some lively pleasantries—half fact, half fiction—which used to appear in the Morning Herald as reports of the "Kilrush Petty Sessions." They attracted some notice in London, and so far won the approval of the proprietors that they made Mr. Jackson the offer of their "Dublin correspondence," at the paltry pittance of three guineas per week. Living, however, is cheap here as I have said, and young men in Ireland, without private property and perhaps with a family, are glad to obtain even so small a certainty where the labour is not great, although the responsibility is—as it has turned out—important. Mr. Jackson took the birth—sent daily his confidential communications to the Morning Herald; that journal kept them after use—reserved them as matter for a Government prosecution—betrayed them, without consulting Mr. Jackson, into the hands of the Crown Solicitor, and the first intimation their writer receives of the shameful fact, comes in the shape of a visit from the Irish official, who lays before him the whole of his treasured correspondence, with a letter from his proprietors commanding him to seal it with his initial verification! I am sorry that Mr. Jackson had the weakness to initial those documents—though I can well make much and sorrowful allowance for the predicament of a young and nervous man, with a family, placed in the alternative of losing his immediate means of subsistence, or of verifying documents which he had after all really written. I know that his true course would have been to have spurned the injunction of the paper that had betrayed him without his knowledge—and we wish he had done so, if only to have spared himself the ordeal of the traversers' fierce examination. But I recall the conduct of the Morning Herald as bad and mean, and treacherous in the extreme, and I am only glad that it has abandoned the dynasty that could involve its character by the commission of such an act.

Having thus dismissed the three features of first importance in the evidence at the commencement of the trials, and which form the real topics of Dublin conversation, I shall leave your readers to gather the substance of the remaining testimony from your reports, merely calling your attention to a sort of practical self perpetrated by O'Connell upon the Crown during the course of Tuesday's proceedings.

Although a prisoner, and under heavy recognizances, he, with one of the other traversers, Tom Steele, left the court, and hurried away as fast as they could fly to a meeting at the Conciliation Hall, where Dan succeeded in delivering himself of a short and fiery oration, Smith O'Brien, Esq., M.P., and the descendant of Brian Boru, being in the chair. Dan and his brother traversers, however, being missed by the Attorney-General, were soon fetched back by a mandate from the Court of Queen's Bench, but not, as I have said, before he had had his say—and for the first, and, I suppose, the Attorney-General will take care last time, sold the Government. You will have seen that Justice Burton being unwell, and absent, in consequence, from court, the traversers applied to postpone the trials for his recovery, but without success. This is only another instance, however, of the arduous and persevering struggle for delay, which the traversers have manifested all through this momentous prosecution.

MEETING AT CHARLEMONT HOUSE.—[illegible] the Earl of Charlemont, a meeting of Liberal peers, [illegible] Commons, and other gentlemen, took place on Thursday at Charlemont House, Portland-square, "to consider the course most judicious to be adopted in the present state of Ireland." Amongst the noblemen and gentlemen who attended—upwards of fifty—were the following:—The Duke of Leinster, Marquis of Clanricarde, Marquis of Kildare, Earl of Charlemont, Earl of Leitrim, Earl of Mountcashel, Earl of Miltown, Viscount Acheson, Lord Stuart De Decies, Lord Talbot de Malahide, Sir Thomas Esmonde, Bart., Sir Percy Nugent, Bart., Sir John Burke, Bart, Sir Valentine Blake, Bart, Sir John Power, Bart, James [illegible], M.P., Robert Archbold, M.P., Mathew Corbally, Esq., M.P., [illegible], M.P., A.B. Blake, George Roe, Esq., Thomas Hutton, Esq., [illegible], Peter Purcell, Esq., Shafto Adair, Esq., James O'Brien, Esq., Hon. Charles Trench, Stephen Dickson, Esq., Harold Crosthwaite, Esq., Joseph Brady, M.P., John H. Talbot, Esq., Hon. Col. Southwell, Marmaduke C. Roberts, Hon. Frederick Ponsonby, Stephen Grehan, Esq. The Right Hon. D. R. Pigot was prevented by illness from attending. The circular convening the meeting was marked private.

Speeches were made, and resolutions passed, having a tendency similar to that which marked the spirit of the aggregate meeting at the Music-hall, which you described and reported in your last number.

Dr. Giffard, the editor of the Standard, is in Dublin, and there is a rumour afloat, whether well-founded or otherwise I cannot inform you, that he has been subpœnaed (how, or why, or wherefore, I cannot imagine) by the Government upon the pending trials. If it be so, there will be a fine encounter between the illustrious Doctor and the traversers. At a great and most respectable MEETING OF PROTESTANT OPERATIVES, which took place on Tuesday evening at the Rotunda, Doctor Giffard sat on the left of the chair, and eloquently addressed an audience of near 2000 persons, amidst deafening cheers. The meeting was got up on behalf of Richard Oastler; and Busfield Ferrand, Esq., delivered at it a long and strong harangue, in which he most effectively pictured the evils of the factory slavery in England, the distress of the manufacturing districts under the march of machinery, and the curse of the Poor-law bill. All these Richard Oastler was for abrogating, and he loped soon to see that fine and honest philanthropist, not only out of prison, but in Parliament, and advocating the cause of the English and the Irish poor. Mr. Ferrand was listened to with much attention and sympathy, and responded to with the loudest acclamations. The Rev. Mr. Gregg and others also addressed the assembly.

I think I have now nearly exhausted for you the topics of the week, and therefore close my epistle.

THE DUBLIN STATE TRIALS.

FIFTH DAY.—FRIDAY.

At ten o'clock the Court sat, and the traversers were duly attended.

Mr Charles Ross was further examined by Mr. Sergeant Warren. On the 28th of August last, witness was present at the Corn Exchange, and Mr. O'Connell, Mr. John O'Connell, and Mr. Ray were present, when the former brought forward his plan for the restoration of an Irish Parliament, and for ascertaining how many Repealers were in each district; witness was present on the 29th of August at the Association; on that occasion he did not take full notes of the proceedings, but only such parts as were material

Mr. Henn, Q.C., submitted that that had passed should have been given, and that the witness was not to judge of what was material.

Mr. Sergeant Warren contended that it would be a very novel doctrine to say, that a person was not to appear to any part of the proceedings of a meeting unless he reported the whole.

The Chief Justice said that he knew of no authority for the broad principle laid down by traversers.

Mr. Sergeant Warren was prepared to show that the witness had taken a note of the whole of Mr. O'Connell's speech.

Mr. Ross wished to mention that he did not in every instance take a short-hand note of the speeches; but where there was anything which he considered immaterial, he took looser notes, containing a summary only.

The Chief Justice.—Do you, however, mean to say that from the summary you recollect the substance which fell from Mr. O'Connell. Witness. Certainly.

Mr. Henn cross-examined Mr. Ross to show that he could only give the topics, and not the particular parts of which he gave a summary.

The Solicitor General insisted that the Crown had a perfect right to have read those parts of which he had a full note; and as to other portions the traversers might supply them if they considered them material.

The Chief Justice.—We will act in conformity with all law that is to be found on the subject, and admit the evidence.

Mr. Ross then read the opening part of the speech of Mr. O'Connell, when announcing the preparing of an address to the subjects of the British Crown in all parts of the empire, and commenting on the Queen's Speech, which he designated, "as the essence of imbecility and insanity. It was the Speech however, of her Ministers—and this he wished to be distinctly understood." He also read, "So help him Heaven, if it had not been that the Queen had a large family, her life might not be safe in the hands of Peel for 24 hours." The motion for preparing the address to the subjects of the Crown was carried on that occasion; witness was present at a meeting of the Association on the 6th of Sept.—Mr. D. O'Connell, Mr. John O'Connell, Mr. Ray, and Mr. Steele, were present; Mr. O'Connell stated that the meeting at Clontarf would take place on the 8th of October, and the chair would be taken on the mounds where the Danes fell. The address was read by Mr. Ross at length, and it referred to a multiplicity of topics, including the formation of a council of 300, and the suggestion that the people might (although he did not recommend it) increase the potato crop, and leave the corn to rot on the ground, besides giving up the use of all excisable articles. The repeal wardens might be considered as returning officers, to whom the Queen might direct her writs for the assembling of the Irish Parliament. The witness read a passage, in which Mr. O'Connell said "Then the law did everything for the landlord, and nothing for the tenant, and this had been admitted by the Tory Lord Chief Justice." (Laughter.)

The Chief Justice seemed surprised at the sentiment attributed to him, laid down his pen, and, after looking at the traversers' counsel, smiled, and resumed taking his notes.

The witness was then examined as to the proceedings at Loughrea, at which were present Mr. O'Connell, Dr. Gray, and Messrs Barrett and Steele, and at which Mr. O'Connell promised the meeting to have the Repeal for them as a new year's gift for January, and that the Saxon stranger should not rule over Ireland.

Sergeant Warren.—What was your estimate of the number present at the meeting?

Witness.—About 12,000 (the Repeal papers estimated them at 150,000.) Having read the speech of Mr. O'Connell at the dinner, the witness next referred to the proceedings at the Corn Exchange on the 12th of September, when Mr. O'Connell presented the draft of an address to the subjects of the British Crown.

Much laughter was excited at an extract from the speech, in which Mr. O'Connell designated the English judges as the most stupid set of fellows that ever existed, and that he never judgment than they gave in the Presbyterian case had never been given on the other side of a very hot place.

Mr. Ross next read the counter-manifesto addressed to the subjects of the Crown, and which, to gain greater publicity, had been printed on a broad sheet.

The Court adjourned at one o'clock for half an hour

The examination of Mr. Ross was then resumed and he stated that on the 17th of September he attended the meeting at Clifden, at which Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Steele were present. Mr. Dillon Browne made a speech there, and stated that they came determined to fight to the death the battle of the constitution, and that they came there to show their strength, but not in violation of the law. He also dwelt on the difficulty of the British dragoons following their light cavalry through the recesses of their native mountains. Mr. O'Connell also spoke. (Passages were read from the addresses, and with how much applause appeared in the Attorney-General's statement.) The number of persons at the Clifden meeting amounted to about 5000. There was another meeting of the Association on the 27th September, and witness was furnished with a copy of a printed paper, signed, by order, T. M. Ray, and containing notices for the formation of arbitration courts; he also obtained, on the 16th of October, from D. Gray, the rules which were to regulate these courts; on the 23rd of September several arbitrators were named by the Association, and they returned thanks.

The next part of the evidence of this witness was a repetition of that of Mr. P. B. Hughes, proving again the language used at the meeting at Mullaghmast, and at the dinner in the evening.

Cross-examined by Mr. Henn.—Witness has been paid £400 since he came to Ireland; he got £50 for attending the Donnybrook meeting; he was in receipt of a salary last.

Mr. Henn asked the witness who suggested to him to come to Ireland, as he said he had been supported by some one; witness declined to answer, and

Mr. Serj. Warren contended that the question ought not to be answered, and cited the law as laid down in the last edition of "Phillips on Evidence," and in Hardy's case Judge Burton did not allow Mr Erskine to ask whether the witness was directed to go to the meeting by a man or woman

Mr Henn said that the Crown had asked the witness "Was it not suggested to him to come to Ireland?" leaving out the question, the defendant's counsel had a right to test the credit of the witness.

The Chief Justice. We are all of opinion there is no ground for the distinction, and the witness must be protected.

On the cross-examination of this witness, which was very protracted, it appeared that he had been in the habit of taking what he called "repeal notes of a great portion of the proceedings at the meetings, and that he had a number of which he deemed material. When called upon to explain exactly in passages by the traversers' counsel, he was unable to discover them in his notes. He stated that he felt much alarm at first at the notion of coming to Ireland, and had been much averse to his going there as a Government reporter. If he had got gone in the capacity of a newspaper reporter, he would not, he said, have come for anything; although he might have been induced to venture for £100,000, or even £75,000, but not for £50,000. He admitted, however, that the [illegible] and personal observation of the state of Ireland had dissipated his apprehensions.

At the close of the cross-examination of Mr Ross the court rose.

SIXTH DAY.—SATURDAY.

At the opening of the Court another witness for the Crown, Mr. John Jackson, was examined by Mr. Hatchell. He stated that he is the Irish correspondent of the Morning Herald. The [illegible] was produced with a view to the identification of the several traversers, the [illegible] of which depended on the accuracy of various reports of the speeches at the Repeal Association. On his cross-examination he stated that [illegible] and documents forwarded by him to the Morning Herald had been [illegible] for the purpose of this prosecution. He referred to the [illegible] instructions from the late proprietor of that journal to [illegible] examination with Mr. Kemmis the Crown solicitor. He admitted that [illegible] been in the habit of employing short-hand writers, but did not write short-hand, that he generally copied his reports from the notes of other reporters, or cut them out from the morning papers published the next day after the meeting.

At the close of the cross-examination of this witness portions of the part of the traversers applied to have his evidence altogether expunged, as, upon his own showing, he was a totally incompetent witness

The Court considered the matter well deserving of consideration, but the present was not the time to argue it.

John Brown, printer to the Repeal Association, deposed to the fact of having been employed and paid by Mr. Ray, for printing, work done for the use of the Association, among which were pamphlets entitled "Report of Committee for Considering the Constitution of the Irish Parliament"—"Instructions for Appointment of Repeal Wardens"—"Address to the Subjects of the Queen"—"Rules of Arbitration Courts"—"Address of Association to the Inhabitants of Countries subject to the British Crown"—"Rules for the Regulation of the Arbitration Courts"—"Arbitration Summonses."

On the production of the document providing for the appointment of Repeal Wardens,

Mr. M'Donagh, Q.C., on the part of the traversers, objected to its production as evidence, it not being included in "the bill of particulars," supplied by the Crown. The learned counsel proceeded to argue against its reception at great length.

The Attorney-General contended that in a case of conspiracy they were not bound to state on the face of their bill of particulars the nature of the evidence on which they relied, and submitted that the document should be received as evidence.

Mr. Moore, Q.C., followed in support of the objection, and contended that inasmuch as the bill of particulars specified the periods at which the meetings took place, while there was no evidence before the Court to show at what time or in what year the document before the Court was printed and published, it could not be received.

After a long argument, the Court gave their decision for the admissibility of the document, and shortly afterwards adjourned.

SEVENTH DAY.—MONDAY.

The Court met at the usual hour (eleven o'clock), but it was found that Mr. Justice Burton was absent through indisposition.

Mr. Hatchell, Q.C., on the part of the traversers, objected to the trial proceeding in the absence of Mr. Justice Burton.

The Chief Justice said he would take a note of the objection, whereupon the Attorney-General said, that in the case of the Bristol riots, when one of the Judges was prevented by illness from attending the Court, the other Judges decided that the trial should proceed.

The Clerk of the Crown then proceeded to read the documents proved by Brown, the printer, on Saturday.

Thomas Thacker, a lithographic artist, proved the execution, in Holbrook's establishment, of the various cards of admission for associates, members, and volunteers, and deposed to the fact of several alterations having been made in the designs, at the suggestion of Mr. Ray and others of the traversers. He also proved the execution, at the same establishment, of "the Repeal Warden's Seal."

In the cross-examination of the witness by Mr. M'Donagh, Q.C., he stated that he was a loyal subject of her Majesty, and that he did not think that in taking those sketches, he was doing anything inconsistent with his allegiance to the Throne.

Isaac Gardiner, another artist in the employment of Holbrook, proved that he had assisted in the execution of the cards, in the ordinary way of business.

Several other persons were produced to prove the delivery of the cards at the Repeal Association, but it did not appear that any of the traversers were present at the delivery.

Among the documents printed at Holbrook's was the form of the deed of submission to the Arbitration Courts, to the production of which Mr. Fitzgibbon objected, because the copy handed in contained a stamp of which the Association knew nothing. This stamp, he argued, might have been placed on it by the other side, to serve a particular purpose, and, as it was intended to send it to the jury as a piece of documentary evidence, he submitted that it should not be received.

The objection was met by the Chief Justice, who intimated to counsel that "the Crown did not propose to read the stamp." This piece of judicial wit elicited a hearty laugh from the Crown counsel.

Mr. Justice Perrin observed that the document could not go to the jury without the consent of counsel for the traversers, and the matter dropped.

John Mullany, of Nassau-street, was the next witness produced by the Crown. It did not appear in his direct examination that he was a professional reporter, but he deposed to his being present at the Tullamore meeting in June last, of which he took a short-hand note. This stamp, he argued, might have been placed on it by the other side, to serve a particular purpose, and, as it was intended to send it to the jury as a piece of documentary evidence, he submitted that it should not be received.

The objection was met by the Chief Justice, who intimated to counsel that "the Crown did not propose to read the stamp." This piece of judicial wit elicited a hearty laugh from the Crown counsel.

Mr. Justice Perrin observed that the document could not go to the jury without the consent of counsel for the traversers, and the matter dropped.

John Mullany, of Nassau-street, was the next witness produced by the Crown. It did not appear in his direct examination that he was a professional reporter, but he deposed to his being present at the Tullamore meeting in June last, of which he took a short-hand note. He deposed to the presence of Mr. O'Connell Mr. Steele, and Daniel O'Connell, jun., at the meeting, and proceeded to read a report of the speeches delivered by the Chairman, Dr. O'Raverty, Mr. Flannagan, Rev. Mr. Spread, Rev. Mr. Nolan, Mr. Samuel Robinson, and Mr. O'Connell While the witness was occupied in reading Mr. O'Connell's speech,

The Attorney-General stated to the Court that he had no desire to insist on the constant attendance of the traversers in Court; it was sufficient for him if they remained within its precincts, but he understood that two of the traversers had left to attend a public meeting, and he therefore called on the Court to cause them to be sent for.

Mr. Moore, Q.C., stated that he was not aware of the fact, but would immediately cause the absent gentlemen to be sent for.

In the course of a few minutes Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Steele, who had attended the meeting at Conciliation Hall, entered the court, and took their seats among the traversers, and the matter dropped; after which,

Mr. Jackson, the witness was recalled, when he stated that he had seen at the meeting banners and placards, on which were printed "See, the conquering hero comes," "Ireland, a Parliament again, or the world in a blaze," Mr. Ray's one of the pet, having bought it off the inventor, was exhibited at the meeting, or posted on the walls of the town, the witness replied, on the walls of the town.

The witness then deposed that he was employed by Capt. Despard, the stipendary magistrate, to report the proceedings. He did not go there as a newspaper reporter, but expected to be paid for his report; but as he did not write it out in time he very much feared he would never be paid for it When he went to the meeting it was understood he was to be paid by Government. He wrote out his report, and gave it to his brother, who was to give it to another person, who was to do something else with it; but he never saw the transcript afterwards till he came to London.

John Simpson Stuart, a sub-inspector of constabulary, was next produced, for the purpose, it would appear, of proving to the mottoes on the banners at the Tullamore meeting. He proved that in the High-street an arch had been erected, on which was a motto—"The slave-master may brandish his whip, but we are determined to be free." "Beware, no physical force is a dangerous experiment." "Rely on the Irish people!" "Repeal shall not be put down by the sword!" "Ireland is too great to be dragged at the tail of any other nation." "Justice and Prosperity to all Creeds and Classes." He stated that the crowds were accompanied by bands in fancy dresses, and that large numbers of horsemen attended. He read portions of a speech delivered by Mr. O'Connell.

The witness was cross-examined by Mr. Henn, in the course of which he admitted that Mr. O'Connell had said something about Ribbonism and illegal societies; but just when he commenced, he (the witness) lost the thread of his discourse. There was no evidence, the witness said, that he thought that the mode in which the crowds came into the town had the effect of preserving order When asked as to the period at which he saw the arch on the day of meeting, he would not swear that it was not taken down by order of Mr. Steele, previous to the commencement of the meeting

Neal Brown, Esq., a stipendiary magistrate, was the next witness, but there was nothing of consequence elicited by his examination.

In the cross-examination by Mr. Moore, he stated that he received directions from his superiors to attend the meeting. There was no riot or disturbance at the meeting; nor did any necessity arise for the interposition of the police.

James Alcorn, a head constable in the constabulary, deposed to the attendance of large bodies of horsemen at the Longford meeting, in May last, and specified the mottoes on the banners, which were much the same as those seen at the Tullamore meeting. He also repeated, from notes taken on the spot, portions of the speeches delivered at the meeting. Mr. O'Connell, he said, told them he would not let another year pass such the same as those that [illegible] had passed; then not to take illegal oaths, and that if they took his advice, and remained peaceable and tranquil, they would soon have the Parliament again; go home quietly, tell your friends the strange news, and when I want you again I'll let you know.

On his cross-examination by Mr Fitzgibbon, witness said he was sent to the meeting with instructions to take notes of what was said and done at the meeting, and to report on the conduct of the police at or after the meeting. Although they were armed with [illegible] sticks; indeed they wore a sweating-irage of excitement. Saw several men on horseback, who, from their dress, appeared to be priests. He was present at the meeting in plain clothes, or, in other words, he was disguised in plain clothes.

At the close of this witness's cross-examination the Court adjourned till next day.

EIGHTH DAY.—TUESDAY.

The Court sat at ten o'clock, when

John Mooney, a head constable of police, was called and examined by Mr. Kennedy, Q.C. This witness deposed to the fact of large numbers of people having attended the Longford meeting in May last. The people marched, as he thought, in military order, and were preceded by bands of music, the members of which were attired in fancy or military costumes. He also deposed to the attendance of Mr. O Connell and Mr. Steele. Among the mottoes about the platform were, "Ireland for the Irish, and the Irish for Ireland." "He who commits a crime strengthens the enemy." He heard Mr. O'Connell speak on that occasion, but the portions which he repeated were certainly anything rather than verbatim reports of the hon. gentleman's sentiments.

On the cross-examination of this witness by Mr Hatchell, Q.C., he stated that he read in the evening papers of the previous night a report of the evidence of Constable Johnson. He saw no breach of the peace at or after the meeting. He looked to see that there were no arms concealed. His business was to take observations of the proceedings, and report the result to his superiors.

John Joly, a head constable of police, was the next witness. He deposed to having attended at the Mallow meeting in August last. He stated that he attended the meeting in plain clothes. When describing the procession he said, the persons forming it marched four and six deep. They were preceded by bands, and the persons who appeared to be in command were mounted. A narrow ribbon was attached. He saw Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Steele on the procession on its return to Mallow, and heard Mr. O'Connell, while addressing the meeting, say that the Union should be repealed within a given time; that they should have Ireland for the Irish, and he defied them to withhold it; for th y were too strong, too virtuous, and too temperate, to be kept in slavery.

The witness, who was cross-examined by Mr. Whiteside, stated that he had conversed frequently with the preceding witnesses on the subject of the trials. He did not swear that he did not read an account of Mr. O'Connell's speech at the Mallow meeting in the newspapers. The crowds did nothing more than play music

Henry Godfrey, a police constable, was examined by Mr. Henn, Q.C., previous to the 15th of August last, he deposed to a numerous attendance—to the presence of Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Steele—to violent expressions on the part of the crowd. In the course of this witness's examination, Mr. Charles Gavan, agent for one of the traversers, objected to a question put by Mr. Freeman, and which he designated a leading, and therefore an illegal question. This gave rise to a scene in which the Court, counsel on both sides, and the traversers, bore a part, and which terminated in the Lord Chief Justice intimating to Mr. Cantwell that a repetition of such conduct would lead to his removal from the court.

The cross-examination of this witness was totally devoid of interest. He admitted, however, that in his direct examination he pretended to read expressions from his note-book which the book did not contain.

Henry Twiss, another police constable, was examined by Mr. Martley, and deposed to the presence of Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Steele at the Ballinasloe meeting in August last.

The witness stated, on his cross-examination, that there was no disposition to riot at or after the meeting, and that every thing passed off quietly

Patrick Lenaghan, a police-constable, was examined by Mr. Tomb, in reference to the same meeting. In the course of his examination, he objected to certain expressions used by persons in the crowd on the termination of the meeting. To which line of examination

Mr. Moore, Q.C., objected, contending, on the part of the traversers, that it was during the time unconstitutional to hold them accountable for what was said and done by individuals who might neither have been present at, nor connected with, the meeting.

Mr Tomb held that the language used by persons after the meeting proved the effect produced on the minds by the proceedings and speeches.

Mr. Moore, Q.C., thought the Court would regard such a proposition as repugnant to common sense and common justice.

The Attorney-General quoted a variety of authorities in support of Mr. Tomb.

Mr. Whiteside replied.

When the Court decided the objection was good, and that the expressions referred to should be struck out of the evidence.

On examination, witness stated that the meeting was perfectly peaceable, and that there was no disposition to riot.

Manvers Hughes, an acting constable of police, deposed to the same facts as the preceding witnesses, in reference to the Ballinglass meeting, and also that he heard three or four persons, previous to the meeting, say that Mr. Saunders's house should be attacked, as it was once the scene of blood

On cross-examination, the witness stated that the meeting was perfectly peaceable, and that, although several of his superior officers were present, he believed they were not in town at present.

John Tynan, another constable of police, deposed to expressions made use of at the Ballinglass meeting.

John Mackie, a sub-constable of police, was examined in reference to the Clontibret meeting, at which the Rev. Mr. Tierney took a part. He deposed to expressions used by the reverend gentleman at the meeting, and also to a private conversation he had with Mr. Tierney previous to the meeting, in the course of which he said the feeling in favour of repeal had extended to the army, and they would aid the fellow men in seeking the redress of their grievances.

Mr. Moore, Q.C., submitted that a private conversation, several days previous to the meeting, was no evidence against the traversers.

The Court ruled that the evidence should be admitted.

The examination was resumed, when the witness proceeded with the further details of the conversation between himself and Mr. Tierney, from which it appeared that the reverend gentleman told him, that even if they did not succeed in obtaining Repeal, they would get other measures which would be beneficial to the country.

On cross-examination, the witness stated there was no violence nor tendency to riot at the meeting; and also that several magistrates were present at the meeting in addition to the superior officers of police.

Wm. Thompson, a head constable of police, deposed to the attendance of the Rev. Mr. Tierney at the Clontibret meeting in August last, and repeated the substance of several passages from speeches delivered by Mr. O'Neill Daunt and others.

This witness, on his cross-examination, testified to the peaceable character of the meeting.

James Walker, another policeman, had not been sworn, when

The Lord Chief Justice, who had been in consultation with his brethren for some time, desired the Tipstaff of the Court to call Samuel Maunsell, of 42, Leeson-street. Mr. Maunsell was called accordingly, but not appearing,

The Chief Justice desired that he might be in attendance in the morning, in order that he might explain the contents of a letter which had been handed to the Court by the High Sheriff, and which, unless properly explained, would be considered a very improper interference with the High Sheriff in the discharge of the duties of his office.

Mr. Justice Perrin said he should be in attendance in the morning, and he would recommend the individual to be very cautious in the meantime how he conducted himself.

The examination of the witness was then proceeded with. He deposed to the attendance of Mr. O'Connell and others of the traversers at the Tara meeting, and on his cross-examination admitted that it was perfectly peaceable.

George Dargan, a respectable magistrate, deposed to the assembly of a large body of people in the town of Trim on the morning of the Tara meeting, who formed four deep, and marched in procession, accompanied by bands of music, to the place of meeting. He calculated that at least 100,000 persons passed him on the way to the meeting. There were upwards of 7,000 horsemen, and he counted nineteen bands of music. This witness, like all the preceding ones, admitted on his cross-examination that there was no disposition to riot manifested by the hundreds of thousands who attended the meeting.

John Robinson, a constable of police, was examined by Mr. Bennett, in reference to the Clifden meeting, in September last, and deposed to the fact of very many of the persons who attended the meeting having Repeal cards in their hats. He was cross-examined by Mr. Fitzgibbon, but nothing of consequence was elicited, and at a quarter to five the court adjourned till ten next morning.

NINTH DAY.—WEDNESDAY.

The Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Crampton, and Mr. Justice Perrin, took their seats upon the bench at ten o'clock precisely. Mr. Justice Burton was still absent from indisposition.

The traversers and jurors answered to their names.

The Clerk of the Crown—Direct the Crier to cal. Samuel Maunsell, of 42, Leeson-street.

The Crier called Mr. Maunsell three times consecutively, but there was no reply.

Mr. Henn, Q.C., rose and said that he appeared on behalf of Mr. Maunsell with whom he had an interview that morning, and who assured him that he had not been apprised until a late hour on the night preceding that the Court had intimated they expected he should be in attendance. He presumed, however, that he should be in attendance punctually at the sitting of the Court, and he (counsel) did not know to what circumstance his absence was to be attributed. Mr. Maunsell, (counsel) was addressed their lordships on his behalf, and he stated that it was not his intention to attempt any justification for the letter which he had yesterday written, but to assure the Court that it was written at a thoughtless moment, and under feelings of great excitement. He had also expressed a wish that he might be permitted to make an affidavit explanatory of the circumstances under which the letter had been penned, and was anxious to know, whether, after the making of such an affidavit, the Court would be satisfied with the explanation, and so regret for what had occurred; but he (the counsel) had told him that it would be much better for him to attend the Court in person, and thus ascertain their Lordships' feelings on the subject. He concurred in the propriety of this suggestion, and after again expressing his regret for what had occurred, had distinctly promised to attend at four o'clock.

Judge Crampton—It is very possible Mr. Maunsell may be here by-and-by. It is only ten o'clock.

The Chief Justice—I trust he may be in attendance, and I am very happy to find that he has the good sense to place himself under Mr. Henn's direction. I trust that he now sees the impropriety of his conduct, and understands the predicament in which he has placed himself by writing a very improper letter to the High Sheriff in the execution of his duty, thereby offering an affront, I may say, to a public officer, and committing at the same time a very gross contempt of Court.

Mr. Henn I do not intend to make any excuse for Mr. Maunsell's conduct, and all I can say in extenuation, is what I have already stated, that he wrote the letter under great excitement. Your Lordships are aware that the letter had no connexion whatever with the present trials.

Chief Justice—Oh, none whatever.

The evidence commenced with that of one of the constabulary from Cork, named Haley. He stated he attended the Mullaghmast meeting, at which he purchased a paper purporting to be "a full and true account of the bloody massacre of four hundred Roman Catholics at Mullaghmast," and also that he saw a banner flying at the front of the platform, inscribed with the words—"Ireland avenged at the last of another nation."

Mr. Moore and Mr. Monaghan, on the part of the traversers, objected to the paper mentioned by the witness being read in evidence, inasmuch as it was not proved to have been printed by the printer of the Association, nor with the authority and consent of the traversers.

The Solicitor-General contended that such proof was not necessary, and that the fact of its having been distributed in the presence of the traversers, and therefore with their knowledge and consent, rendered it admissible evidence.

The document was admitted.

The Attorney-General then applied to put in evidence that portion of the speech of her Majesty on the prorogation of Parliament, referring to Ireland, and expressing her determination to maintain the Union.

Mr. Moore objected to this course, but the speech was admitted by the Court, on the ground alleged by the Crown lawyers, that it had been commented on in several speeches of Mr. O'Connell, which formed the subject matter of the indictment.

The speech, or rather the extract from it, was read from the London Gazette, of August 20.

James Irwin, station-house clerk of police at Liverpool, was the next witness examined. He proved the posting of a placard in that town, containing the "Address to all the Subjects of the British Crown."

Mr. Cooper, of the Stamp-office, was called, and proved having received the declaration of the proprietor of the Nation newspaper, on the 18th Nov., 1842; saw it signed by Mr. Duffy. Upon being cross-examined by Mr. Whiteside, he said he did not know Mr. Duffy, neither could he swear to his hand-writing.

Mr. Whiteside then submitted to the Court, that there was not a particle of proof to identify Mr. Duffy, the traverser in the case, with the person who had signed the paper. That should be proved by somebody who knew Mr. Duffy or his handwriting.

After a lengthened discussion on this point, the Lord Chief Justice said that he did not think sufficient evidence of proprietorship had been given. Subsequently, on reading further in the act, his lordship reversed his decision, and ruled that the proof be received.

The Attorney-General was not anxious about the point as far as the present case was concerned, as he was instructed that sufficient proof could be obtained; but he did not wish to establish the precedent.

Mr. Whiteside said, the act should be amended. "Whereas the Crown may prosecute any person in the community," and it is not incumbent on it to produce any proof of identity (laughter).

Mr. Vernon was recalled, and produced copies of the Nation, and read a leading article of the 10th of June, headed "Morality of War." He also, at the request of Mr. Whiteside, read a portion of the proceedings of the Association, which appeared in the same paper. Counsel for the traversers took the ground that the speech in question formed part of the defence of the traversers. Another long argument ensued, the Counsel for the traversers contending that the paper in question having been produced in the hall of traversers, the Crown was bound to read the whole of those papers which bore on the question at issue.

The Court decided that the proceedings of the Association were a distinct publication, notwithstanding they appeared in the same paper, and, therefore, if read at all, should be read as part of the case of the traversers. The officer of the Court then read several other articles from the Nation by direction of the counsel for the traversers, and also an article published on the 12th August, entitled "The March of Nationality," by the direction of the Attorney-General.

The Court rose shortly before five o'clock. Previous to its rising, Mr. Maunsell, who was not present when called upon in the morning, made his appearance, and apologised for any offence he might have given to any officer of the Court.

[We were informed that Maunsell had requested from the High Sheriff a ticket of admission to the court, which, not having granted, he wrote him a letter, in which he designated the High Sheriff "a damned rascal."]

TENTH DAY.—THURSDAY.

The proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench, Dublin, on Thursday, were of an exceedingly tedious and uninteresting description. The Court, which met at the usual hour, ten o'clock (Mr. Judge Burton being still absent from indisposition), was occupied the greater part of the day with the reading of articles and reports of speeches from the Freeman's and Pilot newspapers. These documents ranged over the whole space of time occupied by the monster meetings and the dinners by which those meetings were generally succeeded. Many of them having been given in the indictment, and again in the opening address of the Attorney-General, they have been, to a considerable extent, omitted in the report. The costing of the case depends on the extent to which these extracts and speeches may be read.

Charles Vernon, Esq., produced files of the several papers which were required.

The Deputy Clerk of the Crown read the article headed "The Crisis is upon us," appearing in the Nation of the 26th of August. Also "The Irish Congress," an article expressing delight at the assemblage of 300 men to act as a national council, like the American Congress, when asserting their independence.

The Attorney-General objected to the traversers' counsel, reading in the present stage of the case, portions of the same newspaper having no bearing on the documents given in evidence by the Crown.

Mr. Hatchell, Q.C., expressed surprise at the objection, as he had understood the Crown had assented to the arrangement that all the articles in the same paper should be read consecutively, first, for the Crown; secondly, for the traversers.

The Chief Justice observed that the Court did conceive there had been an arrangement to dispose of one paper before going to another, although certainly at that time it was not understood that the traversers' extracts would have the effect of such length, and of so unconnected a nature.

Judge Crampton hoped that the traversers would not abuse the arrangement by reading matter which was irrelevant.

The Solicitor-General observed that the Crown were quite disposed to accede to any suggestion of the Court; and the objection had been made by the Attorney-General, in order to enable the case for the prosecution to close sooner.

The officer then read for the traversers' counsel the correspondence between Mr. Hume Dogs and Sir Valentine Blake, on the latter being superseded as a magistrate.

The Crown then had read an article in the Pilot, of the 7th of June, headed "Repeal—the Great Drogheda Demonstration," giving an account of the meeting held there, and of the dinner.

The traversers gave an account of the proceedings of the Drogheda meeting to Parliament, for a repeal of the legislative union.

For the Crown was read "Kilkenny Banquet," in the Pilot of the 12th of June.

Mr. M'Donagh said that he did not mean to delay the Court by having read the whole of the speech made by Mr. O'Connell, but the whole could be entered as evidence for the traversers.

Extracts were read to the jury on behalf of the traversers, in order to show that the healths of the Queen and Prince Albert were drunk with enthusiasm.

The proceedings at the meeting at Mallow were given in evidence, and the remarkable speech of Mr. O'Connell at the banquet, where he hurled his high and haughty defiance at the Saxon, and boasted on the day that the Saxon "polluted the virgin soil of Ireland with his cursed foot."

Mr. M'Donagh required an extract to be read from the speech of Mr. Roche, M.P., at the meeting where he spoke of the tranquility of the meeting.

Mr. Vernon read an account from the Freeman's Journal of the 7th of August, of the meeting at Ballinglass, in the county of Wicklow. The numbers present were stated at 150,000, and as having come from six counties. The speech of Mr. O'Connell on that occasion was of the usual kind, as for example, his statement respecting Lord Wicklow, that one pig was worth ten Lord Wicklows, because the pig could be eaten, and that in no case could good could not be got out of his lordship. That Lord Portarlington's ancestor had come to Wicklow in the capacity of lumpman to the army. The Crown then had read by the officer the account of the Tara meeting as contained in the Pilot newspaper of the 16th of August. The paper stated that upwards of one million of persons attended the meeting from various places in Ulster, Munster, and and Connaught, as well as from Leinster, and the brave men who came from Wexford stooped to shed a tear over the grave where lay buried the men who had fallen at Tara in 1798. The speeches of Mr. O'Connell at the dinner, and at the banquet, were read by the Deputy Clerk of the Crown. Also Dr. Gray's address.

No witnesses were examined during the day.

It was observed that Mr. O'Connell was very little in court, being busily employed in the library with books and papers, no doubt arranging his defence.

A sensation was created in court during the half hour's absence of the judges, by a paragraph which appeared in the Times of Wednesday, and which was handed about among the barristers. It was to the effect that they had "heard with surprise and indignation of the attempts now made to exasperate the popular mind in Ireland against Mr. Bond Hughes;" and continued, "Placards have been stuck upon the walls of Dublin denouncing him as a spy, informer, miscreant, &c. &c., exposing him, therefore, to the perils which deservedly await the most disgraceful meanness, and the most unprincipled men." There was no truth whatever in this passage, for not only has Mr. Hughes not been assailed since he gave his evidence, but the repeal press and the repeal party have candidly admitted that he gave his evidence with perfect fairness, and that he did not exhibit even the slightest wish to aggravate anything that told against the accused, or suppress anything that was favourable to them. Mr. Hughes was in court as a spectator, and expressed regret at the statement in the Times. The dead walls are well placarded with placards, bearing the words, "Where are the 60 names?" and some others of a somewhat similar import, which have only the effect of puzzling passing strangers. There is nothing to warrant the information communicated to the Times.

IRELAND.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The usual weekly meeting of the Association took place on Monday at the Conciliation-hall. There seemed to be an increased degree of interest about the proceedings of the day, as for a long period before the hour appointed, the building presented a crowded appearance. At two o'clock, Mr. Maurice O'Connell entered, accompanied by W. S. O'Brien, M.P., C. Powell, M.P., and several other gentlemen. On the motion of Mr. Maurice O'Connell, W. Smith O'Brien, M.P., was called to the chair, amidst the most rapturous applause. He made a long speech, and said he was ready to be another victim to the Attorney-General, if he wanted another. This was received with "tremendous cheering." The chairman then read the following letter from Mr. John O'Connell:—

"Four Courts, Dublin, January 22, 1844.

"My dear Sir—As I find I am not to be allowed to attend my duty in the Association this day, may I beg of you to state for me that the committee for collecting evidence respecting, and ensure a steadily pursuing its inquiries, and is every day receiving a very large number of letters from all parts of the country, detailing sad stories of sufferings from the oppression of bad landlords. We purpose also to submit these documents, and forward immediately afterwards to Lord Devon and all such letters as contain a special request to that effect—reserving the others to be made use of when his lordship's commission shall visit the localities to which they refer. Permit me to express my humble but most anxious hope that every friend to the people, and to the peace of the country, will endeavour to do away with the dangerous misapprehension the peasantry in various places labour under, in supposing that Lord Devon's commission is empowered to relieve their distresses, or to do anything further than report upon them to the Government. Simply, this commission was intended as a delusion by this miserable Government; and, were even a good report to be furnished them by Lord Devon's commission, it would never be acted upon by them.—In great haste, faithfully yours,

"JOHN O'CONNELL."

Mr. Doheny, barrister, made a long speech. He asked, were the people to be angry at these prosecutions—(cries of "No, no!") or were they to give up. (Cries of "Never, never!") No, never. Let the people persevere, and they must be triumphant. (Cheers.)—At five o'clock Mr. John O'Connell entered amid loud cheers. Several sums of money having been handed in, Mr. Maurice O'Connell announced the rent to be £936 10s. 7d.—Mr. Caleb Powell was then called to the chair, and the thanks of the Association having been given to the chairman, the meeting separated.

A WOMAN POISONED BY HER HUSBAND AND MOTHER-IN-LAW.—A poor woman, named Mary Potts, died in the townland of Kilpike, and parish of Seapatrick, three miles from Banbridge, on the 6th inst., after a short illness, and was interred in Dromore on the following day. Suspicion having been excited by the appearance of the interment, and by a communication made to her brother, to the effect that her death had not resulted from natural disease, the body was exhumed, and an inquest held before the county coroner at Banbridge, on the 11th, after a post mortem examination. The inquest was adjourned till Tuesday last, and the stomach of the deceased in the meantime was committed to the keeping of eminent chemists in Dublin, the husband of deceased, John Potts, and his mother, Elizabeth Potts, being committed to Newry Bridewell. The result has been that a verdict of "Wilful Murder" has been returned against both, on the evidence of a little girl, daughter of the deceased, and of a young woman named Isabella Dudson, and they have been committed to Down gaol for trial. Potts was proved to have purchased poison in Banbridge about six weeks before, and, on the day of the death of deceased, the little girl saw her grandmother mix some white substance from a paper in deceased's drink. She had been lately confined. Arsenic was found in deceased's stomach.

ALDERMAN ROE'S "ANSWER."—The Corporation of Dublin have received an answer from the Secretary of State for the Home Department, acknowledging the receipt of the address to the Throne praying that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to grant an act of amnesty to Mr. O'Connell, and the other gentlemen now on their trial before the Court of Queen's Bench on charges of sedition and conspiracy, and stating that on the return of her Majesty to London, a day will be appointed for the reception of the deputation, of which due notice shall be given. That reformed honours meet to-morrow for the purpose of taking Sir James Graham's letter into consideration.

Lord Eliot left Dublin on Tuesday last for London, to resume his Parliamentary duties.

LEVEE AT THE CASTLE.—His Excellency Earl De Grey held his first levee for the season on Wednesday last at the Castle. It was very numerously attended by the nobility and gentry from all parts of the country. It was rumoured that the Whigs were not to attend, but a considerable number of the most respectable men of the Whig party were present. At one o'clock his Excellency entered the Throne Room, accompanied by the officers of his household, the Archbishop of Dublin, the Duke of Leinster, the Chief Baron, Chief Justice Doherty, Judges Ball and Jackson, Baron Richards, Baron Lefroy, the Commander of the Forces, Lords Cardigan, Bandon, Donoughmore, Devon, Heath, Rossc, Wicklow, Hawarden, and Lorton. The Bishops of Ossory, Cork, and Meath appeared by the "private entrée." We also observed Lord Crofton, Lord Langford, 85th Regt., Lord Kilmaine, and several other noblemen.

THE CORPORATION ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY. The corporation met on Wednesday, when the following letter was read by the town clerk:—

"Whitehall, Jan. 16, 1844.

"SIR, I am directed by Secretary Sir James Graham to acquaint you that he yesterday received your letter of the 13th instant, and its enclosure. I am further to inform you, that Sir James Graham has submitted to her Majesty the copy of the Address agreed to by the corporation of the City of Dublin; that after her Majesty's return to London, her Majesty will be graciously pleased to receive that address; and that Sir James Graham will notify the day when he shall have received her Majesty's commands. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"H. MANNERS SUTTON."

To the Town Clerk of the City of Dublin.

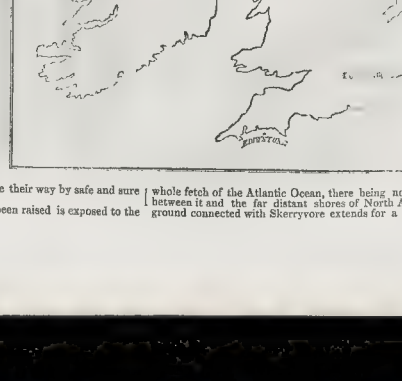
Town Councillor Fitzpatrick observed that, as the Address was agreed to in the hope of stopping the prosecutions now in progress, Sir James Graham ought to be called upon to present it himself. The Lord Mayor said that, as the Address had been adopted at the suggestion of Ald. Reed, and that gentleman not being present, it would be advisable to let the matter rest until he was. Ald. Roe had certainly mentioned to him (the Lord Mayor) that he thought Sir James Graham ought to be called upon to present the Address, under all the circumstances of the case.

We have endeavoured this week, at the sacrifice of many interesting subjects pertaining to other parts of the world, to meet the wishes of a multitude of Irish readers both on the home and colonial circulation of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS by making room for the numerous engravings, illustrative of the recent and still pending prosecutions of the State Trials in the Irish metropolis. The all-absorbing nature of those events, in the present stirring and exciting period of our national history, will be our best excuse for devoting so much of our space to their illustration, and we are not without hope that when time shall have obliterated all traces of national prejudices, jealousy, and dissension, and all parties will have joined in cordially promoting the welfare of our common country, the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS will be referred to as the only faithful pictorial record of these important occurrences. The subjects which embellish our present number are Mr. O'Connell's Progress from his residence in Merrion-square to the Four Courts, on the first day of the trial, in the Lord Mayor's coach, as seen in Dame street.

The Hall of the Four Courts, Mr. O'Connell in his Robing Room, the Interior of the Court of Queen's Bench at the commencement of the trial, and, though last not least (for the exertions of these faithful chroniclers have already filled the world with endless columns of the proceedings), the Reporters' Box. These subjects have been sketched on the spot by one of our artists, and may be relied on as perfectly accurate.

SKERRYVORE LIGHT-HOUSE.

The sketch represents the Light-house of Skerryvore, erected by the Commissioners of the Northern Lighthouses, on a dangerous reef of that name, which lies off the coast of Argyllshire. If is such a stupendous undertaking, which has just been completed, and from which the light is to be exhibited to the mariner on the night of Tours day next, the 1st of February, 1844, was designed and executed under the superintendence of Alan Stevenson, Esq., L.L.B., Engineer to the Scottish Lighthouse Board.



The Eddystone, the Bell Rock, and the Skerryvore lighthouses, are three works of which Great Britain must ever be proud. Of the two former much has been written, and notices have already been given in our columns, but, as regards the latter, nothing has as yet appeared, and we have, therefore, great pleasure in presenting our readers with the following authentic details concerning it. The annexed chart will best illustrate its position.

There is, perhaps, no one of our modern works which can with more justice be entitled to the appellation of "philanthropic" than the Skerryvore, which bears testimony alike to the humanity of the age which produced it, as to the rapid progress of our useful arts. Even since the works began, no less than six shipwrecks have occurred, some of them having been attended with serious loss of life and property. Homeward-bound vessels will now, however, find that this important link in the chain of sea lights has been supplied, and they will thus be enabled to explore their way by safe and sure stages to the wished-for port.

The reef on which this structure has been raised is exposed to the whole fetch of the Atlantic Ocean, there being no intervening land between it and the far distant shores of North America. The foundation connected with Skerryvore extends for a distance of several miles, consisting of many small rocks, some always above the level of the sea, others covered at high water, and others, again, under the surface, but on which the sea breaks in a frightful manner during storms. The main or principal rock on which the Lighthouse has been built measures only about 280 feet square; and even this small surface is low, rugged, and irregular, and is intersected by gullies or fissures of great depth.

THE SKERRYVORE LIGHTHOUSE.

—The Lighthouse is in N. lat. 56 degrees 19 minutes 22 seconds, and W. long. 7 degrees 6 minutes 32 seconds, and lies about 12 miles off the island of Tyrii, which is the nearest point of land. From the isolated position and great exposure of the rock, the sea around it often presents, even in moderate weather, the appearance shown in the prefixed cut, when, of course, all intercourse with it is suspended; and, to give some idea of the inaccessibleness of the situation, it may be mentioned that for seven weeks, during the months of November and December last, no communication could be had with those on the rock, although constant and persevering efforts were made by the lighthouse tender to effect a landing throughout the whole of that period. So high did the sea rise on one or two occasions, that the whole beacon-house shown in the cut was enveloped in heavy spray, and some articles of furniture within were overturned; and, upon one occasion, a block, upwards of five tons weight, was swept right over the rock. Under these circumstances, it will easily be conceived that the hazard and difficulty attending the transportation and landing of no less than about 6000 tons of granite blocks, independently of all other materials, must have been truly formidable. The work was begun in February, 1836, and completed in November, 1843. During the working seasons, the workmen lived in the temporary wooden barrack, which is shown on the right of the Lighthouse.

The whole height of the masonry of the tower is 139 feet, exclusive of the lantern for the lighting apparatus, which measures 16 feet, making the total height from the base to the summit, 155 feet. The diameter at the base of the building is 42 feet, which diminishes to 16 feet under the cornice. The curve adopted for the walls by the engineer, was that of the hyperbola, to which it has been correctly formed. The foundation is 4 feet above the level of high water of spring tides, but in storms the seas make a solid breach completely over the whole surface of the rock, and consequently rise to a considerable height on the tower, as represented in the drawing.—The interior of the tower is divided into ten apartments, each 12 feet in diameter), exclusively of the light-room, which is 11 feet in diameter. The lower apartments contain large water tanks and a store for coals, capable of containing a six months' supply. The illuminating apparatus is a revolving dioptric-light of the first order, in the system of Fresnel; but this apparatus is characterised by the introduction of a series of totally reflecting zones, of large dimensions, which were proposed by the engineer, and are the first of the kind that have ever been executed.

The only casualty of any moment which occurred during the progress of the work, was the total destruction of the wooden barrack, during a heavy storm which occurred in the winter of 1837, but fortunately while no one was at the rock. This disaster is generally supposed to have been produced by some piece of drift wreck having got foul of the upright supporting beams; but those who witnessed, from the workyard, at Tyrii, the prodigious height to which the surf rose were of opinion that the sea alone had been sufficient to cause the disaster. In the ensuing season the beacon was again replaced on the same construction, and has since continued to stand the most severe storms uninjured.

On the island of Tyrii an establishment has been built for the accommodation of the lightkeepers' families, and at the same place a harbour is now being constructed for the vessel which is to attend the Lighthouse.

The whole of the granite for this magnificent tower was liberally given from the quarries in Mull, by his grace the Duke of Argyll, who has all along taken a lively interest in the progress of the work; and laid, with his own hand, the foundation stone of the building on the 4th of July, 1840.

FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

BANNER AND STALL OF THE KING OF SAXONY, ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL, WINDSOR.

The banner of his Majesty the King of Saxony (who was invested with the insignia of the Order of the Garter at Dresden, in October, 1842, by the Earl of Wilton and Sir Charles Young, Garter-King-of-Arms) has just been placed over the stall of his Majesty, together with the crown, crest, sword, mantle, &c., in St. George's Chapel, Windsor. On the back of the stall are the titles and arms of his Majesty, engraved and emblazoned on copper. The stall of the Saxon Monarch is situate on the Prince's, or north, side of the choir, between the stalls of the King of Wirtemberg and the reigning Duke of Brunswick. The only stalls now vacant in the Chapel of St. George are those of the late Duke of Dorset and Marquis Wellesley

STALL AND BANNER OF THE KING OF SAXONY, IN ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL, WINDSOR.

In the recent repair of the chapel, the carved work of the stalls of the several knights was cleaned and beautified, and the whole has now a superb appearance.

FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

No. 1. A hair coiffure, ornamented with a wreath of green leaves with rosebuds.

A white crape dress, with pink satin corsage, the skirt trimmed with fluted pink satin ribbon, and ornamented with bouquets of flowers.

No. 2. A black velvet capote, ornamented with flowers.

A Gros de Naples pelisse, trimmed with ruches of the same material. The sleeves descend a little below the elbows; the under sleeves, which descend over the wrists, are composed of muslin, terminating with lace ruffles.

LA MODE DE PARIS.

Fashion has for the present deserted the promenades, and has taken refuge in the theatres and soirées; consequently, there we must now seek her.

On quitting the Italian Theatre, some elegant sortiets de bal are to be seen. Some are mere hoods, made of wadded and quilted satin, in brilliant colours, these tie under the chin. Others are small cloaks with hoods, and either with or without sleeves, but almost all of white satin or cachemire. They are embroidered with silk mixed with gold, or with open passementerie (silk gump trimming), which is mostly of two colours.

PROMENADE DRESSES are frequently composed of cloth of quite a plain make, but are ornamented either with passementerie (silk gimp trimming), or with ermine, which still continues to be the most fashionable fur.

DRESSES FOR FULL TOILETTES are frequently made to train, in which case they are made full, and of rich materials.

BALL DRESSES usually have two, and sometimes three, skirts, which are looped up one over the other with bouquets of flowers.

HATS have undergone no change in form since our last notice; velvet still continues to be the prevailing material, they are mostly ornamented with feathers; black, violet, and blue, are the prevailing colours.

LACE CAPS with lappets are very fashionable (see the accompanying engravings); they are always ornamented with flowers.

LEFT HAND BUST.—A coiffure composed of a lace scarf brocaded with silver.

RIGHT HAND BUST.—A lace cap ornamented with figured satin ribbon.

HAIR COIFFURES are frequently ornamented with a light wreath of green leaves, which surrounds the top of the head, and descends upon the bands quite down to the ears, where they terminate with a group of flowers.

MR. AND MRS. WOOD, IN THE OPERA OF "THE MAID OF JUDAH," AT THE PRINCESS'S THEATRE.

PRINCESS'S.

The Great Wizard of the North has not only been a bountiful patron to the Museum of Imagination himself, but has been the cause of liberality of contribution on the part of others. His beautiful romance of "Ivanhoe" has furnished the subject of the opera called "The Maid of Judah," from which our artist has selected the last scene. It does not require much tactician skill to dramatise one of Scott's "living tales;" but there is no ordinary ability necessary to recount them well on the stage. That Mr. and Mrs. Wood are in possession of the histrionic power to be, each, par materiæ, cannot be questioned by any one who has witnessed them in the respective characters of Ivanhoe and Rebecca (particularly in the scene chosen for our illustration), but we cannot help thinking that the farewell interview between Rowena and the disinterested Hebrew girl in the novel has been in some degree shorn of its intense interest. In the records of human generosity there is not such a thing described as the parting interview of Rowena and Rebecca. What can be more affecting than the following?

There was an involuntary tremor in Rebecca's voice, and a tenderness of accent, which perhaps betrayed more than she would willingly have expressed. She hastened to bid Rowena adieu.

Farewell (she said). May He, who made both Jew and Christian, shower down on you his choicest blessings!

It is with the highest pleasure we can assure Mrs. Wood that she never looked, sang, or acted better.

We understand that they share the house after a certain sum, and have good reason to know that they have on an average netted upwards of £50 a night!

SCENE FROM "THE MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR," AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE.

HAYMARKET

A merry pair in truth! for, meaning nothing but a frolic, whose ultimatum, as Miss Von Frump would say, was the correction of the over-amatory propensities of a fat knight, they can but be looked upon as a pair of satirical juveniles (no allusion to the Roman scourge of morals) indulging in a lark, at nearly "a whole hog's expence," by way of correcting him. Nothing, even from the pencil of Shakspeare, can be more graphically produced than the contrast of emotions exhibited by the various characters on the detection of Sir John in his unlawful attempts at the fair fame of the plotting dames.—Nothing can exceed the arch roguery of expression of Mrs. Nisbett and Madame Vestris as the Merry Wives, or the appalled expression of Strickland as Falstaff, on being discovered, and disappointed in his "How happy could I be with either"—love speculations, or rather darings. If Queen Bess were the adviser of this comedy, as we have been told by anecdotical history, it shows that she had a deep insight of the weaknesses of human nature, and that the limner she employed could paint them to the very life

THE ADOPTED;

OR,

IMPULSE NOT PRINCIPLE.

BY MISS CAMILLA TOULMIN.

PART II.

"My dear,' said Mrs. Aimington one morning to her husband "here is an invitation to a large party at Selton-place, and a note from Lady Selton, begging we will bring Ellen with us. Really it is so unexpected that I hardly know what to do; besides she is so young.'

"Oh, never mind her being young," said Mr. Aimington, "she has had very little pleasure since we came home; let her go."

"But, dear, I think there are other considerations; and, lately, I have been thinking we ought to make up our minds more decidedly about the dear child You know when we were in Rome ——"

"You wanted me to let her have more regular instruction, and perhaps it would have been wise; though, after all, I do not see that she is so very deficient.'

"Come, Mr. Hardwick," said the lady, addressing a gentleman who was present, and appealing to her husband by a look, "You shall decide whether Ellen is to go or not. You know, when we were abroad, you more than once gave us a gentle lecture on indecision."

"If I did speak so boldly, I hope that you forgave me," replied Mr. Hardwick, a young, but very clever medical man, who had travelled with the party for nearly a year as a professional attendant of Mr. Aimington, "But my excuse must be, that I have suffered painfully in my own family from the error of indecision."

"Then you shall decide," returned Mrs. Aimington, "for you have an old head upon young shoulders. You are aware exactly who Ellen is, and I know she is such a pet of yours that you will decide for her advantage.'

"Since, my dear madam, you really do me the honour of asking my opinion, I will give it with my customary frankness. Introducing Miss Greyleigh into society as an important step; inasmuch that it stamps the fact that you wish her to be considered as a lady, and your adopted daughter. I confess I think so highly of her sweet disposition, her manners, and her natural character, that I should think her an acquisition to any sphere."

"It is easy to see which way you lean," cried Mr. Aimington, with a smile.

"My dear friends—for such you allow me to call you"—returned the other, "I do feel deeply interested for your protegée. You have made her, or can make her, so fit to adorn society, and enjoy the refinements of life, while she is already so unfitted for a lower rank, that I own it grieves me to see her placed in a doubtful or equivocal position. Yet, though trifling the question of going or not going to a party may appear, introducing her at Lady Selton's would certainly be passing the Rubicon, for the world would assuredly consider it as the seal of her condition

"Poor child!" returned Mr. Aimington; "I should be grieved if she ever felt herself slighted or neglected."

"Let us think it over, my dear," said the lady; "it will be time enough to send an answer to-morrow or next day."

How characteristic was each rejoinder! The kindly impulse, which looked not beyond the present, and shrunk from inflicting temporary pain; and the fatal procrastination, which puts off every burden till "to-morrow." True, most true, that the subject required consideration and reflection, for which two days were far too little time. But they had had eleven years to "think it over," and were still undecided! However, as in this case a decision must be made, the kind and present impulse prevailed. Without Mr. Hardwick's words being altogether forgotten, the impression they made passed in some measure away; it was arranged that Ellen should accompany her benefactors to Lady Selton's, while they considered they had made up their minds to treat her as an equal, though not without some regrets at her neglected education, and many resolutions, even now, to make up for it Yet with all these faults of indecision and procrastination—faults whose effects we would faintly attempt to shadow forth—Mr. and Mrs. Aimington loved Ellen Greyleigh dearly, more dearly, perhaps, than they themselves knew. In the limited intercourse the child had held with her parents, they had impressed her so strongly with the sense of her own and their obligations to Mr. and Mrs. Aimington, that her young heart overflowed with grateful and affectionate feelings; and her disposition was naturally so sweet, that even over, and often injudicious, indulgence could not spoil her. Blessings are somewhere quaintly compared to "birds which hop about us with their wings folded; the brilliancy of whose plumage we see never till they are flying away." Such a "bird" to them was Ellen Greyleigh; something more worthy than the "dogs and parrots," not only to love, but to be loved by. An eager listener to the thrice told tale; a ready messenger from room to room; a genie—and, for her years, wonderful—nurse to two frequent invalids. No one knew so well as Ellen how to fold the shawl, or place the sofa cushions; no one could so exactly mix an effervescing draught, or sweeten tea, or even scent a handkerchief. How they would have missed her!

The evening of the party came; and Ellen, attired judiciously in a dress of simple white, tapped at Mrs. Aimington's dressing room, enquiring if she could be of any use

"No, thank you, my love. But come in, I have something for you."

Mrs Aimington was splendidly dressed; and her maid was in the act of clasping on some dazzling jewels. The box which had contained them and many others, was open; and taking thence a single row of fine pearls, she called Ellen towards her, saying "I shall lend you a necklace, my love, I think this will be the best for you"—paused for a moment while her pleased protegée admired its beauty, and then placed it herself round her neck.

"Mr. Hardwick, why do you call me Miss Greyleigh?" said Ellen, just before they stepped into the carriage, "I feel as if I must have been a naughty child, and that you won't forgive me," she added with a smile, as if half conscious that in her ball dress, and pearls, she must have passed the age of "naughty-child"—hood.

"I am practising in private what I intend to perform in public," replied Mr Hardwick.

"But why do you?' returned Ellen.

"For a good and sufficient reason, Miss Greylegh,"—and as he spoke he handed her into the carriage.

The party was rather a select and elegant, than large one; but precisely because this was the case, was Ellen's introduction at it an important step. Towards the middle of the evening, Lady Selton—who was a young hostess—might have been observed for a few minutes in earnest conversation with Mr. Hardwick, after which the latter crossed the room, and took a vacant seat next Ellen Greylegh.

"Ellen," said he, "though you have promised to dance the next quadrille with me, I am going to be so rude as to transfer you to another partner;—will you forgive me

"Yes, as you call me Ellen, for I suppose I am now a good child again.'

'That was a slip of the tongue, Miss Greylegh.

"But why am I not to dance with you?

"When I was a little boy, good children or naughty children used to be told not to ask questions; but as a wiser generation adopt a wiser plan, I must answer yours, Miss Greylegh. I am a nobody, and I think it to your advantage to dance this evening with one or two somebodies—to whom Lady Selton is going to introduce you."

"What do you mean ?'

"Exactly what I have said."

Without really understanding her kind friend's meaning, Ellen coloured slightly —she knew not why; but, with true feminine tact, she turned the conversation, saying, "How lucky that I learnt dancing; you said I should be sure to find it useful."

Yes! the "Somebodies" of the party danced with the Miller's daughter, who from that evening might be said to have entered the private circle of the élite of the county. Yet the rapid decline of Mr. Aumington's health became soon afterwards so marked, that her first was almost her last party; but in the home circle of more limited visiting, there was henceforth, as Mr. Hardwick had predicted, no inapprehension about the real position of "The Adopted." The exemption from scenes of gaiety, in which too many girls at her age are often absorbed, was of the greatest advantage, for she retained the simplicity of character and manner, which, under other circumstances, she might have been so likely to lose.

Thus time passed on, bringing, however, no more regular instruction for Ellen: but much real improvement from reading and observation. Yet were her days chiefly occupied in watchful and affectionate attendance on those she regarded as parents. Not only was Mr. Aumington so confirmed an invalid as to be seldom able to leave the house, but his wife, always what is called "delicate," became yet more feeble. Though they seemed themselves scarcely conscious of the glaring truth, they were, in reality, growing old; and though not so very aged that to them would have been applicable the strong stern line of the American poet—

"It was their time to die;

yet all but themselves seemed able to read that, in human probability, their remaining span must be short

Thus evenly glided away three years. Mr. Hardwick was settled in the metropolis, slowly, but surely, forming for himself a practice there During these three years, however, a line of railway had been opened, which, annihilating time and space, brought the Hall within a three hours journey. Thus he was a frequent visiter.

"Mrs. Aumington," said he, one day when he chanced to be alone with the lady, "you used to tell me I was the most candid person you knew; I am going to prove to you that I have not outgrown my frankness. And yet," he added with a sigh, "I am almost selfish enough to regret the good which I have sometimes flattered myself proceeded from my last especial exhibition of frankness."

"Do you mean," replied Mrs. Aimington, "our conversation long ago, about Ellen? I assure you, I have often rejoiced that we took your advice"

"Believe me, I too have often rejoiced : always, when not overpowered by the selfish wish that Ellen Greylegh a station had still remained undecided, so that —that—my humble offer might at least have presented one advantage, that of exchanging an equivocal for a fixed and honourable position. As it is—I fear—I suspect you have other views. I scarcely dare to ask you, if I may seek her for my wife Walter Hardwick had spoken with emotion, for, like all true and honest natures, he felt deeply, and loved Ellen with manly sincerity. Yet he remembered that he was under obligations to Mr. Aumington for early patronage, the only patronage which can win gratitude—for which success has counted the price of the blind so that the dullest acknowledge it, "the world feels shame in not seeing. A noble heart like his could not forget this truth, and suspecting, but with too good reason, that they had other views for their protégée, he had refrained from word, and he believed from look or manner, which could betray his affection to the object of it.

"I thank you, my dear Sir, for your candour, said Mrs. Aumington, in reply to his honest confession, "and will answer you with equal frankness. You are aware that the death of our nephew will throw the entailed property, after my husband's death, into a distant branch of the family; in fact, the next heir is a second cousin, Mr. James Aumington, whom I think you have met here occasionally "

"I have seen him twice.

"Only twice! To be sure we did not know him ourselves till within the twelve month; but he has been here a good deal lately. We have no reason to doubt his being a very worthy person; yet from only having seen him recently, it seems difficult to look upon him as our relation and successor. The fact is, it would be a consolation to think that when we are gone, the place would be inhabited by some one who would remember us with kindness and affection, and as we intend to bequeath to dear Ellen almost all our personal property, it would certainly make us very happy to find the young people liked each other, and, in short, to see them married; to contemplate Ellen as the future mistress here, and to know that the property would remain be united.

"Did I, my dear Madam," returned Mr. Hardwick—"did I understand you rightly—do you only intend to provide for Ellen Greylegh? Forgive my reminding you of the uncertainty of life—the danger of delay

"You blame Mr. Aumington," said the lady, slightly colouring, 'for not having already made a will in her favour; but the truth is, he has never altered that which he signed years before we adopted her; in which he leaves everything, of which he can dispose, to me. He has always had perfect confidence that if I prove the survivor, I should provide properly for Ellen. And I am quite sure if I should be taken first, he would not not forget her. Indeed"——but here a violent fit of coughing prevented Mrs. Aumington from proceeding.

"And, Mr. Harawick," said Ellen Greylegh to him, in the course of the evening, which followed the above conversation, "will you bring me, the next time you come, the song you were talking about last week, and will you ask your kind sister to match the wools for a worsted work "

"I will send them to you without delay, for I fear I shall not be able to pay you a visit soon for some time.

"Oh, why not ?" replied Ellen, with evident regret.

"Do you think," returned Mr. Hardwick, assuming a tone of irony to cover his real emotion, "do you think I am a person of so little importance, in fact, am so little wanted, that I can be spared for a whole day every week or two ?

"Ah! well, if you are so busy," cried Ellen, "it is very thoughtless of me to add to your trouble—never mind the song and the worsted '

"Indeed, you shall have them, it is no trouble. By the way, shall I send them to Mr James Aimington, and ask him to bring them."

"No, don't—he always forgets my commissions." Ellen looked up as she spoke, and, at least, Walter fancied, had the strange sensation of feeling that though he might not have touched her heart, it was equally free from any impression in favour of his rival

It might be, that Mr and Mrs Aimington were equally conscious of Ellen's indifference towards their cousin At all events, they shortly afterwards found means of hinting, rather than expressing, their wishes on the subject; startled, indeed, was the simple-hearted girl when the conviction first dawned on her mind. True to her grateful nature, there is no wonder that she strove to the uttermost to think and feel as they would have her; but the heart is a strange rebel, often more ready to be sacrificed at the altar of duty, than to obey its dictates As for the gentleman in question, he appeared a perfect specimen of the common place, though there were points of character also in him that will be presently developed, which certainly redeemed him from belonging to that class. Just as a country abounding in pit-falls and quicksands, as little deserves to be called a level plain, as that which is beautifully diversified with hill and dale. Many trifling circumstances revealed to him also the wishes of his relations, and James Aimington began to play the wooer. That he was not very successful he knew; and this knowledge, added to the knowledge of his own real inferiority, piqued him to win her, with a feeling quite independent of any true regard. Yet as he was not a clever, nor even a shrewd person, he had not sufficient self command to hide from Ellen that his temper was irritated, though she, poor girl, did not know that it was at her superiority. As for those who had taken upon themselves the duties of parents towards their "adopted," they were too much engrossed by their own ailments, or had, perhaps, from age or circumstances, so far outgrown the faculties of keen perception, that such shades of feeling in the "young people" were not even guessed at by them.

Such was the state of affairs, when Mrs. Aimington, requiring some purchases to be made in the neighbouring town, proposed one morning that the coach should drive Ellen over to C——, as she would be quite able to make the proper selection. Accordingly the pony phaeton was ordered, and, attended by a single servant, they proceeded on their mission. The shopping I need not particularize; it is enough that one of Ellen s commissions was to procure a little box, according to a certain pattern. The servant was a new one, nearly a stranger to the place and to the family, but knowing the sort of article that was wanted, he drew their attention to a shop which was apparently not recently opened, a workman being in the act of painting the first letter of a name above it. The wares, however, in the window, sufficiently proclaimed that it was a turner's shop, and Ellen and Mr. James alighted. Not finding precisely the article required, Ellen gave the order for one to be made according to the pattern; and drawing from its case one of her own engraved cards, wrote on the back of it minute directions to avoid the possibility of a mistake. By chance the young man behind the counter looked first at the side on which "Miss Greylegh" was inscribed, and as he did so his face flushed, and the next moment he raised his eyes enquiringly to Ellen, saying, in a trembling voice,

"Are you Miss Greylegh ?'

"That is my name," she replied.

"And you don't know me? No wonder, for I didn't remember you a bit. To think of your being our little Nelly, and of my not knowing you! I, who used to carry you on my shoulder many a day to make you the tallest of all. Well, Nelly, shake hands with your brother, though you are in another sense so much above all the rest!'

"Johnny, dear Johnny !" were the only words which escaped her lips; but not alone was her hand held out, a warm embrace followed, and a hearty kiss was given and received.

"And so you don t forget all about old times and the Mill ?" said the young tradesman, the tears starting to his eyes. "I know you don t, though you are a lady, and every way belong to us no more. But didn t you know I was married and set up in business here "

"Indeed I did not; but it is long since I have paid a visit to the Mill; neither, Johnny, must you judge me harshly for this seeming neglect. I——" but Ellen paused, for she did not wish to tell the cause of her absence, and Mrs. Aimington had (and perhaps wisely) contrived that latterly her visits should be as few and far between as possible. Of "excuses," such as frequent exercise to the London, and all of coals and similar articles, she had an abundance, plenty; but her nature was too genuine, and her heart at the moment too much touched to avail herself of them.

Meanwhile Mr. James had stood tapping his boot most vehemently with the light driving whip he had not relinquished; till on a movement being made for Ellen to be introduced to her brother s wife—a tradesman's daughter, whose ready little fortune had enabled John Greylegh to set up in business—he looked up, showing that his hps were white with suppressed anger, and saying,

"I know not, Miss Greylegh, how far my cousin and his lady may approve of this sort of thing. I am sure this young man—your brother did not say he—must see the impropriety ; indeed I feel authorized in insisting that you return to the carriage.

"Insisting" murmured Ellen—the right pride that is confined to no station sending a flush to her cheek—" Pardon me, ' and she extended her hand to the young wife with a kind and glad smile. Yet, when in a few minutes afterwards she was seated in the phaeton on her return home, tears flowed abundantly. And why ?

For many reasons. Young and inexperienced as she was, let it not be supposed that Ellen Greylegh had remained even thus long unconscious of her false position; a phrase sufficiently expressive to those who understand it, though hard to be explained, so infinite are the circumstances which may modify it. Half the miseries of the world arise from people struggling to seem what they are not; and neither to be nor seem what they are not, was the current in which our heroine was drifting. Her education was that of a gentlewoman, but in a false position; and, oh! not less so he, whom adventitious circumstances depress until society underrates him. The latter, indeed, is the more mournful case Yet though neither of these phrases exactly applies to Ellen, hers was, nevertheless, a false position, and here the penalty of suffering It would have been wiser and kinder of the Aimingtons to have adopted an orphan child—a foundling—than one with parents alive—for, alas! how many of these will born want. Or, if from taking a fancy to an individual, they chose to remove a humble child from the parental roof, it was their duty, by a consistent and most detailed line of conduct, to guide the chosen object from the thorns they were sowing in her path.

(To be Concluded in our Next.

It is confidently stated that a new writ for the borough of Dudley will be moved for immediately on the opening of the ensuing session of Parliament.

In a case of assault brought before the presiding magistrate at Wandsworth, on Wednesday last, in which Mr. Monro, a gentleman of large fortune, was the defendant, and his footman the complainant, Mr. Paynter had it in contemplation to fully justify the assertion in his answer to the charge, which was preferred by counsel, but one of them refused to attend, he was certainly justified in turning him out of the house.

Much conversation has been occasioned in the neighbourhood of Notting-hill, Kensington, in consequence of the discovery of two human skeletons at the foot of a tree in that vicinage on Friday last. The skeletons were those of two full grown persons. Another skeleton, of a female child, and that of a child, was made at Blackheath on Saturday, under circumstances that admit of no doubt of foul play.

It is, we are informed, the intention of her Majesty's Government, shortly after the meeting of Parliament, to propose that a select committee be appointed to consider the standing orders relating to railways, with a view to certain material alterations in which the interests of the public are concerned.

DREADFUL SHIPWRECK ON THE COAST OF GODWIN SANDS. HORRIBLE SACRIFICE OF LIFE.—On Saturday night a most distressing shipwreck took place on the Goodwin Sands, in the total loss of a fine brig called the Resolveress, of two hundred tons burthen, Mr Turner, master, belonging to Bideford, whilst on her passage from Newcastle to Plymouth, laden with coals When off the north sand head of the Goodwin, there came on a tremendous gale of wind, which almost immediately dismasted the vessel in the sands, and she instantly fell on her beam ends. The occurrence being perceived by the crews of several luggers belonging to Deal, Ramsgate, and Broadstairs, who are generally cruising about that dangerous part of the Channel in order to render immediate assistance to vessels in distress, they quickly bore down towards her, but the gale did increasing, accompanied by a heavy fall of hail and snow, made it utterly impossible for them to get alongside of the wreck; in fact, it was anticipated that their boats could not outlive the storm, the sea running so tremendously high. The crew of the ill-fated brig were at this period in a truly appalling condition. No sooner had she struck than the surf made a complete breach over her, and several of the poor fellows were nearly washed overboard. It was only by maintaining a firm hold, that they were prevented from being swept away, and they afterwards were firmly secured themselves by lashing each other in the rigging, where they were not so exposed to the full fury of the boisterous element, the sea continually rolling over the mast-head. In this situation did the unfortunate creatures, who perished, with Captain Turner, master, belonging to the brig, remain for seven hours, and, conceiving that it was next to an impossibility of being saved, shook hands fervently with each other, and resigned themselves to their fate with the most unparalleled fortitude. The vessel then was fast sinking into the body of the sand. The conduct pursued by the crews of the luggers, who are better known as "Deal boatmen," was of such a character as deserves the highest commendation They continued cruising about the vessel, waiting for an opportunity to run alongside of her, and, in doing which, their craft often appeared as if buried amidst the boiling surf, so tempestuous was the state of the ocean. The crew of the luggers, as before observed, were all in the rigging, where of the most heart-rending description, imploring assistance in the most piteous manner. At last, about four o'clock in the morning, one of the luggers succeeded in running so close alongside the brig as

Just published, price 4s., bound in cloth,

THE TRAVELLER'S HAND-BOOK for GIBRALTAR, with Observations on the Surrounding Country. By an OLD INHABITANT Illustrated with seven views and a chart.

Printed for COWIE, JOSLAND, and Co., 31, Poultry.

This day is published, price Eighteenpence,

THE STATE and PROSPECTS of PENNY POSTAGE, as developed in the Evidence taken before the Postage Committee of 1843: with Incidental Remarks on the Testimony of the Post Office Authorities, and an Appendix of Correspondence. By ROWLAND HILL. London: CHARLES KNIGHT and Co (32, Ludgate Street).

BREAKFAST TABLE SCIENCE!

In a pocket volume, neatly bound and lettered, price 2s. 6d., bound,

BREAKFAST TABLE SCIENCE: written expressly for the amusement and instruction of young people, by J. H. WARNEY [illegible] M.D. London. Printed for THOMAS TEGG, 73, Cheapside, and may be had of the Author, No. 8 [illegible] Edition of MARY HOWITT'S Popular Story of Strive and Thrive. Price Two Shillings. Superb.

THE WORLD OF LONDON

Beautifully printed in foolscap 8vo., may be had, either in One or in Two Volumes, price only Five Shillings,

THE WORLD OF LONDON. By JOHN FISHER MURRAY. Or gradually published in Blackwood's Magazine.—"Compendious [illegible] whole of modern life in all its variety, the contemplation of which is incontestable." Edinburgh Journal for THOMAS TEGG, 73, Cheapside, and may be procured by order of all Booksellers.

THE ARTIZAN, with which the ARCHITECT, ENGINEER, and SURVEYOR will now be incorporated, price 4d. The number for February, which begins the Second Volume, contains: The Iron Manufacture—Direct Action Metal Planers—Styles in Architecture—Roads—Electricity—Mines of Cornwall—Monthly Record of Architecture and Building Acts—Notices of Architecture and Engineering across the Atlantic—Iron Steamers, &c. &c., with Plates of the Engines of the Steamers Great Western and Nimrod, and Sections of the Great Western, Britain Queen, and Infernal, the last on the new tubular construction.—SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, and Co.

THE THREE EXPERIMENTS OF LIVING

In a pocket volume, neatly printed, price Two Shillings, bound,

THREE EXPERIMENTS of LIVING; viz., Living within the Means—Living up to the Means—and Living beyond the Means. To which is now first added to the Work the 26th Section.—"Every individual should bring home in mind that [illegible] equally accountable."—London: Printed for THOMAS TEGG, 73, Cheapside, and may be procured by order of every Bookseller in the Kingdom.

PHILLIPS'S WORKS of REFERENCE.—EXHEADS'S ENGLISH RECLONER for all trades, with interest and other tables, 12mo, price 2s. bound.

THE SAME WORK, with farming and surveying tables, of convenience in all agricultural concerns. 18mo., 3s. bound.

MACKENZIE'S FIVE THOUSAND USEFUL RECEIPTS, in all the domestic arts and [illegible] 28th edition, 12mo., 6s. 6d. bound.

THE FARMER'S CALENDAR, detailing the business of every month in the year. By ARTHUR YOUNG, Esq. A revised edition, in a thick volume, 12mo., 12s. bound

WHITTAKER and Co. Ave Maria-lane.

PHILLIPS'S FIVE HUNDRED QUESTIONS, forming an INTERROGATIVE SYSTEM of INSTRUCTION.—This Series of Questions applies to all the educational works published by Sir Richard Phillips. They are printed in thin quarto-post copy-books, price 2s. each, sewed, and contain nearly a quire of superfine paper with spaces and margins to enter the answers, so as to exhibit the progress of the pupil in the several subjects of study, and they include Exercises, at the same time, in Writing, Orthography, Punctuation, and Composition.

A KEY to EACH SERIES for the convenience of [illegible] stors, may be had, at 2d. each; and in which there are more than one popular edition of [illegible] Text books, references have been made to each.

THE KEYS, bound in a volume, 8s. 6d.—WHITTAKER and Co.

MORNING EXERCISES AT CRIPPLEGATE, [illegible] Lane in the Field, and in Southwark, being three sermons preached [illegible] every Sunday morning, MDCCXXIII. By several Ministers of the Gospel, in or near London

Now re-sized and corrected, with Notes and Translations of all the Quotations. By JAMES NICHOLS, Editor of Fuller's Church History, &c.

A volume will be issued every alternate month, so as to complete the publication within the year. The present edition is only a very limited one printed, because demand of persons who want most valuable work are recommended to send their names promptly to their respective Booksellers, or to the Publishers.

THOMAS TEGG, 73, Cheapside, London

COMPLETE WORKS FOR SIXPENCE, and 20 Numbers, at ONE PENNY.

THE LIBRARY FOR HOME. Edited by DR. LYNTON [illegible] B.A. —This Library will include the Literature of every age and country, and exhibit the works of voyage, Travels, History, Biography, &c., divested of all passages that can be deemed injurious to the youthful mind, and such as would render the volume unacceptable to all classes of society. The proprietors hope that the cheap and valuable collection in the "Library for Home," now in preparation, will find a place by the fireside and on the library table of every family in the United Kingdom.

The first work of the series, A VOICE FROM THE MAIN DECK; or, Six Years in a Man of War, is now ready, containing Six Books at one penny each.

The Library is printed uniform with "Murray's Colonial and Home Library," in a new type, on fine paper, in a small octavo form, and will be published in Monthly Parts, and in Volumes, on the 1st of the publication, at one penny each, and in post 8vo volumes, every fortnight at Sixpence. Every work will be completed, with [illegible] M

Sixpence, when practicable, and will take [illegible] ORDER published in the history of printing.

London: JOHN NIMMO, No. 76, stock street, Covent-Garden

SCHOOL BOOKS BY WILLIAM BUTLER, EDITED BY THOMAS ROGAN

CHRONOLOGICAL, BIOGRAPHICAL, HISTORICAL, and MISCELLANEOUS EXERCISES. 11th Edition. 12mo., 7s. 6d. bd.

ARITHMETICAL EXERCISES. 10th Edition, with Additions by GEORGE FRONT. 12mo., 3s. 6d.

1. EXERCISES on the GLOBES and MAPS, interspersed with Historical, Biographical, Chronological, Mythological, and Miscellaneous Information. To which are added QUESTIONS for EXAMINATION. With an Appendix, by which the Constellations may be easily known. 12mo., 3s. 6d.

4. A KEY to the EXERCISES on the GLOBES. 1s. 6d. sewed

5. QUESTIONS and ANSWERS on ANCIENT and MODERN HISTORY and BIOGRAPHY. 4th Edition. 12mo., 3s. 6d. bd.

GEOGRAPHICAL EXERCISES on the NEW TESTAMENT; describing the Principal Places in Judea, and those visited by St. Paul; and narrating the most important occurrences recorded in the Evangelical Histories. With Maps, and a Brief Account of the Principal Religious Sects. 5th Edition. 12mo., 3s. 6d. bd.

7. ARITHMETICAL TABLES, &c. 20th Ed. 1oc. with Additions 6d.

Sold by BAYNES and HARVEY, Cornhill; and SIMPKIN MARSHALL, and Co

For February, 18-4, price Sixpence, No. 2, New Series of

THE LADIES' CABINET of FASHION, MUSIC, and ROMANCE. Greatly Enlarged and Improved. Containing Ten splendid Engravings and Seventy-two pages of Literary and Fashionable matter, beautifully printed on fine paper. The large accession of subscribers during the past year to this long-established and well-known Family Magazine and Library of Female Literature, Fashion, and the Fine Arts signify styled the Table Book and Boudoir Companion for the Ladies, has at once suggested the propriety of making a large addition to the literary contents and embellishments for the [illegible] of the present and ensuing volumes, and the charms of variety to its pages, across the Atlantic, besides others fami[illegible] acquainted with the literature of the Continent, who will supply translations from the purest and most brilliant productions of the living authors of Germany, France, and Italy, as well as original specimens of the genius of Spain, Sweden, and Denmark. The Ladies' Cabinet will thus present its readers with a [illegible] of the literature of the world. It will also continue to maintain its pre[illegible] highest authority in fashion, and the arrangements for the ensuing year will render the [illegible] man costumes will enable the proprietor to give the newest, [illegible] and [illegible] rate prices will insure the most fashionable patronage. Fine Art [illegible] peared in any magazine.—London: G. HENDERSON, Old Bond-st.

DE LA VOYE'S NEW FRENCH-ENGLISH, ENGLISH-FRENCH DICTIONARY. 18mo., bound 12s 6d

DE LA VOYE'S NOUVEAU MELANGE. 18mo., bound 12s 6d

DE LA VOYE'S NOUVELLES RECREATIONS FRANÇOISES. 12mo., bound 6s. 6d.

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

REBELLION in IRELAND in 1798.—Part II., price 1s. By W. H. MAXWELL, Author of "Life of the Duke of Wellington," &c., &c. With two beautiful Illustrations on Steel, by George Cruikshank.

In preparing this history for publication, its most [illegible] has been placed on works already given to the world. To peculiar circumstances he has been indebted for exclusive information from [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

DESTRUCTION OF KING WILLIAM'S COLLEGE, BY FIRE.

DESTRUCTION OF KING WILLIAM'S COLLEGE IN THE ISLE OF MAN.

We regret to record the almost total destruction of this splendid college edifice at Castletown by fire, on Sunday morning last. The fire was discovered about two o'clock, issuing from the school-room, and had already made such progress, that efforts to arrest it, without aid of engines, were wholly ineffectual. Engines were sent for to Douglas, without delay; but, such was the distance, that before they arrived, the interior of the main building was wholly destroyed. Nothing is saved of that fine edifice but the bare walls, and a part of the east wing in which the Vice-Principal resides; the very valuable library of the College, containing many works of great rarity, and a curious collection of Bibles, from the time of Coverdale, in upwards of fifty different languages, many unique MSS. relating to Manx ecclesiastical affairs, and the very valuable military models and plans, maps, mathematical and other instruments, many of which cannot be replaced without much labour and expence, belonging to Mr. Browne, the Professor of English and modern literature, were completely destroyed.

The first alarm was given by two boys who were sick of the measles, separated from the other boys, and sleeping immediately over the English class-rooms, who, having perceived a strong smell of fire, gave the alarm. There were about sixty boys sleeping within the college at the time, who were obliged to escape in their night shirts, but not a single accident occurred. The conduct of Mr. Dixon, the Principal, on this trying occasion, entitles him to the highest praise. his first care was to see that the lives of those entitled to his guardianship were all safe—then he bestowed his attention on saving property to the utmost of his power.

King William's College is a modern erection, about half a mile N.E. from Castletown. The first stone was laid by the late Lieut.-Governor Smelt, on the 23d of April, 1830, and it was opened in the summer of 1835. The building is partly in the early English, and partly in the Elizabethan style, forming a spacious and cruciform structure, 210 feet in length from east to west, and 155 feet from north to south; from the intersection rose the embattled tower, 115 feet high, strengthened with buttresses, and surmounted by an octagonal turret, intended for an observatory, having in each of its sides an elegant and lofty window, and crowned with a parapet. The edifice cost about £6000, of which £2000 was from the accumulated fund from property granted by Bishop Barrow, in 1668, for the education of young men for the ministry in the Manx Church. From subscriptions, raised chiefly in the island, £2000 was obtained, and the remaining £2000 was supplied by mortgaging the funds. The original draught of the design was furnished by Messrs. Hanson and Welsh, architects; but the execution of the works, including the alterations and additions, and the design for the great tower—a beautiful specimen of masonry—were under the direction of Mr Welsh. The contractor was the late Mr. Fitzsimmons, who, it is said, lost £1500 by the contract. The property is vested in the hands of trustees, who are the Lieutenant-Governor, the Lord Bishop, the Clerk of the Rolls, the Archdeacon, Deemster Christian, one Vicar-General, and the Attorney-General. The funds expended in the erection of the edifice were, we believe, aided by generous benefactions from England.

KING WILLIAM'S COLLEGE, BEFORE THE FIRE.

WEST LONDON RAILWAY.—On Tuesday there was a special general meeting of the proprietors of this company at the offices in Aberdeen-lane, City, Mr. R. Gunter in the chair, to receive a report from the directors. This document, which was read by Mr. Thompson, the secretary, congratulated the proprietors upon thorough provision having been made by the directors for the completion of the works of the line, and upon the fact that the company was now in a situation to take up the extension of the railway to the Thames, having every reason to expect facilities from the principal landowners along it. Mr. R. Stephenson, the engineer, in his report to the directors, stated that the formation of a rapid and certain communication with the river Thames, as proposed by the West London Railway, would induce a large portion of the goods traffic of the London and Birmingham and Great Western railways to approach the Thames in that channel, and bring the City, by means of steam-boats, &c., within three-quarters of an hour's journey of Uxbridge and Hammersmith, at a cost of about eight pence per passenger, whilst it would afford to the railways above mentioned all the advantages which the South Western Railway derived from its river terminus at Nine Elms. Resolutions were then proposed, and after some discussion (in which Mr. Witchurch, Mr. Camplin, Mr Crawford, Mr. White, and others engaged), were passed, authorizing the directors to apply to Parliament in the ensuing session for power to extend the line from its present terminus at Kensington Canal to the Thames, and for raising a further capital of £654,800.

METROPOLITAN DRAPERS' ASSOCIATION. The annual meeting of this association took place on Tuesday evening, in the large room, Exeter Hall, J. Emerson Tennent, Esq., M.P. in the chair. The report was read by Mr. Rennie, and appeared to be extremely satisfactory. The meeting was then addressed by the chairman in a very powerful speech, who feelingly exposed the mischiefs of the present system of labour, and said that amongst the other classes who were suffering from similar grievances were milliners and dress-makers, 15,000; sempstresses, innumerable; clothiers and linendrapers, 16,796; grocers, 12,831; chemists, 2,500, bring a total of 47,000. Those, as well as other mercantile pursuits, required the hours of business to be curtailed. Dr. Reid then addressed the meeting, and detailed the injury produced to health by such long hours being devoted to business. The meeting was subsequently addressed by Mr. Hitchcock, the Rev. Mr. Cumming, the Rev. Mr. Hughes, &c. The meeting did not break up till a very late hour, and a handsome collection was made at the doors.

MEDICAL TREATMENT OF THE POOR.—An investigation (at the instance of Mr. Payne, the deputy coroner), took place before the board of guardians, at St George-the-Martyr's, Southwark, respecting the manner in which the medical officers of the union had treated two out-door casual poor, who had died. Mr. Bathurst in the one case, and Mr. Kendell in the other, had prescribed without either of them seeing their patient; and the latter had allowed, it appeared, his assistant, an apprentice, only twenty years of age, to attend the paupers. In the former case the board, in spite of great opposition from Messrs. Boxer, Gladwell, and others, passed a resolution acquitting Mr. Bathurst, who said he had every afternoon to see some forty patients. In the other case a similar resolution was agreed to, but accompanied by a caution against allowing any one who had not passed the College of Surgeons to visit the sick poor.

DEATH OF SIR FRANCIS BURDETT.

It is with extreme regret we have to announce the death of Sir Francis Burdett, which melancholy event took place at his house in St. James's-place, at five minutes before four o'clock on Tuesday morning last. Though seriously ill ever since the lamented death of Lady Burdett, whom the hon. baronet survived only eleven days, it was not till within the last three days that apprehensions existed of a fatal termination to his illness. On Monday afternoon, however, it became evident to those around him that his dissolution was near, and in a few hours their worst fears were realised. The loss of Sir Francis Burdett will be deeply felt, not only by his family and numerous friends, but by the many who were dependent upon his bounty, for his hand was ever as open as his heart was compassionate. Of the political character of Sir Francis it is not our purpose here to speak: few men have so long occupied public attention—none have been more popular—and scarcely any have had more experience of "the fickle breath of popular applause;" but whatever diversity of opinion may from time to time have existed of the acts of his public life, there was but one in regard to his private position and social relations. He was an affectionate father, a kind husband, a fast friend, an excellent landlord, a man of unimpeachable honour, and he possessed in an eminent degree those qualities which identified him as a perfect specimen of an English gentleman.

Although we abstain from commentary on the chequered events of Sir Francis Burdett's political career, yet a brief notice of his public life may not be out of place.

Few of the English aristocracy can trace their ancestry through a longer and uninterrupted line of progenitors than the Burdetts. Hugo de Burdett is often mentioned among the active companions of William the Conqueror; and his son, William, was knighted for his prowess in the holy wars. The first baronet of the family was created by James the First. His name was Thomas (and not Francis, as has been stated in some memoirs of the family); he stood eighteenth in the lineal descent from Hugo. His eldest son was named Francis, and was the first of the family who bore that name. The first member of the family who sat in Parliament was Sir Robert Burdett, the eldest son of the first Francis. Although he was thrice married, and had a numerous family, none of his sons survived him. He was succeeded in his titles and estates by a grandson—a gentleman celebrated for his learning. He was an LL.D., and was the grandfather of the late Sir Francis, of whose decease we are now speaking.

Sir Francis Burdett was born in 1770, and was educated at Westminster School, and in 1790, when about 20 years of age, he made the tour of France and Switzerland, returning home in 1793, in which year he married Sophia, the youngest daughter of the late Thomas Coutts, Esq., the well-known banker—a lady whose decease, on the 12th inst., it was our painful task to record. Three years after the return of Sir Francis Burdett to England he first entered Parliament, being elected member for Boroughbridge, in Yorkshire, in 1796. In the following year he succeeded his grandfather in the baronetcy. About this period Sir Francis became a member of the Constitutional Association for promoting a reform in Parliament; an during a long succession of years, both in and out of Parliament, took a prominent part in every public effort to promote that object. The Middlesex election in 1802, in which he was returned over Mr. Mainwaring, the chairman of the Middlesex bench of justices, by a majority of 270, was set aside on petition. The election which ensued was also severely contested, Mr. Mainwaring, jun., who stood in the place of his father, carrying his election by only five votes, in a poll of more than five thousand. At the next general election Sir Francis made a third attempt to sit in the House of Commons for Middlesex; but was opposed by Mr Mellish, and again failed. In 1807, Sir Francis first became a candidate for Westminster, and was returned without one shilling expense to himself. As "The Man of the People" the appellation which was conferred on him—his popularity was immense, and the public enthusiasm in his favour was carried to a height altogether unprecedented. The "chairing" on that occasion was a most imposing procession. The appearance of Sir Francis in the triumphal car—pale from a recent severe wound in the thigh, received in a duel with Mr. Paull, added to the interest of the triumph.

THE LATE SIR FRANCIS BURDETT.

In 1810 Sir Francis Burdett was committed to the Tower by a vote of the House of Commons, for addressing a printed letter to his constituents on the commitment of Mr. Gale Jones. The vote was taken after a long and stormy debate, in the course of which Mr. Williams Wynn's celebrated defence of the privileges of the House of Commons was delivered.

The "Manchester massacre," in 1819, again brought Sir Francis Burdett before his constituents, to whom he addressed a very strongly-expressed letter on that unhappy affair. For this he was prosecuted by the Government, tried in the King's Bench, found guilty, sentenced to pay a fine of £2000, and to be imprisoned for three months.

In the year 1837 Sir Francis, having lost his election for Westminster, which borough he had represented for thirty years, was returned for North Wilts. His lamented death has now caused a vacancy in the representation of that division of the county.

He is succeeded by his only son Lieutenant-Colonel now Sir Robert Burdett—who did not leave town on Tuesday, as was expected, to attend Lady Burdett's funeral, but remained by his father's bedside till his decease.

We understand that the obsequies of her ladyship have been deferred, in all probability until those of Sir Francis are performed.

NOTICE.—All communications respecting the transmission or non-arrival of the paper, must be addressed to the person who supplies the paper, or who receives the subscription.

London: Printed and Published by WILLIAM LITTLE, at 198, Strand, where all communications for the Editor are requested to be addressed.—SATURDAY JANUARY 27, 184

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 92, Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 3, 1844. [Sixpence.

THE OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

In another part of our journal will be found illustrated the State Formalities of the Opening of Parliament, by her Majesty in person, on Thursday last. The event had been for some time past looked for with greater interest than the approach of any Session for some years past; the State Procession was accordingly witnessed by a very large concourse of persons, assembled throughout the line from Buckingham Palace to the House of Lords, where also the attendance was unusually splendid. Her Majesty having arrived there, and taken her seat upon the Throne, read the following most gracious Speech:—

HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

It affords me great satisfaction again to meet you in Parliament, and to have the opportunity of profiting by your assistance and advice.

I entertain a confident hope that the general peace so necessary for the happiness and prosperity of all nations will continue uninterrupted.

My friendly relations with the King of the French, and the good understanding happily established between my Government and that of his Majesty, with the continued assurances of the peaceable and amicable dispositions of all Princes and States, confirm me in this expectation.

I have directed that the treaty which I have concluded with the Emperor of China shall be laid before you, and I rejoice to think that it will, in its results, prove highly advantageous to the trade of this country. Throughout the whole course of my negociations with the Government of China, I have uniformly disclaimed the wish for any exclusive advantages.

It has been my desire that equal favour should be shown to the industry and commercial enterprise of all nations.

The hostilities which took place during the past year in Scinde have led to the annexation of a considerable portion of that country to the British possessions in the East. In all the military operations, and especially in the battles of Meanee and Hyderabad, the constancy and valour of the troops, Native and European, and the skill and gallantry of their distinguished Commander, have been most conspicuous. I have directed that additional information, explanatory of the transactions in Scinde, shall be forthwith communicated to you.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

The Estimates for the ensuing year will be immediately laid before you. They have been prepared with a strict regard to economy, and, at the same time, with a due consideration of those exigencies of the Public Service which are connected with the maintenance of our maritime strength, and the multiplied demands on the Naval and Military Establishments from the various parts of a widely-extended Empire.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I congratulate you on the improved condition of several important branches of the trade and manufactures of the country. I trust that the increased demand for labour has relieved, in a corresponding degree, many classes of my faithful subjects from sufferings and privations, which, at former periods, I have had occasion to deplore.

For several successive years the annual produce of the Revenue fell short of the Public Expenditure. I confidently trust that in the present year the public income will be amply sufficient to defray the charges upon it.

I feel assured that in considering all matters connected with the financial concerns of the country, you will bear in mind the evil consequences of accumulating debt during the time of peace, and that you will firmly resolve to uphold that public credit, the maintenance of which concerns equally the permanent interests and the honour and reputation of a great country.

In the course of the present year the opportunity will occur of giving notice to the Bank of England on the subject of the revision of its Charter. It may be advisable that during this session of Parliament, and previously to the arrival of the period assigned for the giving of such notice, the state of the law with regard to the privileges of the Bank of England, and to other banking establishments, should be brought under your consideration.

At the close of the last session of Parliament, I declared to you my firm determination to maintain inviolate the Legislative Union between Great Britain and Ireland. I expressed, at the same time, my earnest desire to co-operate with Parliament in the adoption of all such measures as might tend to improve the social condition of Ireland, and to develope the natural resources of that part of the United Kingdom. I am resolved to act in strict conformity with this declaration. I forbear from observations on events in Ireland, in respect to which proceedings are pending before the proper legal tribunal.

My attention has been directed to the state of the law and practice with regard to the occupation of land in Ireland. I have deemed it advisable to institute extensive local inquiries into a subject of so much importance, and have appointed a Commission with ample authority to conduct the requisite investigation. I recommend to your early consideration the enactments at present in force in Ireland concerning the registration of voters for Members for Parliament. You will probably find that a revision of the Law of Registration, taken in conjunction with other causes at present in operation, would produce a material diminution of the number of county voters, and that it may be advisable on that account to consider the state of the law, with a view to an extension of the county franchise in Ireland.

I commit to your deliberate consideration the various important questions of public policy which will necessarily come under your review, with full confidence in your loyalty and wisdom, and with an earnest prayer to Almighty God to direct and favour your efforts to promote the welfare of all classes of my people.

At the conclusion of the speech, the Speaker and Members of the House of Commons withdrew, and her Majesty and her suite left the House in the same order in which they had entered it.

THE MOVER AND SECONDER OF THE ADDRESS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

THE EARL OF ELDON.

LORD HILL.

Their lordships then adjourned during pleasure.

The interior of the House was fitted up in the same manner as it was at the time of the prorogation. Her Majesty's chair of state was raised upon a dais. On the right of her Majesty's chair was that of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and on the left that of his Royal Highness Prince Albert. The dais and the steps leading to the throne were covered with a magnificent Turkey carpet.

Their lordships met again at a quarter to five. There was an unusually large attendance of Peers. The Duke of Wellington as usual, was early in his seat. Lord Melbourne entered at a few minutes after five; he appeared to be in excellent health. The Duke of Cambridge sat on the cross benches.

The Earl of Glasgow, the Marquis of Winchester, and Lord Suffield, took the oaths and their seats.

Soon after five o'clock the Lord Chancellor entered the house.

The Duke of Wellington, as a matter of form, moved the first reading of the Vestries Bill.

The Lord Chancellor then read her Majesty's most gracious Speech, which was again read by the clerk at the table.

The Earl of Eldon rose, and moved an address to the Crown for the gracious speech from the throne. In doing so the noble earl said that it was his good fortune to have nothing but matters of congratulation to touch upon in the few remarks he had to address to the house; so congratulatory, indeed, that he believed every one of their lordships would willingly agree to the address which he should move. In reference to one point noticed in the previous speech of her Majesty, he was satisfied there could be but one opinion; he referred to the state of Ireland; he was happy that steps were taken most likely to calm the troubled waters of that country, and that speedy justice would soon be accomplished for Ireland. With the result of certain trials going on there he had nothing to do, but of this he was certain, that their lordships would assist and co-operate with her Majesty in preserving peace

THE MOVER AND SECONDER OF THE ADDRESS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

VISCOUNT CLIVE, M.P. SALOP, NORTH.

MR. CARDWELL, M.P., CLITHEROE.

and the legislative union of the two countries, even though extreme means should be deemed necessary for such purposes. He considered that much benefit would be derived from the proceedings of the Landlord and Tenant Commission; which had been appointed—he had the fullest confidence in the commissioners. With respect to the affairs of the East, it gave him sincere pleasure to think that long-existing hostilities in that important part of the world had terminated to the honour of this country. The noble earl then referred, in terms of exultation, to her Majesty's recent visit to the King of the French, which doubtless was accompanied with much advantage to both countries. With regard to China he could not help expressing his grateful feelings to those who had happily succeeded in effecting an honourable peace. In reference to the affairs of Scinde, he would not then detain their lordships, as the subject would, at the proper time, come before the house. The insurrection in the existing districts in Ireland as such as any of their lordships. He held in his hand a extract of a letter written recently in that country by the daughter of a [illegible] there, testifying to the truth of that distress; and they could not [illegible] the minds of all well disposed persons. Touching a subject which was not mentioned in the Speech, viz., the corn-laws, he begged merely to express a hope that protection would be still afforded to the agriculturists of this country. (Hear, hear.) With regard to another topic not mentioned in the Speech, he referred to a melancholy circumstance which took place last year, by which an officer fell by the hands of another; he sincerely trusted that some measure would be proposed by Parliament for the prevention, if possible, of such lamentable occurrences. He should not further detain their lordships, but conclude by moving an Address to her Majesty

The Address was then read; it was, as usual, an echo of the Speech from the Throne

Lord Hill rose and seconded the Address.

The Marquis of Normanby said that he had been absent when Irish subjects had been dealt with during the last session, and he therefore wished to make some observations on that important topic. He intimated, however, his intention of calling the attention of their lordships to the state of Ireland, after the proceeding trials should have been concluded. He considered that Government should have introduced a measure on their own responsibility for the amendment of the law of landlord and tenant, instead of appointing a commission to inquire into the subject. He hoped that Ireland would be treated with strict justice.

Lord Brougham said, he would refrain from any observations respecting the traversers in Ireland pending the prosecution. He paid a high compliment to M. Guizot, in relation to our foreign relations; and as strongly condemned the repudiation system of America.

The Marquis of Clanricarde considered that the mention of Ireland in the Royal Speech was vague and unsatisfactory, and deprecated the appointment of the Landlord and Tenant Commission.

Earl Fitzwilliam then stated that he would on Monday move for returns connected with the employment of the additional military force now in Ireland.

After some remarks from Lord Campbell, in reference to law reform and to the recent unhappy case of duelling

The Lord Chancellor said that in a few days he would introduce a bill to amend the practice in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and in regard to the recovery of small debts; but Government did not intend to interfere with the question of duelling.

The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—Friday.

The house met shortly before two o'clock, when prayers were read by the Speaker's chaplain

At ten minutes past two o'clock Mr. Pulman, Deputy Usher of the Black Rod, appeared at the table, and summoned the house to the House of Lords, to hear her Majesty's Royal Speech read on the opening of Parliament.

The Speaker, who was attended in his state robes, accompanied by the members present, immediately left, and proceeded to the House of Lords. On their return the house resumed

At a quarter before four o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair. The attendance of members was rather numerous; there appeared about an equal number on both sides.

The following new members were introduced: Mr. Wortley, for the borough of Kendal; Mr. Pattison, for the city of London; Mr. Cockburn, for the city of Southwark; Mr. P. Bell, for the county of Lanark; Mr. D. M'Neile, for Argyllshire.

On the motion of Sir T. Fremantle, new writs were ordered for the northern division of the county of Wilts, in the room of Sir F. Burdett, deceased; and for the borough of Devizes, in the room of Mr. Sotheron, who, since his election, has accepted the office of one of the six clerks of the Chiltern Hundreds.

Sir R. Peel entered the house shortly before five o'clock, and was loudly cheered.

The Speaker having read her Majesty's gracious Speech on the opening of Parliament.

Lord Clive rose and moved, that a humble Address be presented to her Majesty, in answer to the Speech which had just been read. The noble lord took a review of all the leading facts in the Royal Speech, and expressed his opinion that every thing must prove most satisfactory to the country at large. It was satisfactory to know that the friendly relations of this country with foreign powers remained unchanged. (Hear, hear.) Her Majesty's recent visit to France would no doubt tend to cement the cordial [illegible] between these two great nations. (Hear [illegible].) He hoped would prove the permanency of the [illegible]. The noble lord then remarked on [illegible] terms and [illegible] countries in that part of the world, under the able management of Sir H. Pottinger, and after remarking on other subjects contained in the Royal Speech, in conclusion moved that a humble and dutiful Address be presented to her Majesty in answer to her most gracious Speech. The noble lord then read the Address, which was an echo of it.

Mr. Cardwell seconded the address in an able and eloquent speech, which was much cheered. The hon. member congratulated the house on the present aspect of the country. Trade and commerce were improving. There was a surplus revenue, and national credit was improving. (Hear.) He most cordially seconded the address so ably moved by his noble friend.

The Speaker then read the address at length, after which.

Mr. Hume rose and said that he had been called upon to return an answer to the Royal Speech within a few hours after it was delivered. He alleged, that although some improvement in our manufacturing interest had taken place, it could not be sustained, if Government, now would the country be relieved from its present destitute condition until the restrictions in our tariff were altered. He regretted, therefore, that no observations in relation to the Corn-laws had been made in the Royal Speech. He urged also, that in the present state of profound peace, a reduction of taxation should be made without interfering with the public creditor. He condemned the Income Tax, and [illegible] all the decrease of the expenditure of the country, especially in reference to the army, navy, and artillery. He also warmly deprecated the course pursued by Government in relation to Ireland, and declared that if the evils of that country were not redressed, he would vote for a Repeal of the Union. He then moved an amendment to the effect that the "provision" laws should be considered and dealt with.

Mr. Crawford then moved an amendment to the address to the effect that no grant of public money should be made until the grievances of the manufacturing population had been inquired into, and relieved.

Mr. Warburton said he should support the amendment.

Lord John Russell opposed the amendment, but said he would bring on his motion in reference to Ireland, immediately after the trials there had concluded. He made marked allusion to the pacific state in which Ireland had been left the late Administration was in power, and observed that he would be much surprised if Government should intimate their intention of continuing the existing Corn-laws.

Sir R. Peel condemned the principle of refusing the supplies as gross and unwarrantable. He congratulated the house on the position of our foreign relations. Government was determined that no new debt should be contracted, and, with regard to the Corn-laws, ministers contemplated no alteration. By the official returns it was evident that there was no material fluctuation in price, and that was a most important matter. He contended that the present laws had the effect of giving uniformity of prices, and resisted the motion of Mr. Crawford's amendment

After a few observations from Mr. Wyse, Mr. Gibson, Mr. V. Stuart, Mr. Villers, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Scarlett, Mr. Mark Philips, Mr. Colden, Colonel Rawdon, and Mr. Hindley, two divisions took place.

The numbers were, for Mr. Crawford's amendment

For the Ayes	53
Against	351
Majority	298

On the second (Mr Hume's) amendment

For the amendment	49
Against it	225
Majority	176

The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Friday.

The house met to-day at half-past twelve o'clock. The attendance of Peers was not numerous.

The Bishop of Lichfield read prayers, after which their lordships waited until nearly two o'clock, without transacting any business.

The Lord Chancellor arrived at the house shortly before two o'clock, when the Peers present left, and went in procession to Buckingham Palace, to present the address agreed to last night, in answer to her Majesty's Speech on the opening of Parliament.

The house, on the motion of the Earl of Shaftesbury, then adjourned until half-past three o'clock on Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—Friday.

The Speaker took the chair at four o'clock. Several petitions on private bills were presented and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Wallace [illegible] and [illegible] from the Register [illegible] "That the practice of [illegible] in the Court of Session in Scotland, in the case of [illegible] is [illegible] in future petitions [illegible] presentation; and that any rule [illegible] accordingly." He [illegible] the [illegible] the petition be brought up [illegible] clerk at the table, the Hon. Gentleman proceeded to say that it was his intention to move, in conformity with the terms of the motion he had just read to the House, that that order be rescinded; but as the question had been often discussed, he did not feel it necessary to occupy much of the public time in addressing himself to it.

Mr. Hawkins fully agreed with his hon. friend. It could not escape the observation of his hon. gentlemen, that there was a growing indisposition on the part of [illegible] petitioning that house, and he, therefore, cordially seconded the motion.

Sir R. Peel felt a little surprised at the observation of the hon. gentleman who last addressed the house, and to be introduced during the proceedings to withhold petitions from the House of Commons. He (Sir R. Peel) did not think that there was any disposition on the part of the people to withhold petitions from the House of Commons.

Mr. Brotherton said he was convinced that the discussion on petitions, when presenting them, was impracticable.

Mr. Wallace said that all he had heard on both sides of the house had not changed his opinion that the people out of the house would be glad to have the rule rescinded. He would withdraw his motion for the present, but at another time he would shew the house that the rule ought to be modified.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

Sir G. Clerk moved the usual sessional orders.

Mr. W. Williams said, some of these standing orders were so much at variance with the practice of the house, that Government ought to revise them. When the house had laid down rules for the guidance of its proceedings, those rules should be strictly adhered to; but such was far from being the case.

Colonel Wyndham defended the aristocracy and the agricultural interest.

After a few words from Mr. Christie and other hon. members, the orders were agreed to.

Lord Clive brought up the report of the Address.

Mr. Sharman Crawford objected to the paragraph about the Union, which was a subject which ought not to be introduced at all pending the proceedings now going forward in Ireland. He moved as an amendment the expunging of all the words having reference to the Union.

After a few words from Mr. Frenchi,

The O'Connor Don considered that the paragraph in question might bias the jury now sitting in Dublin, and thus have an effect upon the trials.

Sir Robert Peel contended that the Address was totally free from anything objectionable.

After a few words from Mr. Blewitt,

Mr. Roebuck denounced the conduct of the Attorney-General for Ireland, in reference to the challenge he had sent to Mr. Fitzgibbon, in very severe terms, and asked Sir Robert Peel whether he meant to dismiss him

Sir Robert Peel condemned the strong language made use of by the member for Bath, in speaking of the Irish Attorney-General. It was impossible to [illegible] which he had been guilty, but it was done in a moment of [illegible] provocation. Ministers had taken no steps, and did not mean to take any, for the dismissal of the learned gentleman.

After a few words from Mr. Wyse, Lord Eliot, and Captain Bernal,

Lord Stanley said that it would be improper to agree to such a motion in the absence of a public officer, a member of that house, and at such a time as the present. Allowance ought to be made for the infirmities of temper which had been so severely and systematically tried in the case of the Attorney-General.

Sir J. Graham opposed the motion, and contended that for the last act done, independently of all his other blameable acts, the Attorney-General ought to be at once ignominously dismissed.

Mr. Ward supported the motion.

Mr. Shaw defended the Attorney-General for Ireland.

Mr. Stock. Lord Ingestre, and others, eulogised his kindness of disposition and his talents as a lawyer

Mr. Brotherton trusted that the house would speedily legislate on the [illegible] practice of sending challenges.

Mr. Curteis condemned the conduct of the Irish Attorney-General, but did not think he ought to be dismissed.

After some observations from Mr. S. O'Brien, Mr. Duncombe made, and subsequently withdrew an amendment in reference to the franchise; and the house adjourned at ten o'clock.

THE PORTRAITS.

Lord Eldon is the grandson of the distinguished Lord Chancellor. His lordship was born in 1805, and married the daughter of the first Lord Feversham. His lordship succeeded to be a member of the House of Commons, as Viscount Encombe, on his noble grandfather being raised to an earldom, in 1831.

Lord Hill is the nephew of the late General Lord Hill, who died at the close of 1842. His lordship was born in 1800, and married the daughter of Joseph Clegg, Esq. His lordship ceased to be a member of the House of Commons, as Sir Rowland Hill, in 1842, on succeeding to the title.

Viscount Clive, who sits for North Salop, is the eldest son of the Earl of Powis; his lordship was born in 1818, and received the honorary degree of D.C.L. from the University of Cambridge, in 1842. His lordship was first returned for the county of Salop, in 1843, on the succession of Sir Rowland Hill to the peerage.

Mr. Cardwell, who sits for Clitheroe, is the son of John Cardwell, Esq., late of Liverpool, merchant, and was born in 1813. Mr. Cardwell was not returned at the general election in 1841, but on petition, in 1842, was declared duly elected, ousting Mr. Wilson. Mr. Cardwell was late a fellow of Balliol College, Oxford; was a double first-class man in 1835; is a barrister, and goes the Northern Circuit.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, JAN. 30.

SPAIN.

The accounts received during the last few days from Spain are far from satisfactory. In Madrid the Progressists have gained a signal victory in the election over the Ministerial party, for the provincial Cortes of Seville and San Jago voted for M. Olozaga. The election for senators was equally unfortunate, the Ministerial candidate having only 9988 votes. The Progressists, elated with their success, openly declare that they anticipate that the present order of things; they hold nightly sittings, and secret agents have been sent into every department. One of their tactics is to get up addresses to Queen Christina, entreating her to return to Spain; they anticipate that her presence will irritate the mass of the people, or that she will be forced to join them in turning out the Ministers, and cleansing the palace of the intriguing Camarilla. Their agents are also circumventing the Basque Provinces, promising a restoration of the "Fueros," provided the Basques openly declare against Narvaez. The army is also being secretly worked, and it is supposed that the resignation tended by General Concha of his high post of Inspector-General of Infantry is in some way connected with these movements.

The nomination of General Serrano as Inspector-General of Cavalry has astonished many of his friends, and even himself, as he was looked on with suspicion by all parties. In Saragossa the Progressists have declared themselves; the militia, notwithstanding the terms of the capitulation, refused giving up their arms, and on the evening of the 22nd there were some disturbances in the fortress: all was, however, quiet on the 23rd, and the arms were taken from the militia. The Ministers, to support themselves, are cajoling the Clergy. Already have they restored the Archbishoprics of Seville and San Jago to their Bishops; and now serious rumours contemplate placing one of the members of the Church in the Ministry, as Minister of Religion. They also promise to re-organise the navy, reduced to one ship of the line, badly manned, and woefully out of repair; there are, however, fit for sea; two frigates, disarmed; nine brigs; two corvettes; three steamers; fifteen coasting schooners; and nine light transports.

Catalonia is again in a state of commotion. Several bands of Carlists have appeared in the mountains.

ITALY.

There has been a great exchange of couriers between St. Petersburg and Rome. On the 15th, the Prince Royal of Wirtemberg was introduced to the Pope by the Austrian Ambassador.

GERMANY.

There is no truth in the report that serious disturbances had broken out in Posen; the arrest of some Russian deserters gave rise to the rumour. More than the last month the number of Russian deserters who have crossed the Prussian frontier has been very considerable.

The King of Prussia has given orders for the foundation of a Conservatoire de Musique, similar to that of Paris; his Majesty has granted for that purpose 100,000 crowns.

FRANCE.

The scenes which have disgraced the Chamber of Deputies during the discussion on the Address will never be forgotten: all parties are to blame—the Minister and the Opposition; the Minister for wishing to brand as infamous the conduct of honourable men, however wild and speculative may be their political opinions—the Opposition for interrupting the Minister for Foreign Affairs when explaining a grave accusation brought against him by the Legitimists.

The Chamber of Deputies has fallen in the estimation of the public—M. Guizot has been greatly blamed. It was a very imprudent act for him to stigmatise the visit to London, when his conscience must have upbraided him with the visit to Ghent. The only difference being, according to M. Guizot's own showing, that he was certain Napoleon would be obliged to fly, but he anticipated Waterloo!—the Legitimists had not the same excuse. The paragraph against the Legitimists, in the ominous words, was carried by the decision of the President, although the number who rose for and against it was doubtful. The important question now took place—the voting of the whole Address—there were 410 members present, 229 voted for the Address, and 180 against it, leaving the ministers a majority of 50. The Legitimists, about 27 or 28, retired; had they voted the ministers would have been in a minority! and this on a vote of confidence, for as much as considered the Address. M. Guizot will not retire, but his position is anything but safe; within the last few days, M. Molé's residence has been visited by many of the most influential members. Yesterday, on the opening of the house, the President read letters from several Legitimists, tendering their resignation as deputies. That from M. Berryer ran thus:—"M. le President,—The last paragraph of the address voted in the sitting of the 27th of January, is, in our eyes, an attack on the independence and the dignity of the deputy. I have, therefore, found necessary to have a second trial on this question, in the midst of the assembly's sittings; and loyal protest was made. We come in our turn to protest, not against the insulting language, which cannot affect us, but against the violence which has been done us, in contempt of our rights and the guarantees of the liberty which was promised us by the declaration of August 7, 1830. Resolved to fulfil all our duties towards those who have elected us, towards our country and ourselves, but visited with a real moral exclusion, it is not on us that can fall the responsibility of the determination which we are obliged to take. I hereby signify my resignation of my functions of deputy of Marseilles.—Berryer." The Marquis de Larochejacquelin, Duke de Valmy, and M. de Lorey were short; they merely said, "I hereby signify my resignation," &c. It is more than probable that all these gentlemen will be re-elected; if so, the position of the house will be compromised. To-day the ministers presented a bill containing nineteen articles, for regulating the police and service on the different railroads.

I have lived in Paris many years, and never remember so dull a carnival—our theatres are deserted, few of our fashionable saloons are open; in short on n'amuse à rien.

The Earl of Westmoreland is giving a series of morning concerts in Berlin. His saloons are honoured by the Royal Family and the élite of the Prussian capital.

It appears certain that the Bishop of Versailles has refused the Archbishopric of Rouen.

M. Barthe has been named Vice-President of the Chamber of Deputies in the room of Count Bastard, deceased.

The funeral of Marshal Drouet, Count d'Erlon, took place yesterday; it was attended by all the Marshals in Paris, the Corps Diplomatique, the Council of State, &c. &c. The pall was borne by Marshals Molitor and Gerard, and Generals Berthe, Zéne, and Barrois.

M. Claude Rodier was also buried yesterday. The pall was borne by the Minister of Instruction and Messrs. Etienne, Lebrun, and Victor Hugo, members of the French Academy.

A serious accident took place on Sunday at the Paris station of the Orleans Railway. The baggage train, with a diligence for passengers, which left Orleans on Saturday night, on arriving at nine o'clock at the terminus, got off the rails. The diligence, in which were seven persons, was overturned, and two of them killed on the spot; the rest escaped without injury.

PRUSSIA.

Berlin, Jan. 23.—Her Majesty the Queen has slept at intervals during the night, the fever and eruption have disappeared, and the latter has begun to scale off.

BELGIUM.

Brussels, Jan. 26.—The papers contain long descriptions of the fête given by the King in the theatre, which was fitted up with great splendour for the occasion. The number of persons invited was 3330.

AMERICA.

The packet-ship Ashburton, Captain Hattleston, cast anchor in the Mersey, at seven o'clock on Thursday evening last. She left New York on the 16th ult., and brought ten cabin and thirty steerage passengers.

Captain Burrows, of the George Washington, died mid passage out, of brain fever. His wife was on board, on delicate health.

On the 3rd ult., in the House of Representatives, Mr. Rhett offered a resolution, instructing the committee of ways and means to report a bill reducing the duties imposed immediately on all articles, by the present tariff, exceed 20 per cent., to 20 per cent., and, within two years, on all articles, to 20 per cent., and provided that such duties shall be levied solely for revenue. The House refused to adopt the resolution by a vote of 87 to 118. There was, also, another proposition submitted, that the same committee revise the present tariff, and report a bill based entirely upon the principle of revenue, which was lost by a vote of 92 to 84. On the following day a notice, by Mr. Tibbatts, for re-considering the vote by which the House refused to adopt the resolution, was again lost. Other efforts were made, during the day, to accomplish the same object by resolutions of various forms, but which, however, were all voted down. Mr. Hughes, of Mo., introduced a bill, which was read, and ordered to be printed, providing for the establishment of a territorial government over the territory of Oregon. In the Senate, on the 5th, a very spirited debate arose on the adoption of the resolutions calling upon the President of the United States to report to the Senate copies of any correspondence which may have been given by the Executive to the American Minister to this country, on the subject of the title to the Oregon territory, since the 4th of March, 1841, and copies of any correspondence which passed between the Government of the United States and ours, in relation to the same subject. The resolution was postponed until the 8th ult.

The message of the Governor of Pennsylvania is regarded as a shuffling, tricky sort of document. He talks a great deal of the resources of the State; and yet, as the New York Herald justly observes, "He gives no excuse for the non-payment of its debts that would disgrace the lowest loafer in the city, or even the worst pickpocket in its own penitentiary."

By the New York papers of the 4th inst. we learn that the Governor of New York had opened the proceedings of that state at Albany in a long message. He states the public debt to be upwards of 23,000,000 of dollars.

SOUTH AMERICA.

Monte Video.—The latest intelligence from Monte Video depicts the extreme wretchedness of that besieged city. Pachoco-y-Obes had called upon the inhabitants, on the failure of Vasquez's financial scheme, for voluntary donations of their jewels and plate, which had been partially responded to. The aid derived from this spoliation will enable the besieged to hold out a little longer than was expected. The news from the armies under the command of General Acquino announces that Rivera, who was leading the Riverastas in person, had been twice beaten, whilst Gomez had driven the remnants of Silva's division into the territory of Brazil, where it was supposed they would lay down their arms.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

THE QUEEN v. HOLT AND BRANDER.

On Monday these two defendants were at the floor of the court to receive judgment on the verdict of guilty, which had been pronounced against them at the sittings of the last term upon a criminal information, filed at the suit of the Duke of Brunswick, for the publication of libels upon his Serene Highness in the columns of the Age. A great many affidavits were put in on the part of the defendants, some of which came from persons residing in the neighbourhood of Chelmsford, where Brander lived. These affidavits gave that defendant a good character, the deponents declaring that they did not believe that the defendant would wilfully be guilty of libelling any one. Brander purchased shares in the Age in 1837; they had not actively interfere in its management. On the part of Holt, it was stated that he had offered to the Duke the columns of the Age, in order to insert therein any refutation he might think proper of the remarks made upon him. Mr. Platt and Mr. Chambers having severally addressed the Court for the defendants, Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, Mr. Kelly, and Mr. Wordsworth, spoke in aggravation. Mr. Justice Patteson, then, at considerable length, delivered the sentence of the Court, consigning Mr. Holt to the Queen's Bench prison for twelve calendar months, and Mr. Brander for three months.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

Suicide of a Young Gentleman.—On Saturday an inquest took place before Mr. Wakley, on the body of William Chantrey, Esq., aged 23, at his residence in Montpelier-row, Twickenham. The deceased was entitled to large property, and had only just completed his studies. It appeared in evidence that John Lockick was passing the deceased's house, when a female servant informed him that she had found the deceased in bed, cutting his throat. He then followed the servant up stairs, and found the deceased in his bed-room, standing before a looking-glass, still cutting his throat with a razor, and the glass and the person of the deceased were covered with blood. The deceased then staggered, and waved his hands and arms to and fro, after which he fell down and died in five or six minutes. Mr. Knaggs, a surgeon, was called in, who said he had no doubt the deceased had cut his throat himself; the wound in his throat was immediately beneath his chin, five or six inches long, and so deep that the root of the tongue was severed. It appeared from the evidence that for some time the deceased had been much depressed in spirits, in consequence of which his sister, who lived with him, ordered the razors, guns, and pistols, to be removed from his room, which was done, with the exception of the razor he cut his throat with, which he must have kept locked up somewhere. The jury returned a verdict, that the deceased had destroyed himself, but there was not sufficient evidence to prove the exact state of his mind at the time he did so.

Dreadful Accident on the Sheffield and Manchester Railway.—On Friday morning last, about half-past ten o'clock, a frightful accident occurred at Dinting viaduct, now in course of erection across Dinting Vale, a short distance from the present Glossop station, on the Sheffield and Manchester line. The viaduct is of great height, and comprises three stone arches, raised from massive abutments or pillars. One of the three arches, partly formed with stone, and resting on the centres and other supports, suddenly moved and oscillated, when, in a moment afterwards, the ponderous erection fell to the earth, carrying with it the immensely large stones already laid towards forming the arch, and creating a fearful noise, resembling the discharge of artillery guns. On the highest part of the centres, when they fell, stood two workmen, who were precipitated among the heavy stones, timber, and mortar. One of the men was killed outright, and his companion, a labourer, had been employed at the spot where the accident occurred in getting ballast for the repair of the line; and at the spot where the train appears to have run off, there has been a sort of temporary road laid down, which was used by the workmen to carry the gravel out of the cutting, and the labourers were at work at the time. The mail train had passed over the spot about an hour before, but fortunately no accident occurred. The engine and tender were both thrown on their sides, and Wm. Scott, the stoker, fell under the former and was killed upon the spot, and it was a long time before his body could be extricated. The engine-driver, a man named William Heaney, was very severely cut and scalded, and has since died in consequence of the injuries he received. Both men are married and have large families. Two valuable bullocks were also killed. An inquest was held on Monday, and after hearing a few witnesses, the Coroner adjourned it for a week.

COUNTRY NEWS

CORNWALL.—Pursuant to advertisement a public meeting of the shareholders and others interested in the construction of a railway through Cornwall, was held on Friday, in the Town Hall, Truro, "for the purpose of receiving a report from the provisional committee, and devising such plans as may be needful for the carrying out this important measure." The Earl of Falmouth was called to the chair. The report stated that Mr. W. M. Tweedy and Mr. Bond had had an interview with the Directors of the Great Western Railway, who informed them that they had determined on giving assistance to a south line from Exeter to Plymouth, and that they would be ready also to give assistance to an extension of the line from Plymouth to Falmouth, but that they would give no assistance whatsoever to a central line from Exeter, through Devon and Cornwall. The committee, therefore, were strongly of opinion, that a south line from Plymouth through Cornwall would be the most eligible, and affording also the best prospect of giving a return for the capital that might be invested. The amount subscribed in the county was stated to be nearly £79,000, a greater amount than had been subscribed towards a railway in any other locality except in Lancashire and London. Much discussion followed, Sir C. Lemon thinking the formation of a company under present circumstances premature. Mr. Pendarves, M.P., Mr. Treffry, Mr. Turner, M.P., and other gentlemen, supported the adoption of the report, which was ultimately carried unanimously.

DOVER.—COMPLETION OF THE SOUTH EASTERN RAILWAY.—On Saturday last, about half-past twelve o'clock numbers were wending their way towards the cliffs to witness the arrival of the first train from London, and a few minutes after the King Lear was seen to emerge from the Shakspeare tunnel, with carriages containing W. Cubitt, Esq., and several assistant engineers, and other persons, who were loudly cheered as they passed the viaduct and the short tunnel under Arch Cliff Fort, to the site of the terminus, where they alighted, after a short stay they returned to Folkstone, and indeed made three trips to and fro. The entire line is therefore now completed.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE.—INCENDIARY FIRES. During the present week information has been received at Bow-street, that some evil-disposed person or persons wilfully and maliciously set fire to a thatched hovel, in the occupation of the Hon. and Rev. H. Tollemache, at Harrington, Northamptonshire. Also, about seven o'clock the same evening another thatched hovel was set fire to in the same lordship, in the occupation of Mr. Wm. Cheney, whereby the hovels were entirely consumed. A reward of £100 has been offered by the Hon. Charles Tollemache for the discovery of the incendiaries. Also, about one o'clock on the morning of Friday last, the 26th ult., a large wheat-rick in the farmyard of Mr. John Mersey, in the parish of Desborough, Northamptonshire, was wilfully set fire to, and the whole destroyed, with a deal of other valuable agricultural property

GREAT FREE-TRADE DEMONSTRATION AT WAKEFIELD.—On Wednesday the promised "demonstration" of the friends of free trade and the abolition of the Corn-laws, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, was made The theatre selected for this truly magnificent display was the noble hall of the Corn Exchange, which was most judiciously and tastefully fitted up for the occasion. Seats were provided for 6300 in all, and the gallery opposite the chair was reserved for ladies exclusively. J. G. Marshall, Esq., presided as chairman; the vice-chairmen being H. R. Stansfeld, George Craven, F. Schwann, and R. Carbutt, Esquires. On the right of the chairman sat Lord Morpeth, D. Gaskell, Esq., Colonel Thompson, George Wilson, — Grimstone, Wilham Hand, George Oxley, F. Baseley, E. Baines, &c. On the left were Richard Cobden, Esq., the Mayor of Leeds, John Bright, &c. The cloth having been removed, the ladies entered the gallery, and were loudly applauded. As soon as order was restored, grace having been said, the Chairman rose and gave "The health of her most gracious Majesty the Queen," which was drunk with nine times nine. The first toast was not given till seven.

IRELAND.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—At the conclusion of the proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench on Monday, Mr. O'Connell appeared in the Conciliation Hall, to be present at the usual weekly meeting of the Repeal Association.

The Dublin Evening Post of Tuesday contains the following curious and characteristic letter:—"To Sir Henry Pell, Bart., Prime Minister, Tavern-st' Bar, Queen's Bench, Jan. 30th, 1844.—Sir Having had great practice in restoring the peace of Ireland among the Terry Alts and Whiteboi, among their midnight woods, and bogs, and mountains, and mountains, during their two insurrections, I hereby volunteer my services in trying to prevent her Majesty's Irish Attorney-General—the first law officer of the Crown (an office held by Illustrious Nursery) from using and threatening physical force against a peaceable man in the Court of Queen's Bench, where her Majesty is presumed to be present in person.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, THOMAS STEELE, O'Connell's Head Pacificator of Ireland."

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

The untiring lessee of this chief of English dramatic establishments thinks his bill of fare never is too good, or, indeed, good enough, for his friends and patrons, so he has engaged the man sui generis who has had no prototype, and is not likely to have a successful imitator —the minutedo John Parry—to sing, or musically unlade his many-sided conversational combinations of science, and his harmless drollery on alternate nights. We have already expressed our opinion, at some length, of this very gifted artiste, and can only add that he is as mirth-provoking in the theatre as he is in any other of his ubiquitous residences.

OLYMPIC.

On Monday last, a long-promised drama from the fertile brain of Mr. Leman Rede, was produced at this house, entitled "The Profligate" and met with unqualified success. The subject of the story is unfortunately, and in the main point, no new one; but, then, it is treated in ingenious combination. The incident of the first act consists in the Profligate, Viscount Ormande's desertion of his lady, and elopement with another. That actus so necessary to the probabilities of modern melodrama takes place, and there is consequently a lapse of eleven years between the first and second acts, when we are conveyed to Naples, where the guilty pair are residing, but not living together. By a convenient accident, which only happens on the stage, it turns out that the forsaken wife of the Profligate is also there with her daughter, who, under the assumption of a foreign name of Signora Violetta, attains to the position of a Prima Donna at the Theatre San Carlos. A young English tourist of fortune falls in love with her, and offers her honourable addresses. The Profligate, however, advises him to carry her off by force, not knowing her to be his own child. This discovery is at last made, the repentant father rescues her from bandits, and a general reconciliation makes all parties happy. There is an underplot of great humour and spirit, which was admirably performed by Miss Lebutt, Mr Fenton, and Mr. Wild. The part of the Profligate was most admirably sustained by Mr. J. Webster. The piece altogether was most effective; abounding in situation, sentiment, and pointed dialogue. The scenery is extremely good. No doubt it will have a long and highly-deserved run.

THE MAGAZINES FOR FEBRUARY.

We are happy to report favourably of this month's Magasinians; for a dull book is as disadvantageous to a journal as it is worthless to a purchaser. The magazines, then, partake of the spring season, and teem with life and pleasantry.

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT is brimful of the author's best writing; he brings Tom Pinch up to London; has leaving Salisbury, the coach, and the road, are all capitally sketched at a railway rate; "the swaggering, ralish, dissipated, London coach, up all night, and lying by all day," is a genuine touch of descriptive humour; but the entire scene at the public breakfast with real Mr. Nadgett is charmingly glanced at, and the light and shade of the pages are really beautiful. Pinch's visit to John Westlock, in Furnival's-inn, is another home for Boz; and Tom's call upon his sister, the governess, is an immense deal, would-be genteel phase. In the next chapter we return to the thread-bare Mr. Nadgett, man of mystery to the Anglo-Bengalee Disinterested Loan and Life Insurance Company.

"Mr. Nadgett made a mysterious change about this time in his mysterious life: for whereas he had, until now, been first seen every morning coming down Cornhill, to effect the business of the day before, so to occasion a popular belief that he never went to bed, or took his clothes off, he was now first seen in Holborn, coming out of Kingsgate-street; and it was soon discovered that he actually went every morning to a barber's shop in that street, to get shaved; and that the barber's name was Sweedlepipe. He seemed to make appointments with the man who never came, to meet him at his barber's; for he would frequently take long walks with him in the shop, and would ask pen and ink, and pull out his pocket-book, and be very busy over it for an hour at a time. Mrs. Gamp and Mr. Sweedlepipe had many deep discourrings on the subject of this mysterious customer; but they usually agreed that he had speculated too much, and was keeping out of the way. He must have appointed the man who never kept his word, to meet him at another new place too; for one day he was found, for the first time, by the waiter at the Mourning Coach-Horse, the House of the Undertakers, down in the city there, making figures with a pipe-stem in the sawdust of a clean spittoon; and declined to call for anything on the ground of expecting a gentleman presently. As the gentleman was not honourable enough to keep his engagement he came again next day, with his pocket-book in such a state of distention that he was regarded in the bar as a man of large property. After that he regularly breakfasted every day, and had a rump-steak to do, the bar-maid engaged emptying a cayenne-caster into it on two occasions. Although he never talked much, still by being there among the regular customers, he made their acquaintance, and in course of time became quite intimate with Mr. Tacker, Mr. Mould's foreman; and even with Mr. Mould himself, who often said he was a long-headed man, a dry one, a sly fish, a deep file, a reaper; and made him the subject of many other flattering encomiums."

The proceedings of "the Disinterested" crew with Jonas, and Tigg, and Montague's wife, must be passed over, though merely to hint that Tom Punch's "going astray" in London occupies the remaining chapter. The number, from first to last, is excellent: each line is full of life, and there is a current of freshness in every page.

THE ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE is various and agreeable both in its text and illustrations. "A Paper on the British Museum" contains some pleasantry and clever quoting of the Egyptian antiquities. "The Broken-hearted Club" is much too long for its merit. "Titus, the Gardener, or the Demon Gooseberry," is a piece of banter on the hobby of gooseberry growing. Dr. Reden has contributed eight pages of "Travel and Tale of Naples." &c. &c., in which a severe parallel is drawn of the deaths of Carsecioli and the Duke of Enghien. We have but space for one quotation:—

TO CHARLES DICKENS, ON HIS "CHRISTMAS CAROL."

Honour to Genius! when its lofty speech
Stirs through the soul, and wakes its echoing strings:
But honour tenfold! when its day-spring first
The selfish heart, and there let loose the springs
Of pity, gushing blood-warm from a breach
Rent in its close-bound, stony coverings.
Yes! tenfold honour, and the love of men,
The kind, the good, attend on Genius then,
And bless and sanctify those words divine.
Such words, Charles Dickens, truly have been thine;
And thou hast earned true glory with all love:
Long may the torch of Christmas gaily shine
Upon thy home, while voices from above
Music thy carol and again impart
Mirth and good tidings to the poor man's heart. W. W. C.

We are glad to perceive that the Editor will resume his "Chronicles of Clovernook" next month.

HOOD'S MAGAZINE, No. 2.—As the Editor did not fall to "take care of No. 1," so he has not neglected its successor. It opens with one of his breathing and burning poems—"The Lady's Dream," in which there is remarkably intense power. The other poetical contributions are by Miss Frances Brown, and Mr. Charles Mackay. Among the prose papers, "Phebe's Widow, a Romance of Crooked Lane," is entitled to prime notice: it is a very pretty tale.

"The Lady's Dream," by the way, is a severe rebuke of the over-worked needlewomen, whose care is only just now awakening public sympathy: a phantom comes to the lady's bedside:—

"And oh! these maidens young,
Who wrought in that dreary room,
With figures drooping, and spectres thin,
And cheeks without a bloom;
And the voice that cried, 'For the pomp of pride,
We haste to an early tomb!'
* * * * *
Alas! I have walked through life
Too heedless where I trod;
Nay, helping to trample my fellow worm,
And fill the burial sod—
Forgetting that even the sparrow falls
Not unmark'd of God!
* * * * *
I dressed as the nobles dress,
In cloth of silver and gold,
With silk, and satin, and costly furs,
In many an ample fold,
But I never remembered the naked limbs
That froze with winter's cold.
The wounds I might have heal'd!
The human sorrow and smart!
And yet it never was in my soul
To play so ill a part:
But evil is wrought by want of thought,
As well as want of heart!"

The illustration to this poem, "The Church-porch scene of Gray's Elegy," is an exquisite engraving by Joseph Williams.

BENTLEY'S MISCELLANY opens, as heretofore, with Mr. Smith's "Scattergood Family," with an illustration by Leech. The descriptive portion of these chapters is even an improvement upon the commencement of the story. The incidents are Scattergood's theatrical engagement—"The Mysteries of Pentonville and Merchant Tailors' School." Here is a sound homely piece of observation:

"There are few more pleasant things in life, in this matter-of-fact conventional world of ours, than taking a child for the first time to a pantomime; there is nothing that re-opens the spring of old feelings and recollections with such a burst of gladness, however closed up and encrusted over the well may be, by rust accumulated from the damp of disappointment, and the chill of worldly buffeting and unrealized hope. Their mirth is truly glorious: glorious from its purity and reality: glorious from its inspiring effects upon our own hopped and garnished spirits. And heaven forbid there should be any whose withered sympathies are not refreshed by it; for they must either be proof against all pleasant emotions, or never have known what a home was, when they numbered no more years than the joyous children around them."

There is an episodal tale in this paper which is of a very superior merit.

The next structure is Mr. Arthur Asher Morrey's "Physiology of London;" though it strongly reminds us of the same writer in another magazine. There is a pleasant gossipy paper, entitled "The Divan," a sort of kitchen-dresser of the number, which will find many readers: it is smart, and droll in places.

THE YEAR-BOOK OF FACTS IN SCIENCE AND ART is a periodical of a very different class to those we have just noticed. It is a historical record of the progress of science during the past year, and contains some hundreds of abstracts of Discoveries and Improvements in Mechanical Science and the Useful Arts, Natural Philosophy, Electrical and Chemical Science, Zoology and Botany, Geology and Physical Geography, and the Astronomical and Meteorological Phenomena of the past year. It is scarcely possible to give the reader an idea of the interest expressed within the 288 pages of this work: it is, at once, sound and attractive; and its popularity is best attested by this being the sixth volume of the series. It is embellished with a portrait of Professor Liebig, and a vignette of Mr. Babbage's Calculating Machine.

DR. SWINEY.

This eccentric person died, under very extraordinary circumstances, on Sunday week, at his residence, No. 9, Grove-street, Camden Town, where he had resided for fifteen years. Strange stories are related of his birth, though he was acknowledged to be the son of the late Admiral Swiney. He was a relative of the great chemist, the late Sir Humphry Davy. His age was about fifty, and after having shaved for the last two years of his beard descending, swept his aged breast." He lived in almost complete seclusion, his house having but another inmate, a female, his housekeeper. He went abroad not more than four or five times a-year. On Sunday morning, becoming unaccountable, his housekeeper called in Mr. Knaggs, surgeon, of High-street, who, having succeeded in rallying deceased a little, prescribed for him, but he would not take the medicine, and died shortly afterwards.

The statement in the newspapers, that he died of voluntary starvation, is incorrect; his disease was of the heart, and to such an extent, that the medical men present at the post mortem examination were surprised that he could have so long survived.

Neither was Dr. Swiney of miserly habits, as has been related; he lived in a respectable street, and his house had every appearance of decent and cleanly comfort, without ostentation. His eccentricity bordered on insanity, so that his will is likely to become the cause of immediate litigation.

Dr. Swiney died possessed of considerable property. He has willed £5,000 to the trustees of the British Museum for the establishment of a lectureship on geology; and a similar sum to the Society of Arts, out of which the first freeholder, whether in England, Ireland, or Scotland, that shall reclaim and bring into cultivation the largest amount of waste land, is to receive one hundred guineas, to be presented in a goblet of equal value. This prize gift is to be renewed quinquennially. The testator has appointed five executors, gentlemen of high eminence in literature, art, and science, to carry out his last requests.

The provisions for Dr. Swiney's funeral were very eccentric. He was buried, according to his desire, on Monday last, in the cemetery of St. Martin's, Pratt-street. From the residence of the deceased to the burial-ground, a distance of upwards of a quarter of a mile, the number of persons congregated to witness the funeral procession was so great, that a large body of police of the S division, under Mr. Superintendent Carter and Inspector Ages, were obliged to be present to keep anything like order. By the will, five girls were to be chosen as mourners by the chief executor; and to each of them was bequeathed a legacy of £20, besides a similar amount to buy dresses for the three. About a quarter before two, the funeral cortège made its appearance; and, agreeably to the will of the deceased, the coffin was covered with yellow cloth, studded with white nails. On getting into the street, a yellow velvet pall, edged with white silk, was thrown over it. Immediately after the coffin came three young girls, the eldest about fourteen years, and the other two about twelve years of age. They were habited in white (according to the will), with violet-coloured cloaks. Their head-dress consisted of straw bonnets, trimmed with white satin ribbon. The dresses had a most singular appearance, the wearers appearing more like a party proceeding to a wedding than mourners of a funeral. After these came the mutes, and then the real mourners, habited, not in yellow cloaks, as previously announced, but in the usual mourning habit. In the order, the cavalcade proceeded to the burial-ground, the crowd being so dense that it was with the greatest difficulty it could proceed, police officers going first to clear the way. On reaching the ground, there was much hissing and hooting. The service appointed for the burial of the dead was read in a very impressive manner by the Rev. Mr. Chaplin, the officiating minister, partly in the chapel and the remainder over the grave. At the conclusion of the ceremony, despite the efforts of the police, the mass of people round the chapel was so great, that the mourners were compelled to return in hired cabs to the late residence of the deceased. The mourners, of whom Dr. Cox was the chief, consisted of the executors and other friends of the deceased.

THE LATE DR. SWINEY.

THE LATE JOSEPH STRUTT, ESQ.

In our paper of the 20th ult., we briefly recorded the demise of this venerable gentleman, which took place at his residence, in St. Peter's-street, Derby, on the 14th ult. He had been labouring under severe indisposition for some time past, but partially rallied, and was present in November last at the Town Council and County Meetings when congratulatory addresses to the Queen and Prince Albert, in anticipation of their expected visit to Derbyshire, were adopted. He was also at the Railway Station, during the presentation of those addresses. The last time Mr. Strutt was seen in public was at a meeting of influential gentlemen under the Derby Improvement Act, on the 12th of December; on which occasion he attended for the purpose of recording his vote in favour of measures for improving the sanatory condition of his native town. Shortly after leaving the meeting, he had a relapse, from which he was not destined to recover. He expressed himself quite prepared for the final event, and arranged the details for his funeral (which he was anxious should be as private as possible, with a few perfunctory duties of the awful change that awaited him, and with quiet submission to the Divine will.

The subject of this notice (in the main abridged from the Derby Reporter was the third son of Mr. Jedediah Strutt, the ingenious inventor of the frame for making ribbed stockings, a partner of Sir Richard Arkwright, and a man distinguished for integrity, industry, and ingenuity. He was born in 1765, married in 1793, and left a widower in 1800. He had universally esteemed and lamented, in his 79th year, and has left one daughter, Isabel, wife of John Howard Galton, Esq., of Hadzor House, Worcestershire.

The lamented gentleman was the remaining partner in the firm of "William, George, and Joseph Strutt," whose high integrity and extensive commercial transactions have made their names familiar in all parts of the mercantile world. The large manufactories at Milford and Belper (now carried on by the descendants of this firm), are remarkable for their pre-eminence in mechanical improvements, and for the attention which is paid to the education and comfort of the operatives.

Throughout his whole career, Mr. Joseph Strutt was a firm friend and liberal supporter of institutions having for their object the promotion of useful knowledge. At Derby, the Mechanics' Institution (of which he was president) and the Lancastrian School enlisted his warmest sympathies, as handsome donations in money, books, and paintings, testify; and he manifested considerable interest in the sabbath-school, connected with the Friar Gate Chapel (which, we understand, he was mainly instrumental in establishing), by giving rewards for meritorious conduct, and entertaining the children, at stated periods, in his pleasure-grounds. The Derby Infirmary, too—a noble charity, which remains a lasting monument of the ingenuity and benevolence of his elder bother, the late Mr. William Strutt, (an eminent philosopher, mechanic, and economist,—was an object to which he evinced much attention. Uniform and consistent in his political opinions, he was also a sincere enquirer after truth; and the same sincerity and independence which distinguished his general character was manifested in his uncompromising assertion of his political principles. Throughout life he was a firm friend to the cause of Civil, Religious, and Commercial Freedom, and the Rights of Industry

The late Mr. Strutt was for some time Colonel of the Belper regiment of Local Militia, a Deputy Lieutenant of the County, an Alderman and a Magistrate of the Borough of Derby, and first Mayor under the Municipal Corporations Act.

The late lamented gentleman, belonging to a family which has been, by their public and private acts—their great enterprise in business—their upright and honourable dealings, and their general benevolence, held in the highest respect throughout this district—himself stood out with a character peculiarly his own, and exhibited a separate and independent kind of excellence. The Christian and charitable institutions, which constitute the truest glory of our age and country, were supported by him with noble generosity; and the extraordinary, the unique gift of the Arboretum, has made the association of his name with the town of Derby imperishable. An engraving of the Arboretum (planned by the late Mr. Loudon) will be found in No. 64 of our Journal.

One feature in the character of the late Mr. Joseph Strutt, which cannot have escaped notice, was his readiness to let others share—and even to invite them to share—the advantages which his wealth and position gave him. Hence his valuable collection of pictures was thrown freely open for the indulgence of the public. Hence, too, a scene of beauty advisedly adapted for healthful enjoyment and recreation, is presented to his fellow citizens, that they might enjoy the advantages usually confined to the wealthy. He had no gratification in the unparticipated pleasures of a gloomy and solitary grandeur. He could not have been happy in such a solitude—his heart would have been imprisoned, and would have drooped for want of a generous communion with his kind. Is not this the truth which thousands can attest? Who has not seen his venerable countenance beaming with kindness and unfeigned delight, while basking on the crowds enjoying the pleasures which his liberality had provided for them? He loved the people, and was delighted to see them happy, and spared no efforts, and hesitated at no sacrifices, which would promote that happiness.

When men like Joseph Strutt are removed, a strong and wide-spread sensation is produced. All men are mourners. Something has been lost which is common to all, and in which all have an interest. It is not the loss of a friend merely—it is a general loss. The influence of such a character spreads far over enlarging circles, until the remotest share of society is reached by its undulations. It does not die with the last beat of the heart which impelled it into motion. It becomes immortal! It is the property of man, and is a rich treasury of that moral wealth which is composed of the accumulated contributions of the wise and virtuous of every age. In the Philanthropist of Derby commerce has lost one of its most honourable representatives, the magistracy one of its most humane and upright members, society one of its greatest benefactors, and domestic life one of its sweetest examples.

THE LATE JOSEPH STRUTT, ESQ.

The remains of Mr. Strutt were interred at eleven o'clock, on Saturday, the 27th ult., in the burial-ground of the Friar-gate Chapel, at Derby. The service was performed by the Rev. Noah Jones, the minister of whose congregation the deceased was a member. The funeral, in accordance with the strict injunction of the lamented gentleman, was a private one, and consisted only of the hearse, the late Mr. Strutt's carriage, and three mourning coaches, containing relations and friends. The shops along the route were closed, as a mark of respect to his memory; and the Mechanics' Institution, of which Mr. Strutt was president, was also closed during the day.

The annexed portrait of Mr. Strutt is from a miniature by Mr. Huslow, kindly furnished by Mr. Thomas Richardson, of Derby. In the accompanying view of Belper, which may be said to have been raised by Mr. Strutt's well-directed energies, a portion of his mansion is shown.

SPLENDID CASKET, PRESENTED TO LORD MORPETH.

It will be recollected that some months ago, an address from a large number of the electors of the West Riding of Yorkshire, was presented to Lord Morpeth, at Stafford House, which had been agreed to after the defeat of his lordship at the last election for that division of the county. It had been intended that the address, with the names of the electors who had signed it, should have been, on that occasion, presented to his lordship in a splendid casket, made for the purpose, and purchased by a subscription raised among these gentlemen; but as the casket was not ready, the address was presented without it. It has, at length, however, been completed. It is a splendid piece of workmanship, and may be considered as highly creditable to the present state of the art of chasing or modelling in silver. The body of the casket is of bog-oak, found on one of Lord Carlisle's estates in Yorkshire, (stained black and French polished), and mounted in massive silver, gilded by the electro-type process. The effect of the black polished oak and the silver-gilt mountings is magnificent. On each side are his lordship's arms in relief, and around are the arms of the twenty-five polling places of the districts into which the West Riding is divided. The lid is surmounted by a lion proper, the crest of his lordship's family, and on each side of this is a scroll bearing the following inscription, "This casket, with the address which it contains, is presented to the Right Hon. George William Frederick Viscount Morpeth, by his friends and supporters in the West Riding of the county of York, in respectful testimony of their sincere attachment to his person, and esteem for his character as their representative in Parliament, and the advocate of a liberal and enlightened policy in her Majesty's councils. A.D., 1841." The dimensions of the splendid testimonial are, from end to end, about three feet six inches by about two feet four inches in height and breadth. It is so made that it can, on occasion, be used as a wine cooler, of which it is a gorgeous specimen. It was manufactured at Leeds, and the cost will be about a thousand guineas.

In our engraving are shown the shields bearing the arms of the respective polling places in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and the number of voters polled upon the occasion which this superb work is intended to commemorate. As only a portion of these shields could be represented in one view of the casket, we subjoin the remaining number in a separate engraving. Rotherham, one of the polling places, had no arms of its own: the artist, therefore, invented a coat, consisting of an iron bridge and a cannon, with crest, two sledge hammers crossed, and motto, the word "Ferrum."

A report of the grand Free Trade demonstration, at Wakefield, on Wednesday last, at which Lord Morpeth was present, will be found in another part of our journal.

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

THE DUBLIN STATE TRIALS

THE JUDGES PROCEEDING TO THE FOUR COURTS.

IRELAND AND THE STATE TRIALS.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

DUBLIN, Jan. 31.

You will have seen ere this that the case for the Crown in the momentous prosecution of Daniel O'Connell and the other traversers was brought to a close much more suddenly than was expected. The evidence which succeeded that of Bond Hughes, Ross Jackson, and Macnamara, was of a more miscellaneous order—proving, however, apparently to the satisfaction of the Attorney-General, as much as answered his purpose—so that the examination of the rest of the hundred witnesses was abandoned, and the case now rests upon the evidence that has already been produced before the public.

The few days occupied by the Court in receiving the additional testimony given, were dull and monotonous in the extreme, being principally spun through with the heavy, tedious reading of eternal documents—the elaborate compositions of the Repeal Association—or the wild orations of the "fell conspirators" in the traversers' box. Newspaper articles too abounded, and the press of Ireland was in a manner revivified, uncoffined, and brought forth from the tomb of the Capulets, to burn and shine upon the dun solemnity of the Court of Queen's Bench. Many an article, long imagined dead and spiritless, now gave up its ghost—many a wreath of poetic laurel, long since deemed faded, or at the best but a chaplet for the Crown of Lethe, was now called back into vernal beauty, and taught, even amid the withering atmosphere of wig and gown, to brighten and to bloom again! Now flashed ancient similes—and hyperbole lost in the lapse of time—back upon the gaze of memory, and their living authors recognising new beauties through the medium of vanity refreshed, might have inwardly glorified the Attorney-General for summoning those triumphs of their intellect from the grave. The association of conspiracy with them might have made their revival a grim pleasure, but a pleasure it was, nevertheless. And we are not quite sure that the same sort of feeling did not communicate itself to the orators as well as to the editors and poets, upon their trial. When some of those grand speeches of sedition which were meant to teach power while preaching peace and while proclaiming loyalty to teach the people reliance upon themselves rather than upon the law—those majestic orations which, however censurable their purpose or suspicious their effect, rolled the sweetness of their persuasion, or the fiery thunder of their invectives, over the very hearts of monster crowds of idolators—of almost millions of devoted and entranced human beings—when their beauty again broke forth to the listening court, and those passages which, for their force and eloquence, had been climaxed by the reporters with the record of a cheer, fell with a sort of fond familiarity upon the ear of the old Repealer—I fancied that I could see pleasant memories of former triumphs revelling in his soul, and the furtive lightning of exultation flashing into his eye, and the approving smile of gratulation creeping over his countenance, as though he were whispering to his inmost spirit—"The law may turn all this into a great conspiracy, but it can never convert it into a bad speech." And such a whisper would be true; but, nevertheless, half the power and the danger of those marvellous appeals and diatribes consisted in the genius in which they were enshrined.

MR. SHEIL, COUNSEL FOR THE TRAVERSERS.

None of the other traversers could have felt the sort of concealed vanity I have been describing with the same flattering force as O'Connell; if I except, perhaps, Tom Steele himself, and Tom certainly was one of the rejoiced in meeting the departed glories of his own oratory face to face again. Tom is a tall, fine fellow; himself one of the "biggest born of earth," and he "upheaves his vastness" in the cause of Repeal with a flourishing sort of enthusiasm, redolent of shilelagh and potheen. Tom's demeanour in court has been full of bustling attention, which shows how completely his life and soul are vortexed in these trials. He would not be out of them for the world. If conspiracy were proved, and beheading were to follow, there is the head Pacificator ready to lose his head! He is bent upon the glory of martyrdom with O'Connell, and nothing will win him "out of that." There is a capital story about him and the Attorney-General going the round of the Four Courts, which I must tell your readers.

On one of the mornings of the trial, Steele was following close upon the heels of the Attorney-General, and asking him some question at the verge of the entrance to the Court of Queen's Bench——

"I tell you what it is, Mr. Steele," said the Attorney-General, turning suddenly upon him——

"What?" hastily inquired Tom.

"Why," resumed the other, "if I catch you following me about, and tormenting me in this way again, as sure as your name's Tom Steele, I'll strike you out of the indictment."

Tom has been ominously quiet ever since. Poor fellow! he was dreadfully alarmed at the idea of not being tried!

One incident connected with the reading of the newspapers was droll enough. The traversers obtained permission to read other passages from the same journals; and the consequence was, an odd melée of subjects, and a pretty love song might be all of a sudden counteracting in burlesque the sedition and disloyalty of "Who cares for Ninety-eight?" For example—

Mr. Vernon then read as follows, to the apparent amusement of the Court as well as the spectators:

> I have watched in delight the fire that flies
> In the lightning flash of thy dark blue eyes,
> As they sparkled in joyous merriment, caught
> From the passing jest to the brilliant thought—
> My beautiful, my own.
> But I have seen a light in them dearer still,
> A softer, diviner radiance, fill
> Their sparkling orbs, was bliss to see;
> 'Twas affection's light, and 'twas turn'd on me—
> My beautiful, my own.

So here was a little love to set off the conspiracy, and vary the monotony of the evidence for the ladies in the court.

En reste—the Crown evidence was of the dullest; the few jokes forced out of the witnesses, or attempted by the counsel in cross-examination, gave no idea of the rollicking, racy perception and development of the ridiculous for which Irish witnesses and Irish courts have been famed since Irish law began. There were a few bursts of fun, but they were faint, feeble, and tittering, and nothing really jolly came out. The truth is, I believe, that political feeling is absorbing every other; and that, in expectation and partizanship, humour has lost all its play.

It is curious to notice how things are tolerated in Dublin, with reference to these great state trials, which in England would not be endured with reference to any trial whatever, in which either the integrity of justice or the liberty of the subject was at stake. But here it would be nonsense to say that the trial is carried on in the Court of Queen's Bench, or by judges and jury alone; it is being conducted through the whole country, by politicians, poets, priests, editors, and the Dublin world at large. The moment the Court is up, there will be a meeting at Conciliation Hall, where all that has been said or done, and whether it was right or wrong, will be as gravely discussed as if silence upon the whole subject were not properly imperative. The papers, Repeal and Conservative alike, do their utmost daily to influence the trials—comment upon the evidence, pitch into the witnesses, dissect the Attorney-General, have a shy at the decisions of the judges, and in short hold the whole Court fair game for all the freaks and vagaries they choose to play off upon it. The jury separate nightly, and go to their respective homes, to enjoy themselves with their families. I do not know that they are forbidden to read newspapers, or talk politics. They may receive warning or threatening letters (one of them has received one), and should any of them (which may not be likely, but it is possible) turn sick or take it into his head to levant from Dublin by the mail-packet—there is nothing to prevent his so doing—and then the trials would be at an end. In the meanwhile, I find the Freeman's Journal of Tuesday coolly attempting to disprove in print the evidence of one witness whom they seek to fix with perjury before his testimony has gone to the jury. The good people do not seem to know or care that every word they write, and every speech they utter—either calculated to influence the result of the trials, or to damage the testimony of witnesses—is a practical contempt of Court, punishable by the Court, and most unpardonably libellous into the bargain. They are left unnoticed, and are free on for their respective opinions with beautiful party desperation, doing that which in England would either procure them peremptory committals to a gaol, or criminal informations without let or end.

All the excitement here seems to merge in the traversers—a fact most glowingly exemplified upon the commencement of their defence by Richard Lalor Sheil.

As soon as it was known that the case of the Crown would close on Friday, and that on Saturday morning Mr. Sheil would speak for Mr. John O'Connell, the anxiety of the community to hear him became earnest and intense, and no exertion was spared by privileged classes to get admission into the court. At no previous step in the progress of the trial had anything like the then agitation displayed itself in Dublin society. Noblemen and ladies of distinction, and officers of rank, public functionaries of "high dignity and importance," wealthy citizens, and reverend fathers of the church, vied with each other in pestering the High Sheriff out of his accustomed courtesy, and ruffling the temper of office into impatience, amid the bewilderment of applications which beset him on all hands. Long before the business of the day began, carriages came rolling into the court-yard, and soon the court itself was crammed, not as before, with mere uncertain crowds, but with a brilliant reception of the rank and fashion of Dublin. The names of some of the leading stars will be found in the newspaper reports—the Times, especially, has accurately described the appearance of the court.

Sheil—to an audience all silence (save when one magnificent burst of power forced from their excited spirits the involuntary utterance of a loud applause)—delivered one of the most splendid orations ever heard within the walls of a court of justice. Perhaps, indeed, a piece of declamation so truly fine, and so perfectly and long sustained, never was heard within such a locality before, for it is not in courts of justice that great political speeches are ever accustomed to be made. I am sure that in an English court it would have been stopped by the judges, for want of hearing upon the case. But with its grandeur as a surpassing effort of noble oratory, of bounding exhilaration, nervous emphasis, over-boiling passion, touching pathos, strong invective, fine plaintive appeal, plausible ingenuity, flowing diction, and flooding fervent poetry, that, in depth and earnestness, almost melted into prayer—with all these signs of the presence of haughty genius, and the abounding mastery of mind, the absence of legal logic and propriety have nothing to do—but the speech—taken as a speech only—is to be considered worthy of being classed with the most beautiful and powerful addresses with which the greatest men of the greatest countries of the world have enthralled their fellow beings in any age or time.

Mr. Sheil (who, it may be noticed, looks immeasurably better in his wig and gown than costumed after any other fashion) spoke with an earnestness of manner truly inspiring. Turning sometimes to the judges, but addressing himself more absorbedly to the jury, whom he immediately faced, he raised his voice to that pitch which is necessary to arm it with its most effective emphasis, and went through his long labour of genius with something of a lion energy that had determined to baffle fatigue. You saw the bodily labour, and felt that the feebleness was in that outward form; but soul came shining through its every gesture, and you knew at once that the indomitable spirit within would carry that body through its physical exertion, even were that exertion tenfold more wearying and deep. The mind had resolved that the body should not be crushed; so the spirit of genius went on with its rushing utterance of eloquence and thought and power, till eyes and hearts were concentrated upon it, as drawn within some dazzling focus; and before those marvellous outpourings an astonished auditory sat entranced and dumb.

Once only came dizzily on a whirlwind of maddened excitement, that could not hold its passion over one passage which in its aspiration after the holiest brotherhood of mankind blended something of the glory of heavenly feeling with the finer humanities of earth; and that wild praise swept over the court like a torrent, until one word from the seat of justice tamed its enthusiasm and shamed it back into its source. When all ended, it is true there was another wild outbreak; but that was the tribute of impulse unto genius, which even the judges permitted when that magnificent oration had closed.

But after doing this glad justice to the great powers which Mr. Sheil evoked, let us look at the matter of the eloquence, and we find it made up of generalities. I declare that I conceive it would have been, by watchful political adversaries, assailed with cries of "Question," even before an admiring Parliament—on the hustings or in the Conciliation Hall it would have been glorious—but in a court of law the wonder is how it was permitted to have been spoken at all. It was in the first place as much a defence of John O'Connell as this letter. With the exception of one or two brief episodes, it defended the father not the son. It addressed itself little or nothing to the general case, and was essentially a speech of politics and not of law. The most curious circumstance connected with it was Mr. John O'Connell's disclaimer of it the next morning in court—I mean of that portion of it which proposed that the English Parliament should come from the Thames to the Liffy, and try their hands at law making on College-green. This the son of the "Liberator" would not stand; he would have nothing less than a Repeal Parliament. Think of a traverser being allowed to tell as much to a jury the morning after his counsel's speech. Cool work this!

About Sheil's oration there is one marvel which I cannot comprehend. It is the fact of his writing it first, and then learning it, and then delivering it to an audience with as much passion and energy as if every word of it were flowing from his breast at the moment, and even boiling to get vent. Yet there is no doubt of this fact. On the present occasion he was two or three days absent from court—upon the plea of sickness—but, in reality, penning and committing to memory that gigantic speech, which it took him on Saturday just six hours to deliver! It was in the hands of one reporter the overnight, the slips printed the next morning before it was spoken, and the printed copy checked from the reporters' gallery while it was being uttered. Sheil himself carefully revised the slips before he would suffer the evening papers to appear with their reports. This, to me, is the most inexplicable part of the whole business—to remember twelve columns of such a speech, and deliver it with little variation and astonishing accuracy, and with deep and passionate emotion beside. It is a phenomenon quite beyond me.

O'Connell was much affected by the speech—hardly daring to listen with open attention—but generally regarding some document or book. He gave, however, here and there, slight indications of opinion, and I could see that in his own bosom there was a struggle going on. A great many persons were moved to tears by some of the more appealing passages of Sheil's oration.

The speech, notwithstanding the hint about the Parliament coming from Westminster Hall, is regarded here as a strong Repeal speech and the attendants at Conciliation Hall are counting upon soon enrolling Richard Lalor Sheil among the members of the present Association, or any future one that O'Connell may set up, should the jury by their verdict declare that to be legal. At a meeting at the Hall on Monday, I heard Smith O'Brien say that "he felt convinced that they would soon have Sheil amongst them—he now felt sure that the time was almost upon them, when Richard Lalor Sheil would forget that he was a Privy Councillor, and remember that he was an Irishman!"—and the announcement was received with vehement cheers. The meeting was a great one, and no less than nine M.P.'s present. Dan made a short but effective address, in which he complained bitterly of the falling off of the Repeal rent; at this he expressed himself much displeased. Dan never did like a failure in the funds of agitation.

Messrs. Moore, Hatchell, and Fitzgibbon have now all spoken for the traversers, and I shall give you a paper upon their respective speeches in another place. They seem to be all pretty strongly animated against the Attorney-General. By the way, you will find an anecdote in the morning papers about a certain missile war of Nuts and Oranges between the members of the Queen's Bench Bar, which you would do well to quote—or, as it tells a little tale of amusement, suppose I do it for you here:

At the adjournment of the court about one o'clock, a scene ensued which could be witnessed in no other than an Irish court. Some unhappy vendors of oranges and gingerbread, impelled by the auri sacra fames, had forced their way into the galleries, when a most desperate onslaught commenced, not only on the contents of their baskets themselves, but on the persons, which were treated with rapidity from their owners to the facetious members of the bar, who, with equal speed, appropriated the contents in propriam usum. It was fully five minutes before their astonished lordships could restore through the gentlemen who filled the passage to the judges' chamber. As soon as the last glimpse of scarlet and ermine had vanished, the fun waxed fast and furious. A regular and well-directed cross-fire of gingerbread-nuts, spice-cakes, and oranges was directed from all parts of the court, the missiles seldom reaching their intended mark, but being generally appropriated volenti by some agile gentleman. The ladies present seemed much amused at this novel specimen of fortnite voracity.

Such frolics would not pass in dull staid London.

The Court is beginning to get gay, and drawing-rooms and levees have commenced. At one of the former (which take place in the evening) our artist made his appearance, and was most graciously received by the Lord Lieutenant and his noble and distinguished company—many of whom allowed him to take portraits. I send you a beautiful drawing of the whole scenes, which, I am told, has been seen and approved at the Castle. I have many other attractions for your engravers to work upon.

On Monday night there was a fancy-ball at the Rotunda; and at the theatre, Lennard, whom you had at the Haymarket, is playing in some of poor Power's Irish characters. There is little general news, and what there is must come in a postscript, for "the mail is on the start."

ELEVENTH DAY.—FRIDAY.

The greater part of the day was occupied in reading extracts from various newspapers and publications both for the prosecution and the defence, and at the conclusion the Attorney-General intimated that the case had closed on the part of the Crown.

Mr. Moore, Q.C. stated, that Mr. Sheil was to have opened the case for the traversers, but for the last two days he had been indisposed, and, under the circumstances, perhaps the Court would think it not unreasonable to let the case stand over until the following day. They had arranged in what order counsel were to speak, and it would be inconvenient to have any other counsel address their lordships, in the first instance, but Mr. Sheil.

The Chief Justice said the application was an extremely reasonable one.

Their lordships then adjourned until the next morning, at ten o'clock.

TWELFTH DAY.—SATURDAY.

Their lordships sat at ten o'clock, in full court. Mr. Justice Burton having recovered from his recent indisposition. At that hour the court presented an appearance which it had not before exhibited, even on the opening day of these important trials. The large gallery opposite the bench was principally occupied by a dense array of ladies, whose fashionable appearance bespoke their rank. The side gallery was similarly filled by members of the judges' and high-sheriffs' families. Beside Mr. Justice Perrin, on the bench, were some ladies of that lordship's family, and the officers of the court resigned their seats in favour of others of the fair and anxious auditors of Mr. Sheil's eloquence. The gentlemen of the bar gave up without the seats reserved to them to such an extent that the space presented but one dense mass of wigs and gowns, while some of the excluded members, in the energy of their despair, made desperate battle to get into the reporters' box, by attempting to unsaddle contests with the police officers outside. Happy seemed the man who could exert interest sufficient to procure admission within one of the narrow passages, wherein he ran imminent risk of suffocation, for the doubtful gratification of hearing an occasional sentence from Mr. Sheil. The hall of the Four Courts, although not to say crowded, afforded nearly a parallel scene of excitement, each barrister whom pressure and extreme heat might have forced from the court, being immediately surrounded by an inquisitive knot of anxious, troublesome inquirers, intent on learning "how Sheil was getting on." Mr. O'Connell, attired in his professional robes, as senior of the Queen's Counsel, by virtue of his patent of precedency, sat at the table beneath the high sheriff, with his back to the bench, and facing the counsel engaged in the case. During the progress of Mr. Sheil's address, the hon. and learned traverser was busily occupied in perusing books and documents. Mr. John O'Connell, also habited in wig and gown, sat beside Mr. Sheil, in front of the other traversers, and fanned the jury. Amongst the occupants of the large gallery were, the "Lion of the fold of Judah," alias John (Roman Catholic) Archbishop of Tuam, and a few Roman Catholic priests. In other parts of the court were the Countess of Donoughmore, Lady Emily Pennefather, Lady Frances Gordon, Lady Anne Wynne, Lady Mary Vyner, Lady Charles Kerr, Lady and Miss Sugden, Mrs. E. Pennefather, Mrs. A. Busbe, Mrs. Fitzgibbon, &c.

The Judges having taken their seats on the bench and the jurors and traversers having respectively answered to their names, the Chief Justice called on the Right Hon. R. L. Sheil to proceed with his case.

Mr. Sheil, having bowed to the different members of the court, said—

My Lords and Gentlemen of the Jury, I am counsel in this case for Mr. John O'Connell. The importance of this case is not susceptible of exaggeration, and I do not speak in the language of hyperbole when I say that the attention of the empire is directed to the part on which you are now assembled. How great is the trust reposed in you!—how great is the task which I have undertaken to perform! Conscious of its magnitude, I have risen to address you, not unmoved, but undismayed; not unmoved, indeed; for at this moment how many of the incidents of my own political life come back upon me. When I look upon my great political benefactor, my deliverer, and my friend; but of the emotion by which I acknowledge myself to be profoundly stirred, although I will not permit myself to be subdued by it, solicitude forms no part. I have great reliance upon you—upon the ascendancy of principle over prejudice in your minds; and I am not without some reliance upon myself. I do not speak in the language of vainglorious self-complacency when I say this. I know that I am surrounded by men infinitely my superiors in every forensic, and in almost every intellectual power; but my confidence is derived, not from any overweening estimate of my own faculties, but from a thorough conviction of the innocence of my client. I know, and I appear in some part not only as an advocate, but a witness before you—I know from my conviction of the innocence of him who stands his accused. The same blood flows through their veins—the same feelings circulate through their hearts. The son and the father are in all political regards the same, and with the latter I have united in no dishonorable companionship for more than half my life in that great work, which it is his chief praises that it was conceived in the spirit of peace—in the spirit of peace it was carried out—and that in the spirit of peace it was brought by him to its glorious consummation. I am acquainted with every feature of his character, with his thoughts, hopes, fears about me. I have, if I may venture so to say, a full cognizance of every pulsation in his heart. I know I am sure as God is my living witness—that from the imaginary misdeeds imputed to him he shrinks with abhorrence. It is this persuasion—profound, impassioned—and I trust that it will prove contagious—which will sustain me in the midst of the exhaustion incidental to this lengthened trial—will enable me to overcome the illness under which I am at this moment labouring—will raise me to the height of this great argument, and lift me to a level with the lofty topics which I shall have occasion to treat in resisting a prosecution to which, in the annals of criminal jurisprudence in this country, no parallel can be found. Gentlemen, the Attorney-General, in a statement of eleven or twelve hours' duration, read a long series of extracts from speeches and publications, extending over a period of nearly nine months. At the termination of every passage which was cited by him he gave utterance to expressions of strong resentment against the men by whom sentiments so noxious were circulated in language so envenomed. If, gentlemen of the jury, his anger was not simulated—if his indignation was not merely official—if he spoke as he felt, how does it come to pass that no single step was ever taken by him for the purpose of arresting the progress of an evil represented by him to be so calamitous? He told you that the country was traversed by incendiaries who set fire to the passions of the people; that the whole fabric of society, according to the Attorney-General, was in a blaze; wherefore then did he stand with folded arms to gaze at the conflagration? Where were the Castle fire-engines—where was indictment—and of ex officio informations what had become? Is there not too much reason to think that a project was formed, or rather that a plot was concocted, to decoy and ensnare the traversers, and that a connivance, amounting almost to connexion, was deliberately adopted as a part of the policy of the Government in order to betray the traversers into indiscretions of which advantage was, in due time to be taken? I have heard it said that it was criminal to tell the people to "bide their time;" but is the Government to "bide its time" in order to turn popular excitement to a useful official account? The public prosecutor who gives an indirect encouragement to agitation, in order that he may afterwards make it criminal—if actually fall upon it, bears some moral affinity to the informer, who provokes the crime from whose commission he ignominious livelihood is derived. Has the Attorney-General adopted a course worthy of his great office and worthy of the ostensible head of the Irish bar, and the representative of its intellect in the House of Commons? Is it befitting that the successor of Saurin, and of Plunket, who should keep "watch and ward" from his high station over the public safety, should descend to the performance of functions worthy only of a commissary of the French police, and that, in place of being the sentinel, he should sink into the "artful dodger" of the state? But what, you may ask, could be the motive of the right hon. gentleman for pursuing the course which he has adopted, and for which no explanation has been attempted by him? He could have obtained no advantage, signally serviceable to his party by prosecuting Mr. Barrett, or Mr. Duffy, or Dr. Gray, for strong articles in their newspapers, or by prosecuting Mr. Tierney, for attending unlawful assemblies. He did not fish with lines—if I may avail myself of an illustration derived from the habits of my constituents at Dungarvan—but cast a wide and many-constructed trammel-net into deep water, in order that by a kind of surreptitious catch he might take the great agitator leviathan himself, a member of Parliament. Tom Steele, three editors of newspapers, and a pair of priests in an unpublished hovel together, are the fish he has taken; but to a prosecution for a conspiracy, which is open to every one of the objections applicable to constructive treason, the acts and the speeches of one man are given in evidence against another, although they could never have been at the distance of a hundred miles when the circumstances used against him as evidence, and of which he had no sort of cognizance, took place. By prosecuting Mr. O'Connell for a conspiracy, the Attorney-General has constructed trammel-net into deep water, in order that by a kind of surreptitious catch he might take the great agitator leviathan himself, a member of Parliament. Tom Steele, three editors of newspapers, and a pair of priests in an unpublished hovel together, are the fish he has taken; but to a prosecution for a conspiracy, which is open to every one of the objections applicable to constructive treason, the acts and the speeches of one man are given in evidence against another, although they could never have been at the distance of a hundred miles when the circumstances used against him as evidence, and of which he had no sort of cognizance, took place. By prosecuting Mr. O'Connell for a conspiracy, the Attorney-General has given him exactly what he desired—the critical hour. In

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SUNDAY, Feb. 4th.—Septuagesima Sunday.
MONDAY, 5th.—St. Agatha.
TUESDAY, 6th.—Sun rises 7h 27m.
WEDNESDAY, 7th.—Sun sets 4h 53m.
THURSDAY, 8th.—Mary Queen of Scots beheaded, 1589.
FRIDAY, 9th.—Property Tax abolished, 1815.
SATURDAY, 10th.—Queen Victoria married, 1840.

HIGH WATER at London-bridge, for the Week ending Feb. 10.

Monday.		Tuesday.		Wednesday.		Thursday.		Friday.		Saturday.
M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.
h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.
2 16	3 3	3 23	3 52	4 9	4 47	4 57	4 56	5 15	5 35	5 56	6 18

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.
TERMS, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

	£	s.	d.
Per Quarter	0	6	6
Half Year	0	13	0
One Year	1	6	0

May be had of all Newsmen and Booksellers, or at the Office, 198, Strand.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A Subscriber from the Beginning."—Manchester.—Mr. Shell filled the office of Vice-President of the Board of Trade, under the Melbourne Administration.

"J. B. C." and "A Constant Subscriber" should pay their subscriptions in advance, when they would be charged 6*d. each copy.*

"C. R. B."—Sevenoaks.—The mail for the East Indies is made up on the 4th of each month, via Marseilles; postage, 3 ounce, 1*s.* 10*d.; under* ½ ounce, 2*s.* 8*d.; also on the* 1*st of each month, via Southampton, postage* 1*s., not exceeding* ½ ounce; in each case prepaid.

"Wisbory."—Certainly.

"Alfred."—We have not room for the sketch of Camden Chapel.

"A. Z."—Gravesend. We shall be glad to receive the information.

"Y. O. S."—The Cabinet Cyclopædia.

"H. C."—Langton."—See Tredgold on the Steam-engine.

"A Subscriber" should first send the solution of the enigma—"I sit on the rock."

"W. H. B.,"—King William's College, Isle of Man, is thanked, but will perceive that we anticipated the subject in our last.

"Dusender."—All pressed we have not room.

"W. W."—Monaghan.—We cannot admit the engraving of a fire on the 13*th ultimo.*

The anecdote of the late Sir Francis Burdett, from Cork-street, arrived too late.

"Julap."—The engraving shall appear shortly.

"One of our Subscribers" will find the lists in the almanacs, peerages, &c.

"T. K. B.", Harrow.—We do not answer questions respecting cards.

"F. M. F."—To save a map of Continental railroads at present would be premature.

"Agatha."—The portraits may appear incidentally.

"M. W.," Barnstaple.—The view has been engraved, and shall be inserted whenever opportunity occurs

"Henry Campen" should watch our journal. The opera of the "Maid of Judah" is made up from the works of Rossini.

"J. H.," Derbyshire.—The number in question may be sent to any part of the United Kingdom postage free.

"Ellen."—Omnibus is in itself an Anglicised Latin plural noun.

"H. J.," Trotsiger-square.—The portrait shall appear. Will our correspondent send a memoir? We must, however, decline the offer in the postscript.

"W. D."—We have not room.

"J. S."—See our paper of last week.

"Gen. B."—The portrait may appear shortly.

"T. S. D.," Cork.—The subject shall be engraved.

"E. G. C." should apply to a director of the railway in question.

"A Constant Subscriber," Bath.—We have not at present room for the portrait.

"J. G. Bruckley."—The translations will not suit, as we only insert original tales in our journal.

"Delta," Cork.—The omission of the portrait of Mr. Sergeant Warren from the coloured fan for the Queen was purely accidental.

"S. D. L."—The nonsense on the New Year will not suit.

The following are unadmissible.—The Lover's Call; Our Young Prince, by "S. B.;" The Aerial Phenomenon, by "W. W. B.;" I cannot, oh no, never, by "Janet;" Conundrum, by "C. S.;" Impromptu, by "A Subscriber;" Lines to a Brother, by "G. B.," Winchcombe.

"Her Publicus"—Thanks

"Ursula" (!) is informed that there is no recipe or formula of prescription for "the composing of music of songs." At the same time we shall mention some necessary, indeed indispensable, ingredients, of which a good song should be compounded, viz.:—

A thorough knowledge of harmony—
An intuitive sense of melody—
An inclination to poetry—
And talent to make them all agree!

"Rook."—The following are some of the cases which constitute a drawn game.—1st. Stalemate. 2nd. Where one party can give perpetual check, and persists in doing so; 3rd. Where neither party has sufficient force left to checkmate the other; 4th. When one party has king alone, and the other is not able to checkmate him in fifty moves. For further particulars see Walker's Treatise on Chess

"Tiro."—Of course you are not obliged to play your king's pawn. The kings cannot be placed upon adjacent squares.

"D. C."—Either of the pawns could be taken en passant. We have not at present room for the game.

"R. B. R.," Harrow.—The king can castle if he has not moved from his square.

DUBLIN STATE TRIALS.—The illustrations will be continued next week, and throughout the proceedings.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1844.

THE CHALLENGE AT THE STATE TRIALS.

The Irish trials have assumed a new and degrading feature—it is that of rancorous and unjustifiable personality. From the accounts we have of the occurrence, it would seem that one of the results of this argumentum ad hominem, so disgraceful to the bar, has been the passing of a challenge, almost in open court, from her Majesty's Attorney-General to one of the Queen's Counsel engaged in the defence! In the fine old days of Irish eccentricity, when duelling was one of the necessaries of Hibernian existence, and a breakfast seemed hardly digestible without it, we have known, in the persons of their respective Judges, the Court of Queen's Bench to go out to a morning encounter with the Common Pleas, but we thought that such indecorums had vanished before the breath of civilization and the march of mind, and that in the nineteenth century a Court of Justice could never again become the preliminary to a field of blood. There is no counting, however, upon the contingencies of human infirmity; and making such allowance for mortal error as man should ever make for man, we shall endeavour to regard this most serious matter in its proper light, and respectfully to place it in that light before our readers. And here we may notice, that it is from England only that we can expect anything like justice of remark upon the occurrence, for in Ireland it is converted merely into a paltry weapon, which the press of Dublin is wielding with ferocious malignity, to add to the excitement that already prevails respecting the traversers' trials. It is well that we can be more calm and reasonable here. But now to the topic of the Attorney-General's note to Queen's Counsel Fitzgibbon.

It would appear, that during a temporary adjournment of the Court, the Attorney-General conveyed to Mr. Fitzgibbon, in a moment of passionate exasperation, a letter, calling upon him to retract some strong personal observations that he had made in Court, or to name a friend.

Now, first, we deprecate the course of a challenge at all. Our opinions upon the subject of duelling were sufficiently made known in the recent melancholy case of Colonel Fawcett, and the public are aware with what earnestness and sincerity we deprecate it upon the grounds of religion, morality, and humanity alike.

We shall deal, however, with the case in question, without reference to these strong objections.

And at once then we express, most unequivocally, our unqualified disapprobation of the Attorney-General's conduct. That a first law officer of the Crown—entrusted with the temperate (and hitherto he has been temperate) conduct of one of the most important prosecutions within the history of human laws; called upon calmly and dispassionately to prove, in the name of his Sovereign, the existence of a conspiracy for the dismemberment of her empire; that an officer so placed, and with such heavy responsibilities upon him—accustomed, moreover, to the restraints of courts of justice, and the preservation of their reverential dignity—should have lost in anger all consciousness of the greatness of his duty, and with what lofty magnanimity and evenness of temper it ought to be performed—should have degraded his office by yielding to the impulses of pride and passion, and, losing the dignified counsellor in the erring man, have suddenly forgotten himself, his Sovereign, and his court, and condescended to the intemperance of challenging a counsel for the defence—is a misfortune in which so much of fault is blended—is a matter so censurable, as well as lamentable—that, for the sake of public morals, we will not flinch from expressing our deep sorrow for, and unhesitating condemnation of, an exhibition so humiliating, so shameful, and so sad.

Secondly, we feel regret at being obliged to condemn the Attorney-General upon another point. Suppose, that instead of abrogating them as we would utterly—suppose we were to admit into our code those false laws of honour which have been unhappily written in blood, and hold to the nice shades and distinctions which they require in those who obey them—should we not then have to complain of their violation by the Attorney General's note? If he were justified by those laws in sending that note at all, it should have contained only a demand that the expressions which had chafed him should be withdrawn. But he made the fatal mistake of coupling with that demand the alternative of naming a friend—as if any gentleman could make a retractation of anything he had said—no matter how false, or gross, or aggravating, under the insulting alternative of a threat. He thus put it in the power of Mr. Fitzgibbon to say, "he comes to me, pistol in hand, and asks me to retract," and then emphatically to add, "I never will."

And now, not having spared the Attorney-General, let us see what reasonable allowance may be made for the violence of his feelings at the moment, and if there are not several other parties to blame. And, seriously, we think we can make out a strong case against the counsel for the defence, if not in some measure even against the Court itself.

It has been with great regret, that during the whole progress of the state trials, one of the most strongly apparent objects of the traversers' counsel has been to surprise into temper the natural irritability of the Attorney-General, and to provoke him into some undignified display of anger if they could. They have left no course of petty annoyances untried to achieve this—in vexatious motions—futile arguments to gain time—upon cross-examination—hints, insinuations, sneers, and finally, direct and vigorous attacks in their violent speeches for the defence. We are not going to explain to the public at large (as Dublin public already understand it well), one allusion in Sheil's oration which admits of two interpretations, and in England will be regarded merely as playful satire. But if it was a hit, as it is held to be, it hinted at private life, and was an unfair hit; and we do not hesitate to add, that it was ungracious and ungentlemanly too. It was, in fact, more smart than honourable. Wounded on not by this light artillery on the first day, on the second he had to withstand the heavy cannonading of Mr. Moore, who poured down upon his head a storm torrent of professional enmity which could hardly fail also of involving private feeling in its course. Last of all—and as if to climax all—came hard, unbending, stern, earnest Fitzgibbon, speaking loudly, slowly, violently, deeply, and almost uttering thunder, as he swept his energies along. Mr. Fitzgibbon is a bold, uncompromising orator, but his matter and his manner strongly border on the offensive whenever he has invective to pour out; and in the case of his attack upon the Attorney-General, we do not hesitate to say, that if he did not mean personality, he talked personality, and was bitterly insulting—insulting in the last extreme!

Let us prove our words. We cannot pause to quote those long and caustic diatribes against law officers of the Crown who had been formerly vindictive and corrupt, and the application of whose bad characters to the Attorney-General, everybody (undeserved as it was) felt to be intended; but we content ourselves with instancing a single passage to justify our remark.

> Gentlemen, if there exists a case in which a lawyer of the meanest order, in euing the law, is bound to cite it, candidly and fairly, that case is the case of a state prosecution. If there be a case in which common humanity requires that the law should be fairly and candidly cited, it is a case where a man of my own rank—of my own profession—who was for nearly half a century an ornament of that profession—who was for nearly half a century, without any disparagement of myself, my clearly admitted superior in all particulars of professional excellence—if there be a case in which every ennobling feeling that belongs to the human kind in any heart where feeling has found a footing, it is this case, where a man in the discharge of a public duty has the painful task imposed upon him of driving into a prison—to else out in miserable wretchedness the evening of a long life—his brother barrister—his fellow-man—who has nearly completed that measure of human life that is said to be its full extent, and to cowsign him to eke out the little of that life that now remains, in the cold and freezing atmosphere of a dungeon. That is the case where such ought to suggest fairness and candour, if any had been. That is the case in which I would go standing to defend myself against my brother barrister if it should be his duty, as Attorney-General, to prosecute me? That is the case, in which I, conscious of innocence, would say to him, my brother, do your duty—do it like a man—strike hard, but strike fairly! I would say to him strike fairly, but if you strike below the belt, I repeat it, although I succeed in carrying your trenchcoat blow, you are no longer a man entitled to any respect, or entitled to any quarter. Am I, gentlemen, because I am not here in my own case, am I not to fight this battle as I would fight it for myself? Gentlemen, it may be productive of bad consequences to me in my career to do so—but I shall never eat the guilty bread which is earned by professional subserviency. I shall not retire to rest upon my pillow borne down with the remorseful feeling that I was an example of turpitude, as I should if I would not say over and over again every word that I am justified in saying, and in saying, because I am justified in feeling it. SUCH, GENTLEMEN, HAS BEEN THE CONDUCT OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL IN THIS PROSECUTION.

Now, we ask, was ever language more wickedly violent or more intolerably unjustifiable than this? Is it fit language to use from Bar to Bar? Is it either noble or generous or just to be used against a man whose private virtue is proverbial, and whose professional honour has been always unimpeached? Would not those burning words of shameful stigma boil the feeling in any breast that was not frozen? And are they not quite enough to plead an allowance, even though sterner justice will not admit of an excuse?

We will speak out. Mr. Fitzgibbon was to blame certainly, but we think the Court was to blame too. We think the Court should have protected the Attorney-General, have stopped the utterance of such language, have informed the learned counsel that he was going too far, and so have evoked from him that disclaimer of intentional personality which he afterwards thought it just to make. That would have been the proper course to have taken, and that course would have soothed the anguish of the Attorney-General, and preserved the dignity of the Court.

We were glad afterwards that the gentlemanly interposition of Mr. Moore rescued all parties from the dilemma, and that the Court was glad to avail itself of gentle influences to lull the storm which it should never have permitted to have raged.

We refer our readers to our reports for a character of the speeches of Messrs. Moore and Hatchell upon the Irish Trials. It will be seen that the former gentleman addressed himself more to the law points of his case than his predecessor in the defence, and that Mr. Hatchell has the merit of having more avoided generalities, and devoted himself to the immediate interests of his particular client, although his address, in that respect, was something in the nature of an appeal ad misericordiam.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite, and the household, attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Rev. Lord Wrottesley Russell and the Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated. The Earl of Liverpool arrived on a visit to her Majesty on Saturday.

MONDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert walked for some time in the royal pleasure grounds. His Royal Highness afterwards, accompanied by the Earl of Liverpool, enjoyed several hours' shooting in the royal preserves at Sunley. Sir Robert Peel arrived at the Castle, on a visit to her Majesty and Prince Albert. Lord Stanley also arrived. Mr. Davis came to the Castle in the forenoon, to take leave, previously to his departure for China. The above distinguished visitors dined and slept at the Castle. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent and Lady Fanny Howard joined the royal dinner party. The band of the Grenadier Guards was in attendance.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked on the Terrace and in the grounds about the Castle, for some time this morning and afternoon. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice were taken their usual airing. Sir Robert Peel left the Castle early this morning for town. Viscount Canning has also taken his departure. Viscount Hawarden has succeeded the Earl of Warwick as the Lord in Waiting on the Queen, and Mr. R. Ormsby Gore has succeeded Captain Meynell as the Groom in Waiting on her Majesty. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent and her Lady in Waiting joined the royal dinner party at the Castle in the evening.

WEDNESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess Royal, attended by the Royal suite, arrived at the terminus of the Great Western Railway, at Paddington, yesterday afternoon, by a special train from Slough. The Royal party immediately entered three of the Queen's carriages and four, and proceeded to Buckingham Palace. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Princess Royal, and Viscountess Canning (Lady in Waiting) were in the first carriage; Major-General Sir Edward Bowater (equerry in Waiting on Prince Albert) and Mr. R. Ormsby Gore (Groom in Waiting on the Queen) occupied the next carriage; and Lady Caroline Cocks and the Hon. Miss Frances Devereux (Maids of Honour in Waiting and Viscount Hawarden (Lord in Waiting) followed in another carriage. A party of Light Dragoons formed the escort of the Royal party from the Paddington terminus to Buckingham Palace, where the illustrious party arrived at six minutes past three o'clock. At half past three o'clock her Majesty held a Privy Council at Buckingham Palace. It was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert; Lord Wharncliffe, Lord President; the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Privy Seal; the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Right Hon. Sir Edward Knatchbull, the Earl of Haddington, the Earl of Bayon, Sir Henry Hardinge, Sir Edward Knatchbull, the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl of Delaware, and the Marquis of Exeter. The Queen a speech on opening the session of Parliament was arranged and agreed upon. Her Majesty gave audiences to Sir Robert Peel, Lord Wharncliffe, the Earl of Aberdeen, Sir James Graham, [illegible] DRURY-LANE THEATRE.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert attended by a numerous suite, honoured Drury-lane Theatre with their presence on Thursday evening. The performances selected for this auspicious occasion, consisted of Balfe's opera, the "Bohemian Girl," and the Pantomime. Her Majesty frequently testified her approbation of the music. The conditions of loyalty and fidelity to the sublime departure of her Majesty at the conclusion of the opera. Her Majesty, however, re-entered her box at the commencement of the pantomime, and this re-appearance excited the audience to a fresh explosion of cries for "God save the Queen." At length her Majesty responded to the cordial manifestations, and came forward to bow her acknowledgments to the vast crowds who thronged every portion of the theatre. After the audience sang the National Anthem. Her Majesty and the Princess Royal (herself as Payne's impersonation of Carlotta Grisi, and retired shortly after the salutatory display.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE QUEEN'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS OF THE DUBLIN CORPORATION.—The deputation, with the Address of the Dublin Corporation, waited on her Majesty at two o'clock yesterday. The following is the answer:—

"I receive with satisfaction the assurance that sentiments of loyalty and attachment to my person and Crown continue to be cherished by you. The legal proceedings to which you refer are now in progress before a competent tribunal, and I am unwilling to interrupt the administration of justice according to law. It is at all times my anxious desire that any grievance, of which my people can justly complain, should be speedily redressed, and I confide in the wisdom of the Parliament of the United Kingdom for the adoption of such legislative measures as may be necessary for that purpose."

ACCIDENT TO THE QUEEN'S CARRIAGE.—It may not be generally known that during the passage of the Queen's carriage in the state procession to open Parliament on Thursday, when nearly opposite the Duke of York's column, the harness which connects the near leader of the eight cream-coloured horses, broke. The animal began to prance, and the carriage was therefore stopped in the most dense part of the crowd, when Inspector Lincoln, of the D division, stepped forward, and with some strong twine repaired the damage. One of the horses placed his heavy hoof upon the ankle of the inspector's foot, but without doing him any injury. Her Majesty, however, very kindly inquired whether he was injured, before she would [illegible]

HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF HANOVER has presented Colonel Sir Neil Hares with the Decorations of a Knight Commander of the Royal Hanoverian Order, in consideration of his meritorious services, with the allied armies, in Germany and in Hanover, during the campaigns of 1813 and 1814.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND.—The paragraph in her Majesty's Speech referring to the option of Parliament to revise the Charter of the Bank of England after due notice, as therein provided, has excited a degree of interest in the City second only to no other topic introduced. From the tenor of the paragraph it is taken for granted that Ministers will take the initiative of any alteration which they judge prudent.—Morning Herald.

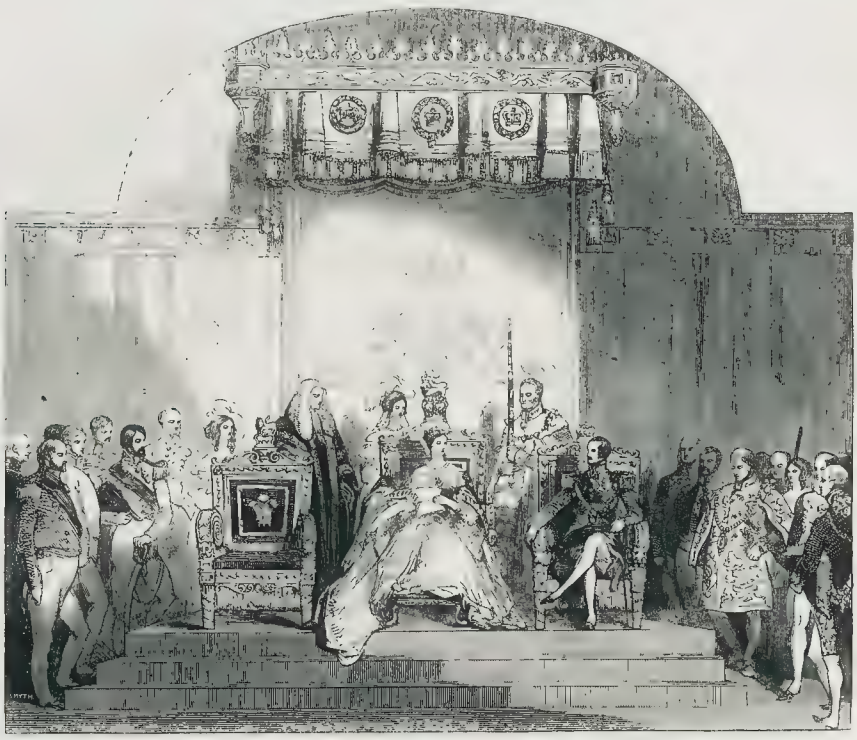
POLICE.—BOW-STREET.—POCKET PICKING IN THE PROCESSION.—The usual accompaniments of a procession in London were apparent at this office on Thursday and Friday. A host of youngsters, and men, were brought before the magistrates, some were committed for trial, some remanded, but in no case were any discharged. Most of them had several handkerchiefs about them, but in one case the incredible number of twenty one were found upon one person. The fellow actually attempted to pick the silkmercer of an officer of the Life Guards, which hung by his side, of his handkerchief, which slightly protruded.

EMBEZZLEMENT.—At Union-hall, yesterday, a man, named William Tait, was committed for trial, for embezzling the sum of £6 18s., the property of his employers, Messrs. Cottam and Hallen, iron-founders, in the Cornwall road.

MANUFACTURE OF BANK NOTE FORGERIES.—The prisoners concerned in this case [illegible] underwent their final examination. Mr. Dorey looked very ill, and appeared to suffering severe pain. The evidence criminating the [illegible] produced was the identification of Mr. Dorey's handwriting, under several assumed names. The prisoners were again remanded for a fortnight.

FIRE.—On Thursday, at a few minutes past twelve o'clock, the upper part of the Red Lion public-house, in Batty-street, Commercial-road East, was discovered to be on fire, and an alarm being quickly given, the engines from Wellclose-square and the other Brigade stations arrived, and by the exertions of the firemen, and a good supply of water, the flames were subdued. The fire originated in a closet on the third floor, which is close to the brick work of the bar chimney. At ten o'clock at night another fire broke out in the premises belonging to Mr. Foster, watchmaker, carrying on business at 19, Henry-street, Pentonville. Flames were first discovered in the show-room, in which a great number of valuable chronometers and watches were deposited. An alarm having been raised, several of the inhabitants hastened to the spot, and rendered great service in preventing the fire from extending. Several engines soon arrived, but fortunately the fire was got out without calling them into operation. The damage done is rather considerable, a number of watches being destroyed. Mr Foster is insured in the Licensed Victuallers' Fire Office.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.



THE THRONE IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—H. M. MAJESTY'S SPEECH.

We here present our readers with a series of engravings of the principal state ceremonies of the opening of Parliament, by her Majesty in person, on Thursday last. The extraordinary interest attached to this event has induced us thus copiously to illustrate its principal scenes or stages, so as to place upon picturesque record the pageant for the people; the royal procession through the superb gallery into the House of Lords; and the regal state of the Sovereign seated on her throne, a spectacle of almost unparalleled magnificence.

The engraving at the foot of the next page, however, represents a form performed on Thursday morning, viz.—the searching of the vaulted cellars under the House of Lords, wherein Guido Fawkes and the other gunpowder conspirators were detected one two hundred and forty years since. The search is made on every occasion of the Sovereign meeting the Parliament: it is conducted with some approach to state, by the Usher of the Black Rod and his officers, attended by torch-bearers, yeomen of the guard, &c., as shown in the engraving.

HER MAJESTY'S STATE PROCESSION.—WHITEHALL.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

THE PROCESSION IN THE ROYAL GALLERY.

The next illustration, "to follow the order of time," represents the progress of her Majesty in state, at the moment of the procession passing the Horse Guards. The weather, which was, on the previous day, exceedingly inclement, at night suddenly cleared up, and a sharp frost set in; the consequence was that the Queen's appearance was on Thursday marked by the fine weather which has always been observed to attend her Majesty's appearance in public on state and other occasions.

Her Majesty, having proceeded in state from Buckingham Palace, arrived at the House of Lords at a few minutes before two o'clock, amid the cheers of her assembled subjects and a royal salute of twenty-one guns.

The Queen, who looked remarkably well, having robed, entered the House, accompanied by the great Officers of State and of the Household, passing through the royal gallery in the order shown in the engraving on page 73.

The doors of the House of Lords were opened at twelve o'clock for the admission of those who had tickets from the Lord Chamberlain. The body of the House was soon afterwards filled by Peeresses and other ladies having the privilege of the entrée, who occupied all the back benches on both sides of the House. The Strangers' Gallery, and the Gallery of the Members of the House of Commons, were also occupied by ladies. Plumes were generally worn by the ladies, but there was not such a display of jewels as sometimes seen. The first Peer who entered the House was the Earl of Shaftesbury. His Lordship arrived shortly before one o'clock. The noble Earl was almost immediately followed by the Duke of Wellington. His Grace, who was dressed in a Field Marshal's uniform, and wore the riband of the Garter, appeared in excellent health and spirits. Lord Chief Justice Tindal, accompanied by Mr. Baron Parke, Mr. Baron Alderson, Mr. Baron Gurney, Mr. Justice Coleridge, Mr. Baron Rolfe, Mr. Justice Erskine, Mrs. Justice Maule, Mr. Justice Wightman, and Mr. Justice Cresswell, took their seats shortly after one o'clock. The Bishop of London arrived after the Judges. The side galleries were principally occupied by ladies. In that to the right of the throne there were several illustrious foreigners, amongst whom we observed the late Regent of Spain, General Espartero, who appeared to take a deep interest in the proceedings. Among the earliest arrival of Peers were the Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Abinger, Lord Campbell, and the Marquis of Clanricarde. His Excellency the Count St. Aulaire, the French Ambassador, arrived at half-past one; he was followed by the Turkish Ambassador, the splendour of whose costume attracted very general attention. The Austrian Ambassador, the Prussian Ambassador, the Russian Ambassador, and the Ministers of the other Foreign Powers, shortly afterwards entered the House, and took their places under the gallery on the right of the throne. The Lord Chancellor entered the House at twenty minutes before two. His lordship looked well and walked firmly. He seemed to have recovered completely from the effects of his recent indisposition. At a quarter before two o'clock, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge arrived. At two o'clock the firing of the Park guns, and the flourish of trumpets announced the arrival of her Majesty, and five minutes afterwards the royal procession entered the House in the usual order, preceded by the heralds in their tabards; the Duke of Buccleuch bore the crown, and the Duke of Wellington the sword of state.

Her Majesty, who leant upon the arm of Prince Albert, looked extremely well. Her Majesty's train was borne by the Duchess of Buccleuch, the Mistress of the Robes, assisted by other ladies.

THE SEARCH IN THE VAULTS OF THE HOUSE OF PARLIAMENT.

household. Her Majesty took her seat on the throne. The Duke of Wellington, bearing the sword of state, stood immediately on her Majesty's left hand. Prince Albert sat on her Majesty's left hand.

Her Majesty having desired all present to be seated, directed the Usher of the Black Rod to summon the House of Commons to the bar. The Speaker, attended by several members of the House of Commons, shortly afterwards made his appearance, when her Majesty, in a clear and distinct tone of voice, read the speech, which was handed to her by the Lord Chancellor with the usual ceremonies.

Upon reference to the engraving of the throne, it will be seen that one of the royal chairs is wanting, and bears the arms of the three ostrich feathers, the crest of the Prince of Wales; such provision being made in the House of Lords from the period of his receiving the title. The corresponding chair is filled by his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

THE DUBLIN STATE TRIALS.

Continued from page 70.)

Swift addressed to them a pamphlet, called "Seasonable Advice;" the bill was rejected; and, Scott, "thus victoriously terminated the first great struggle for the independence of Ireland." To which Lord Flood and Grattan indicted for conspiracy in 1782? The English Minister had learnt a lesson from adversity. The colonies were lost, but Ireland was saved by the timely recognition of the great principle on which her independence was founded. If the Irish were 5,000,000 Protestants, would they be used as they were? They were prevented from co-operation in a single object by their wretched religious distinctions.

Fatal, disastrous, detestable distinctions, said the right hon. gentleman—detestable, because not only were they repugnant to the genuine spirit of Christianity, and substituted for the charities of religion the rancorous antipathies of sect, but because they practically placed, as to a political dependency, while we, under the name, convert a nation into an appurtenance, make us the footstool of the Minister, the scorn of England, and the commeseration of the world. Ireland is the only country in Europe in which abominable distinctions between Protestant and Catholic are permitted to continue. In Germany, where Luther translated the Scriptures; in France, where Calvin wrote the Institutes; ay, in the land of the Dragonnades and the St. Bartholomews—in the land from whence the forefathers of one of the judicial functionaries of the Court and the first Ministerial officer of this court were barbarously driven—the mutual wrongs done by Catholic and Protestant are forgiven and forgotten; while we, maddened that we are, arrayed by that fell fanaticism, which, driven from every other country in Europe, has found refuge here, precipitate ourselves upon each other in these encounters of sectarian hatred, which, in any other country, bleeding and lacerated, is trodden under foot. We convert the island, noblest of the world, into a receptacle of degradation and of suffering; counteract the designs of Providence, and enter into a conspiracy for the frustation of the beneficent designs of God.

This burst of eloquence was received throughout the Court with an involuntary manifestation of applause.

The Chief Justice intimated that if the interruption were renewed, the court must be cleared.

Mr. Shell expressed his regret at the interruption, and proceeded. Ireland made a rapid progress in the course that freedom opened to her. Mr. Pitt and Mr. Dundas admitted it in Parliament. The Protestants of Ireland had been contented to kneel to England upon a Catholic's neck. They rose to a nobler attitude, and but for the rebellion of 1798, so denounced with an unaffected sincerity by Mr. O'Connell, the Catholic question would have been settled in terms satisfactory to both parties. The question now was not one between Catholic and Protestant, but between the greater country and the smaller, which the greater country endeavoured to keep under an ignominious control. The Union was carried by corruption and fear, and many who voted for it lived to repent it. Mr. Saurin, amongst others, was said to have opposed it only during its progress through Parliament, and not after its completion; so that the most important principle laid down in debate were to be regarded as mere delusive assertions. Surely the truth of great principles did not depend upon a statute they were not for an age, but for all times—they were immutable, imperishable, immortal, as the mind of man. They might, perhaps, be reconciled to the terms of the Union, bad as they were, had the results been beneficial to the country; but travellers stood appalled at the misery she presented. Were they to attribute those evils to the will, or the absence, or some evil genius who exercised a sinister influence over their destinies?

The right hon. gentleman then traced, according to his own views, the history of Ireland since the Union. In 1800 Mr. O'Connell first spoke against the Union. In 1810 he made a speech precisely similar to those for which he was now arraigned. His intentions were pure then, it could not be denied. It is the language were the intention must be discovered as a basis for a conspiracy. Now the Catholic Association was created by him, and Catholic Emancipation was accomplished; but did they think that up to that period the Government had been so wise and salutary that the Union ought to be regarded as a great legislative blessing; or that if this indictment could be sustained, an indictment for a conspiracy might not have been preferred against those who had associated themselves to obtain Catholic Emancipation? How, too, was the Reform Bill carried? Who were the conspirators who embarked in that fearful enterprise? Should the answer—Lord Grey, Lord J. Russell, Lord Althorp, and, to crown the list, Sir J. Graham, now Home Secretary? Let gamblers denounce vice, drunkards denounce debauch, when Graham complained of agitation. For aught he knew, Sir James Graham might be sincere in his change of opinions, and had not the slightest desire, from motives of partizanship, to assail him, or to bring him back; but, and the learned counsel—

I do say, that he is of all men the last under whose auspices a prosecution of this character ought to be carried on. The Reform Bill becomes the law of the land—the Parliament is dissolved, and a new Parliament is summoned and called together under the Reform Bill; and the very first measure adopted in that reformed Parliament is a coercion bill for Ireland. The Attorney-General read a speech of Lord John Russell in favour of coercion. He omitted to read the numerous speeches subsequently made by that noble gentleman, which his mistake with respect to Ireland is honourably confessed. Gentlemen, I shall not go through the events of the last ten years in detail. It is sufficient to point out to you the various questions by which the unfortunate country has been successively convulsed—the church question, the tithe question, the Municipal Bill, the Registration Bill. These questions, with their diversified ramifications, have not left us one moment's rest. Cabinets have been destroyed by them. The great parties in the state have fought for them. Ireland has supplied the fatal field for the encounter of contending parties. No single measure for the substantial and permanent amelioration of the country has been adopted. And here we are, at the opening of a new session of Parliament, with a poor-rate on our estates, a depreciating tariff in our markets, and a state prosecution in her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench. Such, gentlemen, is the history of the [illegible] Parliament, whose wisdom and whose [illegible] have been made the theme for such lavish panegyric! Gentlemen, I do not know your political opinions, nor do I know that it is necessary that any man among you favourable to the repeal of the union; but if every one of you be fearful of that measure becoming ultimately the occasion of a dismemberment of the empire, still its discussion may not be unjustifiable, for the safety of the state were governed by no other considerations than those which were founded upon obvious justice, or if measures were to be carried by syllogisms, and government was a mere question of dialectics, then all great accomplishments of the people should, of course, be deprecated, and every exciting adjuration addressed to the passions of the people should be strenuously reproved. But it is not by ratiocination that a redress of grievances can be obtained. The agitator must sometimes follow the example of the diplomatist, who asks for what is impossible, in order that what is possible may be obtained. It must strike the least observant, that when the Government contemplated most vehemently of demagogue audacity, their resentment is the precursor of their concessions. Take, as an example, the Landlord and Tenant Commission, which there are some Conservatives think will disarm the fearful indications of property, and against which Lord Brougham addressed his admonitory denunciation to Sir Robert Peel. For my own part, I think it may lead to results greater than were contemplated; for it appears to me to have been chiefly intended as a means of diverting public attention from the consideration of the other great grievances of the country. The main source of all these grievances, I am convinced, is to be found in the colonial policy pursued to this country. That Union never has been carried into effect. If it had, Ireland would not be a miserable dependant in the great imperial family. The Attorney-General expressed great indignation at the idea that Mr. O'Connell and the petitioners of people cannot be dragged at the tail of any nation on earth." That sentiment is taken from a paragraph in the Morning Chronicle newspaper, and I have no hesitation in saying, that I at once adopt it. To mere numbers, without intelligence, organization, or public spirit, I, for one, attach no value; but a great development of the moral prowess of Ireland has taken place. Instruction is universally diffused. The elements of literature, through which political sentiment is indirectly circulated, are taught by the state. Ireland has, if I may so speak, undergone a species of transformation. By one who had seen her half a century ago she would be scarcely recognised. The simultaneous, the miraculous abandonment of those habits, to which Irishmen were once fatally addicted, at the exhortation of a humble friar, is a strong indication of what might be done by a good Government with so fine a people, without saying that the temperance movement affords a proof of the facility with which the national enthusiasm can be organized and directed. I think it is one among the many circumstances which should induce us to think that we have come to such a pass in this country that some great measures for its security and for its happiness are required.

It had been recommended that the Imperial Parliament should sit at certain intervals in Dublin. To that proposition he saw no sound objection; and he then painted a glowing picture of the advantages that would accrue from the realization of that project.

The advantages which would accrue from the realisation of this project are of no ordinary kind. The intercourse of the two countries would be augmented to such an extent that their feelings would be identified. National prejudices would be reciprocally laid aside. An English domestication would take place. Instead of lending money upon Irish mortgages, Englishmen would bring home to Ireland, and live upon them. The absentee drain would be diminished. The value of property would be very nearly doubled. Great public works would be undertaken, and the great natural endowments of the country would be turned to account. The city would appear in renovated splendour. Your streets would be cleansed by the roll of the gorgeous equipages in which the first nobility of the country would be borne to the senate-house, from which the money-changers should be driven. The mansions of the aristocracy would blaze with that useful luxury which minister to the gratification of the affluent and to the employment and comfort of the poor. The Sovereign herself would not deem the seat of her Parliament unworthy of her residence. The frippery of the Viceregal Court would be swept away. We should look upon Royalty itself, and not upon the tinsel images. We should behold the Queen of England, of Ireland, and of Scotland, in all the pomp of her imperial regality, with a diadem — the finest diadem in the world — glittering upon her brow, while her countenance beamed with the expression of that sentiment which "becomes the throned monarch better than the crown." We should see her accompanied by the Prince, of whom it is the highest praise to say, that he has proved himself to be not unworthy of her; we should see him encompassed by all the circumstances of associate endearment with respect; we should not only behold the Queen as the mother and the wife, and see her from the highest station on which a human being could be placed, appreciate the finest medal of genuine connubial and maternal virtue. I am not speaking in the language of a fictitious enthusiasm when I speak thus of her. I am sure that this project is not only feasible, but easy.

He would not deny that strong speeches had been made by his client and the other traversers, but he denied that they were more exciting or inflammatory than those which were spoken in almost all popular assemblies, Whig, Radical, or Conservative. The right hon. gentleman then referred to the proceedings of large Protestant meetings, at which language of the same character had been used.

He cannot have forgotten the contumelies heaped upon the head of the Queen upon the resignation in 1839 of Sir R. Peel. I will not, gentlemen, [illegible] by a more distant reference to those traitorous diatribes, in which [illegible] noon took a part. It is better we should inquire how it is that gentlemen associated with these very Protestants have thought it necessary to comport themselves when their own passions were excited. The name of the King of Prussia Frederick shaw is attached to the proclamation. I hold in my hand the perusal of a speech delivered by that gentleman, and reported in the Evening Post of the 9th of March, 1835: "The Government might make what regulations it pleased; but he trusted the people knew their duty too well to submit to its enactments. We would not be governed by any law except that of our progenitors; but if the Government dared to lay its hand on the Bible, then we must come to an issue. We will cover it with our bodies. My friends, will you permit your brethren to be cut up in this manner? In the name of my country and of my country's God, I will appeal from a British House of Commons to a British public. My countrymen would obey the laws so long as they were properly administered; but if it were sought to lay sacrilegious hands on the Bible, to tear the standard of the living God, and to raise a mutilated one in its stead, then it would be no time to halt between two opinions; then, on every hill and in every valley would resound the rallying cry of 'To your tents, oh Israel!'" I won't ask the Attorney-General of Ireland what he thinks of this, because [illegible] refers to a subject somewhat embarrassing to him; and what his opinions are upon the Education Board it is not very easy to conjecture; but I may venture to ask the Solicitor-General, who is himself a commissioner of the Education Board, whether Daniel O'Connell, in his whole course of agitation, ever uttered a speech half so inflammatory as this? With respect to Mr. Sergeant Warren, he, I suppose, agrees in every word of it, and only laments that, after so much sound and fury, the Recorder of Dublin is the steadfast supporter of Government, by whom all the murderous thus eloquently denounced has subsequently committed. Gentlemen, I find in the Evening Packet of the 4th of January, 1837, an account of a great Protestant meeting which took place at the Mansion-house, where all the great representatives of the Conservative interest in this country were assembled. Some very strong speeches indeed were made at that meeting. The lord of Charleville said, "Well, gentlemen, you have a rebellious Parliament; you have a rebellious Government, the result of a rebellious Parliament." That speech was heard by the Right Hon Thomas Berry Cusack Smith. Did he remonstrate against the use of language so unjustifiable? He got up and made a speech, in which he declared that "he was sorry to find that Roman Catholic members of Parliament paid so little regard to their oaths." When the right hon. gentleman had such impressions, I cannot feel surprised that cases should have been taken to the country Roman Catholic from the jury-box. Let him not misapprehend me. I do not refer to his language in the spirit of resentment. Resentment is not the feeling with the conduct of the right hon. gentleman is calculated to provoke it.

The right hon. gentleman then went on to point out the means taken by the Irish Orangemen to corrupt the army, by the establishment of Orange lodges in various regiments, and read several extracts from the clandestine correspondence which took place, and which had been brought to light before a parliamentary committee. Through the entire mass of thought embodied in Mr. O'Connell's speeches there was a prevailing love of order, and an unaffected sentiment of abhorrence for the idea of any other than loyal, constitutional, and pacific means for the attainment of his object. Of the charges against him, his whole life was the refutation.

A man cannot wear the mask of loyalty for 44 years; however skilfully constructed the vizard will sometimes drop off, and the moral truculence, the germine features of the conspirator, must be disclosed. You may have heard many references made to the year 1798, and several strains of a long plaint have been read to you, in order to fasten them on Mr. O'Connell. It was in 1798 that the celebrated man arose who is described to you as destined to play a part so conspicuous on the theatre of the world. He was in the prime of youth, in the full flush of life—the blood bounded in his veins, and in a frame full of vigour [illegible] embodied an equally robust and athletic mind. He was in that season of [illegible] when men are most disposed to high and daring adventure. He had come from those rocks and mountains of which a description so striking has appeared in the reports of the speeches which have been read to you. He had listened, as he says, to the great Atlantic, whose surge rolls round the coasts of Kerry's border. He carried enthusiasm to romance; and of the impressions which great events are calculated to make upon minds like his he was peculiarly susceptible. He was unwedded. He was given no hostages to the state. The conservative affections had not tied their ligaments, tender, but indissoluble, about his heart. There was at that time an enterprise on foot; guilty, and deeply guilty, indeed, but not wholly hopeless. The pass that overlooked the Bay of Bantry were visible from Nenagh-hill. What post was taken in that dark adventure by this conspirator or [illegible] But he may Pierre at 22 who is ready to play Renault at 69? Curran was suspected; Grattan was suspected. Men of all parties and creeds in Ireland were implicated in the name of Daniel O'Connell. The entire of the lower orders in the north of England were enrolled in a powerful organization. A league between the Repealers and the Chartists might have been at once effected. Chartism was then almost and its most clandestine efforts to find its way into this country. O'Connell detects it and crushes it. Of the charges preferred against him, am I not right when I exclaim that his life contains the refutation? To the charge that Mr. O'Connell and his son conspired to excite animosity amongst her Majesty's subjects, the last observation that I have made to you is more peculiarly applicable. Gentlemen, Mr. O'Connell and his colleagues have been made the objects of the most fiercest vituperation; and yet I defy the most acute scrutiny of the entire of the speeches put before you to detect a single expression—one solitary phrase which reflects in the slightest degree upon the Protestant religion. He has left all the controversy turned upon the form of Christianity which he professes utterly unheeded, and the Protestant Operative Society has not provoked a retort; and every angry disputant who has entered into discussion on his part, has been [illegible] to rush in "where angels fear to tread." Gentlemen, the religion of Mr. O'Connell teaches him two things—charity towards those who dissent from him in doctrine, and forgiveness of those who do him wrong. You recollect (it is from such incidents that we are enabled to judge of the characters of men)—you remember to have heard in the course of the evidence frequent reference made to poor old Sir Bradley King. The unfortunate man had been deprived of his office, and all compensation was denied him. He used to stand in the lobby of the House of Commons, the most desolate and helpless-looking man I ever saw. The only one of his old friends that stuck to him almost was Baron Lefroy. But Baron Lefroy had no interest with the Government. Mr. O'Connell saw Bradley King, and took pity on him. Bradley King had been his fierce political, almost his personal, antagonist. Mr. O'Connell went to Lord Althorp, and obtained for Bradley King the compensation which had been refused him. I remember having read a most striking letter addressed by Sir Abraham Bradley King to Mr. O'Connell, and asked him for it. He could not at first put his hand upon it; but, while looking for it, he told me, that soon after the death of the old Dublin Alderman, an officer entered his study and told him that he was the son-in-law of Sir Abraham, who had, a short time before his death, called him to his bedside and said, "When I shall have been buried go to Daniel O'Connell and tell him that the last prayer of a grateful man was offered for him, and that I implored Heaven to shower every peril from his head." Mr. O'Connell found the letter. You will allow me to read it:

"Barrett's Hotel, Spring-gardens, August 4, 1834.

"Very dear Sir,—The anxious wish for a satisfactory termination of my cause, which your continued and unwearied efforts have ever indicated, is at length accomplished. The vote of compensation passed last night. To Mr. Lefroy and to yourself am I indebted for putting the case in the right light—to my Lord Althorp, for his lordship's candid and straightforward act, in giving me my just dues, and thus restoring myself and family to competence, ease, and happiness.

"To you, Sir, to whom I was early and long politically opposed—to you who, nobly forgetting this continued difference of opinion, and who, rejecting every idea of party feeling or of party spirit, thought only of my distress, and sped to succour and support me, how can I express my gratitude? I cannot attempt it. The reward I feel is to be found only in your own breast; and I assure myself that the generous feelings of a noble mind will cheer you on to that prosperity and happiness which a discriminating Providence holds out to those who protect the helpless and sustain the falling. For such reward and happiness to you and yours my prayers shall be offered fervently, while the remainder of my days, passing, I trust, in tranquillity, by a complete retirement from public life, will be occupied in the bosom of my family, in contributing to me the grateful recollection of one to whom I am mainly indebted for so desirable a closing of my life. Believe me, my dear sir, with the greatest respect and truth, your faithful servant,

"ABRAHAM BRADLEY KING."

You may deprive him of his liberty—you may shut him out from the light of nature—you may inter him in a dungeon, to which a ray of the sun never yet descended; but you never will take away from him the consciousness of having done a great and noble action, and of being entitled to the blessing even now night before he sleeps, and to address to his Creator the divinest portion of our Redeemer's prayer. The man to whom that letter was addressed, and the son of the man to whom that letter was addressed, are not only of the sanguinary intents which have been ascribed to them; and for this they put themselves upon their country. Rescue that phrase from its technicalities—let it no longer be a fictitious one: if we have lost our representation in the Parliament, let us behold it in the jury-box, and that you participate in the feelings of millions of your countrymen let your verdict afford a proof. But it is not to Ireland that the acting so coincide with which the result of this trial is intently watched will be confined. There is not a great city in Europe in which upon the day when the great intelligence shall be expected to arrive men will stop each other in the public way, and inquire whether the men upon their oaths have doomed to incarceration the man who gave liberty to Ireland. Whatever may be your adjudication he is prepared to meet it. He knows that the eyes of the world are upon him, and that posterity, whether it sanctify or curse it, will look back to him with admiration; he is almost indifferent to what may befal him, and is far more solicitous for others at this moment than for himself. But, at the commencement of what I hope will be the end to you, I told you that we are unmoved, and that many incidents of my political life, the strange alternations of fortune through which I have passed, came back upon me. But now the bare possibility at which I have glanced has, I acknowledge, almost unmanned me. Shall I, who stretch out to you in behalf of the son the hand whose fetters the father had struck off, live to cast my eyes upon that domicile of sorrow in the vicinity of this great metropolis, and say, "Thy husband is not the Liberator of Ireland with his fondest and best-beloved child?" No! it shall never be! You will not consign him to the spot to which the Attorney-General invites you to surrender him. No. When the agony shall have come again, and the winter shall have passed, when the spring shall have come again, it is not through the windows of this mansion that the father of such a son, and the son of such a father, shall look upon those green hills on which the eyes of so many a captive have gazed so wistfully in vain; but in their own mountain home again they shall listen to the murmurs of the great Atlantic, they shall go forth and inhale the freshness of the morning air together! "They shall be free indeed!" they shall be free indeed; they will be encompassed with the loftiest images of liberty upon every side; and if time shall have stolen its suppleness from the father's sinews compared the firmness of his tread, his eye shall not have lost its fire, nor his heart its courage, and shall look out from some high place far and wide into the island, whose greatness and whose glory shall be for ever associated with his name. In your love of justice I can put no trust (Ireland—ay, and your place—I place my confidence. I ask you for an acquittal, not only for the sake of your country, but for your own. Upon the day when that time shall have been brought to a termination, when the public shall be in the expectancy, to answer to the solemn interrogatory which shall be put to you by the officer of the court, you shall answer "Not Guilty," with what a transport will that glorious negative be welcomed! Then will you be able to look back upon the speech now just delivered; and if it would not trespass too much upon the time of the public, I would feel grateful if I were not called upon by the Court to address you this evening. If the Court had not thrown out the intimation itself, I should not have felt myself justified in making the request.

The Chief Justice—It is now three o'clock, and, without infringing unnecessarily upon the public time, it was right that the decree of the Court to give every reasonable indulgence to counsel in their power. You yourself feel that you would rather not go on at present, but wait until Monday morning, as we presume your speech cannot be closed to night. Unless the Attorney-General presses it on to-night, the Court is not inclined to sit, upon you, to proceed to night.

The Attorney-General acquiesced in the adjournment, and the Court was accordingly adjourned at ten minutes after three o'clock, until Monday morning, the Chief Justice having first cautioned the jury against communicating with any one on the subject of the trial.

After the court rose, the hall presented a most animated appearance, and the entrance of Mr. Shell was marked by repeated rounds of applause, the crowd following him to the robing-rooms, and evincing their approbation with great warmth and vigour.

THIRTEENTH DAY—MONDAY.

At ten o'clock the Court sat. Immediately after,

Mr. John O'Connell rose, and begged permission to make an observation in reference to the speech which was delivered by his friend the Right Hon. Mr. Shell on Saturday last, as one part of it was calculated to create a serious misapprehension in the minds of the jury. He had always advocated a full, free, and peaceful agitation for the repeal of the union, but not believing it agreed with the proposal of occasional visits to Ireland of the Imperial Parliament. Nor was he the advocate of any measure that did not give to his country what he esteemed to be her unpurchasable right—the right of domestic legislature.

Mr. Moore then rose to address the jury on behalf of the Rev. Mr. Tierney. He said the Attorney-General had told them this was a momentous case—in point he (Mr. Moore) thought it was one of the most momentous characters, and in momentous times. But never was anything less calculated to allay the animosity that existed throughout the land than this prosecution. From the beginning of the world to the present moment it has been only found necessary to incarcerate the man who gave liberty to Ireland. And if that were so, was it one to come forward, and, taking several together, to charge those who attended them with conspiracy? Never was he more surprised than when he heard the Attorney-General say that the intended meeting of Clontarf was abandoned from a consciousness of its illegality. Did the Attorney-General forget the circumstances that occurred about that time—the haste of the Lord-Lieutenant in proroguing Parliament, and the consternation that took possession of the people on the morning of the intended meeting? The abandonment was owing to the sense and good feeling of Mr. O'Connell. He saw the awful consequences that might have resulted from it; he abandoned it, and if that were so, was it one to come forward, and, taking several together, to charge those who attended them with conspiracy? Never was he more surprised than when he heard the Attorney-General say that the intended meeting at Clontibret meeting, in which, said the witness, Mr. Tierney spoke of what the [illegible] Spain had done, and said that repeal was making its way in the army here. He had the most solemn assurance of Mr. Tierney that no such statement was made by him. Moreover, no intelligence of the disaffection of the army in Spain had been received in this country until the 16th of June, three days after the alleged conversation. What weight would the jury attach to such evidence? Well, then, was there a single thing done at Clontibret that proved the illegality of the meeting, or was a man who attended a single meeting for repeal a conspirator? The resolutions agreed to were pressed in evidence—were they illegal? Similar language had been used by Lord Grey, Lord Fitzwilliam, Sir Robert Peel, and others, there was no evidence that Mr. Tierney had attended any other meeting, or been cognizant of any of the proceedings. It was true he attended a meeting of the Association on the 1st of December, but that meeting was not illegal, nor did anything said or done by his client at that meeting amount to a conspiracy. There was no evidence against his client, and if the jury came to that conclusion, and acquitted him, they would be able to ratify their verdict in the eyes of their fellow-men.

Mr. Hatchell next proceeded to address the jury for Mr. Ray. There were circumstances peculiar to each of the traversers which it was right should be laid before the jury, that they might, as fair and impartial men, see whether the traversers were united in a preconceived plan for overturning the Government. Mr. Ray was peculiarly situated in regard to the charge; as the indictment made him the Secretary to the Repeal Association. They were not to try him for having attended any unlawful assembly he attended meetings, but he denied their illegality. They were not to try him for publishing libels, or uttering seditious expressions—he had never done so in his life. They were not to try him as a Repealer—to that he would have pleaded guilty—but they were to try whether he had entered into a criminal plot for the purpose charged in the indictment. The learned counsel referred to the charge of Chief Justice Eyre, in the case of the King v. Hardy, Tooke, and others," to show that criminal intent must be clearly proved in support of the charge of conspiracy. Mr. Ray performed his duties as paid secretary to the association; that he did so with a criminal intent was the question they were sworn to try. It was not fair to include him in the indictment, for it dispelled from proving as a witness the honesty and integrity of the motives of the other traversers. The learned gentleman then commented upon the evidence, and contended that neither were the meetings Mr. Ray had attended illegal, nor was the publicity whereof he was cognizant of his client had done. All that had been done by him was in his character as secretary of the Association; and they could not, he thought, reconcile it to their minds to condemn of conspiracy.

It had been arranged amongst the traversers that Mr. Fitzgibbon, Queen's counsel should follow Mr. Hatchell in his address, and as it was only two o'clock when the latter gentleman concluded, there was every reason to suppose that a third speech would have been accomplished on Monday. The learned gentleman, however, applied, on the ground of indisposition, to be allowed to postpone his address till the following day. Mr. O'Connell stated, that from the arrangement made by the traversers, no other gentleman who was to address the jury could then be substituted, there was but one alternative—to adjourn the Court, which, in spite of the remonstrances of the Attorney-General, was done accordingly.

FOURTEENTH DAY—TUESDAY.

The Court resumed its sittings at ten o'clock. The traversers and jury having answered to the usual calls,

Mr. Fitzgibbon immediately proceeded to address the Court on behalf of Dr. Gray. The charge against his client was one of the most serious with which a subject could be charged, and if well founded, one of the most dangerous in which a human being could be guilty. He denounced the prosecution as unfair, illegal, and unconstitutional, and compared it to a Ministerial scourge devised for the purpose of driving ill-used and exasperated subjects to madness. The conduct of the prosecutors was, in his opinion, calculated to degrade them in public estimation, and deprive them of the high moral position which they had hitherto occupied as men and lawyers, for they had consented to the packed rulings in a manner only to be equalled by the conduct of Sir Edward Coke, when he prosecuted Sir Walter Raleigh. The Attorney-General had told them that they should take the law of the case from the Court, and in that he fully concurred; but he denied, as the Attorney-General insinuated, that they should take or abide by the opinion of the Court on matters of fact. Of the guilt or innocence of the accused, they, and they alone, were to judge; and in that point the jury was omnipotent—the Court utterly powerless; on that point the jury had full power and authority, while the Court was entirely without jurisdiction; for the law was the Court's province, the evidence and its consideration exclusively in the hands of the jury. The learned counsel proceeded to quote a variety of authorities in support of this proposition, contending at great length that the facts of judges, sitting at Nisi Prius, were not binding on juries, in most cases, but especially in cases like the present, involving the liberties and properties of her Majesty's subjects. He disagreed entirely with the Attorney-General in his opinion of the law of conspiracy. That opinion was not only unfairly and unsoundly; and in a case of state prosecution, common humanity, he contended, required that it should be stated honestly, fairly, and openly. The jury had been told in the course of the proceedings of overt acts, which he questioned much whether any one of them knew what constituted an overt act of conspiracy. There are but two cases to which the term could be applied treason and misprision. Any attempt to compass the destruction of, for instance, if a person imagined the death of the Sovereign, he was guilty of an overt act of treason; but he defied the Attorney-General to point to a single act of his client which could be construed into an overt act of conspiracy. The learned gentleman next referred to the evidence brought forward by the Crown against the traversers, and in the course of his subject alluded in very warm terms to the evidence of Captain Despard, the unfortunate Irish magistrate, which was calculated and intended to induce the jury to believe that large masses of the community were banded together for the purpose of effecting political objects by military means and force. The most extraordinary part of the non-production of Holbrook, the lithographic printer, whom he characterised and designated as a creature of the Government. The learned gentleman then proceeded to point out all social and political misdemeanors were accompanied or preceded by demonstrations of physical force, and among other instances referred to the extortion of Magna Charta by the Barons of England, who appeared before the King, at Runnymede, dressed for war, and ready to force what they had previously made up their minds to attain.

The Court then adjourned for a few minutes.

During the adjournment the Attorney-General handed a note to Mr. Fitzgibbon, who, after reading it, returned it to that gentleman. The Attorney-General refused to accept it. Mr. Fitzgibbon then threw it across the table, and the Attorney-General took it up without any observation. When the Court resumed, Mr. Fitzgibbon stated what had occurred, and called on the Attorney-General to produce the note. On that gentleman taking no notice of the request, Mr. Fitzgibbon stated that in the Attorney-General intimated that he (Mr. F.) had given him personal offence, and if he did not apologise, to name his friend.

The Attorney-General said, that if Mr. Fitzgibbon had any application to make, let it be on affidavit.

Mr. Fitzgibbon declined.

The Attorney-General said that if all the facts of the case came before the Court on affidavit, the matter would wear a different aspect. Mr. Fitzgibbon had said that he (the Attorney-General) was influenced in this prosecution by unworthy motives to obtain a certain result; he felt greatly irritated, and had called for an apology; and he would say, that the same matter were brought before the Court, it would not sanction Mr. Fitzgibbon's conduct.

Mr. Fitzgibbon said, if the Attorney-General had called his attention to any particular observation deemed personally offensive, and asked him to explain or apologise, he did not know what his feelings might have tempted him to have done. That was the course which ought to have been pursued.

Mr. Moore was desirous that time should be allowed in order that all misconception should be put an end to.

The Chief Justice said the court felt indebted to Mr. Moore for the suggestion. It was most satisfactory to see that what had taken place, it was the wish of both that, of all men in the profession, the Attorney-General was the last man who ought to have been betrayed into such an expression of feeling as had been brought under notice.

The Attorney-General admitted he wrote the note hastily, and even then laboured under feelings of irritation; but he begged to withdraw it. He felt he had not fairly dealt with; he would, however, suspect Mr. Fitzgibbon of any other, but leave it to the gentlemanly feelings of Mr. Fitzgibbon to take what course he passed.

The Chief Justice Of course we cannot allow any ulterior proceedings to take place.

Mr. Fitzgibbon proceeded to enter on a long statement, but was interrupted by the Chief Justice, who requested him not to enter on details as the Attorney-General had withdrawn the note, and wished he had not written it. After some conversation the Court called on each gentleman to express himself satisfied.

The Attorney-General said if Mr. Fitzgibbon meant nothing of a personal nature, of course he ought to be satisfied.

Mr. Fitzgibbon had no feelings to the Attorney-General which he had not when he spoke first.

Mr. Fitzgibbon then resumed, and proceeded at great length to impress upon the jury that they were the sole judges of the criminality; and, in support of this proposition, he instanced the conduct of the several juries before whom Hone was tried for the publication of blasphemous and seditious libels. The juries, in that case, brought in repeated verdicts of acquittal, notwithstanding that the learned Judge had taken on himself to instruct them as to the manner in which they should discharge their duties.

At five o'clock Mr. Fitzgibbon begged the Court would permit him to postpone the remaining part of his address to Wednesday morning, which, after some demur on the part of the Chief Justice, was acceded to.

FIFTEENTH DAY—WEDNESDAY.

Mr. Fitzgibbon, Q.C., upon the opening of the court this morning resumed his address. He commenced by stating, that the magnitude of his case, and its importance, absolutely required him to extend his address to the jury, as it was absolutely impossible for him in a speech of some three, four, or even seven hours, to digest the mass of matter which had been so confusedly placed before them, and which he was so anxious to render as intelligible as possible. He hoped, however, that as he did not conclude yesterday, he would not be accused of having broken any promise to the court.

Chief Justice Do not imagine any such thing, Mr. Fitzgibbon—you have not.

Mr. Fitzgibbon His own peace of mind, no matter what length of time he should occupy, demanded that he should go through the case before him to the best of his ability.

Chief Justice. Surely.

Mr. Fitzgibbon then proceeded to say that he appeared there, technically speaking, for only one of the traversers, Dr. Gray, who, he said, was a young man who belonged to a respectable and learned profession, as useful and as honourable a profession as that to which he (Mr. Fitzgibbon, belonged. He (Dr Gray) was part proprietor of a newspaper, which had now existed for half a century in Dublin. He had to defend him from the imputation of crime, of having been led or misled by the eloquence and ability of Mr. O'Connell, to join his ranks, and become a member of the Repeal Association. In defending him then, from that imputation, it became essentially necessary for him to bring before the jury a few of those eloquent passages of Mr. O'Connell, which had induced his client to join the Association—passages, however, which were not yet read and which were calculated not only to exonerate his client, but to suggest to him blame every man who connected himself with the Association, and most unequivocally to exonerate the first of the traversers, Mr. O'Connell himself. He had stated, said, that he was not there to exercise any censorship over the language which they would examine to be the meaning of Mr. O'Connell. But if the Crown believed that, or if they believed they could get twelve honest men to believe it they stood a short in not asking to put to that belief—why not prosecute for libel? and he would tell the jury that if that were Mr. O'Connell's meaning in his speech, and he would say it under the correction of the Court, they were bound to acquit all the traversers, for if Mr. O'Connell had been guilty of high treason the misdemeanour in point of law becomes [illegible] Mr. O'Connell [illegible] Mr. Ray [illegible] What," said he, "is a subject? What is a subject mean by saying so, unless he means first, by force and war, and rebellion and insurrection, to take the sceptre from the hands of that Sovereign. How, otherwise, could he say that [illegible] Dr. Gray [illegible] meant. But, could the jury believe that Mr. O'Connell would even so address the common sense of rational British subjects "that he could wrest the sceptre from her by force in order to establish, by legal, and by constitutional right? Could the jury believe that Mr. O'Connell would be absurd enough to fancy in his mind, or to have the most distant notion, that he would have it in his power to have the removal of that sceptre—that sceptre which, for the last 200 years [illegible] and which belongs to her, not only with the assent and consent of all, but with the heartfelt acclamation of every subject in every part of her dominions. The learned gentleman ridiculed the idea that Mr. O'Connell ever contemplated any appeal to physical force, and read numerous passages from his speeches, all of which condemned in the strongest terms any departure from peaceful and legal agitation. He referred to Mr. O'Connell's declaration at the Association on the 14th of September, in reference to the Chartists, where he said—" We all know what the Chartists have done. Who knew who their leaders are in Dublin, and that the attempts made by them in Ireland have been totally abortive. In Drogheda the clique was broken up, and Hoey, who came over from Barnsley, found he had nothing to do. To that, of course, he would not object—but in found, at all events, that Ireland was not the place for the physical force men and he went back again. It was said that Chartism had made some head in Lougrea, but if there was anything of the kind, there is little doubt that it would soon be put down by that pious and exemplary prelate, the Right Rev. Dr. Cohen, the Catholic Bishop. He would give his valuable assistance in hunting the Feargusites out of the Loughres. We don't repudiate Chartists, because they hear that name, but we cannot associate with men who have been stained with crimes of the most dangerous and evil tendency." Had Mr. O'Connell entertained any notion of an outbreak he would not have used such language in reference to the Chartists. The learned gentleman next referred to the extracts from speech he had said—if Irish or Irish men would not have used such language at it on our minds; but we obtained that mighty political revolution without crime and without bloodshed, by the incessant exertion of our constitutional faculties and by the gigantic, aye, and electric force of public opinion in favour of right and justice.

Again, on the 9th of March, 1843, he said, "There shall not a drop of blood be shed in the struggle. Man must not shed blood like the fiend-man, and the red hand of God's vengeance follows the man who breaks that commandment." In the same speech he said, "The man who violates the peace is an enemy to his country." When the Attorney-General, continued Mr. Fitzgibbon, read with such emphasis and so well the poem commencing—

"Who fears to speak of ninety-eight,"

It was to be wondered that he did not also recollect the lines—

"There came to the beach a poor Exile of Erin,
The dew on his robe was moisture and chill,
For his country he sighed, when at midnight repairing,
To wander alone on the wind-beaten hill."

Who was that exile? Was he not a rebel of '98, and the writer of these beautiful lines now enjoyed a pension from Queen Charlotte, the consort of George the Third, it was necessary to remind the people that they were now to achieve their victories by moral force, and bend down the tempest at the scenes of former massacres. Mr. Fitzgibbon read numerous other extracts, and commented on them as he proceeded, and concluded his address a few minutes before five o'clock.

At the close of the learned gentleman's speech, he adverted to the fracas which had taken place between himself and the Attorney-General yesterday, and said that he regretted the circumstance, and on his own account, and that of the right hon. gentleman, whom he had known so long, and for whom he entertained the highest respect.

Mr. Sergeant Warren here interrupted the learned gentleman, and said that as the matter had already been disposed of, he thought that no good or useful end could be obtained by its revival.

Mr. Fitzgibbon begged to be heard out. He said justice had not been done to him; he had made repeated offers to return the note which the Attorney-General addressed to him yesterday, and it was not until those offers had been as repeatedly rejected, that he had brought the matter before the Court.

The Court adjourned at five o'clock until ten o'clock Thursday morning.

It is the general impression here that Mr. Fitzgibbon displayed very bad taste in reverting to the dispute between himself and the Attorney-General after the subject had been disposed of.

SIXTEENTH DAY.—THURSDAY.

The interest of the trials appears to have increased since the commencement of the defence of the traversers, and as early as half-past eight this morning the court was crowded in every part. The learned counsel took out the bench a few minutes past ten o'clock, when

Mr. Moore rose to state that the term having closed, he did not think the court competent to proceed; he therefore begged, and very respectfully, that a note would be taken of the objection.

The Lord Chief Justice said, certainly he would do so.

Mr. Whiteside, Q.C., then proceeded to address the Court in behalf of Mr. Charles Gavan Duffy, the proprietor of the Nation newspaper. After some preliminary remarks, he said his own anxiety on the subject before them was great indeed desirous as he was to place before them the justice of his case, so that truth might prevail, and the cause of freedom triumph. He would not at the outset of the case say what the result may be—not that he feared with trembling apprehension anything like popular indignation, or lawless violence, but he felt the importance of their decision. He was anxious for the character of his common country—for the fruits of its justice; that their decision might be consistent with the principle of a free constitution—that they might rest on the immoveable ground of truth. They might be assured that that day's proceedings would be watched by the opinion of every enlightened man—by the opinion of enlightened England, as well as by the opinion of every nation on earth which possessed freedom so far as they could, and that human infirmity would permit. They were bound to discharge their duty unflinchingly between the Crown and their fellow-subjects, and with a fearless spirit to the subject's freedom—they were bound so to discharge that duty as to be applauded by their own consciences, as well as by the judgment of all just men. They were not there to try the traversers for their political opinions—for their soundness, or the unsoundness of their views—for the policy or the impolicy of their concurrence—or the wisdom or folly of their actions—for the possibility or impossibility of their carrying out their projects into effect. They might have formed no part whatever of the question before them; still less did they sit in judgment upon the style of speech which might have been exhibited by political orators, or by the taste that might be shown by public men on the subject's free-dom—they were bound so to discharge that duty as to be applauded by their own consciences, as well as by the judgment of all just men. They were not there to try the traversers for their political opinions—for the soundness, or the unsoundness of their views—for the policy or the impolicy of their concurrence—or the wisdom or folly of their actions—for the possibility or impossibility of their carrying out their projects into effect. They might have formed no part whatever of the question before them; still less did they sit in judgment upon the style of speech which might have been exhibited by political orators, or by the taste that might be shown by public men on the subject's free-dom—they were bound so to discharge that duty as to be applauded by their own consciences, as well as by the judgment of all just men. They were not there to try the traversers for their political opinions—for the soundness, or the unsoundness of their views—for the policy or the impolicy of their concurrence—or the wisdom or folly of their actions—for the possibility or impossibility of their carrying out their projects into effect. They might rest on the immoveable ground of truth. They might be assured that that day's proceedings would be watched by the opinion of every enlightened man—by the opinion of enlightened England, as well as by the opinion of every nation on earth which possessed freedom so far as they could, and that human infirmity would permit. They were bound to discharge their duty unflinchingly between the Crown and their fellow-subjects, and with a fearless spirit to the subject's freedom—they were bound so to discharge that duty as to be applauded by their own consciences, as well as by the judgment of all just men. They were not there to try the traversers for their political opinions—for the soundness, or the unsoundness of their views—for the policy or the impolicy of their concurrence—or the wisdom or folly of their actions—for the possibility or impossibility of their carrying out their projects into effect. They might rest on the immoveable ground of truth. They might be assured that that day's proceedings would be watched by the opinion of every enlightened man—by the opinion of enlightened England, as well as by the opinion of every nation on earth which possessed freedom so far as they could, and that human infirmity would permit. They were bound to discharge their duty unflinchingly between the Crown and their fellow-subjects, and with a fearless spirit to the subject's free-d

COMPLETION OF THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY.

GREAT JOINT STATION OF THE CROYDON, BRIGHTON, AND DOVER RAILWAY COMPANY, SOUTHWARK.

useful purpose of a clock-tower is certainly a striking and appropriate feature, though we wish it had been differently introduced. In connection with this terminus a station has been erected in Swan Lane, near the Bricklayers' Arms, Old Kent-road, to communicate with the main line at New Cross, by means of a splendid viaduct of timber. The station is the work of Mr. Lewis Cubitt, the well-known architect, and its arrangements exhibit a degree of simple elegance, convenience of proportion, and solidity of structure, which exactly meet the purposes to which it is to be specially devoted—those of a "first class" and "goods" station. The "west-enders" and "pleasure-liners" are thus provided with spacious apartments, while a more than ordinary extent of warehousing-room has been secured by the erection of several large buildings for such purpose, and among them one of not less than 500 feet in length.

Throughout the route many important additions have been made for the convenience of travellers, and the mercantile interests, at the several stations. The most noticeable of these are, the coaching establishments at Tunbridge and Ashford; the great hop warehouses at the Weald stations; the new inn at Pluckley; and the new station at Westerhanger, near Hythe, by which a ready access will be given, for the first time, to the celebrated ruins of the Kentish Palace of our early Kings, the retreat of Fair Rosamond, and the old cinque port of Hythe. It is, however, at Folkstone the "wonders of the line" commence. Here, the old harbour has been cleansed and deepened, and a fine branch railway erected to connect the quay side with the main line. On the harbour beach a fine tower has been erected, with a gallery at top, to assist the harbour-master in signalling the Indian and other mails, on their arrival in the "offing." The old Pavilion has given place to a noble hotel, capable of giving any required amount of accommodation to travellers in their passage to or from the Continent. But the work which surpasses all others in architectural importance is the stupendous viaduct on the northern side of the town. This imposing structure, of which we have given a perspective view, was designed by Mr. William Cubitt, and its construction is highly creditable to his talents as a scientific practical engineer.

SECTION OF THE VIADUCT.

The viaduct crosses the valley of the river Foord—close to the town of Folkstone; it is reared upon nineteen arches of uniform span, viz. thirty feet, and in the centre, the height above the mill-stream, which flows under it, is not less than 100 feet. It is, however, only for the space of five or six arches that the altitude—or rather depth from the level of the viaduct parapet—is of this extraordinary character, the height of the piers decreasing according to the acclivity of the banks. The entire length of this land bridge, or viaduct, is 768 feet. Lightness and loftiness are the prevailing characteristics of this noble work, the piers being of exceedingly slender proportions—not more than six feet in breadth, or one fifth of that of the arches, notwithstanding their prodigious height in comparison with those of a bridge of the usual kind. One fact may convey a notion of the wonderful lightness, in connection with extraordinary compactness and stability of construction, which the engineer has achieved in the structure of this bridge, and which we believe to be without parallel: the pressure of the entire structure is not more than 1200 lbs. on the square foot.

Of the works at Dover, which are only in course of erection, we shall here call attention only to Mr. Lewis Cubitt's terminus, which, if not so extensive as some other structures of its class, is one of both imposing and appropriate character—a beautiful adaptation of the Italian style. The turret is remarkably effective.

THE FOLKSTONE VIADUCT.

SCENE FROM "FARINELLI; OU LE BOUFFON DU ROI," AT THE ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.

M. ACHARD AS FARINELLI, AT THE ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.

The scene represented in our illustration is one of the most interesting in that delightful little piece, called "Farinelli; ou le Bouffon du Roi." Farinelli saves Doctor Gil Perez from the fury of the populace, who demand of him to produce their king, by singing the romance which the poor monarch was always so delighted to hear. Our artist has chosen the moment when Farinelli, having aroused his Majesty by the thrilling music of his voice, gradually draws him towards the balcony, from whence he might be seen by the enraged people. The Queen with her suite and Precious are also in the tableau. M. Achard, in the part of the Italian minstrel, displays as much genius as he had before exhibited in Bruno le Fileur and L'Amoureux du Regiment. He sings with remarkable elegance and sentiment. M. Lemadre does ample justice to Ferdinand VI., and nothing can be better than the Doctor by Barqui. In fine, this is one of the most interesting pieces produced on the French boards, and has introduced to the lovers of genuine dramatic performance an unrivalled artiste in the person of M. Achard.

LYCEUM THEATRE.

The title of "English Opera House" has for many years appertained to this theatre, without carrying along with it any of the interest that English Opera should excite in the minds of Englishmen; for from season to season it was nothing but failure after failure! But the moment that music is ejected from the fane which was expressly raised to her honour, and that it resumes its quondam attic appellation of Lyceum, the people all become peripatetics, and walk from the farthest distance of the metropolis in crowds to the house opened once more under its ancient name; aye! greater crowds than ever flocked to hear the Stagirite in his Lyceum on the banks of the Ilissus, were assembled on Monday evening last, in Mr. Keeley's on the banks of the Thames, when the season commenced with the first part of Henry IV., and a new farce, entitled "The Miser's Will," founded on a tale by Washington Irving. The acting on the occasion was something like what Martial says of his own works,—it was "good, bad, and indifferent." We were rejoiced to see Mr. Richard Younge restored to the metropolitan stage: he is a sterling actor. A Mr. Harvey Tuckett undertook the onerous part of Sir John, and acquitted himself with far more than ordinary ability. There were several first appearances, and, indeed, the greater part of the dramatis personæ seemed to consist more of "amateurs" than "actors." A Mr. Wentworth was respectable, though somewhat cold, in the fiery Hotspur; but, whatever deficiency there was on the part of the debutantes, was amply made up by the truly artistical skill of Keeley in the little part of the First Carrier, in which he was beyond description admirable.

The new farce went off capitally. Mrs. Keeley's swagger in the exuberance of Dutch trowsers and deshabille was ludicrously contrasted by the timidity and faint-heartedness of her attendant, which part was enacted by Keeley in a most laughable manner. It was highly successful.

Our illustration refers to the last scene in the play, where the following dialogue occurs:—

P. Hen. Why, Percy I kill'd myself, and saw thee dead.

Fals.—Didst thou?—Lord, lord, how this world is given to lying!—I grant you I was down, and out of breath, and so was he: but we rose both at an instant, and fought a long hour by Shrewsbury clock. If I may be believed, so: if not, let them, that should reward valour, bear the sin upon their own heads. I'll take it upon my death, I gave him this wound in the thigh: if the man were alive, and would deny it, I would make him eat a piece of my sword.

Mr. W. H. HOLMES. Nothing but soirées musicales at present en vogue. This distinguished professor has announced that at Willis's Rooms he will give three of them in the course of the present and ensuing month. We have no doubt but there will be "not few, but many things well worth the hearing."

SOCIETA ARMONICA.—This most praiseworthy society, actuated by the best intentions for the promotion, or rather the restoration of the musical art in this country, has made splendid preparations for their next campaign, which will commence on Monday, March 18. All the stars of the opera will shed their vocal brilliancy upon each night of performance; and, from what we learn, some extraordinary musical comets also are on their way to pay their respects to us. Independent of these, our native talent will be "strong in the field," so that altogether we may anticipate a most brilliant season.

MISS M. SMITH.—It is with the sincerest gratification that we find a young lady, professing to be a professor of harmony, for never before in our memory did a lady make pretension to any acquaintance with counterpoint, barring one or two exceptions, and which exceptions "only prove the rule." This lady has announced three soirées to take place in the course of the three ensuing months. Some first-rate talent has been already announced for the occasion—the "indispensable" John Parry, of facetious notoriety, being included. We heartily wish the fair contrapantist every success in her undertaking.

SCENE FROM SH. KEPPARE'S PLAY OF HENRY IV., PART I., AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE.—THE DEATH OF HOTSPUR.

THE ADOPTED;

OR,

IMPULSE NOT PRINCIPLE.

BY MISS CAMILLA TOULMIN.

CONCLUSION.

How it is not a very common thing for rich persons to adopt poor children; but it is far too common for unfeeling ones, from what is called kindness, but is cruelty, merely to gratify the caprice of a day, or a week, or a month, to unfit their humble friends for the duties and happiness of their own station. God forbid that I should seem for a moment to speak slightingly of the humblest born, the poorest, or even the most ignorant; it is the performance of our duties in our station, whatever that station may be, which gives true respectability; it is moral worth which can make the peasant equal or superior to the prince, or, as Burns in his own rich coinage hath it,

"The rank is but the guinea's stamp,
The man's the gowd for a' that."

And it is because there is true happiness to be found in every station, that it is so great a mischief to unfit anyone for that to which he or she is born, unless we have the power to place them absolutely in another. As for those who possess great talents it is another question; let such know and remember, that genius has the right as well as the power to make its path upwards—the "diamond" with which "to cut its bright way through" all obstacles.

But I am digressing. That Ellen Greyleigh felt something of all this may account for her tears; but the page she had just read in James Ainington's character was far more painful. She had been trying for some time to school her heart—and hard the task—to hate him; and, as the surest way, had tried to persuade herself that she was dear to him. Now, she knew it was no lover who scorned her humble family, and reproved herself so harshly. Yet, with this knowledge came a joyful thought, like one bright star in a dark night, the thought, the conviction, that she never should be his; the sacrifice was greater than even her guardians had a right to demand; and for the first time she saw clearly what her duties were to them, and what she also owed to herself. Mr. James Ainington showed yet more clearly his own ignorance mind, by continuing his harsh and unfeeling remonstrance during the drive home. Nevertheless, Ellen's tears were dried, when they alighted, and a resolution more than half formed, of telling Mrs. Ainington the real state of her heart, with as little delay as possible. Alas! for our intentions! During the absence, Mrs. Ainington had, in a fit of coughing, ruptured a blood-vessel, and in a few hours she was no more!

It has often been remarked that when two old persons, who have lived in happiness and affection from early years together, are at last separated by the cold hand of death, the blow shakes rudely out the few remaining sands of the survivor. It has always seemed to me one of the many merciful dispensations by which we are governed that it should be so. How strong must be the chain of habit and affection, which forty, fifty, sixty years have woven! Why, the strongest love of the young seems, by comparison, but the love of yesterday. Mr. Ainington was no exception to the rule. From the day of his wife's death he sank rapidly; his memory began to fail; it was evident his mind was tottering; and in less than a month he was seized with paralysis.

It has been said that Ellen felt her duties to be clearly defined; and it was this knowledge which supported her in the natural anguish of her bereavement, and sustained her through every trial. Wonderful were her exertions in the sick room, unwearied her gentle care and tender watching. But it was no part of her duty to dream of any future self-sacrifice to James Ainington; and even in the house of mourning and of sickness she had found the opportunity of intimating to him as much. It may be easily imagined that a nature like his was stung to the quick, by the rejection of the miller's daughter; but, as there was something about her which he could not despise, his feelings rankled very nearly to hatred.

Mr. Hardwick was frequently in attendance; but his practice had so much increased, that it was impossible for him to remain at the Hall more than an hour or two at a time. It was on an occasion when a marked change, apparently for the better, had taken place in the patient, that Mr. Hardwick beckoned Ellen from the room.

"Dear Miss Greyleigh," said he, taking her hand, "this is an hour in which we must all act. And I call upon you, for your own sake, and for the sake of those you love best, to conquer as much as possible the outward display of feelings and prove your firmness. First send off the fleetest servant to the nearest lawyer, that he may be in readiness, should we need his services, if, as I fear—or perhaps I should say, hope—he may be wanted. You told me the other day, in answer to my question, that you believed Mr. Ainington had made no new will, though all you knew was, that he had, since his poor wife's death, destroyed the one he signed some twenty years ago, declaring his intention of speedily preparing another. Since the fit his mind has never been, until now, in a state in which I could conscientiously speak to him on such a subject; and, alas! unless all my experience deceives me, this is the last flicker of reason. I shall return to his bedside, and I only charge you to take care that for the next half hour we are not interrupted."

"It is of me you are thinking," said Ellen, wringing her hands, "better—far better, I should be penniless, than his last moments so distracted."

"You say so now," returned the other, "and I honour you for the feeling. But believe me, I should think that I shared in the guilt of others delay and indecision, did I lose the present opportunity," and so saying he left her without waiting for an answer.

Let us not linger over the harrowing scene which followed; the regret for past negligence, and the anguish which dictated a lavish, and almost unwise atonement. Mr. Ainington soon became again speechless, though the last words he did utter were a blessing on "his child," as he called Ellen Greyleigh. A state of insensibility quickly followed, and in a few hours all was over.

"I tell you candidly," whispered Mr. Hardwick to Ellen, a few minutes before the will was opened, "that it was not I who recommended you should have so large a fortune; I only desired to see you with a suitable independence. Yet, as the wife of the heir-at-law, it can signify little."

Ellen a pale cheek crimsoned as she answered through her tears, "His wife Never."

"Indeed!" was the only word with which Mr. Hardwick could reply, for at that moment they were called to listen to the reading of the will. It was very short. The limited property was entailed; there were legacies to a few old servants, and to Ellen Greyleigh was bequeathed the sum of fifty thousand pounds!

James Aimington almost started from his chair when he heard the words, yet he managed to listen with composure to the few remaining sentences.

Gentlemen," said he, when the reading was concluded, "I beg to give you notice that I shall dispute this will. It is true the ink is scarcely dry, and the witnesses to the signature are all present; but my lamented cousin was not, for many weeks before his death, in a fit state to execute any such document."

Walter Hardwick trembled, for at a glance he saw, what before had not occurred to him, that however admirable our laws, law and justice might not in this instance prove on the same side of the question.

"Take me home, to my own old home," murmured Ellen to a lady, a friend of the Aimingtons, who had passed the last few mournful weeks at the Hall, "take me home, dear lady."

"Nay, nay," was the reply, "I will stay with you here, or you shall go home with me. We know not yet," she continued with spirit, "that this gentleman has the power to injure you; and if the power be his, I cannot think he dare neglect his cousin's dying wishes and leave destitute one who was dear to him as a child."

"This is not the time, Madam, to speak of these things; though I may tell you that partly suspecting the state of the case, I have already consulted my lawyers. There is no doubt of our setting aside the will—though probably I shall provide for this young person."

"Take me home—home" again murmured Ellen, and Walter Hardwick sighed out "It is best."

Alas! the threat of the heir at law was carried out;—the will was set aside. None but a stranger lawyer, and friendly doctor, could speak to the testator's soundness of mind. All other testimony was against it, and even the acknowledgment of the lawyer that Mr. Hardwick had suggested to the dying man, that the legacy to Ellen should be smaller, was construed as proof that he feared its magnitude would draw attention to the legality of the will itself. It must be remembered that the country medical attendant had not seen poor Mr. Aimington during the hour's "flicker of reason;"—and legal evidence overpowered a sense of justice

Many were the friends of the dead, who partly out of respect to their memory, and partly from kindly feelings towards herself, invited Ellen to become, at least for a while, their guest; but firmly, though gratefully, she declined all such invitations. Her heart ached at the thought of leaving the home of her infancy "on sufferance;" yet it yearned for affection, and a home feeling, and these she knew would be hers once more at the mill. But we have said before that Ellen Greyleigh was clearly her duties, and fervently praying, as she did, to be able to fulfil them, it was no part of her plan to remain a burthen on her honest, industrious parents. No; she would heal her own sorrows, and gladden their hearts by passing a few weeks or even months with them. And then she would go into a school as junior teacher, for the opportunity of improving herself; for though Ellen was in reality, from mere reading and conversation, better informed, more cosmopolitanable, than many "accomplished girls are found to be, her education had been so irregular, that a course of training was still necessary before she could become an efficient teacher. These were her plans (or a wretched patience, Mr. James Aimington offered as charity, neither she nor her parents would accept), but what said Walter Hardwick?

Kind reader, let us once more return in thought to the old mill, and the old farm house; not that they seem to have grown any older than when we first spoke of them. It is the same large kitchen, with the spacious chimney corner, and the oaken rafters (verily, one could believe with the sc.f same sides of bacon hanging therefrom), as that in which we first saw Ellen Greyleigh, the blue-eyed child of four years old, dressed in the rarest frock, with the scarlet poppy stuck therein. The comely dame of five-and-thirty is now a care-worn woman of fifty. Greyleigh, the miller, looks what we left the old man. Punch has been dead 6 years, and his successor has not yet quite determined whether to be friends or not with the stranger, who, attired in the deepest, but plainest mourning, sits listening with exemplary patience to the family reading of her youngest sister, the sometime baby of the cradle. All the family are attired in some show of mourning, but none is so decided as that of Ellen. How they listen to every word that falls from her lips—what an eager look is cast on their countenances when she speaks! should have been more "spoilt" at home than ever she was by those who adopted her. And perhaps she is right, for people who are in a false position must be subject to many trials of temper. Amid all her sorrows, too, her heart has been gladdened by hearing that things have gone on better of late; the mortgage is nearly paid, and Johnny is doing well. How eagerness are some than ever toward up to be her own "daddy!" and yet she is rather wondering that for a whole week she has not heard from one whom she calls her kindest friend

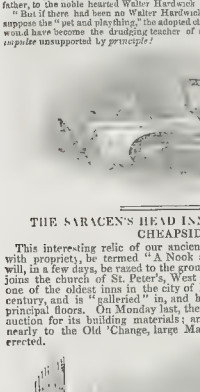
The latch is raised and Walter Hardwick enters. It is his first introduction at the farm, but as he steps across the sanded floor, he does not seem at all to observe that he is not treading on the softest carpet. He shakes the miller's hand warmly, and offers a greeting to his wife; to the rest he gives a kind nod, but perhaps he holds it a second longer. How completely he has put them all at their ease!

We do not know half of the kind that he, though we know pretty nearly for what purpose he came. It is enough that when a few months afterwards Ellen Greyleigh put off her mourning, it was to put on a bridal dress of simple white. And a very happy bride she was: given, at that quiet wedding, by her grey headed father, to the noble hearted Walter Hardwick.

"But if there had been no Walter Hardwick?" asks the reader. Why then I suppose she "sat and plaughing," the adopted child, reared in luxury and elegance would have become the drudging teacher of a school-room; the victim of good inspirits unsupported by principle!

THE SARACEN'S HEAD INN, FRIDAY-STREET, CHEAPSIDE.

This interesting relic of our ancient metropolis, or what might, with propriety, be termed "A Nook and Corner of Old London," will, in a few days, be razed to the ground. The Saracen's Head adjoins the church of St. Peter's, West Chesp, in Friday-street; it is one of the oldest inns in the city of London, probably of the 15th century, and is "galleried" in, and has a balcony in front of the principal floors. On Monday last, the property was disposed of by auction for its building materials; and on its site, which extends nearly to the Old 'Change, large Manchester warehouses will be erected.



THE SARACEN'S HEAD INN.

This inn was extensively connected with coach proprietors and waggon carriers down the Great Western road, the traffic of which was broken up by the establishment of the railways. The house adjoining, No. 5, Friday-street, which is part of the above property, is said to have been in the occupation of Sir Christopher Wren at the time of the erection of St. Paul's. The estate belongs to the Merchant Tailors' Company.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

It is stated that several parties in the city of Bristol who have hitherto borne an irreproachable character are deeply implicated in the Will Forgeries. Two of the old Bow-street officers are busily employed in tracing the ramification of this ingenious swindler, but as yet no further apprehensions have taken place. The under-mentioned gentlemen were called to the bar by the Honourable Society of the Inner Temple on Saturday last. William Nathaniel Massey, Esq., Robert Moon, Esq., M.A., Henry Linwood Strong, Esq., Woodforde Foxlee, Esq., M.A., Frederick Goulburn, Esq., M.A., Charles John Bayley, Esq., M.A.

The Coroner's jury at Taunton have found a verdict of wilful murder against Mary and Faith Seale for the murder of their father. The prisoner Faith made a confession of guilt, and a detailed statement of the whole circumstances of the poisoning.

James Matheson, Esq., M.P. for Ashburton, has just purchased the noble mansion in Cleveland-row, adjoining Sutherland House, so long the town residence of the Earl of Durham.

The rumour concerning a vacancy in the representation of the borough of Dudley turns out to be unfounded. Mr. Hawkes, the present member, who, with his family, is now residing in the south of France, has paired off with Captain Vivian until Easter, at which period he will resume his parliamentary duties.

At a commission of lunacy held at Red Lion-square on Monday last to inquire into the state of mind of Joshua Richard Wilkinson, Esq., described as late of Batley Hall, Staffordshire, in the county of Kent, gentleman, and now an inmate of Dr. Warburton's lunatic asylum, the jury found that the unfortunate gentleman had been of unsound mind since December 1841.

A subscription is in contemplation at Folkestone, to erect a monument to the memory of the celebrated Dr. Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood.

Several pro-corn lawmeetings have been held throughout the country during the past week, at which many Noblemen and Members of Parliament have been present. The object was to form societies to counteract the influence of the Anti-Corn law League, and the agitation appears to become somewhat general.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—FRIDAY.—The quantity of English wheat on show here to day was extremely limited, and neither the demand for it was at all brisk, nor the currency. Monday's prices were supported. For foreign wheat there was a fair retail trade at full previous rates. The supply of barley was small. Milling parcels sold freely, other kinds scarcely at stationary prices. The demand for malt was slow; but as the quantity on offer was not large, prices were supported. Oats, beans, peas, and flour moved off slowly at previous currencies.

ARRIVALS.—English: Wheat, [illegible] barley, [illegible] oats, [illegible] quarters. Irish: oats, 7600 quarters. Foreign: Wheat, 1360 quarters; barley, 720 quarters; flour, 2420 sacks. Malt, [illegible] quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 40s to 48s; ditto, white, 44s to 48s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 42s to 45s; ditto, white, 46s to 50s; Rye, 28s to 30s, grinding barley, 23s to 25s; distilling ditto, 26s to 31s; malting ditto, 33s to 36s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 60s to 62s; brown ditto, 56s to 58s; Kingston and Ware, 60s to 62s; Chevalier ditto, 64s; Yorkshire and Lincoln feed oats, 21s to 22s, potatoe ditto, 22s to 23s; Youghal and Cork, black, 18s to 19s, ditto white 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 38s to 40s, ditto, old, 34s to 35s; grey peas, [illegible] boilers, [illegible] white, 32s to 36s; boilers, 34s to 35s, per quarter. Town made flour, [illegible] Suffolk, to 60s, Stockton and Yorkshire, 38s to 40s, per 28 lbs. Seconds and [illegible] ditto, 36s to 38s. Essex and Kent, [illegible] to 40s. Irish, [illegible] to 36s; ditto, new, [illegible] to 34s; Scotch feed, 32s to 34s; ditto, new, [illegible] to 30s; ditto, fine, [illegible] to 36s; Foreign [illegible] to 32s, peas, 32s to 34s, per quarter. Flour, American, [illegible] to 24s; Italian, 21s to 22s, per barrel.

Imperial Weekly Averages.—Wheat, [illegible] barley, 32s 8d; oats, 19s 7½d, 32s 4d; beans 37s 6d; peas, 36s 10d.

The Six Weeks' Average which governs Duty.—Wheat, 57s 9d; barley, 32s 10d; oats, 18s 8d rye, 31s 6d, beans, 37s 10d; peas, 36s 10d.

Duties.—Wheat, 5s; barley, 3s; oats, 2s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 11s 6d; peas, 10s 6d.

The Seed Market There has been rather a better demand for red and white clover seed since our last, at full quotations, but, in other kinds of seeds, next to nothing has been transacted.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 50s to 60s; Baltic crushing, 40s to 42s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 38s to 39s; bengal seed, 38s to 39s per quarter; rapeseed, 18s to 20s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 12s to 18s; white ditto, 16s to 24s; tares, 40s to 46s per bushel; English sanfoin, new, 32s to 42s per last of 10 quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 4l to 4l 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s to 5l 10s per ton; canary, 8s to 8s 6d per bush.

Bread.—The prices of the wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 6½d to 8d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6d per 4lb loaf.

Flour.—This article has ruled flat, but holders do not give way to any extent.

Spices. The cinnamon sales have gone off tolerably well, at but little variation in prices. For pepper the demand is steady, at full quotations. Cloves and nutmegs are quite as dear.

Provisions. For Irish butter we have a better demand, at full quotations. In foreign butter not much is doing from our last report.

Tallow.—The article is quiet: a fair business has been done, yet prices have a downward tendency. Russ I parcels of P.Y.C. produce 41s. For forward delivery scarcely anything is doing, at 41s 6d to 42s per cwt.

Lards. Adam, 14s; Chester Main, 18s; Holywell Main, 19s 6d; New Tanfield, 14s 6d; Tanfield Moor, 19s 6d; Bowes, 20s; Whitwell, 22s 3d; Sunderland, 12s; Gateshead, 20s; Belmont, 19s, per ton. Shags arrived, 53.

Hops.—Although the amount of business doing in new hops the week has not been to any extensive, the quotations are steadily supported in every instance. The value of old hops is still slightly on the advance, with a very limited quantity on show. Weald of Kent pockets, £6 4s to £8 10s; Mid Kent, £6 15s to £9 10s; East Kent, £6 15s to £9 10s; ditto, choice, £10 to £11 11s; Sussex, £6 to £8 12s; Farnham, £8 15s to £11 15s; Mid Kent bags, £5 12s to £9 10s.

Wool.—Several public sales of wool have been held this week. At these sections—ensuring about 6000 bales and bags—the holdings have been tolerably well, but full prices.

Potatoes. Although the arrivals of potatoes continue large, the sale for them is steady, at rather improved rates

Smithfield.—Notwithstanding the supply of beasts on sale in our market of to day was very moderate, the beef trade, owing to the thin attendance of buyers, was in a sluggish state and, in some instances, the quotations had a downward tendency. The number of sheep was unusually small. Prime old Downs sold briskly, at an advance of 2d per 8lbs; but the value of all other kinds remained unaltered. Calves were in short supply, and active demand, at full rates. Pigs moved off slowly, yet late currencies were supported. In milch cows very little was doing, at from £16 to £18 each. Per 8lbs, to sink the offal—Inferior beasts, 2s 6d to 3s 2d; second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime large oxen, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 10d to 4s 0d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; second quality ditto, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; prime ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 2d; prime Southdowns ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 6d; large coarse calves, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; prime small ditto, 4s 8d to 5s 0d; large hogs, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; suckling calves, 18s to 30s; quarter old store pigs, 16s to 21s each. Beasts, 519; sheep, 2280; calves, 134; pigs, 293.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—We had a very heavy trade over both to day, at the following quotations:—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling ditto, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; prime large ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; prime small ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; large pork, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; inferior ditto, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; prime small ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; veal, 4s 0d to 4s 10d; small pork, 3s 6d to 4s 4d; per 8 lbs. by the carcass. ROBT. HERBERT.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The difficulties in the way of the productive employment of capital continue rather to increase than otherwise, and accordingly the money market, throughout this week, a considerable degree of animation has prevailed. On the value of shares generally this continued pressure of money has had a favourable effect, for the generality of all descriptions of these securities are again higher than we quoted them in our last publication. In leading lines of railway associations the favourable alteration is particularly observable, for the transactions in all of them have been very considerable, and the prices of many of them decisive, as our readers may gather from a reference to our quotations. Still, however, railway property gains on the good dividends which the companies will be enabled to pay on the present amounts income occur, still it pays fair rates of profit for the money invested in it, at the present quotations. That, however, is the opinion of many capitalists, and hence the pressure into the exercises with which sales can now be effected contradicts. Indeed the present rate, the exercises with which sales can now be effected contradicts. Indeed the present rate, the exercises with which sales can now be effected contradicts. Indeed the present rate,

JUST OUT,

THE SISTERS.—One volume 8vo. to be had at all the Libraries. The new novel by HENRY COCKTON, reprinted from the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, embellished with one hundred engravings, price 7s. 6d. Office, 198, Strand.

THE WORLD OF LONDON

Beautifully printed in foolscap 8vo.; may be had, either in One or in Two Volumes, price only Five Shillings.

THE WORLD OF LONDON. By JOHN FISHER MURRAY. Originally published in Blackwood's Magazine.—"Compounding the whole of human life in all its variety, the contemplation of which is inexhaustible."—London: Printed for THOMAS TEGG, 73, Cheapside, and may be procured by order of all booksellers.

BREAKFAST TABLE SCIENCE.

In a pocket Volume, embellished with Two Scenic Engravings, price 7s. 6d. bound,

BREAKFAST TABLE SCIENCE: written expressly for the amusement and instruction of young people, by J. H. WARDE. The Third Edition.—London: Printed for THOMAS TEGG, 73, Cheapside, where also may be had, a New Edition of MARY HOWITT'S Popular Story of Strive and Thrive. Price Two Shillings and Sixpence

With a beautiful Illustration in Oil COLOURS, 12mo., price 7s. 6d.

ADVICE on the CARE of the TEETH and on the best means of RESTORING them when LOST. By EDWIN SAUNDERS, M.R.C.S., Lecturer on the Anatomy and Diseases of the Teeth at St. Thomas's Hospital, author of "Dr. Teste, a Tour of Age," &c.

"A work which should be in the hands of all who regard their health, comfort, or personal appearance.—Standard

WARD and Co., Paternoster-row; H. RENSHAW, 356, Strand, and to be had of the Author 16, Argyll street

SACRED MUSIC.—Part I. RENSHAW, 356, Strand, and to be had of the BRITISH MERCURY, to be published on the 1st of February, 1844, in addition to the usual amount of standard Music, Songs, Duets, Glees, &c., the first of a series of Three Original Sacred Compositions by the Composer Resolcomm, for four voices, with accompaniments for organ or pianoforte.—Glasgow: W. HASTIE, 139, Brunswick street: J. MENZIES and SON Edinburgh; MACKEN, Dublin; and SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, and Co., London, and may be had by order of any bookseller

HOOD'S MAGAZINE AND COMIC MISCELLANY for FEBRUARY. Contents: The Lady's Dream. The Strange Student. The Bird Bride. Nature and Art. The Schoolmaster's Dream; by Mrs S. C. Hall, Pastoral. The Oxford Examination; by Shum Cuticle, Esq. The Pilgrim's Dream. A Nest for Roses. The Struggle for Fame, by Charles Mackay. A Vision of Past Times. A Song for Gentlemen. A Child of Sorrow. Life's Commerce; by Charles Mackay. Gaiter's Travels in Spain. The First Valentine. Fifty Days on board a Slaver. The House of Mourning. A Farce. Phebe's Window. A Romance of the Second Lane. Magnetic Musings. The Echo. Office, 1, Adam Street, Adelphi, and all booksellers.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE, for FEBRUARY, Price One Shilling, contains. Blanks and Prizes, or, The Wheel of Fortune: a Tale by Mrs Gore, continued Tytler's History of Scotland; Concluding Volume. Literary Sketches. No. III. My Neighbourhood. Reminiscences of Mrs. Opie: No. I. An Evening Party at the Dowager Countess of C——'s. The New Novels. "The Rule of the Family" and "Harry Muir." Ben Gualtier and his Friends. Poetry. Literary Register. Essays of an Invalid. &c

WILLIAM TAIT, Edinburgh: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, and Co., London.

FRASER'S MAGAZINE for FEBRUARY, Price 2s. 6d., Contains:—1 French University Writers. 2. Fanny Kemble in Paris. 3 A Box of Novels. Harry Lorrequer and his Critics, Tom Burke of "Ours." &c. 4. Jy Lover The Bayonne Bather of Brittany. 5. Dr. Maginn. 6. Shooting Reminiscences. 7. The Speculative Farmside, a Pluralist Study. 8. The Drama. 7 The Luck of Barry Lyndon; a Romance of the last century. By Fitz Boodle. 8. Great Cures; their Decline and Fall. 9. The Artist's Despair. 10. Reminiscences of Men and Things, by One who has a good Memory. The Prince de Metternich, Part 2. 11. Translations of Provençal and French Songs 12 The State and Prospects of the Government Question.

G. W. NICKISSON, 214, Regent-street, London.

THE ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE, for FEBRUARY, Price One Shilling, Edited by CHARLES JEROLD, contains the following Original Articles, with Illustrations by Gilbert, Leech, Hine, Prior, Heming, Charles Martin, and Fussell. The British Museum, by Labre. The Broken Hearted Club—No 7. The Mystery of having a Red Nose, by Mrs Shelton. Sonnet. The Spectre, or the Demon Governess, by Charles Hooton. Beaus of England. Travel and Talk (Recollections of Italy), by Lyle Redde, M.D. To Charles Dickens, on his "Christmas Carol." Bachelor Pleasures of Parisian Life.—The Grisette, by Mrs. Postans The Thirteenth Canto, a Legend of Old London, by Angus B. Reach. A few Words about Tobacco, by Medicus. Poetry, &c.

Office, No. 2, Crane-court, Fleet-street.—Sold by all Booksellers

THE DUBLIN UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE, for FEBRUARY, price 2s. 6d. contains: L'Elisée Apocryphe. The Mixtape of Mister Latitat Fashion, slavery, and Ecclesiastical Vice in the Sister Island: Chapt. I. to IV. Life of General Grifin. Stray Leaflets from the German Oak. Frith Path. An Ecclesiastical Legislature: No. II. Conversations. Stranger and his songs: by William Dowe. The Present State, Resources, and Prospects of Art. A Bevy of Little Lyrics. Enquiries and Replies. Abstracts of Parian Life.—The Grisette, by Mrs. Postens The Thirteenth Canto, a Legend of Old London, by Angus B. Reach. A few Words about Tobacco, by Medicus. Poetry, &c.

Office, No. 2, Crane-court, Fleet-street.—Sold by all Booksellers

THE DUBLIN UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE, for FEBRUARY, price 2s. 6d. contains: L'Elisée Apocryphe. The Mixtape of Mister Latitat Fashion, slavery, and Ecclesiastical Vice in the Sister Island: Chapt. I. to IV. Life of General Grifin. Stray Leaflets from the German Oak. Frith Path. An Ecclesiastical Legislature: No. II. Conversations. Stranger and his songs: by William Dowe. The Present State, Resources, and Prospects of Art. A Bevy of Little Lyrics. Enquiries and Replies. Abstracts of Parian Life.—The Grisette, by Mrs. Postans The Thirteenth Canto, a Legend of Old London, by Angus B. Reach. A few Words about Tobacco, by Medicus. Poetry, &c.

Office, No. 2, Crane-court, Fleet-street.—Sold by all Booksellers

MONASTIC and SOCIAL LIFE in the TWELFTH CENTURY, as exemplified in the Chronicles of Jocelin of Brakelond, Monk of the Edmundsbury, from the 1173 to 1203 Translated, from the original Latin, by THOMAS TEGG, for the Camden Society, under the superintendence of JOHN GAGE ROKEWOOD, Esq. F.S.A. and Member of the Council. With Illustrations, by the Rev. Joseph Hunter, Esq., Editor of "Lotharii Tractatus," &c., Forming a portion of WHITTAKER'S POPULAR LIBRARY of Modern and standard Works, beautifully, printed in the same manner as the Cabinet Cyclopædia Works, Historical, Biographical, &c., heretofore published at very high prices, but now varying from One Shilling upwards. A full descriptive catalogue of the series can be obtained through any bookseller.—WHITTAKER and Co., Ave Maria-lane

PHILLIPS'S WORKS of ENTERTAINMENT and INSTRUCTION

THE ANECDOTE LIBRARY, consisting of several thousand anecdotes, from scarce and authentic sources. 18mo., 10s. 6d. bound

THE WONDERS of the UNITED KINGDOM, describing all the curiosities of nature and art, in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. Illustrated. By the Rev. [illegible] 12mo., 12s bd

THE LADY'S HOUSEHOLD, or Whist Self-Taught. By Mrs. [illegible] 12mo., 12s bd

GALT'S PLAYERS, or anecdotes gathered from Legal, Scottish, and Irish History 2 vols 12mo., 12s

L'ENFANT PRODIGUE, a moral tale, in French, with illustrations. 24mo., price 3s. bound

PRIOR'S UNIVERSAL TRAVELLER, describing all the striking objects, &c., of all nations. 12mo., 10s 6d. with [illegible]

THE SCOTSMAN'S LIBRARY, containing the genius of Scotland. 12mo., 10s. 6d bound.

WHITTAKER and Co., Ave Maria-lane

PHILLIPS'S HISTORICAL and BIOGRAPHICAL WORKS for SCHOOLS.

ROBINSON'S GRAMMAR of UNIVERSAL HISTORY, with 500 Questions Annexed. 21st edition. 18mo., price 3s. 6d.

ROBINSON'S ABRIDGMENT of HUME and SMOLLETT'S HISTORIES of ENGLAND with 140 Engravings. Tenth edition, 12mo. 6s. bound.

ROBINSON'S MODERN HISTORY of NATIONS, brought down to the Treaty of Vienna. New edition, 12mo., 5s. bound.

ADAIR'S QUESTIONS on the Current Editions of GOLDSMITH'S HISTORY of ENGLAND 18mo. 1s. sewed

GOLDSMITH'S BIOGRAPHICAL CLASS BOOK, contain [illegible] ers, from Homer to 1830. Arranged as Lessons for every day in the year. With numerous Portraits. 18th edition, 12mo., price 6s. bound.

RUNDALL'S GRAMMAR of SACRED HISTORY, with Maps and Engravings. 18mo., 4s., bound

WATKINS'S SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY; or, Lives of Scripture Characters from Adam to St. Paul. 34th edit. 12mo., 7s.

NIGHTINGALE'S ACCOUNT of all RELIGIONS, with 100 Engravings. 10th edition, 12mo., price 10s. 6d. bound.

RARDHOW'S 300 QUESTIONS on the NEW TESTAMENT. 18mo., 1s. sewed.

BARROWS 500 QUESTIONS on the OLD TESTAMENT. 18mo., 1s., sewed.

WHITTAKER and Co., Ave Maria-lane

For February, 1844, price Sixpence, No. 2, New Series of

THE LADIES' CABINET of FASHION, MUSIC, and ROMANCE. Greatly Enlarged and Improved. Containing Ten splendid Engravings and Fifty pages of Literary and Fashionable matter, beautifully printed on fine wove paper. The large accession of subscribers during the past year to this long established and well known Family Magazine and Library of Female Literature, Fashion, and the Fine Arts, aptly styled the Table Book and Boudoir Companion for the Ladies, has at once suggested the propriety of making a large addition to the literary contents and embellishments for the new year. In order to give fresh and varied interest and the choice of variety in its pages, we have engaged the services of several eminent writers to furnish us with original contributions, besides others familiarly conversant with the literature of the continent, who will supply translations from the purest and most br. lant productions of the living authors of Germany, France, and Italy, as well as occasional specimens of the literature of Spain, Sweden, and Denmark The Ladies' Cabinet will thus present its readers with a rare feast of the literature of the world. It will also continue to maintain its position as the highest authority in fashion; and the arrangements for the early receipt of all the Parisian costumes will enable the proprietor to give the newest, as his arrangements with first-rate artists will ensure the most finished and elegant Fashion Plates that have ever appeared in any magazine.—London: G. HERBERSON, Old Bailey

THE LADIES' CABINET of FASHION, MUSIC, and ROMANCE. Greatly Enlarged and Improved. Containing Ten splendid Engravings and Fifty pages of Literary and Fashionable matter, beautifully printed on fine wove paper. The large accession of subscribers during the past year to this long established and well known Family Magazine and Library of Female Literature, Fashion, and the Fine Arts, aptly styled the Table Book and Boudoir Companion for the Ladies, has at once suggested the propriety of making a large addition to the literary contents and embellishments for the new year. In order to give fresh and varied interest and the choice of variety in its pages, we have engaged the services of several eminent writers to furnish us with original contributions, besides others familiarly conversant with the literature of the continent, who will supply translations from the purest and most br. lant productions of the living authors of Germany, France, and Italy, as well as occasional specimens of the literature of Spain, Sweden, and Denmark The Ladies' Cab net will thus present its readers with a rare feast of the literature of the world. It will also continue to maintain its position as the highest authority in fashion; and the arrangements for the early receipt of all the Parisian costumes will enable the proprietor to give the newest, as his arrangements with first-rate artists will ensure the most finished and elegant Fashion Plates that have ever appeared in any magazine.—London: G. HERBERSON, Old Bailey

THE NEW MONTHLY BELLE ASSEMBLÉE for FEBRUARY, a Fashionable and Literary Magazine, under the immediate patronage of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, is beautifully illustrated with highly finished Portraits of the Nobility, and contains two coloured Plates of the Fashions, finished in the first style, as they arrive monthly.

Contents: St. Valentine's Day, by W. G. J. Barker, Esq. To the Snow drop. The Water-spirit, by Elizabeth Tourett. Sonnet, by Emily Bud. Manor Morals, or Miss Lacy's Maids Twaimy. The Lover Lonely Maid by Angus Bethune Reach. "The old Year and the New King," by George Linnæus Banks. The First and Last Parting. Farewell to Love, by E. Glanville. A Sister's Memory, by Grace Gordon. Hints for Pattern, by Mrs Camilla Toulmin Woe to the Wilful, by Vincent Leigh Hunt. My Portrait Gallery. No II., by Calder Campbell. The Caverns, by Mrs. Jones on the Death of Mr. C. Lloyd, by Mrs. S. M Song of Exile, by Richard Ingoldsby. Song of the Moon by Night, by W. Tagart. The Overture, by Miss Anne Maria Sargeant. "Our Bad is New," by Eglantine. Charles Willett: a Tale of the Revolution. The Footman, by Charles Hooton. Hand. The Proud Ladye. St. Elmo. An Impromptu to Nature. Poetical Portraits, No III., by Mona Lonington. "The One I Love so Well" by Adis. Broken Vows. A legend of the Twelfth Century. "True Friendship." Our Boudoir Table. La Revue Musicale. Announcements of the Month. Fashions for February. Description of the Plates. Parisian Sketches. To Correspondents.

"This Magazine should find its way into every drawing-room in the kingdom."—The News. "In every respect well worthy the distinguished patronage conferred on the work —Exeter Gazette. "A great acquisition to the fashionable world."—Reading Mercury "The elegant and amusing periodical deserves well the patronage of the female sex."—Newcastle Courant.

May be had, by order, of all booksellers. Office, 74, Norfolk street, Strand, London.

THE MEDICAL TIMES of to-day contains (Price 5d.) 96 Quarto Columns of closely-printed Medical Intelligence. Among the articles will be found a verbatim Report of the Great Meeting at Freemasons' Hall, to consider the Charter of the College of Surgeons. Lectures by Mr. Brodie, Dr. Prout [illegible] a letter from Paris, containing all fresh improvements in Surgery, combining everything of value in the English Medical Journals. Reviews, &c., with about 100 articles of great value to the medical and scientific reader.—Price 5d., stamped, 6d., or by post order 25 1s. per annum in advance to the publisher, J. A. CARPAR, 49, Essex-street, Strand.

BY COMMAND. UNDER THE ESPECIAL PATRONAGE OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT.

THE SPORTING REVIEW for FEBRUARY, 1844, is beautifully embellished with TWO SPLENDID STEEL ENGRAVINGS, viz.—

FARE THOUGHTSONE, engraved by S. Harper, from a Painting by J. F. HERRING, sen. and [illegible]—WILD FOWL SHOOTING IN THE HEBRIDES by MOONLIGHT, Designed and Engraved by H. Bentwith.

Contents:—Hyde Mansion, or Recreations of a Sportsman's Life, by the Editor, Chapter XXXVII. Notitia Venatica, by R. L. Vyner, Esq. The Horse of the Cape of Good Hope, by F. R. Surtees, Esq. Lines to the Memory of George Templer, Esq., by Merlin Sporting Peregrinations; the Duke of Rutland's, Duke of Beaufort's, Lord Redesdale's, and Lord Gifford's Hounds, by Robin Hood. The Horse and the Hound, by Trunby. Sporting Writers. Thomas Smith, late Master of the Craven Hounds, by Nimrod. Wild Sports in the West, by P. St. John, Esq. The Steeple Chase, by Castor. Words for Music, by W. Kenney, Esq. The Life of a Jockey, by Lord William Lennox. A Day on the Irish Mountains, by Skirmisher. The Horse and his Management at Home and Abroad, by H. D. Richardson, S.E.H.S. Reliance for the Season. And on the 1st February, by Pincator Hunting Memo, by Rollingwell. Public Amusements of the Metropolis. State of the Odds, &c. The Turf Register: Bodmin, Leicester, Brecon, Shore, Liverpool Autumn Meetings, Lincoln, Hampton, Hereford, and St. Leonard's, Hurst, Liverpool Autumn Meeting, Royal Caledonian Hunt and Western Meeting.

London: Sporting Review Office, 74, Norfolk street, Strand. May be had of all Booksellers

CONTRARY to all expectation, the news by the Overland Mail has produced a FALL in the price of useful TEAS. The East India Tea Company are not to be blamed for the public benefit of this fall, the bag of good sound Bancha Teas now 12s. The 8lb bag of young Hyson is one sovereign.

Offices, 9, Great St. Helen's, Bishopsgate.

CHARLES COLLING.—A Portrait of this eminent Breeder of Short Horns, with a biograph cal sketch by C. W. Johnson, Esq., appears in the "Farmer's Magazine" for February. May be had by order of all Booksellers. The Farmer's Magazine, Vol XIX., price 6s. 6d., cloth boards, is just published.

Office, 54, Norfolk street, Strand, London.

THERE is a Vacancy for an APPRENTICE to a CHYMIST, in a very Old established House. He will be treated in all respects as one of the family, and will enjoy many advantages for improvement in mind and morals, as well as in matters of business. A premium will be expected.

Apply to Geo. CLINTON, Esq., 40 St Martin's-lane

THE Toilet of Beauty furnishes innumerable proofs of the high estimation in which GOWLAND'S LOTION is held by the most distinguished possessors of brilliant complexions. This elegant preparation preserves the complexion from the effects of cutaneous malady and variable temperature, and imparts a delightful sustaining the brightest tints with which Beauty is adorned.—ROBERT SHAW, London, on the stamp—Price, 2s. 9d., 5s. 6d., 8s. 6d., 11s. Sold by all Perfumers, &c.

CUT GLASS, LAMPS, LUSTRES, &c.—WILLIAM WHITE will now sell, for Cash, by retail, the largest Stock of CUT and PLAIN GLASS ever exhibited in Ireland. Patterns matched with accuracy and despatch. The Mineral Department will feel peculiar advantage in dealing with the trade. Large orders sent to all parts of the kingdom The trade supplied as usual. WARE ROOMS, No. 3 MARLBOROUGH STREET, DUBLIN. (LATE MCAVOY'S.)

STOPPING of the SHOULDERS and the PATENT ST. JAMES'S CHEST EXPANDER.—This invisible, comfortable, and most successful means of imparting a healthful and graceful expansion of the figure, which is used in the families of eminent medical gentlemen, and by persons of all ages, is sent post paid by MR. A. BENTON, 40, Tavistock-street, Strand; or a prospectus, on receiving postage stamp

BAKER'S PHEASANTRY, BEAUFORT-STREET, KING'S ROAD, CHELSEA.—GAME of every description. Gold, Silver, White, Red, and common Pheasants for sale. Eggs and young birds during the season. Every variety of pinion's and domesticated Aquatic Fowl, for ornamental waters, Useful and Ornamental Poultry, Fancy Pigeons, Bantams' Sir Rowley Gascoyne, Caroline Ducks, Shieldrakes, &c. And at HALF-MOON PASSAGE, Gracechurch-street, City.

INCOME WITHOUT RISK.—The GOLDEN EAGLE TEA COMPANY, Established November 5th, 1918, at 23, Ludgate-hill, are now filling up their List of Agents; a remote residence of such an appointment, by which many have derived considerable incomes, without risk, during the last twenty-six years, are requested to apply to the Company at their Warehouses, 3, Lawrence Pountney-hill, London.

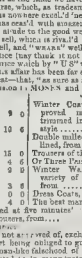
JONES' £4 4s. SILVER LEVER WATCHES are selling at the Manufactory, 338, Strand, opposite Somerset House. They comprise every modern improvement, and are warranted not to vary more than half a minute per week. This great reduction of price at once sets aside the high charges of the manufacturers or any other house.—Read Jones's Sketch of Watches, sent free for a 2d. stamp.

PIANOS TUNED FOR ONE POUND A-YEAR.—SQUARES and Cottages, 2s. 6d., Cabinets, 3s., Grands, 5s. 6d. the single Tuning. No extra charge for visits. Give one trial at home, by letter to John Peale, No. 79, Frith street, J. N most respectfully offers his services as a Pianoforte Tuner and Repairer, having had considerable experience and extensive practice in some of the most eminent Pianoforte Manufactories in London. Pianofortes repaired on reasonable terms

WOOLLEN CLOTHS, &c. &c.—Buyers of Woollens in Town and Country Trade will do well to call on GAINS and CO., 47, Ludgate-hill, to select from their extensive Stock of Worsted Coatings, Beavers, Cloths, Tweeds, Fancy Trouserings, Vestings, &c., which will be offered extremely cheap, in order to make room for Spring Goods. Tailors requiring cuts for ready money will be served on the best possible terms, participating in the great advantage of goods bought of needy manufacturers and agents for ready cash

EMPLOYMENT.—Persons having a little time to spare, are respectfully informed that Agents are wanted to be appointed in London and Country Towns for the EAST INDIA TEA COMPANY, for the sale of their celebrated TEA (Offices, 9, Great St. Helen's, Bishopsgate-street). [illegible] are allowed a handsome Commission on the amount of all orders they procure, which are regularly executed by the Company, and the money paid to them every month. [illegible] per cent. per annum, and one-third of the profits arising from the Agency, without risk or loss. Application to be made (if by letter, post-paid) as above

LOSS OF TEETH SUPPLIED without Springs, Clasps, or Wires, Loose Teeth Fastened, and Filling Decayed Teeth with Mineral Marmo Mons LE DEAY and SON, SURGEON-DENTISTS, removed from 110, Newman-street, to 42 Berners-street, Oxford street, continue to restore Decayed Teeth with their celebrated Mineral Marmoramum, applied without pain, trouble, or pressure, preventing subsequent Toothache, and rendering the operation of extraction unnecessary. They also fasten loose teeth, whether arising from age, neglect, the use of mercury, or disease of the gums. Incorrodible, Artificial, or Natural Teeth, of surpassing beauty, fixed, from one to a complete set, without extracting the roots, or giving any pain, at the following charges:—A single tooth, 10s.; a set, £5 5s. Arranged on the most approved principles, and restoring perfect articulation and mastication. At home from Ten till Six.—N.B. Removed from 66, Newman-street, to 42, Berners-street, Oxford-street



AN ELEGANT LADY'S COMPANION, price 16s. (see engraving); Elegant Rosewood Writing Desks, 12s. 6d., Lady's ditto, with secret drawers, 21s., Lady's Rosewood Dressing Case, with brushes and cutlery, 21s., Rosewood Tea Caddy, with two canisters, 21s., Lady's Rosewood Work Box, full size, and fitted complete, 21s. The largest variety of Papier Maché Elegancies. An Elegant Envelope Box, a Blotting Book, and an Inkstand, en suite, price Five Guineas for the three. These articles are of the newest design, in Papier Maché manufacture, beautifully painted with flowers.—Show rooms upstairs. BELLAMY SAVORY, Stationer, and Dress Case Maker, British Paper Warehouse, No. 46, Cornhill London

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

Her Majesty's excellent Speech from the throne
Affords us much pleasure, we candidly own:
The part, which deals as now, with the army—
But the clause touching commerce is better than any.
[illegible] MOSES and SON
[illegible]
The Queen in her Speech, spoke of commerce—and, thus,
Most sensibly touched on the subject for us.
Sir did not exactly make use of our name,
Yet that night have signified an equivalent claim;
But did she not hint at the fame we have won
At the brilliant course, which, as tradesmen, we run,
In the spirit which is now so distinctly our own,
And which never has ceas'd with assessment to scan?
Did the Queen not allude to the good we have done,
By the clothing we sell, when in rivalry seen
Which "cannot" well, and "will not" well, and Suits ev'ry one?
And address her not notice (say think of) with many—
The reductions in price which by "U S" were begun?
Yes!—and since that time has been far eclipsed again,
We [illegible] repeat—that, "as sure as a gun,"
The Queen did allude to MOSES and SON.

READY MADE.

Tegelonis, velvet collar and cuffs, lined throughout, from	0 9 0
Beaver Counterfeit, velvet collar and cuffs, lined throughout, from	0 12 6
Codringtons, Paltees, York Wrappers, &c., handsomely trimmed, from	0 15 0
Double breasted Winter Vests, from	0 3 6
Dress Coats, edged, &c., from	1 0 0
Frock do.	1 4 0

Moleskin, to any extent can be had at five minutes' notice, at the following prices.

Men's Suits, Dress coat, vest and Trousers, from	£1 16 0
Boy's do., Jacket vest and Trousers, from	0 14 0

Any article purchased, or ordered, if not approved of, exchanged, or the money returned.

CAUTION.—E. MOSES and Son regret being obliged to guard the Public against imposition, as they learn that the untradesman-like falsehood of being connected with them, or, to the same concern, has been resorted to in many instances, and for obvious reasons. They have no connexion whatever with any other Establishment; and those who desire genuine Cheap Clothing, should call or send to 154, Minories, to guard against disappointment, &c.

Observe.—E. MOSES and SON, Tailors, Wholesale Woollen Drapers and Outfitters, 154, Minories, and 36, Aldgate, City.

MUSIC ACADEMY, on LOGIER'S SYSTEM, for INSTRUCTION on the PIANOFORTE and CONCERT playing. Open on Mondays and Thursdays, at 8 even o'clock. Two Hours each Lesson. Two Lessons in each Three Guineas per Quarter; to commence with the First Lesson. Private Lessons Governesses and others. N.B. LECTURE LESSONS on the Science, and Private Parties attended. By Mr. GREEN and able Assistants, at 53, Soho-square.

DANCING TAUGHT in the most fashionable style, by Mr. WILLIS, 41, Brewer-street, Golden-square. Private Lessons at all hours to ladies and gentlemen of any age, winning private and expeditious. An evening academy on Mondays and Fridays. A juvenile academy on Wednesdays and Saturdays. Lessons in the Valse à Deux Temps every day.—A card of terms may be had on application as above.

The ROOMS may be ENGAGED by PRIVATE PARTIES

MOULD CANDLES to burn WITHOUT SNUFFING.—KEMPTON'S PATENT.—THESE CANDLES ARE NOW GREATLY IMPROVED, and in not requiring snuffing they burn longer, and are superior to any other candle; the flame is steady and brilliant. No metallic or deleterious matter is used in the manufacture—Price 8s. per pound.—Sold by E. FARIN, Agent for Paternoster, 214, Bread-street, City and at the Manufactory, Old Barge-house, Christchurch, Surrey.

MR. COCKLE'S PILLS for INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, &c.

"If you are in possession of better means,
Candidly inform me; if not, make use of these." HORACE.

THIS FAMILY APERIENT will be found particularly valuable in every form of indigestion, with torpid liver and inactive bowels, also in gout, bilious & nervous attacks, sick head-ache, and nervous irritability from a deranged state of the stomach, &c.—May be had of all medicine vendors

IMPROVED ELASTIC WINTER GAITERS for Ladies, which afford convenience by drawing on without lacing or buttoning, and comfort and neatness, without pressure. They are made in black and coloured silks, cashmere, and mixtures of various textures, suitable for home, for carriage, promenade, or equestrian wear can be forwarded in a letter, from POPE and PLANTE, Manufacturers of all the best descriptions of hosiery, 4, Waterloo-place, Pall mall.

TEAS.—WHOLESALE PRICES.

	s. d.		s. d.
Good common Black	3 0	Fine Pekoe Souchong	4 0
Strong Congou	3 4	Superior do.	4 4
Fine do., Pekoe flavour	3 8	Finest do. imported	5 0

Gentle delivery to all parts of town daily. Country Orders, amounting to £5, sent free to all parts of Great Britain.

MANSELL and Co., 2, Bucklersbury, Cheapside.

COFFEE.

	s. d.
Good Ceylon	1 0
Fine ditto	1 2
Finest ditto	1 4
Finest Java	1 6
Finest Cuba	1 8
Finest Mocha	2 0

G. T. MANSELL and Co., 2, Bucklersbury, Cheapside.

BROAD CLOTHS, Beavers, Tweeds, Doeskin, Fancy Trouserings, and Vestings, at Wholesale Prices, for Cash payments.—The Best House in London for persons buying their own materials is T. CUPIT'S, 21, Leadenhall-street, corner of Lime-street passage. At. cloths warranted perfect, well dressed and shrunk. Silks, Serges, Paddings, and every description of Tailors' Trimmings at lowest possible prices. Goods not approved exchanged, or, if preferred, the money returned. All goods marked in plain figures, lowest prices, from which no abatement can be made

ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or Pearl Dentifrice, a fragrant White Powder, compounded of the rarest and most fragrant exotics. It eradicates tartar, arrests the progress of unimpaired decay from the Teeth, imparts a pearl-like whiteness, and gives firmness to the Gums. It strengthens, braces, and renders the gums of a healthy red, and ensures a grateful sweetness and perfume to the breath. Price 2s. 9d. per box, duty included.

Caution.—A. ROWLAND and SON, 20, Hatton-garden, is engraved on the Government stamp, affixed on each genuine box.

 All others are Spurious Imitations! !

Sold by Chemists and by Perfumers.

"On est ordonné de la rhubarbe et du séné
Mais mon, je'ais la pour nous
Et pour nous [illegible]."—SCRIPS.

IT is pleasant to eat a light delicate SPONGE CAKE: but by eating it to do without the doctor and his nauseous stuff is better All you that suffer from heartburn, with sick dizziness, &c., who will not be reasoned to take what is to do them good; look to this, and send for a packet (1s. 1½d.) of DRABBLE'S CHEMICAL POWDER which are a vegetable purgative without calomel, and in the pleasant disguise of a sweetmeat. Sold by W. DRABBLE, Chemist, 76, Bedford-row, and all Venders.

LONDON CARPET WAREHOUSE.—WAUGH and SON, 3 and 4, CRANBOURNE STREET, LEICESTER SQUARE, respectfully call the attention of the Nobility, Clergy, Gentry, &c., to an inspection of their large and splendid Assortment of Brussels, Royal Velvet Pile, Axminster, Saxony, Turkey, and every other description of Carpeting, of British and Foreign Manufacture, suitable to the present style of modern decoration and furniture; the Colours and Quality of which can be warranted, being manufactured under their own immediate inspection, and their great experience They have had in every branch of the manufacturing (their Establishment being exclusive) for the sale of Carpets, enables them to ensure to purchasers Carpets of permanent Colours and Qualities at the Lowest Prices

EDE'S NOT-TO-BE-WASHED-OUT NEW MARKING INK without preparation. Possesses every good quality requisite in a Marking Ink, and is sold in a Bottle at 1s. 6d. each, by EDE, Chemist, &c., 71, Baker-street, Portman-square, Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly, & 122, Bishopsgate Within.—R. N. DEAN, Wholesale and Export Agent. 37, Bucklersbury, City.

DECEPTION AND FRAUD.—J. READ, INSTRUMENT MAKER to his late Majesty, the Army, and the Honourable East India Company, Patentee of the STOMACH PUMP, &c., begs to caution the public against spurious and paltry articles which are so extensively palmed on them as imitations of Read's Patent Instruments, which dupe the purchaser, injure the merit of the genuine article, impugn the skill of the patentee, and invalidate the testimony of professional individuals. The public should therefore be cautious to whom they apply, as the only Instruments are manufactured ONLY by the Patentee, 35, Regent-circus, Piccadilly. Sold wholesale by 21, Bishopsgate-street Within, and retail at the same price by all chemists of respectability. Observe the name and address are stamped with the words "READ'S PATENT," and other Instruments which have never yet been introduced to the public

THE ORNAMENTAL, the USEFUL, and the ECONOMICAL.—These three essentials are comprised in 44 Novelties from DISON'S LACE WAREHOUSE, amongst which he can particularise Net Skirts, elegant, Juvenile Ball Dresses, from 12s. 6d. to 30s. each. Berthes of newest form and elegance, in real lace, from 12s. each. The new Mandarin and tight sleeves, Honiton mittens, cuffs of every style, riches, each exceedingly cheap, new shaped capes, pelerines, collars, and chemisettes. It is scarcely credible how much Indian muslin might save if they would purchase French tambrés pocket handkerchiefs of Dison, whose extensive sale is a convincing proof that both for quality and cheapness he continues to maintain his pre eminence. Address, Dison, Principal Lacedraan to the Queen and Royal Family, No 23, Regent street. Orders from the country most carefully executed, or a town reference

EDWARD DODD, MANUFACTURER to H.R.H. Duke of Cambridge of his ANGLO ROMAN STRINGS for VIOLIN, VIOLONCELLO, and HARP, which Strings for power of tone and durability are equal to the best Italian Strings, at about half the cost, less, and far superior to those in general use. The peculiar property of rest stop the ill effects of bented rosins. Testimonials from Messrs. Blagrove, Tolbecque, Willy, Alpress, Lindley, and No. 1, Great Marlborough-street, where the manufactory, 112 Vauxhall Walk, Lambeth. Each bundle wrapped with a blue band with EDWARD DODD, Anglo Roman Strings—Please ask for E. Dodd's Anglo Roman Strings. Also improved Silver Strings, warranted not to turn green.

COMBINATION, ECONOMY, and QUALITY, VERSUS EXPENSE and INFERIORITY.—MESSRS. VINCENT and PUGH, Distillers and Rectifiers of the New Park street, Borough, claim the attention of the Public to the fine article of BRANDY. The two essentials, QUALITY and PURITY, are rarely combined in the manufacture. The spirit having been submitted to the severest chemical tests by the first analysing chemists of the day, the Brandy now produced to press is the perfect equality with the finest Foreign Brandy imported, the Proprietors can confidently defy competition in the article to be equal. For the convenience of families, the Proprietors have bottled a large quantity, both PALE and BROWN, in handsome bright glass bottles, covered with a neat metallic capsule over the cork, and labelled "VINCENT and PUGH'S Champagne and Cognac Brandy." Sold in quantities of not less than two gallons, equal to one dozen bottles, at 46s. per dozen, bottles included. Agent, WM. MAY, Wine Merchant, No. 14, Portsea-street, Kingsland-road; and No. 1, Great Marlborough, Leicester-square.

NELSON'S PATENT OPAQUE GELATINE, Half the Price of Isinglass.—CAUTION: From the increasing demands for NELSON'S OPAQUE GELATINE, many spurious articles are imposed on the Public; to guard against which, and for a protection to purchasers, it is sold in packets only, by respectable chemists, grocers, and oilmen, in town and country, at 1s., 1s. 6d., 2s., 2s. 6d., 3s., 12s., and 24s. each packet, bearing the Patentee's signature. Extract from Dr. Ure's testimonial, June 6, 1840: "I have M. G. Nelson's Patent Opaque Gelatine to be [illegible] and purest of the agents to the best among any for some culinary [illegible] from many specimens of gelatine in the London market." The Opaque Gelatine is an article well adapted for hotels, taverns, coffee and ship stores, and a safe and profitable commodity for exportation.—ROBERT MILN WARWICK and [illegible]

PANKLIBANON IRON WORKS, BAZAAR, 42, REGENT-STREET, PORTMAN-SQUARE Wholesale and Retail GENERAL FURNISHING IRONMONGERY Tin, Copper, and Iron Cooking Utensils Tub Cistern, Lead Pipe, Zinc Plate, Gas Stoves Silver Wares, Papier Maché Tea Trays The new Coffee Urns Stoves, Grates, Kitchen Ranges, Fenders and Fire Irons; Baths of all kinds, shower, hot, cold, vapour, plunging &c., together with Ornamental Iron and Wire Work, for Conservatories, Lawns &c., and Garden Fences All articles are of the very best description, and offered at exceedingly low prices, for CASH only; the prices of each article being marked in plain figures.

THE WILL FORGERIES.—EXAMINATION AT THE MANSION HOUSE.

THE WILL FORGERIES.—RE-EXAMINATION OF THE PRISONERS AT THE MANSION HOUSE

The engraving has been executed from a sketch taken in the justice-room of the Mansion-house, on Friday week, when William Henry Barber, Joshua Fletcher, George Dorey, and Thomas Griffin, were brought up in custody of Daniel and William Forrester, for re-examination upon various charges of forging wills and obtaining fraudulent transfers of stock.

The Lord Mayor, who was accompanied by Alderman Farebrother, took the chair at three o'clock. Alderman Humphery took a seat at the reporters' table at a later hour in the afternoon.

The justice-room, as usual, was crowded to excess by persons anxious to hear the proceedings; the, rush at the front entrance as soon as it was opened, was tremendous, and there would have been much greater confusion than there was but for the judicious directions of the Lord Mayor.

Fletcher first entered the dock; for a moment or two he looked down, and then slowly drew scrutinized the faces of the persons in the court. Barber, who appeared to have lost but little of his accustomed self-possession, carried a large bag, which seemed to be pretty well laden with papers and books. As the female prisoner, who followed him, took a seat provided for her immediately below the dock, he bent over, and peered into her face with an inquiring look, which she seemed to turn quite round to receive; but, of course, no words, and, as far as could be observed, no signal, passed between them. Mr. Dorey appeared to be very unwell. Griffin did not arrive until some time afterwards, and a disagreeable interval of delay to the proceedings was the consequence. When he came, he was placed in the dock next to Barber on his right, Daniel Forrester, the officer, being on his left, between him and Fletcher.

The principal results were the examination of a witness named Sarah Hawkes, who proved handing to Mrs. Dorey, the female prisoner, a certain letter addressed to a Mr. Jones, which she, Sarah Hawkes, had consented to receive at her residence. Another witness examined, was one Joseph Cuckson, who married a sister of the prisoner Fletcher, and who proved his connexion with "a rogue of an attorney." The prisoners were then remanded till Friday; and Mr. Clarkson stated that it might be necessary still further to remand them; so that the trials would not be likely to take place at the next session.

Next week, we shall present to our readers accurate portraits of the three eminent counsel engaged on this important occasion.

"THE GREAT COMET,"
AS SEEN AT VAN DIEMEN'S LAND.

We are indebted to a Staffordshire correspondent for the original of the above sketch of "The Great Comet" of last year, as seen in the southern hemisphere. The locality is in the neighbourhood of Hobart Town; and the scene has been effectively lithographed by Mrs. Allport, of Aldridge Lodge, by whom it was forwarded to this country per ship Eudira, just arrived.

CHINESE LACE.

This curious specimen of Chinese manufacture was obtained by a soldier (originally a bobbin-net lace maker), and who was engaged in the expedition to occupy and obstruct the navigation of the Imperial Canal. While out on a foraging party, he saw a Chinese female making lace upon a sort of pillow; and he was so struck with the novelty of the fabric that he most unceremoniously took from her part of her work, and with it cut off about a yard of the lace, which he has recently brought to Nottingham. He, at first, supposed it to be composed of a kind of weed, or grass; but, upon the lace being shown to some more experienced persons in Nottingham, it was pronounced by them to be a sort of silk, well known in the East. This decision, however, proved incorrect; for, on a small piece of the lace being cut off, and boiled, just as silk is boiled, to extract its gum, to his surprise he found that after a fetid yellow gummy substance had been extracted, the fabric proved to be cotton thread of double yard, admirably twisted; its silken appearance being owing to the gum with which it had been stiffened. This was tested by several experiments, alike proving the lace to be of gummed cotton.

The fabric corresponds with that of foreign laces generally: four of the sides of the hexagon meshes have the two threads twisted round each other; while the two remaining sides have the four threads twisted and plaited together. This description has not yet been made by bobbin-net machines. About twenty years since the ground was made by means of machinery, which is now nearly forgotten; it was produced by the action and movement from a bobbin-net or warp net machine, and the fabric was known as "Wehring's lace." The process was very slow, being scarcely a tenth of the rate of a bobbin-net machine.

The Chinese lace is, in the construction of the meshes, nearly the counterpart of Mechlin, which is known but little to Brussels and Brussels point. The annexed engraving is a specimen of the size of the holes, and the course of the ornamental threads, which are essentially different from the European mode of ornamenting foreign laces. The large spots have the thread passed no fewer than fifteen times through the meshes; but many of the threads in the escallop are somewhat loose, and do not, as will be perceived, join the net at the top. Such was the brilliancy of the lace when first cut from the pillow, that it might have been mistaken for gold. The soldier states that he saw this lace used for trimming furniture draperies, as well as in articles of dress, as round the bottom of the skirt, the shoulders of the bodice, &c.; and the effect was bold and striking, from the coarseness of the pattern, and the brilliancy of the material.

It appears that some time since a lace manufacturer at Nottingham consigned some lace to our new colony of Hong-Kong; when the consignee, in reply, stated that the goods were of no value, since lace was not worn in China; an assertion which speaks but little for the information of British residents in the Celestial Empire. Very excellent imitations of the Chinese lace can, doubtless, be made by our machinery; and, in point of durability and regularity, it will be superior to the original article; but the gum used in the latter is a secret only to be found out by the ingenuity of the British residents at Ning-po and Shang-hai. It is hoped that the inquiry will be persevered in; since the manufacture of lace for China would be of almost incalculable importance to the counties of Nottingham, Leicester, Derby, Northampton, Bedford, Bucks, Somerset, Devon, Lincoln, Gloucester, Hants, Stafford, Renfrew, Middlesex, and Limerick, in all which districts lace is either made by machinery or the cushion, or is ornamented by the needle or tambour-hook. The collections of Chinese costume in the metropolis have been carefully examined, but they do not contain any specimens of Chinese lace; a circumstance which our informant conjecturally accounts for by the collections having been made only in the southern provinces of China. We are indebted for the accompanying details to Mr. Thomas Hewitson, lace-manufacturer, of Nottingham.

CHINESE LACE.

NOTICE.—All communications respecting the transmission or non-arrival of the paper, must be addressed to the person who supplies the paper, or who receives the subscription.

London: Printed and Published by WILLIAM LITTLER, at 198, Strand, where all communications for the Editor are requested to be addressed.—SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1844.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 93, Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 10, 1844. [Sixpence.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

BEFORE we proceed to consider the nature and tendency of the various measures which have been already suggested and discussed in various quarters for the redress of the admitted evils that oppress the empire, we must again refer to the hopes and promises held out by Ministers, as evinced in the Queen's Speech, which the country has now had a full week to consider. It must be admitted that it was a speech of more determination and purpose than it has usually been the custom of Ministers to ask their Sovereign to deliver from the throne. We are quite ready to admit that much of it was vague and meaningless—that some of its features were clothed in the proverbial inanity of royal speeches—that it partook of the character of mere truism which has marked all the oratory of its class; but we nevertheless find, in one or two episodical paragraphs, the proclamation of defined intention—the distinct enunciation of purposes most important to the general welfare and prosperity of the people. It is strongly to be remembered, also, that her Majesty laid unusual stress upon those declaratory passages—enduing them with an eloquence very beautiful and impressive, and producing a strong feeling upon her listeners that her heart entered with sincerity into the spirit which her voice was interpreting to the land she rules.

One among the topics we allude to is the fair revival of trade and manufacture—a source of many blessings and much congratulation—and greatly tending to prevent the two sad social evils of depression among the comparatively wealthy, and destitution with the really poor. It is a pleasure to reflect upon the intimate connexion which exists between the prosperity of the employer and the comfort and happiness of the employed. But the two emphatic suggestions of the speech, which touch both commerce and policy, are those relating to the revision of the Bank Charter, and the adoption of a course of conciliation and redress towards Ireland, which every frank and cordial heart will most honestly approve. We leave the watching of the Bank Charter question to those vigilant minds which guard our commerce with a tenderness proportioned to its greatness, and a vigour commensurate with its extent—a jealousy moreover which springs out of its character, and an integrity that is part of its principle; and whatever may be the result of discussions in Parliament upon the subject, we feel sure that the acute sense and spirit of English merchants will put the monetary interests of their country in a significant and proper light. The observation of Sir Robert Peel, however, the other night, in reply to Mr. Williams, holds out no prospect of any change on this question at present. Alas, if it were in the nature of human generosity that all other interests were as well protected and preserved—that the poor could be as much honoured in their humble feeling as the rich—that the Workhouse could be as well guarded as the Bank—the honour and happiness of England would be grandly increased, and her legislators rewarded, not only with the fame of honesty, but with the better and more beautiful tribute of a people's love.

We turn, then, next to Ireland—and we do think that it is greatly creditable to Ministers—although only a part of the duty which so many Governments have neglected—that they should, at this peculiar and momentous crisis, have got their Sovereign to declare the earnestness of her sympathy with that unhappy land. It is important also that a voice from the throne should have declared the inviolability of the Union; that England will not let Ireland fall from her, or permit any strength of agitation or plausibility of patriotism to sever an embrace at once ardent and endearing—affectionate and firm. But useful and composing as is the effect of that express determination, it falls far short of—while it enhances—the value of the declared intention to give Ireland a better boon than Repeal—a stronger justice than separation. The extension of the franchise; the enquiry into the law of registration; the commission to report upon the relations between landlord and tenant, with a view to conciliate and to amend them; the encouragement of measures tending "to improve the social condition" of the people—are all boons, which, if they ought long since to have been granted, are surely not the less acceptable on that account. We know that bis dat qui cito dat—but the axiom is intended to set up cheerfulness against reluctance in the bestowal of a gift; and if what England awards to Ireland be awarded in a cheerful spirit, it must not be depreciated on account of the delay.

But while saying thus much, and praising the Irish passages in the Royal Speech—and confessing them to be of deep moment—we are not prepared to hide all our disappointments, that they were not more both in number and in strength. We look with an unspeakable regret upon the omission of the Poor-law from the Speech. One word of royal sympathy would have aroused the heart of Parliament, and fettered it to the truth—on this momentous question—a question so deeply momentous to England and Ireland both. How many prayers would have blessed the beautiful utterance of that royal oration, had it contained this one cry of pity for the poor? And, furthermore, so far as Ireland only is concerned, if attention had been directed to the bitter religious differences among the people—differences far more powerful and prevailing than even their strong political feelings—an amount of good might have been effected, which it is almost impossible to describe. Allay the superstitions—calm the prejudices—soothe the bigotry of religious animosity in Ireland, and you will achieve more happiness for her than by almost any alternative of domestic legislation.

We express no opinion upon the effect of the Speech on the present Corn-law agitation—the League does not want more vigorous opponents or more vigorous support than are engaged for or against it at the present crisis.

In the last paragraph we have an address to Heaven—from the throne mortal and erring, to the unerring throne above—a prayer of a mighty Sovereign to an Almighty God, that he will direct and favour the efforts of the Parliament to promote the welfare of the people. May Parliament act in the spirit of that prayer! May it direct its energies to objects which are as religious in their duty, as imperative in their obligation, as that pious aspiration for the people's good! May the fruits of the Session above all things be bountiful and plentiful for the poor! May charity be more abounding, and political economy less merciless and cold! May Christianity support the fine nature of the ardent politician, and, evoking for all classes the noblest influences, be productive for the community of the noblest results!

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, DUBLIN.—THE TRAVERSERS ON TRIAL.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, FEB. 6.

SPAIN.

Notwithstanding the apparent tranquility of Spain, private letters to the 30th ult. give as certain that in almost every province secret agents, well supplied with money, are endeavouring to get up a pronunciamento. Several military and civil chiefs have been applied to, and have promised to act the instant any portion of the army should declare in their favour. To seduce the troops money is lavished in profusion; the chiefs are offered a considerable sum, and all those who enrol under the insurrectionary banner 120 reaux per day. It was expected that several cities would declare their pronunciamento before the end of February. The Ministers, aware of every movement of the Progressists, were raveling the troops, by paying them irregularly, and granting promotions to the officers; to raise money, they have entered into a negotiation with a company of French and Spanish capitalists for the advance of 250,000,000 millions of reaux, giving the duties on salt as guarantee. They are also in treaty for a loan with the same parties, to whom they offer 80 per cent.

The suspension of payment of the house of Salamanca and Burschetal had created a great sensation in Madrid. Some, Salamanca attribute their misfortunes to the advances they made the Government on the National Property Contract, for 400,000,000 reals; this is denied by the Government, who state that Messrs. Salamanca only advanced 8,400,000 reaux, and that they are indebted on the sale contract more than 15,000,000. The principal creditors of the house are in London, Havana, Cadiz, Barcelona, Marseilles and Bayonne.

Christina, the Queen Mother, has officially signified her intention to return to Spain by the end of the month. She leaves Paris for Perpignan, from thence to Madrid, by Barcelona and Valencia.

The Infanta Donna Carlotta, the wife of the Infant Don Francisco de Paulo, died at Madrid on the 29th of January, of a malignant typhus fever. The Princess, who was born at Naples, on the 24th of October, 1804, is sister to Christina and niece to the Queen of France. After being embalmed and laid in state, she will be buried in the Pantheon of the Escurial. The death of the Princess has caused a great sensation in certain political circles. She was the chief of a party in direct opposition to the Moderates. In private life the Princess possessed few friends, being of a most violent temper and unbounded ambition. The first symptom of the illness of the Princess was a slight irruption on the skin. She was instantly bled, and immediately after became ill, the fever became malignant. Such was the rapidity of the disease, that the priest was sent for in haste, and he arrived without the usual escort.

General Shelly, Political Chief of Barcelona, has been appointed Governor of Madrid.

The Government have published a most important decree, revoking the measures of precaution against the clergy, adopted during the civil wars.

ITALY.

The King of Naples has ordered that the grand Exposition of Italian Industry shall take place on the 30th of May next. The recognition of Queen Isabella of Spain by the King of the Two Sicilies has been officially announced; this happy event was communicated, on the 13th, by the Duke Santa Christina, Minister for Foreign Affairs, to all the members of the diplomatic corps residing in Naples.

It appears that the volcano of Mount Etna is not extinguished: the borders of the crater have become considerably extended. Of the five new craters, two were still smoking; from one of them flames were seen to be seen during the night; and from the other thick columns of smoke were emitted

The sale of the picture-gallery of the late Cardinal Fesch will take place at Rome, on the 25th of March. Many distinguished amateurs, from all parts, have already arrived, and a smart contest may be expected.

GERMANY.

The Queen of Prussia is declared to be in a state of convalescence. The King of Prussia, accompanied by General Neuman, left Berlin on the 26th January, for Johannhausen, on a hunting excursion. His Majesty passed through Leipsic on the 29th

Letters from Berlin give a long account of an imposing ceremony which took place on the 22nd, in honour of the 69th birth-day of the celebrated philosopher Schelling. Upwards of 200 students, by permission of the authorities, some with flambeaux, others with musical instruments, marched in order to the house of the philosopher. A deputation of five students presented an address, to which a suitable answer was returned. A serenade was then given, the pieces chosen being chiefly those of Beethoven.

The Grand Duchess of Oldenburg, daughter of King Gustavus IV., and the third wife of the reigning Grand Duke, died in child-birth on the 27th January, aged thirty-six years.

The railroad from Bonn to Cologne is completely finished, and several journeys have been performed by experimental trains. The shares in the Rhenish railway, which suddenly rose to 85, have fallen to 79½.

FRANCE.

As anticipated, the discussion and vote on the Address have greatly shaken the confidence of the King and the Chambers in the stability of the Guizot Administration; and I should not be at all astonished were the Ministers left in a minority on the question of the "Regency Bill." The fact is, that the King Majesty is in daily conference with many influential members of both houses, and the name of M. Molé is frequently heard in the Palace. I would not wish it to be understood that M. Guizot must go out, but I think his position is not altogether but secure. The resignation of M. Salvandy as Ambassador to the Court of Turin has greatly injured M. Guizot. The King was desirous that M. Salvandy should withdraw his resignation for a month, but M. Guizot's presence, and his leaving Paris for his post within eight days, he definitively refused, and the next day Count Mortier, his successor, was gazetted. It will be difficult to find a Minister who possesses the confidence of M. Guizot at Ghent, the Moniteur has thought proper to publish the following article. "Several journals have recently disclosed that M. Guizot, who was Secretary-General of the Interior in the 1814 and 1815, had the precision, during the Hundred Days, under the ministry of Gen. Count Carnot, appointed Minister of the Interior by a decree of the 16th of March, 1815; that he had signed the act, official act, and that he had been cognizant. One of the journals has published the testimony of the Moniteur. These assertions are false. M. Guizot had quitted the Ministry of the Interior on the 20th of March, 1815. He was replaced in his functions as Secretary-General by a decree of the 22nd March, which confided them to Baron Basset de Chateaubourg, ex-Prefet. It is not M. François Guizot who is spoken of in the note published by the Moniteur of the 14th of May, 1815, but M. J. J. Guizot, Chief de Bureau at that period at the Ministry of the Interior, who was in fact dismissed from his functions in the course of the month of May, 1815."

There is nothing of importance going on in either of the Houses of Parliament: the different committees are examining the Budget. M. Guizot informed one of the committees that a great change was preparing in the Consulate department, and that many changes would be made.

The Opposition press is very angry with Sir Robert Peel, and other members of Parliament, for their praises of M. Guizot and the French alliance; the majority is, however, I fear certain, anxious to preserve the friendship of England.

The naval division at Brest is about to be considerably reduced. Admiral Casey has already lowered his flag.

It is reported to-day that the Count de Paris is rather indisposed. I trust it is not true.

The detached forts, Mont Valerien, Charenton, Afort, Ivry, Romainville, and Nogent, are already garrisoned with troops of the line; the artillery will be mounted next week.

The friend and companion of Napoleon, General Bertrand, died at Chateauroux, on the 31st January, and was buried on the 2nd of February. The whole of the garrison was under arms, and the assemblage of people was so numerous, that the church would not contain them all. The pall was borne by the Prefect of the Department, Generals Gueheneu and de Bigny, and the Mayor of Chateauroux.

The Monitteur Parisien contains the following article:—"The three great lines which have been completed in France, have cost, with their matériel, an average of 350,000 francs (£14,400) per kilomètre, that is, 1,440,000 francs a league of four kilomètres. The road to Orleans, which is 123 kilomètres in length, cost fifty millions of francs, being 370,000 francs per kilomètre; that of Rouen, 128 kilomètres, cost fifty millions, being 390,000 francs per kilomètre; and that of Strasbourg, 140 kilomètres, 45 millions, being 320,000 francs per kilomètre. This expense, although considerable, is far from equal to that of the three lines in the environs of Paris, viz., the two Versailles roads, and that to Saint Germain, which form together a length of 56 kilomètres, and cost 900,000 francs per kilomètre, or 3,600,000 francs per league.

A second trial of lighting with an alcohatic mixture is about to be made in the Place du Carrousel du Musée. It is said that this new kind of lighting is about to applied on a large scale in the streets of the capital.

Fanny Elssler has written to the Journal des Débats, declaring the two letters which appeared in some London periodicals, and purporting to be signed by her and Havenmah, to be false, and to have been written either for vile speculation or to turn her into ridicule.

Madame Catalani is not dead. The Gazette de Florence says, she is a excellent health.

The Italian Opera had a full house last night for the benefit of Ferrarari: the representation was "La Gazza Ladra." Grisi was in good voice. The duet the second act, sung by Grisi and Brambilla, was encored. Mario applauded and encored Mademoiselle Brambilla was divine; her voice was clear and melodious, and such was the enthusiasm of the audience, that she was twice called forth. By-the-by, our English fashionable circles seem greatly disappointed at a report that Mademoiselle Brambilla will not appear at the London Italian Opera next season. I trust the rumour is unfounded.

The new ballet, "Les Caprices," will be brought out at the end of the present month. It is said that the managers of Drury-lane Theatre are in treaty with Dupres for May and June next. "Cagliostro," the new opera, in three acts, will be performed for the first time this evening. "La Syrene," "Oreste and Pylade," and "Le Jabot," are in rehearsal.

Taborg is expected next month in Paris. In the month of March we shall have Liszt, Thalberg, Dreyschock, and Doehler.

An opera, by Wagner, called "Le Hollanda's Errant," was lately brought out at Berlin, under the superintendence of Meyerbeer.

The principal tenor of the Italian Opera at Alexandria (Egypt) has been arrested, and sent to Leghorn. He is accused with meddling in politics.

SWEDEN.

ALARMING ILLNESS OF THE KING OF SWEDEN.—STOCKHOLM, JAN. 26.—His Majesty the King, who completed to-day his 81st year, has unhappily been attacked with severe illness. The State Gazette publishes the following bulletin

"JAN. 25, 10 A.M.—The King, who retired to rest yesterday evening without any appearance of indisposition, and slept well during the night, was seized at half-past six this morning with vomiting and determination of blood to the head, which still continues, but appears however to diminish."

The Aftonblad adds to a second bulletin that the appearance of improvement was premature by bleeding; that the King had never before consented to be bled but that the physician having now declared that nothing else could save his life, it has been done by order of the Crown Prince. The vomiting was a spitting of blood. The blood of a dark red hue had no unfavourable appearance, and the patient fell into a state of lethargy. Between ten and eleven in the forenoon he asked for coffee, and drank some, then vomited again and went to sleep. Between twelve and one he drank a glass of warm water, which he took from the hand of an attendant. A great number of officers of state, and persons of distinction, have been to the palace to make inquiries. A supper at the Crown Prince's, and a fete intended to be given by the Queen, are deferred.

AMERICA.

The Philadelphia packet ship Susquehana, Captain Mercken, arrived at Liverpool on Tuesday, after a very quick voyage from that port. She left the city of Philadelphia on the 18th, and brings papers of that date; and the mouth of the Delaware on the 19th ult., being thus only nineteen days from the latter reckoning.

The cotton market of the 13th, at New York, was brisk: the sales upwards of 5000, with a still upward tendency; in other articles and in the prices of stocks there is no change.

There had been received from St. Louis accounts of a most terrible steam-boat accident (to the Shepherdess) by which ninety or a hundred persons had lost their lives. The vessel plied between Cincinnati and St. Louis, and was owner way to the latter port on the night of the 4th ult., steering, at eleven o'clock, and within three miles of St. Louis, she struck on a snag (sunken tree under water); the concussion was very severe, and tore up several of her planks. The passengers had mostly retired to bed, and the vessel filled so rapidly from the extensive injury she had sustained, that they had not time to dress themselves—the engines almost immediately became useless, and the vessel was at the mercy of the current. Upon striking the snag, the vessel swung round in getting to the Illinois shore, four to the Missouri side, and one was taken off the wreck; they were all reunited on the ferry boat at Cahokia, at a moment when each party supposed the other dead Such a scene as that presented on the boat is not easily described. Mr. Rice, of Virginia, and his brother were on board, with their mother, and nine slaves. Seven of the slaves were lost—the whites were all saved. One man lost 3000 dollars in money, and another 1500 dollars. Five children were drowned—Mr. Rice's Virginias sequently this committee was appointed, the Bishops of LONDON and EXETER, at their own desire, being excluded from it.

The Marquis of NORMANBY complained of the supineness of the Government as in not having ere this brought forward a bill to improve the sanitary condition of towns. He had himself introduced a bill in 1841 and 1842, to their lordships on this subject, and he charged the Government with great blame for not having since then either urged forward this measure, or some other, to remedy the disease and death which notoriously prevail over great towns. The Duke of BUCCLEUCH replied that sufficient information on the subject to legislate safely on not having been before Parliament, a commission of inquiry of most extensive ability had been appointed. That commission would make its report, and then the Government would, if they deemed the information sufficient, feel it their duty to introduce some measure. The noble Duke, however, could give no pledge until the report of the commission of inquiry was laid on their lordships' table.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

Sir JOHN TROLLOPE presented twenty-nine petitions from Lincolnshire, praying for protection to agriculture.

In reply to Sir EDWARD Napier, Sir R. PEEL promised to lay the instructions given to our cruizers on the coast of Africa, on the table, in a day or two.

To a question by Lord J. RUSSELL, the PREMIER replied that, a change having taken place in the British embassy at Washington, the negotiations relative to the Oregon question had not progressed, but that, a new ambassador having gone out with full instructions, hopes were entertained of effecting a negotiation on this important matter

Mr. PATTISON having suicidy asked whether the sugar duties were to be altered this session, Sir R. PEEL answered, amidst much jocularity—"That is a question which I should have expected would have been asked by the youngest member of this house—for certainly nothing but the circumstance of a member being the youngest among us could justify such a question at this period."

Sir J. GRAHAM was understood to say, in reply to a question, that he contemplated a new charter for the College of Physicians in London, and a bill relating to medical practice in the kingdom and in Ireland.

Earl ARUNDEL reported her Majesty's answer to the Address.

Mr. BLEWITT having inquired if the report that her Majesty was in debt had any foundation, Sir R. PEEL replied:—"I am greatly surprised that the honourable member should be so credulous as to believe any such report as that, and I should have thought that any man who had seen the course which her Majesty has pursued, from the commencement of her reign to the present moment, must have been enabled, by inferring to that course alone, to give the most positive contradiction to any rumour of the sort. I can assure the honourable gentleman and this house that there is not one syllable of truth in the report, and that her Majesty is not a single shilling in arrear." This assurance from the Premier was received with loud cheers.

On the motion of Lord LINCOLN, the Metropolitan Improvements Bill was read a second time.

Mr. GLADSTONE moved the appointment of a select committee to consider the standing orders relating to railways, and whether any, and what, change should be made in those orders; and likewise to consider whether any, and what, provisions ought to be introduced into such railway bills as should come before the house during the present or future sessions, for the advantage of the public and the improvement of the system, and to report their opinions thereon to the house. The right hon. gentleman said, he should propose that this committee be empowered to inquire into the propriety of modifying the rule that required a deposit of ten per cent. on the capital, with the view to assimilate it to that of the Lords, which only required one of five per cent. He also proposed to submit to it the consideration of discouraging competing lines, unless the public advantage was clearly manifested by the general system of charges, and the neglect of comfort in third class carriages. Mr. Gladstone stated, he was anxious the committee should direct its attention, in the first instance, to the railway measure which they about to apply for additional powers; but he trusted he would soon be enabled to submit the general subject of legislation on railways to the committee, the powers of which might be easily enlarged, as the occasion arose, by instructions to it.—A very interesting conversation followed, in which Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Roebuck, Mr. Wallace, Sir R. Peel, Mr. S. Wortley, Mr. P. Stewart, Colonel Sibthorp, and Mr. Plumtre, took part. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GLADSTONE moved the appointment of a select committee on the Merchant Seamen's Fund.—Mr. LABOUCHERE regretted that a legislative measure, instead of a select committee, had not been prepared.—The motion was agreed to.

The usual committee on the printed papers of the house was nominated, and the house adjourned at seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Duke of RICHMOND brought under the notice of their lordships a circular letter, dated the 2nd of September last, signed by the Assistant-Secretary of the Treasury, and addressed to the clerks of the peace of the United Kingdom, in which directions were given in cases in which there was reason to suppose a prisoner charged with felony was possessed of property other than that found on his person, the magistrates were to cause inquiry to be made at the residence of such prisoner, or any other place frequented by him, in order to ascertain the value of such property, and to have it included in the return to the Treasury. The noble duke contended that such a requisition would be illegal, and called on the Government to withdraw it.—A very long discussion ensued, in which had he longed to convicted felons, and which, by common law, was forfeited to the Crown, but which, by modern usage, was considered as no right whatever to it. The object of this letter had been to remedy that wrong. A remedy had been issued by the Treasury, explaining the portion of the letter complained of.

Lords BROUGHAM and CAMPBELL expressed their regret that a letter of such consequence should have been issued without the approbation of the Lord Chancellor or the Attorney-General. They were of opinion that to require a constable to enquire into the property having, or supposed to belong, to a prisoner, was to compel him to do what was quite illegal.

The subject then dropped.

The Earl of CLARENDON gave notice, for Friday, to ask questions respecting late events in Spain, and our present relations with that country.

In answer to Lord MONTEAGLE's inquiry, as to the mode of proposing the renewal of the Bank Charter, the Duke of WELLINGTON stated that no investigation by committee was intended; that such papers as could be laid before the house would be produced; and that the renewal of the Charter of the Bank of Ireland would be formed on the principles adopted with regard to the Bank of England. His grace, in answer to Lord Monteagle, added, that there would be no objection to an inquiry being made into the Irish Poor-laws in the course of the session.

The Duke of RICHMOND moved the second reading of a bill to stop qui tam actions on illegal betting.

Their lordships adjourned till Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Mr. CORDEN gave notice, for Tuesday next, to move for a select committee to inquire into the effects of import duties on tenant-farmers and farm-labourers.

Mr. COCHRANE gave notice to move, on the 20th instant, for correspondence between our Government and that of France and Russia, relating to recent events in Greece.

Mr. ROEBUCK gave notice to move an amendment to Lord Ashley's motion, to the effect that the conduct of Lord Auckland in his negotiations with the Ameers of Scinde was inquitous and impolitic; and that the policy of Lord Ellenborough was unfortunately the necessary result of his predecessor's conduct; also, that while the restoration of the Ameers would be dangerous to British interests, they should be treated in a manner befitting their former station.

To a question from Mr. WYSE, Sir J. GRAHAM stated that he should introduce the measure regulating registrations in Ireland before the Easter Recess.

In reply to Mr. LABOUCHERE, Sir R. PEEL stated that he considered our commercial negotiations with Portugal to be in progress; and that no advance had been made since last session in our negotiations with France.

Sir J. GRAHAM moved for leave to bring in his bill for the better regulation of, and the amendment of the laws relating to, the employment of children and young persons in factories. This bill will limit the labour of children between the ages of eight and nineteen to six and a half hours a day; young women between thirteen and eighteen will be restricted by it to twelve hours' labour; and women of every age, in cotton, silk, wool, and flax manufactories, will be confined to twelve hours' labour. With respect to education, the Home Secretary said that the experience of last year had determined him not to interfere with the quality of the instruction given to the children. It had been the desire of Government to form some scheme of instruction comprehending Scripture reading independent of doctrinal differences, but he was now convinced that reliance must be placed on the exertions of the millowners themselves. And it was no vague reliance, for he felt convinced that an honest rivalry had arisen between the Church and the Dissenters, and that great efforts would be made to diffuse the blessings of moral and religious education amongst the dense masses of the manufacturing population. At all events, he was not prepared to interfere, directly or indirectly, with the quality of the education to be given. All he asked the house to do was, to give the children an opportunity of attending school for at least three hours each day, except Saturday. Mr. Hume designated this attempt at legislation as "a perfect folly." Mr. A. Wortley, Mr. Bingham, and Lord Ashley complimented the Government on their proposed measure, and leave was obtained to bring in the bill.

Mr. GLADSTONE moved that the following gentlemen be nominated a select committee on railways:—Mr. W. Gladstone, Mr. Labouchere, Lord Seymour, Mr. W. Patten, Viscount Sanden, Mr. Gisborne, Lord G. Somerset, Sir J. Easthope, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Russell, Mr. J. M. Stewart, Mr. Grenne, Mr. Masterman, Mr. Thornely, and Mr. Cardwell.—An animated discussion was originated by Mr. WALLACE, who complained that the railway interest was far too strongly represented in the committee, which contained five railway directors and other gentlemen directly interested as shareholders in these undertakings.—Mr Labouchere, Mr. Hume, Lord Howick, Mr. Roebuck, and Lord J. Russell having expressed themselves more or less against the constitution of this committee, and three of the hon. members named (Sir J. Easthope, Mr. Hamilton, and Mr. Stewart) having announced their willingness to retire, Mr. Gladstone withdrew the appointment of the committee for the present. The motion was withdrawn.

On the order for going into committee of supply, Mr. SHARMAN CRAWFORD brought forward an amendment for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the general grievances of the people of this country, an enumeration of which he entered into in the course of his speech.—Mr. WILLIAMS seconded the amendment, which was supported by Mr. HUME, and opposed by Sir R. PEEL.—On a division, there were

For Mr. Crawford's amendment	22
Against it	130
Majority	108

A conversation, touching the appointment of the landlord and tenant commission in Ireland followed, in which nothing was said worthy of remark, except that Sir R. PEEL again complained that, after selecting persons with the view of being agreeable to "gentlemen opposite," he found that "gentlemen opposite" were still dissatisfied.

After explanations given by the Lord ADVOCATE of SCOTLAND respecting certain imprisonments arising out of a riot at Rosken, the house went into a committee of supply pro formâ.

Mr. J. JERVIS obtained leave to bring in two bills relating to the recovery of small debts. The house adjourned at half-past ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The house did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER took the chair at four o'clock.

Several petitions relating to private bills were presented.

Lord LINCOLN brought up the first report of the Commissioners for the Improvement of the Metropolis. Ordered to be printed.

Lord PALMERSTON said, in consequence of some misstatements which had been made in another place, respecting Mr. GURNEY and the unsatisfactory answer given to the question, he should move on the 19th instant an address to the Crown on the subject. The following was a copy of the address intended to be proposed:—"That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, representing that this house, observing the deep abhorrence with which the people of this country regard the slave-trade, most earnestly beseech her Majesty not to consent to any alteration or modification of any of the treaties now in force between her Majesty and foreign states for the suppression of the slave-trade, which, by weakening the means which these treaties now afford for the prevention of that piratical offence, might tend to render more easy the perpetration of so detestable a crime." (Hear.)

On the order of the day being read for bringing up the report on the Committee of Supply, Mr. WYSE protested if it was intended during the present session to propose any additional grant for the purposes of education? Sir J. GRAHAM said he was not prepared to give a definite answer to the question. Some Orders in Council which had been issued might call for an additional sum, but he could not say to what amount.

The Report on the Committee of Supply was then brought up, agreed to, and ordered to be taken into further consideration on Friday next.

Sir G. CLERK moved for an address to her Majesty, praying that a copy of the Estimates should be laid before the house.—Agreed to.

Mr. HUME gave notice, that on Tuesday week he should move for a select committee to inquire into the effect of the high duties now payable on tobacco, spirits, silk, and other articles, and that the committee report the same to the house.

The house adjourned at twenty minutes before five o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their lordships met at five o'clock.

The Duke of BUCCLEUCH laid on the table the first report of the Metropolitan Improvement Commission.

Lord BROUGHAM moved the second reading of the Horse-racing and Many Sports Bill, in the absence of the Duke of Richmond.

After a short discussion upon the details of the bill, in which Lord Campbell and the Bishop of London took part, and Lord Brougham pointed out the necessity of a public prosecutor in such cases,

The Bishop of Exeter said he had intended to move that the second reading of the bill before the house be postponed for six months; but, after having heard the opinion of so high an authority as the Lord Chief Justice (Denman), he should content himself merely with saying "not content." (Hear.

The bill was then read a second time, committed, and ordered to be read a third time on Friday.

The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. THURSDAY.

A number of petitions having been presented, on various subjects,

Sir H. HARDINGE laid on the table the army estimates, and said that, as they would be printed in two or three days, he wished to give notice that he should move that the house go into committee to consider them on Friday the 16th inst.

Mr. LABOUCHERE gave notice that on the 20th of February he should bring forward a motion relating to the commercial relations of this country with the Brazils.

Mr. ELPHINSTONE moved an Address to the Crown for a number of returns, which were ordered.

Mr. FERRAND gave notice that on Friday he should ask the Right Hon. Secretary for the Home Department, whether he intended to introduce into the Poor-law Amendment Act, any clause preventing the separation of mother from child in union workhouses?

Lord ASHLEY then rose to move that an address be presented to the Crown, "praying that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to take into her consideration the situation and treatment of the Ameers of Scinde; and that she will direct their immediate restoration to liberty, and the enjoyment of their estates, or with such provision for their future maintenance as may be considered a just equivalent." The noble lord at great length addressed the house in support of his motion; he contended that the conduct of the British Government towards the Ameers of Scinde could not be justified. He hoped the house would attend to the subject, and that the whole case would be fully considered.

The remainder of the evening was consumed in discussing this important question.

The house divided on the motion, and the numbers were—

For the motion	68
Against it	202
Majority	134

Mr. DIVETT preferred his motion, to the effect that Mr. Charles Bonham, the Ordnance Storekeeper, be dismissed from his office, but had no seconder.—Sir R. PEEL afterwards vindicated Mr. Bonham.—Mr. LEADER also apologised for Mr. Bonham, and said he did not think it a fit matter to bring before the house.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

Lord CLARENDON stated, that in consequence of the illness of the noble lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, he should postpone his question on the state of affairs in Spain until Monday next.

On the motion of Lord BROUGHAM several verbal amendments were made in the Gaming Bill, which was then read a third time and passed.

Lord CAMPBELL introduced a bill with regard to seditious libel, which was read a third time, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

There being only thirty-five members present, the house adjourned until to-morrow (this day).

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Cum prorepserunt primis animalia terris
——— emergunt ——— ponere legus
Ne quis fur esset. HORAT.

Soon as the world escaped from night and chaos,
Laws were contrived, that none might rob or slay us.

It is related of a certain unfortunate bishop of Seville, that

No choice was left him feeling or his pride,
Save death or Doctor's Commons so he died.

Better had the old Andalusian's choice of an alternative been followed by the fraternity of legs than that they should have metamorphosed the ring into the forum. Some time ago we informed our readers how the profession had gone to loggerheads with the amateurs, and set upon them with lethal weapons, to wit, qui tams, and other penal provisions, prosecutions, persecutions, and so forth. As soon as the approaching session of Parliament shall commence its labours, the noblemen, gentlemen, and the like (and unlike), suffering and grieving at the prospect of these pains and penalties, purpose preferring a bill to that intent that no evil minded informer, from malice prepense, or motive personal as regards revenge or lucre, be henceforth permitted to recover penalties under the statutes of Charles the Second or Anne. These monarchs in their love and reverence for virtue and a pure life, gave their assent to enactments whereby it was made unlawful to game for a sum exceeding £10 at any one time; and all who did so were liable—in default of the persons from whom they might win such further sums prosecuting within the three months next ensuing their loss in aforesaid—to be prosecuted against by any common informer for the amount of their winnings, together with treble the amount, in the shape of penalty. Well, the qui tam-ers have commenced the war after this manner, as we have seen; and as nothing but the extirpation of their victims would seem to content them, pressed by desperation, the sufferers are about to lay a memorial at the foot of the throne, praying that their miserable situation shall meet with the merciful consideration of the executive.

During the past and present week sporting circles have been deeply interested by the draft of this missive, which has been extensively circulated. The prayer of it is, that whereas the most grave of sovereigns, Charles, allowed so to be enacted laws concerning the free privilege of ruin by gaming to his subjects, it is no longer convenient such statutes should encumber the books (!!) but that they forthwith be repealed. Seriously, there are men at large who contemplate Parliament in the reign of Victoria extending facility and protection to gambling, repudiated in the days and by the councils of Charles Le débonnaire? "Make betting legal," they say, "and no longer will penniless paupers be the reproach of the ring; the great discouragement of speculation on the turf." Linendraping is according to act of Parliament: are the dealers in soft goods all honourable men? There is no restriction upon bill discounting: are the doers of "stir" all good men and true?

The existing laws, as they relate to the legitimate sports of this country, may be very beneficially revised, by means of a committee of the House of Commons. This deliberative assembly would call before it persons conversant with the present state of our field sports, as affected by certain statutes. Coursing for stakes, to any consistent amount, might be recommended to be made legal; also, cricket matches for sums exceeding £10 ought to be allowed; and in other cases improvements might be adopted; but we should indeed regard it as a sign of a "mad world, my masters," were the Legislature of England to pass a law for the countenance and encouragement of gambling under such a pretence as the service of the turf, on any pretext whatever. As we read in our motto, from the earliest ages of the world laws have existed to protect social interests: when those for the restraint of vice—of which the most scruple is gaming—shall be repealed, then, of a verity, "Chaos is come again!"

The market at the commencement of the week, in spite of the heavy blows being inflicted on sporting speculation, was very active, and some moves of interest occurred. Orlando, of whom we spoke well last week, was eagerly inquired after, and backed for three pounds less than his previous price, and Leander found friends at 18 to 1. Running Rein and T'Auld Squire were each at 25 to 1, with the appearance of mending. Despite this, we do not think Scott's real horse has stood the market yet; at all events, not in his true form. Running Rein has fallen into good hands for giving a lift, and 25 to 1 is an outside price. He will probably see a better; but should be carefully watched even at his present quotation. With these exceptions, the Derby remains pretty much as it was. Horses are brought forward freely for the Chester Cup, and backed to hedge, upon the principle that most of them being in fancy hands will go up in the odds; this is very likely. Yaksel at 5.30 to 1, is a promising investment for instance, because should he come to the post the natives will take a very different offer that he wins. We shall presently take occasion to treat more at large upon this event. For the present, save to the professional better, the transactions in the betting market are not of particular account.

THE THEATRES.

ADELPHI.

When a late celebrated scholar and critic made the witty remark, that Boz "would go up like a rocket and come down like the stick," he forgot in his prediction to say how long the rocket's brilliancy would endure! In our thinking the said rocket has taken root in the ray he allowed the expression) in the sky of intellect, and, with its offshoots of light, every one of which becomes more luminous daily, we might say voluminous indeed, will, we have no doubt, be considered by future literary astronomers, a constellation!

Dickens is a great man a moral chymist who has analysed the human heart to a nicety.

"Shewing the poison and the honey there"

His "Christmas Carol; or Past, Present, and Future," dramatised by Mr. Stirling in a most sterling manner, from the prose story of the modern Fielding, was produced on last Monday with most decided success. The acting of O. Smith, as old Scrooge, the miser, was, throughout, admirable. Wright as Bob Cratchit, the miser's clerk, presiding over his family party, was exceedingly droll. The story on which the piece is founded is too well known to enter into particulars of it: suffice it to say, that it is one of those home-bred, natural escalents that a true dramatic palate likes to enjoy, and as such, from its enthusiastic reception, will no doubt be universally relished, and ought to correct and improve the taste of those who fly to the Continent for what can be so abundantly supplied at home.

WESTMINSTER SESSIONS.

These sessions commenced on Wednesday, at the Guildhall, Westminster. There were twenty-seven prisoners on the list, all for felony.

Edward Pearson, aged 21, was indicted for stealing two printed books, the property of Alfred Sharpe. The prisoner pleaded guilty to the indictment. Mr. Tracey, the governor of the Westminster Bridewell, stated that the prisoner appeared to be labouring under a most extraordinary delusion with respect to transportation. He had been before convicted and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment. His conduct while in prison was good, but it was his anxious wish to be transported, and the felonies he had committed appeared to have been done with this view rather than with any other motive. He had formerly been a gentleman's servant, which situation he filled respectably until his mind became occupied with this strange idea. The prisoner during this statement appeared to be delighted with the thought that his singular wish was about to be granted. Mr. Walesby remarked to the prisoner that transportation was by no means such a luxury as he seemed to imagine it was not only a voyage over the Pacific at her Majesty's expense, but a heavy punishment. He would not grant his wish, but would give him an opportunity of reflecting, and recommended him to listen to rational advice on the subject. The sentence, therefore, was, that he be imprisoned six months, and kept to hard labour, and six weeks solitude.

SURREY SESSIONS.

These sessions commenced on Monday last at the Court-house, Newington, before Mr. Puckle, the chairman. Mr. Wallinger applied to the chairman to pass sentence on James Bovington and William Andrews, who were convicted last sessions of a burglary at Lord Botham's mill. Mr. Onslow, the clerk of the peace, informed the court that the prisoners had brought a writ of error, in terms of judgment, and the indictment had, on Saturday afternoon last, been removed by certiorari into the Court of Queen's Bench. The ground on which the case has been removed to the superior court is, that the indictment is bad in law, the titles and descriptions of the prosecutors, Lord Botham and Sir George Frederick Berkeley, K.C.B., not being properly set forth in the indictment; Sir George Berkeley being described as a baronet, he not possessing that title, and Lord Botham not being described as a baron.

MOST DARING ROBBERY.—James Franklin, aged 19, and John Cox, aged 18, were indicted for feloniously stealing at St. Mary's, Newington, on the 1st of January last, a quantity of jewellery and wearing apparel, the property of William Spencer. The prisoners were defended by Mr. Charnock. From the evidence adduced on behalf of the prosecution, the [illegible] appeared one of the most barefaced and daring robberies that [illegible] cognizance of this court, and one also of the most [illegible]. Franklin was sentenced to six months' imprisonment [illegible], and Cox to seven years' transportation.

On Wednesday, a man of the name of Davis, a journeyman baker, was charged with the [illegible] committing suicide [illegible] under the following circumstances:—Mr. Bodle [illegible] Mr. on the third inst. An inquest had been held on the body, when the jury, having no suspicion to the contrary, gave a verdict that she committed suicide, being in a state of insanity. The evidence was confined to the testimony given by the relatives of the deceased, who considered her insane. The acting alderman directed the officer to summon other witnesses, and remanded the prisoner till Friday.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET. On Tuesday, two well-dressed young men, who gave the names of Charles Bailey and Charles Cooper, were charged by police constable Russell, 113 C, with stealing a quantity of knockers in the neighbourhood of Leicester-square, between three and four o'clock on Monday morning. On the constable apprehending Bailey, eight knockers were found upon him, and three Cooper dropped on the road to the station-house. The prisoners pleaded in excuse that they had been to a birth-day party, and were not aware of what they had done. They were fined £5 each, or one month's exercise at the treadmill.

UNION-HALL.—John Stevens silversmith, of Islington, was committed to take his trial for "doing" a pawnbroker, named Folkard, in the London-road, by obtaining loans of money on ingots of base metal, which he represented as silver.

THAMES POLICE. Two men, named M'Gregor and Lambert, have been remanded from the Thames Police-office, on a charge of piracy, and attempting to create a revolt on board the whaling ship Hester, whilst on an outward-bound voyage from London to Desolation Island in the South Pacific. One of the mutineers, named M'Gregor, was shot dead by the Captain.

MARYLEBONE.—Henry Bailey, a constable in the employment of the London [illegible] for two months, for being drunk upon duty. The prisoner's misconduct might have led, if not detected, to the most disastrous consequences.

THE LATE DUKE OF SAXE-COBURG GOTHA.

In the latest edition of our paper of last week, it was our painful duty to announce the unexpected death of his Royal Highness the late Reigning Duke of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, who expired suddenly on the 29th ult. His Royal Highness was uncle and father-in-law of her Majesty, father of Prince Albert, and eldest brother of the Duchess of Kent and the King of the Belgians.

The late Duke, Ernest Anthony Charles Lewis, was born on Jan. 2, 1784, and succeeded his father in 1806. When, during the war in Germany, which was ended by the Peace of Tilsit, Napoleon found that the hereditary Prince Ernest (the late Duke) was at the Prussian head-quarters, he issued a proclamation, declaring him his particular enemy, and caused formal possession to be taken of his territories. All the property belonging to the ducal family was seized, and a very heavy contribution imposed on the country, which had already suffered by the passage of the French army. It was not till the Peace of Tilsit that, by a particular stipulation, the house of Saxe-Coburg-Saalfeld was re-instated in its possessions. Duke Ernest, however, on his return, found the finances dilapidated by the French authorities, the institutions entirely ruined, and his country, to the last degree, impoverished. Having remained at Coburg time enough to put his affairs somewhat in order, Duke Ernest went to Russia in 1808, and resided there for some time, leaving his possessions to the care of his brother, Leopold, now King of the Belgians.

On the 9th of December, 1806, died the eccentric Duke Frederic of Gotha-Altenberg, by which event his estates came into the possession of Duke Ernest, by virtue of the Salic Law, established by Ernest the Pious. He was, however, precluded from taking possession by his adherence to the King of Prussia until the year 1813. In that year he commanded the 5th Corps d'Armée, and Mentz was delivered up to him by the French.

Returned from the Congress of Vienna, he bestowed his whole activity and solicitude in the welfare of his people, and in the year 1819 gave them of his own accord a representative constitution. After the extinction of the House of Gotha, he shared in the division of it with Saxe Meiningen and Saxe Hilburghausen, giving up Saalfeld to the Duke of Saxe Meiningen, and receiving the principality of Gotha, subsequent to which the title of the house was changed into that of Saxe Coburg and Gotha.

The Duke was twice married; first, to Dorothy Louisa Paulina Charlotte Frederica Augusta, daughter of Augustus, the last Duke but one of Saxe-Gotha-Altenberg, by whom the issue was Ernest, hereditary Prince, born 21st of June, 1818, now the reigning Duke; and Prince Albert, whose education the Duke personally superintended with the utmost parental solicitude and care. He was married a second time to Antoinetta, daughter of Alexander, Duke of Mecklenburg, by whom he has left no issue.

The late Duke was a great lover of the arts and sciences, and his active energy is evinced by the creation of the Palace of Coburg, the restoration of the old Castle, the erection of the chateaus of Rosenau (Prince Albert's birthplace) and Calenberg, and of Rhenard's Brun; the High School at Gotha, and the two splendid theatres at Coburg and Gotha.

The annexed portrait is from a sketch of the late Duke, taken from Woolwich, on his Royal Highness's last visit to England. The subjoined autograph is from the interesting collection of Mr. Soyer.

The domain of Coburg, the patrimonial estate of the present Duke, was originally a very small inheritance. The principality is the most southern of the Saxon independent states, and is surrounded by Schwartzburg, Meiningen, Hildeburghausen, and Bavaria. The valley of the Itz forms the greater part of its territory. The province is intersected by five rivers, namely, the Itz, Rodach, Steinach, Nassläch, and Lanter, besides a few smaller streams. The Thuringian mountains stretch along the northern boundary of Coburg, which is only about one-fourth larger than Rutlandshire, having an area of not quite 200 square miles in extent. Joined, however, to Gotha, the territory of the Duke equals in size the county of Dorset, having a surface of 1000 square miles. Much of this is covered by mountainous and forest land; in the latter, that portion of the Thuringian forest is comprised, which is called the Black Forest, whose romantic shades have been made the scene of many of those wild legends that the Germans delight to recount. The whole district lies in the Landgravine of Thurings, of which it is the best cultivated, most fertile, and prosperous, and is one of the most thickly populated duchies in the empire.

The inhabitants of Saxe Coburg Gotha number 131,861 persons, who live in 9 principal, and 10 market towns, 429 villages, and 23,950 houses. All the inhabitants are Lutherans, except 2000 Catholics, and 1000 Jews. They are a fine, hardy race, preserving the characteristics of the old German tribes more obviously than their neighbours; they are chiefly employed in agriculture. Although so small in extent, several dialects are spoken in this territory.

The town of Gotha is situated on a hill, beside the river Leine; and few places of the same size and rank in Germany possess more public buildings of interest, or more valuable collections, calculated to promote science, literature, and the fine arts. Gotha, in this respect, may be considered as one of the most classical towns in Germany, and as containing the greatest number of eminent men of letters. The finest public building is the ducal palace of Friedenstein, which stands on the summit of a high hill, with a terrace like that of Windsor Castle, and surrounded by gardens and pleasure grounds. The town has a fine gymnasium, and is adorned with several fountains, and some handsome buildings. The annexed picturesque view of Gotha is from a well-timed work, entitled, "Prince Albert, his Country and Kindred." The companion illustration to the above represents the Palace of Rhenard's Brun, near Gotha, the favourite residence of the ducal family; and for further information respecting the ancestral life of the late Duke, we cannot do better than refer our readers to the above named work.

THE LATE DUKE OF SAXE COBURG GOTHA.—FROM A SKETCH TAKEN DURING HIS LAST VISIT TO ENGLAND.

GOTHA.

CHATEAU OF RHENARD'S BRUN, NEAR GOTHA.

THE PALACE OF THE LATE DUKE OF SAXE-COBURG GOTHA.—FROM AN ORIGINAL PAINTING.

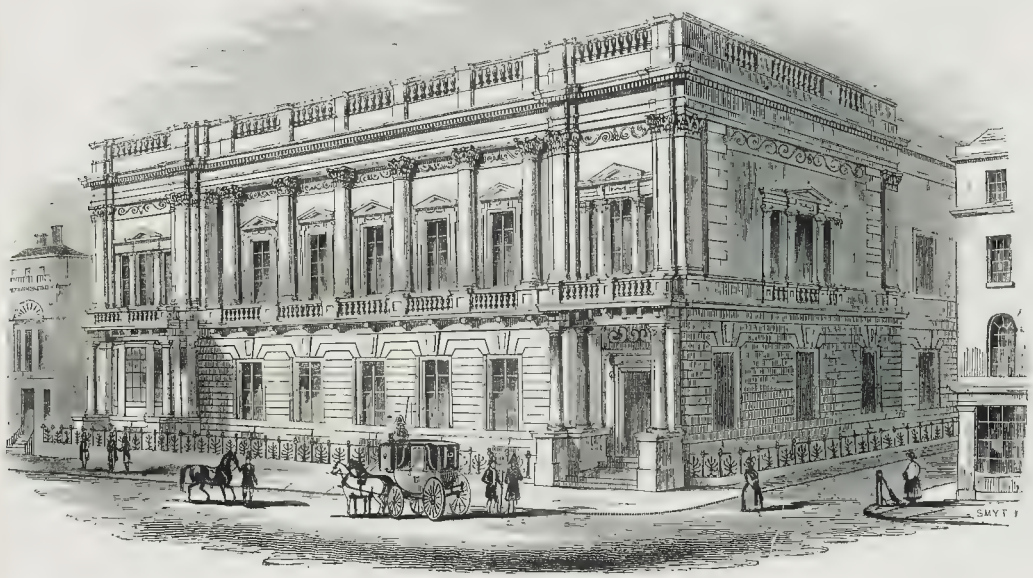
THE NEW CONSERVATIVE CLUB-HOUSE, ST. JAMES'S-STREET.

It has been well observed that Pall-mall, with its magnificent club-houses, has assumed a patrician air; and the present structure will materially aid St. James's-street in attaining similar distinction. True it is that the latter district has, for some scores of years, contained several sedes beatas of club-hommes, but, until a comparatively recent period, the club-houses of St. James's were plain, unostentatious mansions, with little architectural embellishment in contrast with the palatial edifices reared for club-accommodation in the present day.

The Conservative Club-house, which is the latest of these creations, occupies the site of the Thatched House Tavern, the west side of St. James's-street, within a short distance of the Palace-gate. The substitution of a club-house for a tavern will, however, disturb but few associations, since the change is of too frequent occurrence at the west end of the town to excite further than a passing remark; taverns being the convivial glories of the last century just as metropolitan club-houses are the pride of the present; and, as far as street architecture is concerned, we are the gainers.

The design of the new Conservative Club is the joint work of Mr. Sydney Smirke and Mr. George Basevi, jun., and it has the largest façade in the metropolis, being only 3 feet less in length than the Reform Club-house, than which it is 1 foot higher, or 60 feet. The front consists of two stories, or orders, the lower rusticated, and without columns, except at each wing, as to be hereafter described. The upper story is Corinthian, and consists of entire but attached columns and pilasters, upon the usual podium, and having the entablature surmounted by a balustrade. In the intercolumniations are windows, with enriched dressings and pediments. Over the windows, and ranging with the capitals of the columns, is a frieze of sculptured foliage, for the most part of classical character, but having the imperial crown, encircled by an oak wreath, occasionally introduced. The front is of uniform height, but the wings are slightly advanced. In each wing the lower order is Roman Doric; that on the left contains the porch entrance, deeply recessed, with groups of columns and pilasters on either side. In the right wing, the leading features are uniform with the porch; but, instead of an entrance, is a bow-window, which was introduced as an essential, in the opinion of some members of the club, to the morning room, affording the loungers a view of Pall-mall and St. James's-street; this introduction, by the way, reminding us of Theodore Hook's oddly comparing the bow-window of a club house, nearly on the same spot, to a portly old gentleman with a white waistcoat. The whole front of this new club house is of Caen stone, and, with the rest of the building, has been carried up in about six months; the foundations having been commenced in the middle of June, and the whole club house being now roofed in, with much of the interior plastering far advanced. The contractors are bound to complete the building by the end of the present year.

In the "Civil Engineer and Architect's Journal," whence these details are derived, it is truly observed that "difference of opinion will exist with regard to the merits of the Conservative Club-house; but, at any rate, the design is not hackneyed, while the grandeur of the edifice cannot be denied." At the same time, without going into minute critical detail, we must enter our protest against the feebleness and poverty of the composition of the lower or basement part of the façade, especially in contrast with the grouped columns above, these being altogether disproportionate to the supporting columns of the basement, which are likewise unsatisfactorily placed. The upper division of the front is, on the other hand, very successful; and the Club-house certainly forms the most prominent architectural feature of St. James's-street. Some difficulties that existed in the shelving nature of the ground have been cleverly mastered by the able architects.



THE NEW CONSERVATIVE CLUB-HOUSE, ST. JAMES'S-STREET

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

Sunday, Feb. 11th.—Sexagesima Sunday.
Monday, 12th.—Lady Jane Grey beheaded, 1555.
Tuesday, 13th.—Revolution of 1688.
Wednesday, 14th.—St. Valentine.
Thursday, 15th.—Normal School commenced 1840.
Friday, 16th.—Sun rises 7h 13m.
Saturday, 17th.—Sun sets 5h 12m.

High Water at London bridge, for the Week ending Feb. 17.

Monday.		Tuesday.		Wednesday.		Thursday.		Friday.		Saturday.
H. M.	A. M.	H. M.	A. M.	H. M.	A. M.	H. M.	A. M.	H. M.	A. M.	H. M.	A. M.
7 33	8 7	8 47	9 31	10 18	1 6	11 49	0 6	0 25	0 55	1 28	1 57

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.
TERMS, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

	£	s.	d.
Per Quarter	0	6	6
Half Year	0	13	0
One Year	1	6	0

May be had of all Newsmen and Booksellers, or at the Office, 198, Strand.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"H. R. T." A list of Unclaimed Dividends at the Bank of England may be referred to at Dr. Cole's Coffee-house, Walbrook.

"J. H. B." The manuscript is left at the office. The writer is thanked.

"A. A." A Subscriber.—The charge for advertising in the Illustrated London News is 7s. for five lines, and 1s. for each line after.

"Hunchback" small pamphlet, condemning the Fixed Bridle, or Bearing Rein, has been received, but the evil has too frequently been exposed.

"In the Same Case." The second son of the Sovereign would be created Duke of York.

"The Ghost of Barry."—"The History of a Picture" is interesting, but we have not room.

"A Cabinet Maker," Stratford, is not liable for duty on the conveyance, but he is liable for the horse if once entered.

"G. P." Leicester.—How our subscriber a perspective view of the church?

"J. M." Hyde, is liable.

"A Lover of Hunting," Cornwall.—We cannot find room.

"W. F. P."—Yes.

Auburn Earthquake.—We have received a statement of the receipts and distribution of the funds raised for the sufferers by the earthquake in Antigua, from which it appears that there has been dispensed the sum of £ 5,253 14s. 8½d.

"J. H." Mile End.—A book 276 years old would be useless for a newspaper.

"An Old Gentleman."—On the occasion of another royal visit. The tales are becoming very popular.

"A Sherbonian."—See the gratis Supplement to Vol. III.

"S. Q."—We recommend our subscriber not to trouble himself in the matter, as we do not possess considerable interest.

"T. M. R." Upper Kennington-lane.—Declined.

"J. B." Ratcherby.—1. We do not fold the papers. 2. The cases will be ready shortly. 3. The Census error shall be corrected.

"F. T. V." Penzance.—See future announcements.

"J. W. P." Burslem.—The application depends on circumstances which our subscriber does not sufficiently explain.

"Columbus and the Egg."—Too stale.

"Timothy Plain" is thanked for his letter.

"C. A." should address to the head gardener, &c.

"A Subscriber."—Neither of the works has the reputation of being sound.

"A Constant Subscriber," Liverpool. See this week's journal.

"Andrea Gambesano."—We have not space.

"Ignoramus Vos."—The noblemen sits in the House of Lords.

"Hodge Glowworm's" lines are not bright enough.

"A. B."—Declined.

"K. A." should apply to Messrs. Robertson and Co., Patent Agents, Fleet-street.

"W. R." Cambridge, is thanked for his sensible hints.

"J. and F."—The illustration shall appear.

"U." Pemmican is a kind of concentrated meat for ship's crews in long voyages. Boulders (stones), in geology, are rolled blocks of stone rounded by the action of water.

"L. N. R." Irvington.—"The Parting Moment" will not suit.

"T. W." St. John's-lane.—The Captain of the Honourable Corps of Gentlemen-at-Arms to the Queen is Lord Forester.

"Mens" request, if literally complied with, would occupy more space than we can spare.

"R. V. R."—Spire and steeple, in architecture, are synonymous.

"J. L." Bath.—The terms must be misprinted.

"R. S." Mr. Ditone.—Address to Mr. Dickens's publishers, Messrs. Chapman and Hall, Strand.

"D. C. K." Glasgow.—The continuator of Sir James Mackintosh's "History of England" is Mr. James Wallace.

"A Constant Reader," Dublin. A lender to the amount of forty shillings may be made in silver, but beyond that amount it must be in gold. If a tender be made to a larger amount in silver or in bank notes, and no objection to the nature of the tender in which it is made, the objection to the tender on that ground will be held to be waived, and the tender will be held good to the full amount to which it is made. (See the article Tender in the "Penny Cyclopædia.") A tender, moreover, to be legal, must be unclogged with condition.

Game Laws.—We will agree in the sentiments expressed by our northern correspondent on the subject of the Game Laws, but the crowded state of our columns utterly prevents the possibility of its insertion; his rather lengthy communication this week. We promise, however, not to lose sight of the subject, and will take an early opportunity of returning to it.

We beg to refer our Gelston correspondent to the 83rd and 89th numbers of the Illustrated London News for a solution of his query.

Chess.—"J. D. F."—You are not obliged to say check to the queen.

"One who can Play a Little."—Walker's Treatise on Chess is the one we should recommend.

"Clio Victor."—Received.

"X. Y. Z."—You may have two or more queens on the board at once, as we have stated at least twenty times.

"H. O."—It depends entirely upon situation: it ought to be a draw.

Errata.—No. 90, p. 48, col. 1, for "15,000 persons," read "1500 persons."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1844.

We observe with great satisfaction that the subject of railway monopolies is at last forcing itself upon the attention of the Legislature, and although, from the declaration of the President of the Board of Trade, there is little hope that increased accommodation for the humbler classes, or a reduced rate of fares, will be made the subjects of ministerial consideration, yet, from what occurred in the House of Commons in reference to this question on Monday last, we do not despair that, even in spite of the Government protection, the various railway companies throughout the country will be obliged to abandon the harsh and unfeeling mode of traffic which they have hitherto pursued, and consent to provide at all proper times and seasons accommodation for the poorer class of travellers commensurate with their means, and who are now virtually shut out from all the advantages of railway transmission. Mr. Gladstone has declared that to encourage railway competition, would be, in his opinion, to "multiply monopolies;" but whilst he seeks to strengthen the prerogative of the Board of Trade, by giving it a veto on all contemplated new lines, he holds out not the slightest hope of any check being put to the abuses of existing railways, nor is it even hinted at as being a proper subject for inquiry. It was well observed by Mr. Rocbuck, that when Parliament granted a monopoly it had a right to interfere if that monopoly was not exercised as Parliament had been led to expect, or as was conducive to the interests of the public. For ourselves, we should say that although we would be the very first to protect the rights of individuals who have invested their capital in railways on the faith of acts of Parliament, yet when we find companies becoming bloated with the immense accumulations of wealth, from which the public derives not the slightest benefit, and that all the promises which were at first held out, of reducing fares in the event of the speculation paying a dividend of a certain amount, were nothing more than so many specious delusions, we cannot hesitate to declare, that the rivalry of competing lines must be productive of much benefit. On some of the railways the third class passengers are huddled together like so many sheep, without shelter from the inclemency of the weather, and without a seat, a circumstance which is, in our opinion, a disgrace to any class of commercial speculators, much more one that numbers amongst its pursuers many of our benevolent and Christian legislators.

PUBLIC INCOME AND EXPENDITURE. BALANCE SHEET.

An Account of the Net Public Income of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in the Year ended the 5th day of January, 1844, after abating the Expenditure thereout defrayed by the several Revenue Departments.

INCOME OR REVENUE.		Total.
ORDINARY REVENUE AND RECEIPTS.		£ s. d.
Customs		21,033,717 0 9
Excise		12,877,598 17 6
Stamps		6,948,136 12 7
Taxes (Land and Assessed)		4,199,468 1 6
Property Tax		5,349,356 13 11
Post Office		595,000 0 0
Crown Lands		117,560 0 0
Fees of Offices		5,231 18 0
Small Branches of the Hereditary Revenues of the Crown		5,440 11 7
Surplus Fees of Regulated Public Offices		47,676 11 2
		£1,069,978 7 0
OTHER RECEIPTS.
Money from China, under the Treaty of August, 1842 ..		1,315,899 1 6
Imprest and other Monies		100,517 15 10
Money received from the East India Company		60,000 0 0
		£2,545,795 4 4
Unclaimed Dividends (more than paid)		37,112 5 10
		£2,582,917 10 2

EXPENDITURE.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
Funded Debt.—Interest and Management of the Permanent Debt	24,656,692 7 10
Terminable Annuities	3,924,183 16 4
Total Charge of the Funded Debt, exclusive of £6749 17s. 9d., the Interest on Donations and Bequests	28,581,076 4 2
Unfunded Debt.—Interest on Exchequer Bills	668,084 4 2
	29,249,160 8 4
Civil List	390,306 17 4
Annuities and Pensions for Civil, Naval, Military, and Judicial Services, &c., charged by various acts of Parliament on the Consolidated Fund	582,504 10 8
Salaries and Allowances	345,341 6 11
Diplomatic Salaries and Pensions	179,486 5 3
Courts of Justice	236,785 19 6½
Miscellaneous Charges on the Consolidated Fund	257,409 11 9
	2,389,894 5 5½
Army	6,997,156 0 0
Navy	6,966,056 14 3
Ordnance	1,910,704 1 3
Miscellaneous, chargeable on the annual grants of Parliament (including £262,000 to indemnify the holders of certain forged Exchequer Bills)	3,279,362 16 5
Canada Insurrection	25,300 0 0
China Expedition	416,056 0 0
Queen Compensation	1,245,323 5 10
	19,489,459 17 8
	£31,129,514 11 5½
Excess of Income over Expenditure	1,443,402 18 8½
	£32,582,917 10 2

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The reception on the throne by the Queen of the Address of the House of Commons, on Saturday afternoon, was postponed, in consequence of the receipt at Buckingham Palace of the melancholy and unexpected intelligence of the death of his Royal Highness Ernest (reigning) Duke of Saxe Coburg Gotha, father of his Royal Highness Prince Albert. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge called at Buckingham Palace on Saturday afternoon, to inquire after his Royal Highness Prince Albert. Her Majesty and Prince Albert left Buckingham Palace at five o'clock on Saturday afternoon, in a carriage and four, for Windsor Castle. The royal party quitted the palace by the garden-gate, and travelled post to Windsor Castle, unattended by any escort from town.

Windsor, Sunday.—Prayers were read before the Queen and the Prince by the Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay (in their private apartments), who also performed divine worship before the members of the Royal Household, in her Majesty's private chapel, both in the morning and afternoon. In consequence of the lamented demise of the reigning Duke of Saxe Coburg, the whole of the members of the Royal Household are in deep mourning. The painful intelligence of the death of her Royal Highness's brother reached the Duchess of Kent, at Frogmore, from Buckingham Palace, between twelve and one o'clock, on Saturday afternoon. Her Royal Highness was most deeply and painfully affected at the unexpected and mournful tidings of her sudden bereavement. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert paid a visit of condolence to her Royal Highness on Sunday afternoon, shortly before dark, in a close carriage and pair, observing the strictest privacy.

Monday.—Her Majesty was very nearly meeting with an accident when leaving the Castle to take a private walk in the Home Park, which, in the present extremely delicate and interesting situation of the Sovereign, might have been attended with serious and painful consequences. The Queen, on proceeding from the Castle, down the steep declivity leading (from the South-terrace to the outer entrance to George the Fourth's gateway, between the York and Lancaster Towers, would have fallen backwards, and with considerable violence, in consequence of the slippery state of the pathway which was entirely frozen over, had it not been for the presence of mind of the Countess of Dunmore, who fortunately caught her Majesty in her arms, and thus prevented the Queen from sustaining any injury.

Tuesday.—Her Majesty and His Royal Highness Prince Albert walked for a short time on the terrace, and in the afternoon visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore House, where they remained some time. The Queen and Prince dined in private, and continue the utmost privacy during the remainder of the week. The Castle has assumed a most sombre appearance. The weeds of the blinds of the windows are drawn down throughout the royal residence. The shutters of every house in the town are also closed out of respect to the memory of the parent of the Prince Consort. The state apartments at the Castle will remain closed to the public for some days.

The Duke and Duchess of Sutherland left Stafford House on Wednesday, for the Earl of Carlisle's seat, Castle Howard, Yorkshire, in consequence of the noble earl, her grace's father, having experienced a relapse, and being alarmingly indisposed, which prevented the family from coming to town. We understand that the noble earl is labouring under an attack of paralysis.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge attended a meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society of England on Wednesday, in Hanover-square. In the evening his Royal Highness, attended by Colonel Keate, dined at the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle-street.

Sir Robert Peel has issued invitations for a grand parliamentary dinner on Saturday, the 17th instant, at his residence in Whitehall-gardens.

We regret to record the demise of Lady Fennel Grant, of Grant, sister to the Earl of Seafield, who expired at West Park, near Elgin, on the 27th inst.

METROPOLITAN NEWS

EXCLUSION OF CATHOLICS FROM JURIES.

A public meeting of English Catholics was held on Wednesday at one o'clock, at the Freemasons' Tavern, for the purpose of considering the propriety of addressing her Majesty on the subject of the conduct of the Lord-Chancellor of the Crown in Ireland, in excluding Roman Catholics from the jury on the State Trials in that country. The room was crowded long before the commencement of the proceedings.

On the platform we observed Lord Camoys, Lord Stourton, the Hon. C. Langdale, P. Howard, Esq., M.P. (Carlisle), the Hon. Sir David Yavasour, Bart., P. C. Maxwell, Esq., Charles Eaton, Esq., J. Tempest, Esq., J. Townley, Esq., W. Williams, Esq., J. A. Cooke, Esq., E. Jerningham, Esq., R. Berkeley, Esq., (of Spetchley), James Eyre, Esq., John Selby, Esq., George Morgan, Esq., George Basil Eyston, Esq., the Rev. Dr. Magee, Revds. Sisk, Moore, Harrington, Price, Cotter, Tounsel, Coyle, Telford, Browne, Rymer, Hunt, Hearne, O'Neil, and several other distinguished Catholic noblemen and gentlemen.

At one o'clock, on the motion of Lord Stourton, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Langdale, Lord Camoys was called to the chair

The Chairman then read a letter from the Earl of Shrewsbury, expressing his indignation at the insult offered to the Catholics by the conduct of the Government in striking off the names of all Catholics from the jury panel, and protesting against the conduct of the Government to the Catholics. (Loud cheers.)

Lord Stourton was called on to propose the first resolution. He said he was almost a jubilarian in the service of his Roman Catholic brethren. (Cheers.) He had chosen who had associated them one by one decay, but he, though old, was a living witness to refute the calumny that Catholics were not to be bound by their oaths. (Cheers.) His late excellent friend the Duke of Norfolk would not pass the rail by which he must enter Parliament, and he cast his staff upon the ground rather than enter that place, because he would not take a certain oath. He would not enter it himself, because there was an oath upon it. (Cheers.) They would not consent to have their privileges abridged in the House of Parliament, because they were Catholics. If they could not vote upon every measure that came before them, he would consider it a dishonour and not an honour, to be a Member of the House of Peers. Such was the opinion of the first peer of the realm, the late Duke of Norfolk. If he abstained from voting on questions relating to the Established Church, he did so from delicacy, lest any one should say that he had taken. The Catholic religion was spread over the world, and if it were true that Catholics were not to be believed on their oaths, then they were perjurers over the whole world. Let Catholics and Protestants meet each other on the point, but let them not weaken the foundations of their common religion, and their common belief in the sacred volume. Let them call on her Majesty to protect, not their, but her and their common Christianity. The noble lord concluded, amid loud cheers, by proposing the following resolution:—

"That the abolition of civil distinctions, on account of religion, was the avowed object of those who introduced and understood the principle of the Act for the Emancipation of the Roman Catholics."

The Rev. Mr. Harrington seconded the resolution, which was put and carried. Several other resolutions were then passed, and the following address was carried unanimously:—

"We, your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, professing the Roman Catholic religion, strongly impressed with the importance of the principle sanctioned and established on the passing of the Emancipation Act, that our religion should no longer be a bar to our full and free enjoyment of those civil rights and privileges which we had so long been deprived under unjust and erroneous imputations on its tenets, cannot but view with extreme jealousy the late act of the legal advisers of your Majesty's Government in Ireland, whereby all Roman Catholics were excluded from the jury list. We, therefore, humbly presume, in presenting this, our loyal address, to your Majesty, to protest against this, their act, being construed into a precedent for infringing on those rights and privileges which we consider ourselves equally entitled to, and justified to enjoy with any other class of your Majesty's subjects."

After a vote of thanks to the Chairman, three cheers were given for Daniel O'Connell, and the meeting separated.

Incorporated Society of Licensed Victuallers.—This Society held a jubilee at the London Tavern on Thursday last, to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the publication of the Licensed Victuallers' Journal, the profits of which go to maintain that splendid institution in Kennington-lane, which is an ornament to the metropolis, of which her Majesty, Queen Victoria, is the patroness, and which maintains and educates a great number of children, the sons and daughters of deceased members belonging to this populous body, besides granting pensions to the parents. Nearly a thousand members assembled to commemorate this—for them and to all charitable disposed persons—gratifying occasion, and the utmost enthusiasm and harmony prevailed throughout the evening. The proceedings of the Licensed Victuallers in support of their charities present an example worthy of imitation; for although that body, like every other extensive association, is greatly divided on political subjects, yet with them "the end justifies the means," and the staunchest Conservative is reconciled to the Radicalism of his organ by the honest consistency and charity with which it is conducted, as well as by the objects of that noble institution which its success so materially contributes to support. Like many other of the splendid charities with which the metropolis abounds, the Licensed Victuallers' Institution has reared many valuable members of society.

Dinner to Thomas Baring, Esq.—On Wednesday evening the electors of the City of London resident in the district and ward of Farringdon Within, gave at the London Coffee-house, Ludgate-hill, a public dinner to Thomas Baring, Esq., the Conservative candidate at the late election. George Byrom Whitley, Esq., was in the chair, supported by about one hundred electors, including several influential supporters of the Conservative cause voting in this ward.

Seamen's Hospital Society.—On Wednesday the twenty-third annual meeting of this society was held at the office, 74, King William-street, City; John Labouchere, Esq., presided. The chairman, after a few preliminary observations, called on Mr. Harley, the secretary, to read the report, which stated that during the year there were admitted as patients 2778; and that relief had been afforded to 2933 out-patients; making the total number during the year 4811. From the annual statement it appears that the receipts for the past year were £4040 19s., and the disbursements £6000; making a deficiency of nearly £2000.

Post-Office Order.—The following notice appeared on Wednesday at the Post-office, St. Martin's-le-Grand:—"The next mail for India, &c., viâ Marseilles, will be despatched from hence on the 4th March. The Clyde will take out the West India mails on the 17th instant. The Caledonia, for the American mails of 4th March. The Superior, for the New South Wales mails of the 29th instant.

London and Brighton Railway.—On Wednesday the proprietors held their half-yearly general meeting in the large room at the London terminus, Mr. Parsons, chairman of the Directors, presiding. There was a numerous attendance of the proprietors from Brighton, York, and other places, and amongst them Sir John Simpson, Captain Kelly, R.N., Mr. Rowland Hill, Mr. Baxendale, Chairman of the South-Eastern Railway; Mr. Bastrick, engineer, and the secretary. The report contained the usual statements of the traffic during the past half-year, as contrasted with the corresponding period of the previous one, showed an increase of £7885. The reduction of the company's fares, in consequence of the negotiation with the London and Croydon to the proprietors and the public, and an assurance had been obtained from the General Steam Navigation Company that, during the ensuing season, improved steam-boats should be provided for the passage between Brighton and Boulogne, as heretofore. The meeting was occupied for upwards of three hours, in the discussion of a variety of topics. Ultimately resolutions were passed, declaring a dividend at the rate of 20s. per cent., a negative to a proposition on the part of the South-Eastern Railway, to take a lease of the Brighton line, at a rent of £100,000 per annum; also authorising the Directors to take a lease, at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, of the ground-rent lands from Brighton to Hastings, such from Shoreham to Chichester, and to adjust any differences in the accounts unsettled with the South-Eastern Company. Captain Kelly, R.N., Mr. Thompson, and Mr. Wigan, having been re-elected Directors of the railway, the meeting separated.

The New Royal Exchange.—Instructions have been given by the committee superintending the erection of the New Royal Exchange to sell the triangular block of buildings facing Cornhill and Threadneedle-street, known as Bank Buildings, and which is to be taken down for the purpose of forming the western approach to the New Royal Exchange and the site for the Wellington statue

Death of another Old Bow-street Officer.—Mr. Salmon expired on Sunday, within a few days of his old associate Mr. Goodson, whose death we recorded last week. Mr. Salmon was the oldest Bow-street officer living, being 74 years of age. He was celebrated as a principal in apprehending Thistlewood for the Cato-street conspiracy, in which enterprise Smithers was killed. Latterly, till within a few weeks of his death, Mr. Salmon held a situation as officer in the Court of Equity at Westminster Hall.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Brighton.—Military Outrage.—The magistrates of the Brighton bench were occupied for several hours on Monday with a charge of riot and assault, preferred against six soldiers of the 7th Hussars. The parties were Corporal Hubbard, Privates M'Intire, Weston, Williams, and Baldwin, and Kean, servant to Captain De Winton. According to the evidence, the soldiers, between one and two o'clock on Thursday morning, broke open a house in Thomas-street, pulled some little Italian boys out of their beds, then proceeded to an adjoining room, and served them in the same way, and moreover, stripped the beds, and broke the bedsteads on which the females slept. The master of the house, who slept next door, being awoke by the disturbance, ran to the spot, and on his and his wife's return, found the doors were struck with fragments of the broken bedsteads; the woman received a severe injury in the back, and her husband sustained a compound fracture of the arm. The soldiers then attacked the window-frames, shutters, mahogany kitchens, and other utensils, till scarcely a whole pane was left in the house; and then, having discovered a couple of pianos or organs used by the Italian boys about the streets, they dragged the instruments into the street, and utterly demolished them. The injury to the house was estimated at near £20, and to the pianos at about as much more. We understand that the provocation which gave rise to the outrage was an assault made upon a party of dancers connected with persons of ill fame, for whom the street is a rendezvous, and that the injured soldier's comrades, in endeavouring to take vengeance, mistook the house. All the prisoners were committed for trial to the next quarter sessions; but on the following day the Colonel gave bail for the appearance of Corporal Hubbard, who was consequently discharged.

Devizes.—The Election.—The nomination took place on Tuesday morning. Mr. Ludlow Bruges was proposed by Colonel Olivier, seconded by Mr. Butcher. Mr. Temple was proposed by Mr. P. Anstie, seconded by Mr. James Wyatt. Both candidates had a fair hearing, the favour declared the show of hands in favour of Mr. Bruges, and a poll was then demanded for Mr. Temple and his friends.

The polling took place at eight o'clock on Wednesday morning, and finally closed at four, when the numbers were—for

Mr. Bruges		206
Mr. Temple		64
	Majority	142

Dover.—The remaining portion of the South-Eastern Railway from Folkestone to Dover was opened on Tuesday last. The directors, accompanied by a party of friends, left Folkestone, in a special train, decorated with flags and laurels, at a quarter before four o'clock, and proceeded at good speed towards

Dover. As the train issued from the Shakspeare Cliff Tunnel, drawn by the engine Shakspeare, a most animated scene presented itself in contrast to the previous darkness. The heights were crowded with spectators, flags were flying, bands of music were playing on the heights, salutes were fired, and the voices of the people were heard cheering as the carriages passed along. At the station, the band of the 1st Dragoon Guards from Canterbury was drawn up, and played "God Save the Queen." The band of the National Guard of Calais was also in the station, and afterwards played the English National Anthem. When the directors had descended from their carriages, the Mayor and Corporation of Dover, in their robes of office, came forward, and the Town-clerk (W. G. Ledger, Esq.), addressed Mr. Buckle, the chairman of the company, and requested that the guests would see the successful completion of the arduous undertaking, which promised to become of the greatest public benefit. Mr. Buxendale acknowledged the compliment in a short speech, and thanked the Corporation and the inhabitants of Dover for their very cordial welcome. A procession was then formed, consisting of the Mayor and Corporation, and the Directors of the Company, preceded by the band of music, and accompanied by numerous banners, having appropriate mottoes. The procession took a circuitous route, through some of the principal streets, to the Theatre, which had been fitted up for a public entertainment by the Corporation of Dover for the diversion of the officers of the train and their friends. The interior of the theatre was very tastefully decorated with flags, devices, and evergreens. In one of the side galleries the band of the Calais National Guard was stationed, and on the opposite side the band of the 1st Dragoon Guards, who played alternately during dinner. Shortly after five the Mayor entered the theatre, followed by the members of the Corporation, and by the chairman and directors of the railway. Among the other gentlemen, were were Mr. Rice, M.P. for Dover; Mr. Cubitt, engineer in chief of the railway; M. Maurice, the Mayor of Calais; the Deputy Mayor of Boulogne, and the officers of Artillery, and of the 96th and 97th Regiments quartered in the town. The Mayor of Calais returned thanks for the health of Louis Philippe, and several excellent speeches in French and English, breathing the utmost friendship and cordiality between the two countries, were delivered during the evening.

Flintshire.—The Flintshire colliers have struck work for an advance of wages, at a time when hundreds of working men are in a total want of employment. This movement has been urged by the delegates from the north, where meetings we have recently noticed. The following are said to be amongst the demands:—The colliers demand that what they are now paid 4s. for shall be advanced to 5s. 6d. The drawers demand an advance of from 3s. 8d. to 4s. 2d.; and the fillers from 2s. 8d. to 3s. 11d. All others employed also demand an advance. The strike is not general, but still it is embarrassing to several large concerns. This combination will probably produce a combination of employers, which will eventually end in the depression of wages.

IRELAND.

Lord De Grey and Sir E. Sugden.—It is rumoured that there has occurred a very serious misunderstanding between the Lord Lieutenant and the Lord Chancellor. The cause assigned has reference to a fashionable party at the residence of the Chancellor. This matter has been much talked of in Dublin for some days past. The Lord Chancellor or his family did not attend the late drawing-room at the Castle.

The Repeal Association. The weekly meeting of the Association was held on Monday in the Conciliation Hall, Dublin. The building was crowded to excess. On the motion of Mr. Maurice O'Connell, the chair was taken by Lord Ffrench, amidst the most rapturous applause. His lordship said, amongst other things, "that he identified himself heart and soul with Mr. O'Connell." The meeting was addressed by Mr. Maurice O'Connell, M.P.; Mr. Dillon Brown, M.P.; and Mr. Smith O'Brien, M.P., who moved and carried a resolution to appoint a committee to watch over the proceedings in Parliament. [Mr. O'Connell entered the hall during the proceedings, and was most vociferously cheered.] After the other business was disposed of, Mr. O'Connell handed in some more money, and said, although he had already spoken something more than five hours, he could not refuse to address a few observations to the meeting. They were words of peace. His opinion was that matters were going on as favourably as possible, and inculcated peace as the only means of obtaining the Charter. Mr. O'Connell moved an adjournment of the meeting for a month till Monday next, and announced the rent for the week to be £350 4s. 10d. Mr. Roche, M.P., was then moved to the chair, and the thanks of the meeting were voted to Lord Ffrench

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Malta, Jan. 18th.—The Commander-in-Chief has appointed Mr. Herbert, mate of the Vernon, to be acting Lieutenant of the Hyacinth; Mr. Hawkins, mate of the Queen, to be acting Lieutenant of the Geyser. On Tuesday, the 9th ult., a court-martial sat on board the Vernon, Captain Bouverie, and continued by adjournment, for the trial of Lieut. C. B. Strong, of that ship, on a charge of absenting himself for several days without leave. The charge having been proved, the prisoner was sentenced to be dismissed his ship, and to be placed, for two years, at the bottom of the list of lieutenants. Rear-Admiral Sir Lucius Curtis was President; Captains Rich, Sartorius, Walpole, members.

The Penelope steam frigate returned to Plymouth, from a week's cruise, on Saturday last, having blown out the bottom of her hot well. She is gone up Hamoaze to repair damages, which will occupy three weeks. She is destined for the coast of Africa, as no engineer is ordered to take passage in her, on the way to join the Gorgon, to which he is appointed.

The Vernon, 50, Capt. W. Walpole, is ordered home from the Mediterranean. She will call at Lisbon.

Promotion.—Mate: Mr. F. E. Forbes, to the rank of Lieutenant, and to the Childers, vice Milbanke, deceased.

Appointments.—Lieutenants: J. R. Baker, to the Tortoise; R. Mc. K. Richardson (additional), to the Cornwallis. Mates: W. A. Lee, to the Excellent; R. T. N. Chessyre, to the Prometheus. Chaplain: Rev. G. Richards, to the Victory, vice Marshall. Assistant Surgeons: Richard Hooper (additional), to the St. Vincent; Dr. R. Clarke, to the Prometheus; Dr. Hoa, to the Vernon. Second Master: Forbes Macbean, to the Excellent. Coast Guard: Lieut. John Kiddle, to command Harpy, R.C.; Lieut. Charles Henry Baker, to Vulcan steamer; Lieut. Charles Douglas O'Brien, to the lieutenancy of a watch. Removals: Commander Douglas Curry, from Newcastle, to Ryde district, vice Commander Robert Kerr, to Weymouth; Lieut. Henry Crocker, to Prince Albert; Lieut. Samuel Marines, to the Coastguard at Ascension, for Lieut. Goldsmith, Shamrock, R.C.; Lieut. Thomas Edward James, R.N., from Happisburgh to Lyme Gobb.

An invention has been made by an ingenious mechanic of Edinburgh, of a new mode of creating motion to vessels, doing away with the paddle-wheels and boxes, as well as the Archimedian screw. It is a simple revolving cylinder, placed astern, which acts on the principle of the screw-propeller. The fact, the velocity acquired is in proportion to the quantity of water discharged by the agency of the cylinder, through a discharging nozzle at each side of the vessel; and the entrance, the discharging nozzle can be turned by a simple operation on deck, so as to stop the vessel, make her move backwards, or round as on a pivot within her own length, without even the knowledge of the engineer, or the motion of the machinery, so the stoppage of the engine is rendered unnecessary in these purposes. The convenience is a smaller consumption of fuel, and the capability of the broadside carrying an entire armament.

To the pension of £100 per annum, of which General John Mackenzie is already in receipt, an addition has been made of £210. Major Generals Heiser, Touzel, James Hay, William Wood, George Burrell, and Sir Robert James Harvey, are each to receive £200 per annum, and Colonels Alexander Kennedy Clark Kennedy, and the Hon. George Cathcart, on the unattached half pay, at £160 per annum each. The pensions of the first six are to take effect from the first of last month, and those of the two Colonels from the 1st instant.

A court-martial is ordered to be held on a few days, on board the St. Vincent, on Lieut. Dyke, late of the Iris frigate, on charges preferred against him by Captain Lee, of the Royal Marines, late Commandant at Ascension, for words uttered by the Lieutenant, presumed to be prejudicial to the character of the Captain.

Shipwrecks.—Intelligence was received in the City on Wednesday, that the splendid packet Anne, Capt. Crawford, of the port of Ardrossan, was lost, and in all probability, every person on board perished. From the particulars obtained it appears that the vessel was nearly new, having been built about eight months since by Mr. Henderson, sen., and had made only one voyage to Malta, and was on her road from Cork to Glasgow, laden with a cargo of logwood. On Tuesday week the crew, consisting of ten men, came on shore close to the Mull of Kentyre Point. In one of the boats was the lifeless body of Mr. John Henderson, jun., the mate. Since then the vessel has been found a few miles S.S.W. of the Ailsa Craig, and the sails, which were cut to pieces by the gale, have been subsequently towed on shore, along with the greater portion of the rigging. Owing to the recent boisterous gales it is supposed that the vessel must have capsized, and all hands perished. Information was also received that the Julia, Capt. Burnett, of Guernsey, from Caen for London, and reported as lost, on Monday last, at about two o'clock, A.M., in running for Havre, during a violent gale of wind from the south, struck on the Casquets. The captain and crew, anticipating that she would go to pieces, abandoned her. Towards daylight the storm moderated, when Captain Burnet and the crew, with assistance, returned to the vessel, and succeeded in getting her off the sandbank, and brought her to Havre, in a very leaky state, where she is at present undergoing a survey.

Southampton.—The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer Pacha, Captain Wilson, arrived at Southampton on Monday last, from Gibraltar, &c., bringing all the Peninsular mails; also the East India passengers who were detained at Malta, in consequence of an accident which happened to the Great Liverpool steam-ship, and which has been before noticed.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

The late Fatal Accident on the Eastern Counties Railway.—The inquiry into the circumstances attending the deaths of James Hanney and Proctor Wilkins Scott, the engine driver and stoker of a luggage train on this line of railway, who were killed near the Springfield ballast hole on the morning of the 28th ult., was resumed on Monday forenoon before Mr. C. G. Lewis, coroner for Essex, at the Three Cups Inn, Springfield-road, Chelmsford, and after the examination of several witnesses, at half-past nine o'clock at night was adjourned to a future day.

Explosion at Malden Powder Mills.—On Monday morning, at one o'clock, the inhabitants of Malden, a village between Cheam and Kingston, Surrey, were alarmed by a loud noise similar to that made by the discharge of a piece of artillery. It was soon ascertained that an explosion had occurred at the powder-mills, which are the property of Mr. Frederick Taylor, of Ewell. There was no person at work in them at the time, and, therefore, the result was not of a fatal character. From an inspection subsequently made, it was found that one of the corning mills, in which there was a quantity of green or unprepared powder, had been utterly destroyed. The process of grinding was in actual operation at the time, and it is supposed that, prior to the man, who has the charge of this particular mill, leaving, he had not sufficiently damped the powder, the consequence of which was, that some grit getting intermixed with the dry powder caused the latter to ignite by friction with the machinery. It is a singular circumstance that an explosion occurred at these mills about six months since, at the same early hour in the morning, and under similar circumstances.

Accident in Hyde Park.—Tuesday morning a young man named Henry Budding, a groom in the service of Lord Sudeley, whilst exercising a valuable horse, the property of his lordship, in Hyde Park, the animal suddenly took fright, and succeeded in throwing his rider into the road. The poor man was conveyed to St. George's Hospital, where it was discovered that he had sustained a serious fracture of his right leg.

Fatal Accident occurrence in the City.—Mr. Payne, City coroner, held an inquest on Tuesday at Guy's Hospital, on the body of James Hiller, a carpenter, aged 23, one of the unfortunate men who were injured by an extensive quantity of earth falling from the north-eastern angle made for the Fresham Club House, at the corner of King William-street and St. Swithin's-lane on Saturday last. The evidence showed that there was no neglect on the part of those who superintended the excavation. The cause of the earth giving way was attributed to the weight of an iron water pipe, about five or six feet from the bank of earth which fell. Verdict, "Accidental Death."

Dreadful Fire.—On Wednesday night, at half-past nine o'clock, as police constable Weavers, No. 227 M, was going his rounds, his attention was directed the steam saw mills belonging to Messrs. Harrison, situate in Swan-street, Bermondsey, by perceiving a dense body of suffocating smoke issuing out of the sawing-house. No sooner had the constable spread the alarm, than the fire broke through the roof, and in less than five minutes through every part of the sawing-house. The brigade, by dint of extraordinary exertion, succeeded in arresting the progress of the fire; and shortly after ten o'clock the conflagration was entirely extinguished; not, however, until that part of the premises where the outbreak took place was, with its contents, almost destroyed. The origin of the fire is unknown.

Melancholy Loss of Life at Messrs. Barclay's Brewhouse.—On Wednesday afternoon, about two o'clock, Roberts, one of the foremen of the above-named establishment, with one of the men under his superintendence, descended into one of the large vats for the purpose of cleansing it, when it was shortly discovered that they were insensible, suffocation having taken place. Immediate assistance was procured from St. Thomas's Hospital, when Dr. Callaway and several other medical men, were in prompt attendance, and after using every means surgical skill could derive, it was found that life was quite extinct. Mr Roberts was much respected by the firm. He has left a wife, as also the other unfortunate sufferer. It is a remarkable circumstance that Mr. Roberts was appointed to the situation in consequence of having saved the life of Mr. Arthur Barclay, when bathing at Cornwall, sixteen years since, and has lost his own life in endeavouring to save the life of a fellow creature.

Fatal Accident.—It is with deep concern we have to state that the Right Honourable the Earl of Kintore has met with another painful bereavement, in the death of one of his daughters—a most interesting child, about ten years of age, who, while amusing herself near the top of the staircase at Keith-hall, fell over the balustrade, and alighted on the basement floor, a great height. She was taken up in a state of insensibility, and died in little more than an hour. This distressing occurrence, occurring so soon after the sudden and lamented death of Lord Inverury, renders the affliction doubly severe.

Melancholy Accident.—A deplorable accident, attended with loss of life, occurred on Saturday last shortly before twelve o'clock, on the site formerly occupied by Dove-court, Mansion House-street, where some extensive excavations have been going on during the last few weeks, preparatory to the erection of the London Club-house. A number of men had been engaged during the morning in excavating a deep trench for the reception of concrete, out of the six persons, named Hillyer, was in the act of placing a board against the embankment, when Matthew's sank—My salary is £60 per week and we have taken £10 per week for expenses of dresses, which is not sufficient in consequence of our wardrobe, which is worth from £300 to £400, being bold by Mr. Moses, from whom some day I hope to redeem it; therefore for the want of many of those dresses, we are obliged to buy new ones. Mr. James should wish Mr. Mathews to state what reduction would be necessary from his salary for stage decoration, and what was requisite for the maintenance of himself and wife.—Mr. Mathews. £30 a week for stage expenses, and the maintenance of myself and wife. The £5 a week included £10 for personal expenses, £10 for wardrobe expenses, £5 a week for marriage, which with cheaper than a coach, and £5 for servants at the theatre.—Mr. James thought that £5 a week for the latter was too much.—Mr Mathews: I can not see you for a cheaper than hiring a cab, for, in the first place, we have to go to rehearsal, then Mrs. Mathews has to go and make the necessary purchases for the evening, we have sometimes to get a dinner at three o'clock, and in the meantime I have to run round to stop the mouths of creditors for £3000, at 60 per cent, and for the last five years, I have never had time to study a part except in a cab; for these reasons, offer my creditors the one-half what I owe.

Sir C. F. Williams: I think it is extremely liberal.—The protection was renewed. The schedule, which consists of 37 double folio pages, states that the bankrupt's debts he has consists of twenty-one separate items amounting to £30; while the gross debts and liabilities are £8111 13s. 10d. He has no credits and no debts due to him. Mr. and Mrs. Mathews realised by provincial engagements, from 17th March 31, 1840, for 93 nights at Dublin, £2,790; ten nights at Edinburgh, £640; for six at Glasgow, £264; for two at New castle, £60, and for five at Liverpool, £260. From April the 19th to November 4th, 1843.—In April, £140; in May, £280; in June, £280; in July, £280; in August, £200; in September, £280; in October, £380, and in November, £48, making a total of £4382.

Central Criminal Court.—Friday.—Extensive Robberies.—Henry Anscomb, aged sixteen years, was indicted for stealing a quantity of moiseeline de laine, value £2, and upwards, the property of Messrs. Robert Price and Co.; and William, his father, aged 46, and Sarah, his mother, aged 46, were charged with feloniously receiving the same, well knowing it to have been stolen There were similar other indictments against the prisoners, who were defended by Mr. Payne. James Lordency, who was originally implicated in the transaction, was admitted as evidence on the part of the Crown. He stated that he became acquainted with young Anscomb about sixteen months ago, and after wards had interviews with the elder prisoners. He had lived with the prisoners a considerable time before he began to rob them. He commenced in 1842, and disposed of the property to one or other of the prisoners. The system went on for a long time, and the prisoners paid him at a very low rate one-third of the value of the plunder. He supplied the prisoners twice a week. The property named in the indictment was delivered by him to the prisoner Henry, near the Seven Dials, and the prisoners paid him at a very low rate one-third of the prisoners. Several other witnesses having been examined, Mr. Payne made a most powerful speech, and the jury acquitted all the prisoners. The prisoners were soon afterwards charged for being accessaries after the fact, and the same evidence having been given, the jury found the young Anscomb and his mother "Guilty," and the Common Sergeant sentenced them each to seven years' transportation.

Fire on the St. Paul's Churchyard.—On Thursday night a fire was discovered to have broken out on the extensive premises in the occupation of Messrs. Cook, Gladstone, and Co., calico printers and Manchester warehousemen, situate on the north side of St. Paul's Church yard, facing the south entrance to the cathedral. The warehouse is supposed to be the largest of the description in the metropolis, comprising no fewer than ten spacious houses, namely, six in St. Paul's Churchyard and four in Carter lane, Doctors' commons. The fire was caused in consequence of the improper construction of a common ire-place chimney into a flue of a large furnace, used for heating water to warm the premises.

The Thames Tragedy at Deptford.—The unhappy woman Dickenson, who murdered her two children, and afterwards attempted self destruction, is still sternly recovered to be removed, and is to be taken to Newgate as soon as the grand jury is discharged, so as to allow her time to gain strength to meet her trial at the next session.

Fatal Accident to one of Barclay's Draymen.—Yesterday morning, about 11 o'clock, a melancholy and fatal accident occurred to one of Messrs. Barclay and Perkins's draymen, on London bridge. It appeared that deceased, whose name was Thomas Freeman, aged 41, was proceeding over London-bridge, towards the City, with a loaded dray, which, from the crowded state of the bridge, he kept close to the kerb. He was walking alongside the shaft on the path, when his attention was called to a cart on the other side; while turning round, his feet slipped, and he fell under the wheels, which passed over his chest. He must have died instantly, as he showed no signs of life when taken up and placed on a shutter, on which he was conveyed to St. Thomas's Hospital

FOREIGN

Alexandria, Jan. 21.—The packet Ennuetje came into this harbour from Beyrout on the 17th inst., and brought intelligence of the death of Mr. Robert Fraser, Esq., of the firm of Robert Jackson, Fraser, and Co., of Cyprus, Scotland. He died at Jerusalem, of fever, caught by too great exposure to bad weather on the eve of Christmas-day.

Fratricide, Real or Fabled.—The chief of Goritz, the residence of the exiled Bourbon family, has been the theatre of an atrocious murder committed upon the person of Count Attems; circumstances are spread with the account of this murder, that would render it, if true, a sidepiece to the famous execution ordered by Queen Christine of Sweden during her exile in France.

Wholesale Massacre.—Accounts from the Havanna state that an insurrection of slaves had taken place there, and that no less than 600 of the poor creatures were killed on the spot! The coolness and business-like announcement of this event in the American journals, demonstrates the effect which the close and habitual contemplation of slavery has in blunting the better feelings of humanity.

POSTSCRIPT.

ATTEMPTED REVOLUTION IN SPAIN.

Intelligence has arrived announcing another attempt at a Progressista revolution in Spain. At eleven o'clock, on the 31st ultimo, a council of ministers was held, at which several intercepted letters compromising some 60 individuals at Madrid were read. Senors Manuel Cortina, Madoz, Gernica, Olozaga, Perez, Alonzo, and Gerredo, Progressista deputies, were arrested and lodged, pro tempore, in the city prison. It is added that General Seoane and Concha have also been arrested. The garrison was immediately put under arms and the posts doubled, and during the night a considerable force left the city, with orders to proceed to Valencia by forced marches. The disturbances commenced at Alicante, where an insurrectionary junta had been formed. The most vigorous measures had, however, been ordered for the purpose of preventing the extension of the revolt. It was rumoured that the insurrection had already extended to Valencia and Santander. It was reported that the Provincial Regiment of Valencia, stationed in garrison there, had joined in the insurrection, which appears exclusively directed against the Government. A junta of Government was formed in the usual way. A Commandant of the Carabineers, named Bonel, is at the head of this movement, which took the authorities by surprise. M. Lasala, the Military Governor, M. Ramon Cevati, the Political Chief, and the Provincial Commandant of Valencia, were immediately imprisoned. The National Guards are to be suppressed, and the liberty of the press abolished. The Madrid Gazette is filled with most stringent decrees against the insurgents. General Narvaez had been appointed, in addition to his other dignities, a Lord of the Bedchamber The National Guard at St Sebastian had been disarmed

The pretext for these arrests is stated to be that the revolt at Alicante is the result of a vast conspiracy, in which the above parties are suspected to be implicated.

The following are the orders given by the Minister of War to the Captain-General of Valencia —

"1. All the leaders, officers, and sergeants belonging to the army and the provincial militia, the National Guard, Custom House Carabineers, and the Marine, who have taken part in the rebellion of Alicante, shall be shot, whenever they can be seized and their persons identified.

"2. If, after being summoned by the Queen's troops to give up all their arms and to re-unite under the banner of loyalty, they do not comply with the order, within a limited time, they shall then be decimated in conformity with an ordinance strictly commanding this to be done. Any delay is left to the discretion of your Excellency.

"3. All private persons who shall have figured as leaders in the rebellion of Alicante, shall be shot.

"Captains-General and Commandants-General are rendered strictly responsible for the execution of the above measures."

Madrid is placed under martial law, as well as the provinces of Alicante Murcia, Albacete, Valencia, Almeira, Castellone de la Plana, which are all placed in a state of siege. Three steam vessels have been dispatched to Alicante, to blockade the place.

Madrid Bourse on Feb 1.—Five per Cents, 20¼; for March 18

It was reported in Paris on Wednesday that Lopes and Madoz had escaped from Madrid. It was the brother of the celebrated person of that name who was arrested Bayonne, Feb. 4.—The following important information has reached this town from Pampeluna:—"The Spanish Government has decided on calling upon the province of Navarre to furnish its contingent for the last levy of 28,000 men voted by the Cortes, and as some resistance and much discontent will be caused by the measure, the Minister of War intends directing a force of 6000 men upon Navarre.

[illegible]

Sir John Power, Bart., of Kilfane, died on Saturday, in his 76th year.

Mr. J. N. Wigney, late M.P. for Brighton, whose bankruptcy created such a great sensation some time since, died at his residence in Porchester place, Hyde-park a few days ago.

[illegible] Meeting of the London and Birmingham Railway Company.—[illegible] The large room was completely filled, as well as the passages, with an immense crowd, and among the proprietors present were Lord Granville, Chairman of the Company; Sir Lawrence Peel; Mark Philips, Esq., M.P.; E. Cardwell, Esq., M.P.; T. B. Macaulay, Esq., M.P.; J. A. Roebuck, Esq., M.P.; F. M. Gibson, Esq., M.P., and gentlemen from Lancashire, Warwickshire, &c. The report stated that the Company's affairs were most prosperous and improving, and that, compared with the corresponding half-year of 1842, there was an increase in receipts of £11,388, while in the working charges there was a decrease of £2,000. The balance in the hands of the Company now was £259,751 9s. 5d., on which a dividend had to be declared, with the exception of £17,006 left in the hands of the Directors. A dividend of £5 per cent. on every share of the 434,434 £100 shares was granted, and of 17s. on every one of the new £32 shares, which were 42,066 in number. A discussion took place on the progress of the company with Government relative to the Chester and Holyhead Harbour and Railway, from which was elicited that the Government would make the harbour and the company the railway, for which one million of money was ordered by the meeting to be set aside. Mr. Cropper, Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Young, Mr. Tooke, and Mr. Glynn, were re-elected on the Board of Directors, and with thanks to the Chairman and Directors, the meeting separated. The dividend was announced to be payable on the 19th of February, and it was also stated that the third class carriages had been covered over for the convenience of the public, which was received with loud applause.

Court of Bankruptcy.—Mr. Collier's Matters and his Creditors.—This insolvent, the comedian, appeared on Thursday, on his petition, praying that the Court would appoint a sitting for the final order under the new act. His petition detailed debts to the amount of £6111, under the interim order of the Court, which was obtained on the 23d December, had stayed about 30 actions. There appeared on the schedule upwards of 100 creditors, and in addition a long account was given of the insolvent's income and expenditure, including that by his wife (Madame Vestris), from his former insolvency, in June, 1842. The renewals, which were due at the time mentioned, were upwards of £4000. He proposed to assign one-half of his income, which, as stated, at present, be £150 for his numerous creditors. The court was thronged. Mr. James appeared for one of the creditors, Mr. Anderson, the insolvents's brother-in law. On being examined, Mr. Mathew's said—My salary is £60 per week and we have taken £10 per week for expenses of dresses, which is not sufficient in consequence of our wardrobe, which is worth from £300 to £400, being bold by Mr. Moses, from whom some day I hope to redeem it; therefore for the want of many of those dresses, we are obliged to buy new ones. Mr. James should wish Mr. Mathews to state what reduction would be necessary from his salary for stage decoration, and what was requisite for the maintenance of himself and wife.—Mr. Mathews. £30 a week for stage expenses, and the maintenance of myself and wife. The £5 a week included £10 for personal expenses, £10 for wardrobe expenses, £5 a week for marriage, which with cheaper than a coach, and £5 for servants at the theatre.—Mr. James thought that £5 a week for the latter was too much.—Mr Mathews: I can not see you for a cheaper than hiring a cab, for, in the first place, we have to go to rehearsal, then Mrs. Mathews has to go and make the necessary purchases for the evening, we have sometimes to get a dinner at three o'clock, and in the meantime I have to run round to stop the mouths of creditors for £3000, at 60 per cent, and for the last five years, I have never had time to study a part except in a cab; for these reasons, offer my creditors the one-half what I owe.

Sir C. F. Williams: I think it is extremely liberal.—The protection was renewed. The schedule, which consists of 37 double folio pages, states that the bankrupt's debts he has consists of twenty-one separate items amounting to £30; while the gross debts and liabilities are £8111 13s. 10d. He has no credits and no debts due to him. Mr. and Mrs. Mathews realised by provincial engagements, from 17th March 31, 1840, for 93 nights at Dublin, £2,790; ten nights at Edinburgh, £640; for six at Glasgow, £264; for two at New castle, £60, and for five at Liverpool, £260. From April the 19th to November 4th, 1843.—In April, £140; in May, £280; in June, £280; in July, £280; in August, £200; in September, £280; in October, £380, and in November, £48, making a total of £4382.

Central Criminal Court.—Friday.—Extensive Robberies.—Henry Anscomb, aged sixteen years, was indicted for stealing a quantity of moiseeline de laine, value £2, and upwards, the property of Messrs. Robert Price and Co.; and William, his father, aged 46, and Sarah, his mother, aged 46, were charged with feloniously receiving the same, well knowing it to have been stolen There were similar other indictments against the prisoners, who were defended by Mr. Payne. James Lordency, who was originally implicated in the transaction, was admitted as evidence on the part of the Crown. He stated that he became acquainted with young Anscomb about sixteen months ago, and after wards had interviews with the elder prisoners. He had lived with the prisoners a considerable time before he began to rob them. He commenced in 1842, and disposed of the property to one or other of the prisoners. The system went on for a long time, and the prisoners paid him at a very low rate one-third of the value of the plunder. He supplied the prisoners twice a week. The property named in the indictment was delivered by him to the prisoner Henry, near the Seven Dials, and the prisoners paid him at a very low rate one-third of the prisoners. Several other witnesses having been examined, Mr. Payne made a most powerful speech, and the jury acquitted all the prisoners. The prisoners were soon afterwards charged for being accessaries after the fact, and the same evidence having been given, the jury found the young Anscomb and his mother "Guilty," and the Common Sergeant sentenced them each to seven years' transportation.

Fire on the St. Paul's Churchyard.—On Thursday night a fire was discovered to have broken out on the extensive premises in the occupation of Messrs. Cook, Gladstone, and Co., calico printers and Manchester warehousemen, situate on the north side of St. Paul's Church yard, facing the south entrance to the cathedral. The warehouse is supposed to be the largest of the description in the metropolis, comprising no fewer than ten spacious houses, namely, six in St. Paul's Churchyard and four in Carter lane, Doctors' commons. The fire was caused in consequence of the improper construction of a common ire-place chimney into a flue of a large furnace, used for heating water to warm the premises.

The Thames Tragedy at Deptford.—The unhappy woman Dickenson, who murdered her two children, and afterwards attempted self destruction, is still sternly recovered to be removed, and is to be taken to Newgate as soon as the grand jury is discharged, so as to allow her time to gain strength to meet her trial at the next session.

Fatal Accident to one of Barclay's Draymen.—Yesterday morning, about 11 o'clock, a melancholy and fatal accident occurred to one of Messrs. Barclay and Perkins's draymen, on London bridge. It appeared that deceased, whose name was Thomas Freeman, aged 41, was proceeding over London-bridge, towards the City, with a loaded dray, which, from the crowded state of the bridge he kept close to the kerb. He was walking alongside the shaft on the path, when his attention was called to a cart on the other side; while turning round, his feet slipped, and he fell under the wheels, which passed over his chest. He must have died instantly, as he showed no signs of life when taken up and placed on a shutter, on which he was conveyed to St. Thomas's Hospital

FOREIGN

Alexandria, Jan. 21.—The packet Ennuetje came into this harbour from Beyrout on the 17th inst., and brought intelligence of the death of Mr. Robert Fraser, Esq., of the firm of Robert Jackson, Fraser, and Co., of Cyprus, Scotland. He died at Jerusalem, of fever, caught by too great exposure to bad weather on the eve of Christmas-day.

Fratricide, Real or Fabled.—The chief of Goritz, the residence of the exiled Bourbon family, has been the theatre of an atrocious murder committed upon the person of Count Attems; circumstances are spread with the account of this murder, that would render it, if true, a sidepiece to the famous execution ordered by Queen Christine of Sweden during her exile in France.

Wholesale Massacre.—Accounts from the Havanna state that an insurrection of slaves had taken place there, and that no less than 600 of the poor creatures were killed on the spot! The coolness and business-like announcement of this event in the American journals, demonstrates the effect which the close and habitual contemplation of slavery has in blunting the better feelings of humanity.

THE DUBLIN STATE TRIALS.

The Liberator, (as he is styled by his political associates,) and his son, are here represented in their forensic costume. Of Mr. O'Connell's address delivered in his own defence, in the Court of Queen's Bench, on Monday last, a summary will be found in another part of this week's paper. In this speech it was clearly apparent that the promotion of the Repeal question was a much dearer object to the hon. and learned gentleman than his escape from the meshes of a State Prosecution. We cannot better express our opinion of Mr. O'Connell's defence than by adopting the language of our respected contemporary, the Morning Post, who is not in the habit of eulogising the Irish Agitator, and who thus refers to his oratorical display of Monday last:—

"It possesses, indeed, few of the flowers of rhetoric, or of those allusions to general literature, or other matters of general interest, which make a speech attractive to a listening crowd of ladies and gentlemen. But we are bound in justice to say, that upon a deliberate reading of Mr. O Connell's speech, it appears to us to be a frank, familiar, and manly harangue, which does him greater credit than a more flowery oration would have done. Many of the references to documents which had been referred to before must have been tedious; but, apart from these, when he spoke to the jury, not (as he said himself) in the character of his own advocate, but the advocate of his country, there was a manly air of truth about his appeal, which was much more than we expected from him."

Mr. O'Connell during his speech had divested himself of the Queen's Counsel garb which he has hitherto worn, and appeared plainly attired. His address —listened to amid the most solemn silence—was not delivered at the commencement with that emphasis and confidence which characterise the hon. gentleman's manner elsewhere, but as he proceeded those qualities seemed to return to him.

It will be seen by a report of a meeting of English Catholics, held at the Freemasons' Tavern, on Wednesday last, which we have given elsewhere, that Mr. O'Connell's peculiar position at the present juncture has awakened in the breasts of his co-religionists in this country a stronger feeling of sympathy than that which is generally supposed to exist between the self-styled Liberator and his more aristocratic friends. If any jealous coolness has heretofore existed between the parties, the proceedings alluded to must go far to reconcile their differences. The following character of O'Connell, taken from the "Dublin Review," was read by Lord Camoys, and may be given here, as showing the estimation in which he is held by his admirers; but, of course, we do not hold ourselves responsible for the accuracy of the writer's views or opinions. The reviewer is answering a work which calls Mr. O'Connell "a gross, clumsy, open, impudent deceiver":—"For forty years has this 'gross, clumsy, open, impudent deceiver,' been living among them, mingling in their festivities, presiding at their assemblies, kneeling at their altars; instructing, advising, guiding, impelling, restraining; standing upon an eminence, with the searching gaze of a mighty empire fixed for ever upon him; every word and every gesture, every action and every omission, recorded and canvassed; in the high courts of law, in the high court of Parliament, in the high court of public opinion, in the high court of the press—the most powerful press in the world; by eloquent men, by learned men, by acute men; by the lower orders of society, by the middle orders, by the upper orders; by artizans, by merchants, by lawyers, by parsons, by proud barons, by mighty kings; in all these, by all these, has this being, without a name, been accused and tried. For forty years has this trial been going on, and the first generation of accusers, and witnesses, and judges has passed away, and left room for another and another, and after all this the conviction is yet to come. His bitterest enemies have borne testimony in his favour, and they who would grind him as wheat, or burn him in a furnace, have admitted and maintained that he is a sincere man, an honest man, and, all, all proclaim that he is a great man. They who know him best, whose interests are chiefly identified with his incorruptible virtue—one of the purest hierarchies in the world—one of the most laborious, virtuous, simple-minded priesthoods in the world, and seven millions of the Irish people, have placed in his hands, without a shadow of misgiving, their dearest earthly hopes. Nor have they done so precipitately, hastily. They have tried him long, they have trusted him long, and he has never once betrayed them, and, therefore, they trust him again. He has the blessing of the church, he has the prayers of the people, he has the confidence of both. Profane history has no example of this kind."

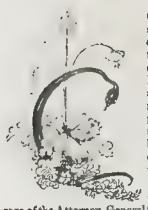
So much for Mr. O'Connell as he appears to the mental vision of his admirers. The other illustrations which ornament the present page have been taken in court by our artist at different stages of the proceedings, excepting that which represents the Attorney-General in an attitude of profound attention, and which was taken on Monday, as he actually appeared during the delivery of Mr. O'Connell's harangue.

MR. JOHN O'CONNELL. MR. O'CONNELL.

THE STATE PROSECUTIONS IN IRELAND.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

DUBLIN, Feb. 7.



O'CONNELL engaged on these Trials have since last week, kept Dublin alive with extraordinary sensation, and, within twenty-four hours, that sensation had communicated itself to every part of Ireland. The incident which had aroused all this agony of emotion—moved so many tongues to wag with passion—put the stutter of agitation upon so many lips—poured the glare of bewilderment into so many maddened eyes—and originated as much ejaculation as would have served the French Chambers for a round dozen of sessions—was nothing more than the semi-message of the Attorney-General to Queen's Counsel Fitzgibbon. A duel—or the subject of one—formerly so much a thing of course—now stirs the Irish hasty-pudding I can tell you; and a duel either intended or prevented—breaking in shadowy grandeur from the impatient heart of a vexed Attorney-General during the very hurricane of a State Trial—was a phenomenon to fix all hearts and eyes, and make astonishment most unmistakable in the expression of its eloquence and the eloquence of its expression. The same sort of feeling too seems to have communicated itself by a sort of electricity to England—and really the poor Attorney-General seems to have got the worst of it all. The Times very nearly badgered him out of office.

"Cassio, I love thee still,
But never more be officer of mine" was quoted one fine morning, as if Ministers had just communicated

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL LISTENING TO O'CONNELL'S DEFENCE.

to the Thunderer the intention of giving the conductor of Dan's prosecution the sack. None of the journals, however, except your own, gave an extract; none of them, indeed, contained a true report of that aggravating and insulting provocation in the speech of Mr. Fitzgibbon, which appeared in my last letter. In Dublin, this irate burst of forensic indecency is rather approved than otherwise; but there is, nevertheless, a truly Irish feeling strongly apparent in society that the Queen's Counsel should not have gone like a whining school boy, telling tales to the birch-holders on the bench, but have put the Attorney-General's note into his pocket and have fought! For my part, I hold it rather a mercy that if the Attorney-General was to betray the infirmity of his temper, it was just as well that matters turned out as they did; but it is curious to remark that Sir James Graham's disclosure of the Irish law-officer's letter upon the subject of a sort of "conspiracy" on the part of the traversers' counsel to attack him, completely coincided with the remarks of your own leading article upon the event in question. He was bitterly provoked—no doubt of it—and Ministers have thrown their shield around him in consequence.

"Cassio is still an officer of theirs."

With reference to the trials themselves, a week of abounding interest has transpired. They have never—not even when Sheil was to be heard—provoked the same anxiety, and ardent expectation and curiosity, as was displayed after Fitzgibbon had ceased to utter his bitter philippic, up to the moment of the close of O'Connell's speech. This was, in great measure, owing to the new tone of public feeling produced by Mr. Whiteside, in the grandest speech that has been spoken in Europe since the best days of Canning, and the most brilliant outpourings of Brougham.

Of this speech I deeply lament to say (for any omission from it is a loss to the literature of the country) you have in England but the faintest and most meagre outline. It is the misfortune of the trials that it should have been the speech best spoken and worst reported, but such is the fact. Sheil's oration had the advantage of being given almost to the letter; but this far more glorious production of Mr Whiteside (and I say this without depreciating the truly fine eloquence of Sheil,) has been nowhere followed in the same literal spirit, or given to the public eye, as it was poured in rapturing brilliancy upon the public ear.

The Freeman's Journal of the first day, and the Monitor of the second, contained the best reports; but all the English versions were deficient.

Do not believe that I exaggerate about this truly noble emanation of gigantic intellect, when stating that after having heard all the great speeches of the British Parliament upon vast national questions for many years, I declare it to have surpassed any thing that has been uttered within that temple, sacred to the very spirit of all eloquence, since the early genius of the two men I have already mentioned shed its lustre upon the world's oratory—or even since Burke selected that favoured arena to fill it with those floods of fire, which, with all the glory of immortality, are still blazing before nations of mankind.

It is not enough to say, as Daniel O'Connell has said, that Whiteside has made his fortune, but it is better and more beautiful, if not more true, to aver that he has made his fame. And it is very remarkable that it should be so; most remarkable that a staunch Conservative barrister should found a loud and lasting reputation upon the defence of the uncompromising and inveterate Repealer who is now upon his trial. Yet such was the effect upon all hearts of that imperishable oration, that men went about the streets of Dublin with their blood stirred and their voices trembling over his praise, and had there been that day an election for the city, and Whiteside ambitious of Parliamentary renown, the most violent opinionists of extremest parties would have rushed to poll for him alike.

The speech were difficult to describe, but I could almost exchange the happiest moment of my memory for the delight with which it inspired me. It was beautiful absorbingly, full of light and shade, of rapid changes of colour and transitions of thought; now exhibiting the radiance of a sunlit river—now the power and impetuosity of a rushing torrent—now the depth and strength of waters that roll through forests in the still majesty of an eternal calm! It was commenced with a grave modesty a nice sense of the responsibility the speaker was incurring, a graceful spirit pervaded all the exordium, and then the lawyer developed the proper doctrine of conspiracy to respectfully attentive ears. At that moment there was a favourable impression, but no dream of what was to follow lingering upon any brain. The stars of the mental firmament had not as yet began to shine. But soon, one by one, they broke upon the audience, until they studded the fine oration with their light. First the light play of a frolicsome humour, that bantered without cruelty, and burlesqued

(Continued on page 91.)

DISCUSSING THE TRIALS.

DISCUSSING THE TRIALS.

FINE ARTS.—FRANCESCA DA RIMINI.

FRANCESCA DA RIMINI.

FROM THE ITALIAN OF DANTE

BY LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

"I fain would speak to that unhappy pair,
Who hand in hand so lightly float in air.
In words like these, to Maro I expressed
My wish; and thus he granted my request.
"Wait till the Shades approach, then name the word
Of love, which rules them; straight you will be heard."
Soon as I saw the constant ghosts were cast
Near to our station by the baleful blast,
Swift I conjured them: "By your miseries past,
Oh, speak!" and as two doves on wings outspread
Float to their darling nest, by fondness led,
So did these sorrowing spirits leave the throng
Where Dido broods o'er Man's unpunished wrong;
Nor aught of woe concealed, nor aught refused,
Such magic power was in the words I used.
"Oh, pitying stranger! that in this dread place
Canst feel for blood-stained hearts, had we found grace
With the great Lord of all we should not cease
To pray his mercy for your future peace;
For you shew mercy to our mortal sin—
But stay; while yet the tempest holds its din,
Speak what you list, ask what you reck to know,
And hear our griefs—'tis all we can bestow.
In lands where Po with ample torrent flows
To the broad sea, and finds at length repose,
We sprung; there love, by which each gentle breast
Is quickly fired, my Paolo's heart possessed
For that fair form, torn from me in such chill
And cruel fashion as afflicts me still;
True love by love must ever be repaid;—
I learned to please him so, that still his shade
Is seen e'en here to wander by my side,—
For love we lived, for love together died.
But he by whose unnatural hand we bled,
With Cain shall dwell;"—these words the Shadow said,
Thoughtful I listened,—when I heard the offence
Borne by these gentle souls, in sad suspense
I bent my eyes: the silence Virgil broke,
And questioned of my thoughts—slowly I spoke:
"Alas!" I said, "how soft and light a train
Of sweet desires led these to endless pain!"
Then turning round, the lovers I addressed
"Your griefs, Francesca, weigh upon my breast,
And fill my eyes with tears; vouchsafe to tell,
In love's spring-season of fond sighs what spell
First brought the bud of secret hope to flower,
And taught your hearts the presence of his power."
"Alas!" she said, "when only pangs remain—
The memory of past joy is sharpest pain.
And this your master knows; yet if desire
So strong and eager prompt you to inquire
Whence sprung our love, the story you shall hear,
Though every word be followed by a tear.
One day, intent to wile away the time,
Alone, yet void of fear as free from crime,
We read of Lancelot's love: oft from the book
We raised our eyes, and each commingling look
Led to a blush,—the story we pursued,
Till one short, fatal passage all subdued.
For when we read the lover crowned with bliss,
Her rapturous smile, and his more ardent kiss,
He, who is ever to my side attached,
He from my lips a kiss all trembling snatched;
No conscious slave the impassioned message bore,
Save that frail book: that day we read no more."
As thus one Shadow told the mournful tale,
The other did so feelingly bewail,
That pity chilled my blood, my voice, my breath,
And sunk me to the ground as one in death

Literary Souvenir.

THE YOUNG FLAGEOLET PLAYER.

BY

MISS LOUISA STUART COSTELLO.

S the tourist or traveller enters the gates of the fine park of Chatsworth, the pride of Derbyshire, approaching from the pretty villages of Rowsley and Beeley, he passes along a hollow road, very much overgrown, and somewhat gloomy, till, having gained the top of the hill, he reaches the open space called Lindeslow, where, if there is ever any wind, it is sure to salute him at that point.

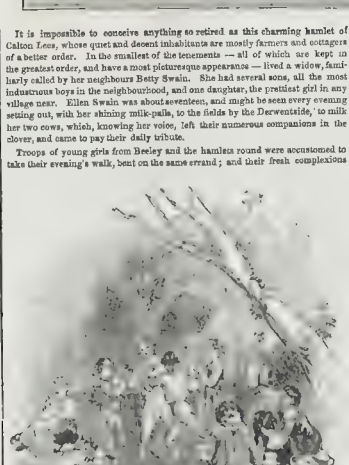
Instead of keeping straight on, should he happen to take the upper road, which winds beside a fine grove of high elms, he will arrive at a preserve, where fat bucks, destined to immolation, and a group of curious goats are usually seen. After pausing a few moments, to remark the gambols of the kids, the most lighthearted of animals, he may follow the palings; leaning against which, are the majestic victims, their companions, which gaze with large serious eyes on the intruder, their lofty spreading antlers waving over their heads, as they rise indignantly, and move to a greater distance, as if to avoid observation.

The stranger soon comes to a second gate, having Beeley Moor and its Druid stones before him, and part of the old park and its mysterious recesses on his left hand, in the distance: suddenly he perceives a small hamlet, so concealed in the bocage which encircles it, that it does not show itself till the last moment.

This secluded nook is called Calton Lees: it is composed of five or six houses only, of which two have been beautified, so as to keep up their original form of the Elizabethan age, with additions. One of them is conspicuous for the beauty of its little gardens and lawns and bowers, into which opens a large bay window: the centre part forming a door, and leading by a flight of steps into the miniature shrubbery. Roses and honeysuckles creep almost entirely over its exterior, and all kinds of flowers bloom in the parterres.

As the cottage stands on the acclivity of the hill, there is a rather extensive view of the moors and mountains from its upper windows; but the most admired object with the inhabitants, is the view it commands of "the Duke's stand," a fine ancient tower, in the midst of the woods, on a great elevation, where the red flag flying tells of the arrival of the master of Chatsworth.

A group of detached roofs peep forth from an opposite tuft of trees on the answering hill, and a forest of pines, chesnuts, beeches, and oaks, crowns the heights above. The most luxuriant meadows spread abroad in all directions, some leading down to Darley Dale, others upward to "the Hill Top," as a romantic elevation, surmounted by a curious old house, is called. A thick grove of magnificent trees leads up a steep ascent to a fine open space of meadow, dotted thickly with hawthorns of great age: this is named Calton Hill — descending from whence, and being now in the Rutland territory, a rugged path, through a tangled wood, conducts to the Dale of Bakewell.



It is impossible to conceive anything so retired as this charming hamlet of Calton Lees, whose quiet and decent inhabitants are mostly farmers and cottagers of a better order. In the smallest of the tenements — all of which are kept in the greatest order, and have a most picturesque appearance — lived a widow, familiarly called by her neighbours Betty Swain. She had several sons, all the most industrious boys in the neighbourhood, and one daughter, the prettiest girl in any village near. Ellen Swain was about seventeen, and might be seen every evening setting out, with her shining milk-pails, to the fields by the Derwentside, to milk her two cows, which, knowing her voice, left their numerous companions in the clover, and came to pay their daily tribute.

Troops of young girls from Beeley and the hamlets round were accustomed to take their evening's walk, bent on the same errand; and their fresh complexions and neat appearance are sufficiently attractive, although the white cap, check apron, and worsted hose of old time have given way to the fashionably made gown, and bonnet, and smart shoes, and stockings of modern improvement.

When these rural damsels all met under the trees in the park, waiting to rest and to select their cows from the herd, there is generally a good deal of conversation, and all the news of the country is discussed. Information is given of approaching wakes, and well-flowerings, cricket-matches, and tea-drinkings; and parties are formed, and meetings agreed on.

Ellen Swain was always ready to assist any of her companions on these occasions, and her lively conversation and agreeable anecdotes always made her arrival amongst them a matter of congratulation to the assembled milkers. It was rarely that she failed to come; although, if otherwise occupied, her little brother Jacob was sometimes sent as her substitute; but this was regretted, even though he was a great favourite, and not yet old enough to interrupt them, or cause any commotion in their minds at his sight. This, however, might not have been the case if Ellen had sent her elder brother Edward; for he was acknowledged to be the handsomest lad in Derbyshire, and as gay and lively, and, by some, thought as agreeable as his sister.

Every evening, after his work was done, his flageolet might be heard at the Lees, as he stood at his mother's cottage door, playing all sorts of airs with taste and skill quite astonishing, considering that he was his own instructor, and had caught all the airs by ear. Old Betty used to delight in hearing him, and Ellen was never tired of listening and dictating as he went on, like a bird, making the woods echo with his sweet music.

It chanced that an invalid gentleman, on his way from Buxton, where he had spent some weeks for the benefit of the waters, paused at Chatsworth, to make the usual visit at the Palace of the Peak, and, roaming through the park, took the turn lately described, instead of the high road, and found himself at the hamlet of the Lees before he was aware of his mistake. He was so much delighted with its calm, tranquil appearance, that, entering into conversation with the mistress of the pretty cottage with the bay window, he found she was not averse to receive him as an inmate, as the greater part of her house was now unoccupied, her married son and daughter, and their children, having recently left her to settle at Sheffield

The invalid was enchanted with the appearance of the whole neighbourhood, and imagined that he had at last found the spot of all others which would best suit him for the summer: far removed from the noise of cities, to which he had been too long accustomed, and away from all the troublesome acquaintances with which a bachelor is usually pestered in a great town, or a small one.

Here, then, Mr. Ashe resolved immediately to take up his abode, without seeking further; and accordingly he became installed possessor of the pretty parlour, with its cheerful window, and the bedchamber where honeysuckles peeped in at the casement.

Every day he took long solitary strolls, and found new beauties to reward him for the trust he had placed in this charming retreat. He wandered amongst the solitary moors, and sought out the yet remaining altars of that strange worship which has never been explained. He sat for hours in the thick wood, listening to the fall of waters. He strayed in the thickly flowered meadows, by the river side, and gazed on the blue distant mountains of the Peak, towering above the dark forest. But not the least of his amusements was to sit at his open window, in the evening, and listen to the concert which Edward Swain never failed to afford his neighbours. Although Mr. Ashe had a fastidious ear for music, was an excellent critic, and had heard the best performers in all parts of the world, the simple melody which Edward drew from his flageolet pleased him extremely; and, when he heard the first notes, evening after evening he took his accustomed seat, and gave himself up to delicious musings.

One evening in August, when the hay-harvest, which is extremely late in Derbyshire, was going on, Mr. Ashe, as he approached his window, was aware of an unwonted stir in the hamlet, and remarked that the tones of Edward's flageolet were unusually brisk, and that he was playing with more than his wonted energy. He soon found that he was performing jigs and country dances to a party who had, like himself, been employed all day in haymaking, and whose joyous voices, as they made up their stacks on a neighbouring field, the invalid had heard with amused attention during the afternoon, while the gurgling of a small waterfall, in the valley immediately below, seemed to form an under current of lively music.

"That young man," mused Mr. Ashe, "if properly instructed, would make a great musician. It is of such stuff performers are formed who set the civilized world mad with enthusiasm. In such a humble way to remain the admired musician of his native village, or would it be better to bring him forth from obscurity and introduce a genius to the admiration of mankind?"

It was this train of thought that led Mr. Ashe from one image to another, until he pictured to himself Edward Swain the most celebrated flageolet player in Europe: rich, admired, sought, the centre of a circle; and still, as the lively sounds mingled with merry laughter went on without, he continued his dreams till the object of them was lost sight of. Suddenly the instrument ceased, and, after a pause, another strain of melody broke the stillness which had succeeded the mirth of the half weary party.

A clear, deep, pathetic voice presently echoed along the valley, and the singular words of an Irish melody, in the original language, were heard giving force to the strain. So wild, and sweet, and solemn, was the song, that the musical enthusiast, for such was the invalid listener, was rapt with delight:

> "Only he thought the sounds too quickly pass'd,
> And every note he feared would be the last."

When the song was over, he stepped out into his shrubbery, and, anxious to come nearer to the scene of action, strolled down the little laurel walk, which brought him, unseen, close to the party divided from him, only by a fence; he could, therefore, plainly hear the following conversation:—

"How did I come by such a voice, is it? Faith they tell me it was given me by the fairies, who, in my country, sing like nightingales, though it was never my luck to hear them, seen 'em I have often."

"Oh!" said the laughing voices of Ellen Swain, "how can you say so? but you Irishmen are such deceivers always, one can never believe any of you."

"And can you say that, Miss Ellen," replied the first speaker. "When, didn't I say the very last thing last summer when I went back to Ireland after the harvest, that I'd be back this, and sure here I am; did I keep my word in that?"

"Yes," said Ellen, "that's true; but when I read your letter to farmer Turner, offering to come as usual, I thought you might change your mind for all, though he wrote to say he should be glad of your helping hand."

"So you saw my letter, then," was said in a lower key, and in a tone of peculiar softness; "and you saw that when I sent my respects to all the neighbours, your mother was not left out?"

"Yes," answered the young girl, her voice partaking somewhat of the soft nature of her companions, "and you said your mother was well too—did you leave her so? how glad she must be every time you go back after the harvest in Derbyshire!"

"How much gladder she'd be if I took a sweet little wife wid me," whispered the melodist; but Mr. Ashe heard no more, for the laughter, talking, and confusion around.

"So then," he reflected as he strolled back to his window, "this is the young Irishman, whose letter, so quaintly written, my landlady brought to show me a few weeks back: it was full of good feeling, though a little oddly expressed: it seems he is proud of being a scholar, and writes every year to the farmer to offer his services, taking the proceeds of his labour to his old mother. How happy these people must be, toiling as they do, yet always light-hearted. Yet suppose he marries this pretty Ellen, what has he to give her?—what is their prospect but poverty, and a life of privation? He would, nevertheless, persuade her to it, and she would consent. Shortsighted mortals!—

> "'Thus runs the world away!"

It was not long before Mr. Ashe made himself acquainted with Edward Swain, and found in him an ambition answering to the talents he possessed, which were, in all respects, superior to the station he held. Although he fulfilled his daily duties cheerfully and without murmuring, yet he had aspirations and soarings far beyond his humble occupations: he acknowledged that, when occasionally he had been admitted by the servants of the steward to hear concerts there, he had formed wishes of being able to distinguish himself like the artists he saw caressed and admired. Visions of independence for his mother, and sister, and brothers, flitted before his mind's eye, and he wished for a wider field for his talents than the hamlet of the Lees. All the conversations which he had with Mr. Ashe confirmed his wish, never hitherto expressed, to try his fortune in another sphere; but he had no hope of an opportunity occurring which could afford the means of carrying on his wish. A musical education was requisite to make his talent of any avail, and how was that to be attained? He had scarcely ventured to ask himself the question, when the means were offered him by his new acquaintance.

With unconfessed delight did he hear him propose that he should accompany him to London, to defray all his expences, to place him at a public musical institution and afford him the chance of future fame and fortune.

What amazement to Betty Swain, what pride to Ellen, when Edward informed them of the proposal made! It was too flattering to be rejected—no such thought entered their minds—all was gold, all glittered before them, and, as the widow kissed her son and congratulated him, her remark was "Well, dear Edward, don't keep your carriage too soon."

When the chilling days of autumn, felt very sensibly in the Peak, began to warn the invalid that he must seek a warmer climate, the family of the widow felt that there was something besides exultation in their hearts, for they must part with Edward. What a loss he was to them and to all the hamlet no words could express, and when he drove away on the box of a hired carriage with Mr. Ashe every one repented that his journey was not opposed. He went himself, however, in high spirits, and had a thousand words of comfort to say to all his old friends, besides the encouraging assurances that he left with his weeping mother and sister, and as he hugged little Jacob—who tried to smile through his tears—he bade him be a man, and when he came back, he should have a new harness for the donkey, a promise which went a great way towards restoring his peace of mind.

Ellen felt for some time after he was gone a depression which she could not shake off; nor were her spirits increased when she received a letter from her admirer, Arthur Conner, the youth whose sweet voice had won the ear of Mr Ashe as well as her own, informing her, that as, the wheat harvest in the South was over, and as he had had a tempting offer from the directors of the Paris and Rouen Railroad to join a party of his countrymen on the line, he was about to quit England for a time. The addition, that he looked forward to a speedy return with plenty of money, when he hoped she would allow herself to be convinced that an Irishman could make the best husband in the world, carried some balm with it; but still she felt more than ever lonely and unhappy.

The bleak snowy winter of that part of the country, where it is generally exceedingly severe, had passed away soon enough; the sharp spring had succeeded with little that was genial about it; but summer appeared earlier than usual, and brought weather as fine and warm as any that is known in the south. With sunny days came all the host of tourists and idlers who run through Derbyshire for its own sake, or on their way to the Lakes of Cumberland, and in every pretty wayside inn fashionable parties had taken up their abode, their tackle complete, and their "Walton" in their pockets.

Of all the beautiful little hotels to be found in this county, where all are tastefully and artistically got up, none may compare in attraction with that at Rowsley, poetically pronounced by the country people, whose dialect is not in general too refined, Rawsley. It was formerly, in Elizabeth's days, a private mansion, belonging to some substantial yeoman, and is large and commodious, all gable ends, low doors, and diamond casemented windows, with ornamented chimneys, and sheltering roofs of various heights. It stands in a beautiful garden, quite full of roses of every sort and kind, is overgrown with flowering shrubs, and shadowed with light graceful trees, and is close beside a pretty bridge, and one of the charming trout streams, the pride of the country. There is a great competition amongst the amateur anglers to get possession of certain favourite parlours which look into the garden, and almost always the inn is full of company throughout the season. Though this was very agreeable to young Sir Lionel Vane, who was charmed to meet several of his college companions there, it was found too bustling for his invalid mother, and she was not sorry to hear from the physician at Bakewell, who attended her, that she could be received in the retired house of the Lees—quite as pretty, and infinitely more quiet, than Rowsley. Lady Lucy Vane had been a woman of fashion, and a beauty; she was highly sentimental, and extremely romantic, and always in extremes of one kind or another: the first sight of the "Peacock, at Rowsley, had thrown her into ecstacies of admiration, which had lasted a full fortnight, but at the end of that time she longed to change her sylvan retreat, and the Lees offered exactly the asylum from noise and bustle which she sighed for.

"Good Heaven, mother!" exclaimed her son, one morning as he entered the open window of her little parlour, "I have just had a vision! Have you seen her? The most beautiful creature that poet or painter ever imagined! Who would have believed such beauty existed in England!"

"Dearest Lionel," said his mother languidly, "what can you mean? is it some lamb you have met in the meadows that has so enchanted your vivid imagination? I have seen nothing here so transcendant."

"Then you have not seen Ellen Swain," exclaimed the young angler; "for I ascertained her name from the boy who leads your donkey every day; she is his sister, and a perfect angel."

"A Madonna, I dare say," said Lady Lucy: "if she rode the donkey instead of me, and there were but a village Raphael to paint her, all would be complete. Do you remember, dear, when we were travelling in Italy, the amazement of a group of peasants on seeing me, thus mounted, suddenly appear before them: 'Santa Maria!' cried one of them; 'it is the Holy Virgin herself!' I was, it is true, handsomer then than I am now," added the lady, sighing, as she stood before a glass.

"You never looked so lovely, sweet mother," said her son. "How well this air of Derbyshire agrees with you—and with me, too. I am in no hurry to quit it. I will walk over those enchanting meadows every morning to see you: there is magnificent fishing just below here."

Sir Lionel kept his word, for he found many attractions in his walks; and he not only came in the morning, but his filial affection frequently led him along those same meadows in the summer evenings: he admired and enjoyed the rural Ités everywhere, and there was not a well-flowering at which he was not a guest.

These well-flowerings are very pretty meetings, peculiar to this part of the country, and lately revived with great animation, and encouraged by all classes They are not so picturesque now as they were formerly, in monkish days, when masses were said on the brink of the well, and garlands of flowers were thrown into the waters, and left on the margin, to propitiate the good saint or spirit; nod were they even then so brilliant as when the Druid priests, and the white-robed priestesses, with golden girdles, came in procession to offer flowers to the Goddess of the Crystal Spring: but still this relic of old usage, though not now altogether religious, is interesting and characteristic.

In most of the villages handsome fountains had been erected, and it is in honour of these useful buildings, that, on a certain summer day in every year, sort of wake or fair is held in the open space where they stand: before the fountain is placed a framework screen, covered with flowers, disposed in mosaic, in the most intricate patterns, introducing the arms and mottoes of the public benefactor, who was at the expense of the fountain, or top, as it is here called. This brilliant screen is of every hue that flowers will yield, and glows and gleams in the sun with infinite gorgeousness; a band of music enlivens the scene; booths filled with toys and fruit attract the visitor, and groups of smartly dressed men and maidens parade about the little village where the ceremony takes place, waiting till the hour arrives when dancing concludes the festivity. A service is performed in the church, at which several companies and clubs attend, the bearers of their respective callings ranged along the walls, making the old arches gorgeous. The members of these fraternities, after church, walk out in gay procession to the house, where a feast is prepared for them, and where their hilarity commences.

Carriages filled with strangers may often be seen among the peasant groups for it is become quite a fashion to visit the well-flowerings; and in one of these, Lady Lucy Vane and her son were to be seen at the meeting, at the pretty village of Jouligrave. But far more than the ceremony did young Sir Lionel admire the appearance of pretty Ellen Swain, as she wandered about with pleased looks, accompanied by numerous female friends, not one of whom had half her beauty or animation.

"What a pity not to educate such a creature," said Lady Lucy; "she should not blush unseen amongst these mountains. I vow it would be a charming task, which would amuse me of all things. I wonder if masters can be had at Bakewell.

The idea, encouraged by her son, having once got possession of the mind of an enthusiastic lady, she was resolved to put it into execution. Ellen soon became a confirmed favourite with her, and her own inclinations assisting, she had nothing to oppose to the lady's proposal of her residing with her as companion "Your having milked the cows, and all that sort of rural thing," said Lady Lucy, "only makes you more interesting and Arcadian, and it has not made your hands red at all: your cheeks being so blooming, is quite in character; you are exactly the very thing I have been dreaming of for years."

"And so have I," said her son, "but I wish she hadn't been quite so rustic, either. However, it can't be helped; she will soon surpass any fine lady in London."

Sir Lionel was not deceived: he went back to college, and Lady Lucy left Derbyshire, carrying her pretty companion with her, for her mother could not oppose the good fortune which deprived her of her two eldest children.

(To be continued.)

THE MAGAZINES FOR FEBRUARY.

We resume our notices from last week's paper with AINSWORTH'S MAGAZINE, in which the editor continues his new tale of "St. James's; or the Court of Queen Anne," with considerable spirit: a peep below stairs at Marlborough House, and the cleaning of Marlborough's boots are capitally narrated; the portrait of Prodigy, the Queen's state coachman, is excellent; the patter songs are good; the secretary's levee, introduces Saint-John and Prior, and is followed by Harley's secret interview with the queen, interrupted by the Duchess of Marlborough: the narrative and descriptive passages in each chapter are in Mr. Ainsworth's best vein The next paper is by Mrs. S. C. Hall, on "The Long Hours," illustrated by a to ishing tale, and opened with these sensible observations: "If men suffer so much from those 'long hours, women endure much more: but they who are occupied in shops are the most pitiable females, who have not the care of a family to think of—this is the only alleviation, that I know of, to the misery. There is of necessity in the streets at late hours is a danger so great, that if everybody could only be induced to look upon it in all its bearings, I am convinced it could soon cease to be permitted. The total remedy of the 'long hours,' as regards our shops, is so simple, so rational, and productive of such small inconvenience, that I can see no reason why it cannot be completely applied, if 'everybody' does act, in running after some new object, quit the subject before the cure is effected. However, the sufferers are able to keep their case before the public by their own individual, as well as united exertions; and this is doing a great deal.

The other papers are principally continuations, the most striking of which are Maginn's "John Manesty," and Leigh Hunt's "Honey from Mount Hybla. The number altogether is bustling and attractive, though we must enter our protest against the oracular style of the reviews of new books.

TAIT'S MAGAZINE opens with Mrs. Gore's "Blanks and Prizes; or, the Wheel of Fortune," clever and sparkling as usual. "Reminiscences of Mrs. Opie" are commenced with a bite evening party The review papers are on "Tytler's History of Scotland" and a batch of new novels, capitally executed but probably too racicst article is "Tom Cauliflower and his Friends," a sort of "Notes," interspersed with some charming ballads, and well-seasoned with piquancy.

THE BOKHARA CAPTIVES.—We have great pleasure in announcing that letters from Trebizond of the 13th of December, announce the arrival there on the 11th of some Bokhara merchants, who report that Colonel Stoddart is still alive, and holding the appointment of Sirdar, or chief place, of commandant of a fortress, having been compelled to embrace Islamism under the name of Abdel Semet Khan. The same passengers likewise state that Colonel Stoddart has under him a young man, who is a Scotchman by nationality, according to their description, is supposed to be Captain Connolly. Later dates from Trebizond, to the 31st of December, mention that these reports had been confirmed by other persons arriving there from Bokhara on their pilgrimage to Mecca, and who had left Bokhara between five and six months previous. Mr. Wolff had reached Erzeroum on foot from Trebizond, a distance of one hundred and fifty miles.

SIDE-BOARD APPENDICITIES.—Under the fanciful paper published as the Allegory as a copy of the sign-board of an itinerant showman: "A Rattel Snaicke too be Shoed.—This litsry off this snaick is as as follors: hee was ketcht on tung mounting buy a gipsen woman, which as he naturely, being sicks yer cuild and very wenumous; he is now in a hocks and cant hirtne boddy, which is much better than too bee running wild, cause he cant want to eat nothun. Admittance is sickpents for them what pleese to pay it, and thrippents for them what dont; a libberall reduckshon for fammeleez. For more particklers pleese to cawl on Old Dick. T. N.—Take notiss it was the poore man and not the snaick that had a large fammely."

The Hon. Captain George Grey, R.N., who obtained leave from the Admiralty to come from Gibraltar to see his venerable and noble father, Earl Grey, has resumed his command of the Belvidera, stationed at Gibraltar.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.
(Before Lord Chief Justice Tindal.)

GOSLIN V. CORNY.

This was an action of libel. Sir Thomas Wilde and Mr. Huggins conducted the plaintiff's case; Mr. Hill appeared for the defendant. The plaintiff had been formerly in the employ of the defendant, a timber merchant, at Preston, as a sub-overlooker, on the Preston Railway, and had become indebted to him in a sum of money, which, being unable to pay, the defendant, it was alleged, wrote a letter to the editor of the Hue and Cry Gazette, enclosing an advertisement, charging the plaintiff as having absconded, and imputed to him fraud. The advertisement subsequently appeared in the Gazette, and the plaintiff was apprehended in London, but, on being taken before the magistrate, no person appeared to make a charge, and he was discharged. The defendant denied that the letter containing the advertisement was in his handwriting, and the whole question in the cause rested upon whether it was so or not. The evidence was conflicting on that subject, some of the witnesses affirming and others denying that the defendant had written the letter.—His Lordship left the jury to decide the point, after having retired for a short time, found a verdict for the plaintiff.—Damages, £200.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

THE QUEEN V. HENRY KING, EMILY ANN BIRCH, AND AUGUSTA BIRCH.

This was a prosecution against the parties for a conspiracy to defraud a number of tradesmen under false pretences. The scheme was this, for Mrs. Birch to order a great many goods of the most valuable kind from many different tradesmen—honouring in this way several dealers in one sort of goods with her profitable custom—to name a future, yet not very distant day for payment, and then before that day arrived to have the goods swept off by executions issued at the suit of King and the defendant Dorcas Phillips. The creditor of King was to be in respect of money alleged to have been lent by him to Mrs. Birch. In the months of November and December, 1841, and January and February, 1842, was Mrs. Birch employed in carrying these schemes into effect. She went to various tradesmen, she ordered goods of an expensive description, consisting of plate, jewellery, wine, upholstery, pianofortes (for she had two of them at a time), furniture, one from each of two eminent makers), and thus she accumulated in her house property to the amount of about £3,500. The goods had been ordered in from about December, 1841, to February, 1842. The time appointed for the payment was April. Just before that time arrived two executions were put into the house of Mrs. Birch—one at the suit of King, for £2,135, and the other at the suit of Dorcas Phillips, for £500. The latter named Mr. Jesson, who was not on his trial, had kept a low lodging-house in the neighbourhood of Whitechapel. The principal conspirator, King, who is a solicitor, resided in chambers in Verulam-buildings, and the Birches had a splendid mansion in Grosvenor-place. A fiat of bankruptcy was issued against Emily Ann Birch (who was the widow of a coachmaker in Long Acre) whilst the sheriff's officer was in possession, but the most valuable goods had been removed, and from each of two eminent makers, and thus she accumulated in her house property to the amount of about £3,500. The goods had been ordered in from about December, 1841, to February, 1842. The time appointed for the payment was April. Just before that time arrived two executions were put into the house of Mrs. Birch—one at the suit of King, for £2,135, and the other at the suit of Dorcas Phillips, for £500. The latter named Mr. Jesson, who was not on his trial, had kept a low lodging-house in the neighbourhood of Whitechapel. The principal conspirator, King, who is a solicitor, resided in chambers in Verulam-buildings, and the Birches had a splendid mansion in Grosvenor-place. A fiat of bankruptcy was issued against Emily Ann Birch (who was the widow of a coachmaker in Long Acre) whilst the sheriff's officer was in possession, but the most valuable goods had been removed, and from each of two eminent makers),

THE DUBLIN STATE TRIALS.

(Continued rom page 88.)

without a wound—next a sudden and impetuous flood of burning enthusiasm then some indignant censure, that never became unpolished, while it was severe or else a cutting unexpected sarcasm, that was the more powerful in its effect, because it seemed no part of the nature of the man who uttered it. Last of all—but here description fails—and no written words can convey into the human thought the abounding grandeur of that glorious persuasion. I speak of the burst of majesty which concluded the first day's harangue. Full of fine vehemence—and the modulating harmony with which true eloquence has strengthens and sweetens the human voice at will—the speaker called up before the classic mind some of the dearest objects of its admiration. The spirit of old Greece, regenerating worlds with the stern example of her struggles for liberty, seemed to hover upon his lips. At once, and by that magic which passes time and space, he linked the greatness of her orators with the greatness of the orators of Ireland in an after day. Then came the tribute paid by genius to genius, as he dwelt upon names, to whose immortality his own power was even wedding him as he spoke; and, as he alluded to the places in which their orators had built up an altar, he drew a fearful and beautiful picture of the desolation of the city's deserted temples of architecture, that made the listener wonder how their ancient glory could depart. Then, rushing to a climax, which overwhelmed him with its own impetuosity, in a burst of wild, stirring, half-frenzied declamation, his voice failed him, and he sank exhausted in his seat. The next day he resumed, and concluded his oration; and it will be long before its greatness and beauty can pass away from the memory of the Irish heart. The speech elicited from a gentleman here the following impromptu, of which the Monitor has kindly given me a copy, which will enable you to publish it in London as early as it will appear in Dublin:—

IMPROMPTU ON THE SPEECH OF MR. WHITESIDE, Q.C.

I.

He spoke at first as one who would prepare
His pathway unto glory, and the voice
Persuasive, sweet and sonorous—sounded there
The herald of his soul. If worlds rejoice
When all he said is gathered up by Fame,
Garner'd within her temple and laid by
As the fair garnish of an honor'd name
Brought proudly up to feed posterity—
There will be few who grasp the mighty span
Of that all-mighty speech—who then will dream
Of the fair calm which that great storm began,
Ere god-like genius kindled with its theme!

II.

He spoke again—he was a playful child
Pattering with bubbles by the cheerful till,
Yet sporting forth his humour while he smiled,
And as he pattered waking laughter still.
Anon, the child grows manhood—and his wit
Revels triumphant in the early brain,
Until the crowd are shaking as they sit,
And roll his joyous laughter back again.
When quick he springs to manhood then his joke
Wears the keen edge which friends and foes all feel:
And while the latter wish he had not spoke
They, bleeding, own the polish of the steel!

III.

He spoke at last—less as a man than God—
For god-like thoughts fell proudly from his tongue,
And Age's wisdom inspiration brought
To crown the warmth of what was bright and young!
He trampled upon tyranny—a flood
Of very liberty pours from his lips—
Hurls down the throne, whose Stygian sea is blood—
And blasts the being of the wretch who sips!
Lifts the great heart of man with every word—
Raises the soul, and thrills the mortal frame
Until exhaustion sheaths the mental sword,
And it could be die—'twere in the arms of Fame!

I have thus gone out of my way upon the subject of Mr. Whiteside's speech as a matter of simple justice, which I think he emphatically deserves but, as I may be deemed enthusastic, it is as well to say that I have no personal knowledge of that distinguished gentleman, and speak of him only upon the impressions which his own genius evoked.

Mr. M'Donagh, from whom much was expected—but who felt the disadvantage of following his eloquent colleague—made many points in the line of the defence he adopted, and is generally considered to have added to his reputation at the bar by the display of his talent upon this occasion. Mr. Henn followed, and his was great eloquence; of a quiet order, but full of a mother humour and pleasantry which kept the court in a roar. His apology for the "concatenation of ideas" which made him call a certain magistrate a Dogberry, because the trial reminded him of "Much Ado about Nothing," was in its manner exquisitely droll, and his—"Counsel says the Attorney-General; Sedition, more blandly utters the mild Solicitor; flat Burglary, says Brewster!" got up such a shout in court as no English justice-hall ever echoed. The more sensible and grave portions of his arguments were also powerfully put, and I cannot be wrong in adding my testimony to the general opinion that Henn is one of the brightest ornaments of the Irish bar.

Apropos of that shout of laughter of which I have just been speaking, it may not be amiss to state that there is a general spirit of indecorum pervading the conduct of the Irish courts, always excepting Sir Edward Sugden's and the Recorder's. It is nothing to stop a judge in the middle of a speech from the bench, with an "I beg your pardon, my lord"—and the utterance of a contrary opinion—and really, I have seen some of such interruptions assume almost the nature of a wrangle. On Saturday night, when it was known that O'Connell was to speak on Sunday, an application was made by one of the junior bar (the witty Mr. Holmes, a gentleman above sixty), on the part of the class he represented, to have them admitted in their wigs and gowns into the same gallery with the public; and will it be believed that upon this occasion, the High Sheriff was made to speak—and two of the Judges delivered grave opinions before the Court announced its decision. It was as indecrous and contemptible an exhibition as I ever beheld. The High Sheriff, with something of the insolence of office, said that the junior bar gave him more trouble than all the rest of the community, and there were Irish whispers that the said bar intended to notice the expression in another way! I shall send you a separate letter about O'Connell's speech.

SEVENTEENTH DAY.—FRIDAY.

At five minutes past ten the Court sat, the traversers and jury being in punctual attendance. Mr. Whiteside rose, but the Lord Chief Justice having requested him not to commence for a moment or two, he resumed his seat. After a short pause his lordship intimated that the proceeding day, the persons who sat in the gallery indulged in much cheering, and which occasioned considerable noise. Certainly the cheering was due to the distinguished leaders of Mr. Whiteside's bar, as there was a great deal of impropriety and indecorum committed, the Court would then observe that it would not allow the repetition of such conduct. Those, therefore, who had a desire to signify either approbation or disapbation must do it elsewhere; but in the court neither should be allowed. Having apologised to the learned gentleman for the interruption, he directed him to proceed.

Mr. Whiteside then resumed his address, and throughout sustained the high strain of eloquence which so much interested and delighted his auditory on the previous day. He commenced by adverting to that charge in the indictment which imputed to the traversers the design of bringing the courts of law into disrepute, and establishing courts of their own in their place. He maintained that the system which they endeavoured to found was purely one of arbitration, or a settlement of disputes in a friendly way, without referring them to the recognized tribunals. Was there anything criminal in that? Why, Christianity commended it—moralists approved of it—and the law itself lent it its sanction. To prove the two first of these propositions he quoted Paley and St. Paul; and for testimony to the third, he cited several law authorities and acts of Parliament. So much for the crime of not going to law, and providing means for the people to make those amicable settlements of their disputes which were sanctioned by such high authority. The traversers were charged with using too much freedom in commenting on a speech delivered by her Majesty in Parliament; but in the exercise of this liberty they were encouraged by usage and principle; by principle, for it was quite constitutional to consider a royal speech as that of the Minister; and by usage, as precedents without number were to be found on the subject. He would select two as examples—one from the Morning Post, published in 1839, and another from an evening journal of the same period. These journals published comments on the Queen's speech in answer to the address of the House of Lords on the education question, and bold and unsparing as they were, no prosecution was ever thought of against those writers, either for libel or conspiracy. Again, it was imputed to the traversers as something sacrilegious that they contemplated the repealing of an act of Parliament which was declared to be permanent, perpetual, and almost irrevocable. But there was no immortality in such matters. The Act of Union itself had repealed other Acts which were in their time just as much pronounced to be "for all generations." To say, therefore, now, that the act of Union was irrevocable would be to cut away its very foundation on which it rested. It was curious that one of the traversers had exposed himself to the attack of the Attorney-General for asserting that her Majesty could issue writs to summon a Parliament in Ireland on her own mere authority for presuming to carry the power of the Crown too far. But this prerogative was asserted by most writers on the subject—by Mr. Chitty, among others—and had never been taken away by any express act of Parliament. The learned gentleman next took up the topic of the neglect of the Government to take exception to the conduct of the traversers in detail, and contrasted their quiet acquiescence in the meeting at Donnybrook with their fiery declaration at the intended assembling at Clontarf. He treated this point with great vivacity, and produced infinite merriment by the occasional fencing with which he mingled his graver discussion and vacuity of the Government at one time, as their sudden bit of vigour and resolution beyond the occasion at another.

The following passage created great amusement:—

From March to October the traversers had, according to the indictment, been publishing seditious intelligence to rebellion. Two years had that Court, and yet the Attorney-General had brought forward no prosecutions against any one of those publications now called seditious and criminal. No, during all that time had the factitious calm of the constituted elegis and now that the mischief was done, he comes forward with his idle complaints. The jury would recollect what had been the evasive answer of the Minister to the question of Lord Roseleyn. Could he not, with his great majority, have put down the mischief long since by a short Act of Parliament. The learned counsel continued—nothing of the kind was done—Parliament broke up—the Lord Lieutenant leaves for England—the Chancellor wanders to the banks of the Thames to muse on the law—the noble Secretary seeks, in some lonely dell, to lose the recollection of Irish wickedness, or Irish folly. The Attorney-General soon joins him, and the learned Solicitor is left at home with the unagreeable anticipations of the future. (Laughter.) The Prime Minister goes to Drayton, his colleagues join him, and Ireland is left to go headlong to destruction by means of this horrible consequence. The Donnybrook meeting takes place—a black cloud hangs on the mountain—the political horizon becomes overcharged, and a dangerous activity succeeds an equally dangerous inaction. Couriers are flying here and there, to summon the functionaries to their Irish post of danger. (Laughter.)—sedition! Where is the Lord Lieutenant? Illegality! Where is the Chancellor? Political expediency Where is the noble Secretary for Ireland? (Loud laughter.) They assess! I believe that the Attorney-General would have seen wandering by the sea shore, straining their eyes to the coast of England, and were heard to exclaim—

"Ye gods, annihilate both time and space,
And make two lingers happy."

(Continued laughter.) They come! they come! the Privy Council is summoned, but I cannot tell what passed in that august assemblage, that must be reserved for some Robertson or Gibbon of future days, but I can tell what was done—that was nothing—the do-nothing prevailed. The members separated, having done nothing, and went home with the happy consciousness of having done their duty. (A laugh.) Soon, however, they rise like giants refreshed with wine, they reassemble, and a proclamation is issued at three o'clock in the day to put down a meeting called for next morning, and for which at that moment men were on their march from all parts of the country. The commander-in-chief receives his orders to march on Conquer-hill, cannon are planted, bayonets are fixed, and forth march the army, with all the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war—

"Oh, it was a glorious sight to see
The march of England's chivalry."

(Laughter.) The advanced guard pushed on, and seized Aldborough-house—the Pigeon-house bristled with cannon terrible to behold—continued laughter in which the Bench fully partictepated)—and the Commander-in-Chief did as much as could have been expected from Julius Cæsar under similar circumstances. Attended by a brilliant staff, he rode to Conquer-hill, and planted himself under it with all that had been done, and then—went home and dined. Oh, there never was such a triumph since Brian Borolhme got his bright sword upon his giant thigh, and smote the invaders. (Laughter.) The learned counsel continued—But to be serious, was such conduct consistent with justice? Was that a line of policy to make a Government respected? Was it not, on the contrary, vacillating and inconsistent? Downpatrick passed over and Clontarf put down, how were the people to understand such conduct? The mischief had been allowed to accumulate until the last moment, and then how puerile the manner taken to counteract it. He told the jury that if they convicted his client they convicted the Government; if they acquitted his client the Government would stand acquitted also.

His next topic was the seditious ministrelsy and inflammatory writings of the Nation, which he justified by the sentiments of Mr. Thomas Moore—by the writings of Taylor, Southey, and Sir Walter Scott himself. In fine, he treated the prosecution as an infringement of the right of free discussion, and wound up one of the most splendid displays of forensic talent, eloquence, and learning, ever heard within the hall of the Four Courts of Dublin, by the following impassioned and beautiful apostrophe, which, although pressed for space, we cannot do any thing like the magnificence of its delivery:—

A nation's rights are involved in the issue—a nation's liberties are at stake. What won—what preserves—the precious privileges you possess? The exercise of the right of political discussion—free, untrammelled, bold. The laws which wisdom framed—the institutions struck out by patriotism, learning, and valour—can they preserve the springs of freedom fresh and pure? No! Destroy the right of free discussion, and you dry up the sources of your freedom. By the same means by which your liberties were won can they alone be increased or defended. Quarrel not with the partial evils free discussion creates, nor seek to contract the enjoyment of that greatest privilege within the narrow limits timid men prescribe. With the passing mischiefs of its extravagance contrast the prodigious blessings it has heaped on man. Free discussion aroused the human mind from the torpor of ages, taught it to think, and shook the throne of ignorance and darkness. Free discussion gave to Europe the Reformation, which it has been taught to believe the mightiest event in the history of the human race, illuminating the world with the radiant light of spiritual truth. Say is shine with steady and increasing splendour! Free discussion gave to England the Revolution, abolished tyranny, swept away the monstrous abuses it rears, and established the liberties under which we live. Free discussion, since that glorious epoch, has not only preserved, but purified, our constitution, improved our laws, reduced our punishments, and extended its wholesome influence to every portion of our political system. The spirit of inquiry it creates has revealed the secrets of nature, explained the wonders of creation, leading the knowledge of the stupendous works of God. Arts, civilization, freedom, pure religion, are its noble realities. Would you undo the labours of science, extinguish literature, stop the efforts of genius, restore ignorance, bigotry, barbarism—then put down free discussion, and you have accomplished all. Savage conquerors, in the blindness of their ignorance, have scattered and destroyed the intellectual treasures of a great antiquity. Those who make war on the rights of free and free discussion, without their ignorance, imitate their fury. They may check the expression of some thought, which might, if uttered, redeem the liberties or increase the happiness of man. The insidious assailants of his great prerogative of intellectual beings, by the cover under which they advance, conceal the character of their assault upon the liberties of the human race. They seem to admit the liberty to discuss, blame only its extravagance, pronounce hollow praise the most artful assailant of a nation's rights—he declares friendship while he wages war, and professes affection for the thing he hates. State prosecutions, if you believe them, are ever the fastest friends of freedom. They tell you peace is disturbed, order broken, by the excesses of turbulent and seditious demagogues. No doubt there might be a seeming peace—a deathlike stillness by repressing the feelings and passions of men. So in the fairest portions of Europe this cry has been peace, and order, and submission, under paternal despotisms, ecclesiastical and civil. That peace springs from terror—that submission from ignorance—that silence from despair. Who dares discuss, when with discussion and by discussion tyranny must perish? Compare the stillness of despotism with the healthful animation, the natural warmth, the bold language, the proud bearing, which spring from freedom and the consciousness of its possession. Which will you prefer? Insult not the dignity of manhood by supposing that contentment of the heart can exist under despotism. There may be degrees in its severity, and also degrees in the sufferings of its victims. Terrible the dangers which lurk beneath the calm surface of despotic power. The movements of the oppressed will, at times, disturb the tyrant's tranquillity, and warn him their day of vengeance and of triumph may be nigh. But in these happy countries the safety of the people consists in freedom of discussion. Partial evils in all systems of political governments there must be; but their worst effects are obviated when their cause is sought for, discovered, considered, discussed. Militia and bayonets are artificial truth, in language as instructive as his sublimest verse:—"For this is not the liberty which we can hope, that no grievances ever should arise in the commonwealth—that let no man in this world expect, but when complaints are freely heard, deeply considered, and speedily reformed, then is the utmost bound of civil liberty obtained that wise men look for." Suffer the complaints of the Irish people to be freely heard. You want the power to have them speedily reformed. Their case to-day may be yours to-morrow. Preserve the right of free discussion as you would cling to life. Combat error with argument, misrepresentation by fact, falsehood with truth. "For who knows not," saith the same great writer, "that truth is strong, next to the Almighty. One needs no policies nor stratagems to make her victorious—these are the shifts error uses against her power." If this demand for a native Parliament rest on a delusion, dispel that delusion by the omnipotence of truth. Why do you love—why do other nations honour England? Are you are they dazzled by her naval or military glories, the splendour of her literature, her sublime discoveries in science, her boundless wealth, her almost incredible labours in every work of art and skill? No: you love her—you cling to England, because she has been for ages past the seat of free discussion, and therefore the home of rational freedom, and the hope of oppressed men throughout the world. Under the laws of England it is our happiness to live. They breathe the spirit of liberty and reason. Emulate this day the great virtues of English men—their love of fairness—their immoveable independence, and the sense of justice rooted in their nature. These are the virtues which qualify jurors to decide the rights of their fellow-citizens. Deserted by these, of what avail the tribunal of a jury? It is worthless as the human body when the living soul has fled. Prove to the accused, from whom perchance you widely differ in opinion—whose liberties and fortunes are in your hands—that you are there not to persecute but to save. Believe me you will not secure the true interests of England by leaning too severely on your countrymen. They say to their English brethren, and with truth, "We have been in your side whenever danger was to be faced and honour won. The scorching sun of the East and the pestilence of the West we have endured to spread your commerce, to extend your empire, to uphold your glory. The bones of our countrymen whitened the fields of Spain, of Portugal, of France. Fighting your battles they fell—in a nobler cause they could not. We have helped to gather your imperishable laurels—we have helped to win your immortal triumphs. Now, in time of peace, we ask you to restore that Parliament you planted here with your laws and language, uprooted in a dismal period of our history, in the moment of your power—our devotions, our weakness, CHILLINGHAM BULL SHOOTING.—DRAWN BY MR. T. LANDSEER.

CHILLINGHAM WILD CATTLE.

Considerable interest has, of late, been excited by a statement in the Newcastle journals, that the park of Chillingham was to be despoiled of its glory and boast. It appears that a writ of execution had been directed to the Sheriff of Northumberland, to bring to the hammer this celebrated race of cattle, so long the exclusive property of the Earls of Tankerville. We are, however, happy to find the following paragraph in the Tyne Mercury of Tuesday last.

The anticipated sale of this noble park has fortunately not taken place. The wild cattle have been successfully claimed by Lord Tankerville, as heir to one of the estate and consequently personal property of the Earls of Tankerville. The deer-sale will, therefore, also be set aside, and no Tuesday last were put up at the following prices:—The red deer, in one lot, at £60, and the fallow deer at £50. There was, however, not a single offer made, and the sale did not proceed.

The Chillingham cattle have long been as much an object of curiosity to strangers visiting this country as many of our national monuments; and Sir Walter Scott, in his interesting notes to the "Bride of Lammermoor," has added to the celebrity of this noble race of Northumbrian cattle. They are stated, by Leslie, to have inhabited the great Caledonian forest in ancient times, and, more recently, they have been found in other localities. In the park of Chillingham Castle, the seat of the Earl of Tankerville, near Alnwick, these cattle have been carefully preserved in their pristine purity. They are described in "Bewick's Quadrupeds;" but we prefer the more recent account, communicated by Mr. I. Hindmarch, to the British Association, in 1838. They are, he stated, pre-eminently, all the characteristics of wild animals, they hide their young, feed at night, basking or sleeping during the day; they are fierce when pressed, but generally very timid. They, however, very much in different seasons of the year, and according to the manner in which they are approached. In summer, for instance, they are, for several weeks, scarcely to be seen; and, on the slightest appearance of any human being, they retire into the wood. On the other hand, in winter they go down for food into the inner park; and, being in constant contact with the people, will almost let them come among them, particularly if on horseback. Their usual mode of retreat is to get up slowly, set off in a walk, then in a trot, and afterwards in a gallop. In form they are gracefully shaped: short legs, straight back, thin skin, and horns of very fine texture; some of the bulls are of cream-colour, and they have a peculiar cry, more like that of a wild beast than of ordinary cattle. They have also all the marks of high breeding, and some of its defects. When they come down to the inner park, which they do at stated hours, they move like a regiment of cavalry in single file, the bulls leading the van, and as they retreat, the bulls also bringing up the rear. There were, at the time Mr. Hindmarch wrote, in the herd at Chillingham park, about 80 cattle, viz., 25 bulls, 30 cows, and 15 steers, of various ages. The eyes, the eye-lashes, and the tips of the horns, are black. The bulls have no mane, but a little coarse hair; and they fight for supremacy, until a few of the most powerful subdue the others. The calves are at their greatest value months, and when first born are hidden in some sequestered spot for a week or ten days, to which the mothers go twice or thrice a-day to give them milk. Should any one approach the calves they clap their heads to the ground, and lie in the form of a bow. They seldom live more than eight or nine years. The weight is said to reach from 30 to 40 stones, and the oxen are stated to feed heavier, approaching near to the Lancashire breed, the horns being long and beautifully turned.

The flesh of the Chillingham cattle is good and succulent, when they are killed in condition, which must be done by shooting them like deer: the beef is finely marbled, and of excellent flavour. The olden mode of killing these cattle was, according to the account in Bewick's work, perhaps, the only modern remains of the grandeur of ancient hunting. On notice being given that a wild bull would be killed on a certain day, the inhabitants of the neighbourhood came armed with guns, &c., sometimes to the amount of 100 horse, and 400 or 500 feet, who stood upon walls, or got into trees, while the horsemen rode off the bull from the rest of the herd, until he stood at bay, when a marksman dismounted and shot. At some of these huntings, twenty or thirty shots were fired before he was subdued! On such occasions, the bleeding victim grew desperately furious from the smarting of his wounds, and the shouts of savage joy that were echoing from every side; but, from the number of accidents that happened, this dangerous mode has been little practised of late years. Bewick engraved the Chillingham breed most accurately: indeed, it was his masterpiece of wood-engraving, and measured 9½ by 7 inches.

The annexed engraving is from a valuable drawing by Mr. Thomas Landseer: it represents the mode of killing the Chillingham, as at present practised; the bull is fatally wounded, and just turning on the dogs in the last agonies of despair.

CONDORS AT THE SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

CONDORS AT THE SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

The annexed sketch is a spirited representation of condors which have been recently added to the fine collection of this class of birds, at the Surrey Zoological Gardens. Two of the three are males, and are considered to be upwards of twenty years old. They are all remarkably large, and, probably, the most splendid specimens that have ever reached this country alive: they measure four feet in length, and from eleven to twelve feet across the wings, which must be nearly the maximum size; as the largest specimen of whose dimensions we have any accurate statement was the one preserved in the Leverian Museum, which measured thirteen feet one inch from wing to wing.

These proportions, although considerable, do not at all realize the exaggerated notions generally entertained of the immense size and power of the bird that carried away the Peruvian hero, Rolla, in his talons; but it is with the condor as with the human inhabitants of Patagonia, and many other objects of natural history—the more they are examined the more does the estimate of their size diminish.

The condor is found throughout the whole range of the Cordilleras, along the south-west coast of South America, from the Straits of Magellan to the Rio Negro, in lat. 41, four degrees which locality the specimens were brought. Their habitations are almost invariably on overhanging ledges of high and perpendicular cliffs, where they both sleep and breed, sometimes in pairs, but frequently in colonies of twenty or thirty together. They make no nest, but lay two large white eggs on a surface of bare rock: the Chilenos say that they breed but once in two years. The young ones cannot use their wings for flight until many months after birth, being covered only, during that time, with a blackish down like that of a gosling. They remain on the same cliff where they were hatched long after having acquired the full power of flight, roosting and hunting in company with the parent birds. Their food consists of guanacos, deer, cattle, and other animals that have either died, or have been killed by the pumas. The condors may often times be seen at a great height, soaring over a certain spot in the most graceful spires and circles. If they glide down and then suddenly all rise together, the Chileno knows that it is the puma, which, watching the carcass, has sprung out to drive away the robbers. Besides feeding on carrion, the condors will frequently attack young goats and lambs. Hence, the shepherd dogs are trained, the moment the enemy pass over, to run out, and, looking upwards, to bark violently. The Chilenos destroy and catch great numbers. Two methods are used: one is to place a carcass within an enclosure of sticks on a level piece of ground, and when the condors are gorged, to clap up on horseback to the entrance, and thus inclose them; for when this bird has not space to run, it cannot give its body sufficient momentum to rise from the ground. The second method is to mark the trees in which, frequently to the number of five or six, they roost together, and then at night to climb up and noose them. They are such heavy sleepers that this is by no means a difficult task.

The condor, like all the vulture tribe, discovers his food from a great distance; the body of an animal is frequently surrounded by a dozen or more of them, almost as soon as it has dropped dead, although five minutes before there was not a single bird in view. Whether this power is to be attributed to the keenness of his olfactory, or his visual organs, is a matter still in dispute; although it is believed, from a minute observation of its habits in confinement, to be rather to its quickness of sight.

The presence of this fine group gives much additional interest to the aviary of rapacious birds at the Gardens.

THE FIRST SNOW-BALL!

Dexterâ——jaculatus.—Hor.

The flow'rs ne'er lov'd the genial spring—
The happy birds ne'er spread a wing
Upon the gentle winds that bring
The summer months around,
With fonder joy than youthful Mirth
Doth hail the snow-emantled earth
The first time it is found!

The dusky sons of Afric's shore,
In wild saltation love not more
The saccharine to tumble o'er,
In islands Western far,
Than urchins here delight at home,
With what old Plato calls the foam
Of clouds, to make a war!

Beyond gun-powder it hath claims:—
It is snow-matter where it aims—
For if it hurt, it seldom maims
Like t'other deadly thing—
E'en "paper pellets of the brain"
Have often caus'd severer pain
Than snow-balls, though they sting!

Sting?—ay!—full many a wight we've seen,
Who for a time had champion been
Upon the white-enshrouded green,
Laid low by one fell shot—
And seem'd as sore as if he lost
A battle to the Nation's cost,
Though Patriot he was not!

But let us hope this gelid fray
Will soon to warmer sports give way,
And Spring lead in the flow'ry May!
We would not hasten Time—
But Frost and Rain and Hail and Snow,
And noisy winds that threat'ning blow
Are not the things we'd rhyme!

We'd sing of Violets and flow'rs
That spring to meet the April show'rs—
Of rosy hedges—myrtle bow'rs
Where wooing birds collect.—
Snow-drops to snow-balls we prefer,
But, gentle reader! don't infer
The latter we neglect!

"SNOW-BALLING."—DRAWN BY KENNY MEADOWS.

OPENING OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN INSTITUTE.—VISIT OF PRINCE ALBERT.

This new institution is designed to combine the comforts of a club with the beneficial and intellectual objects of a literary institution, and to infuse into both the elegances of private society by the introduction of the ladies to a share of those privileges, hitherto enjoyed exclusively by men. The members of the institute having increased beyond the expectations of its early friends, and already exceeding a thousand in number, the evening of Friday, the 2nd inst., was fixed for its opening;—his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the patron of the Institute, having signified his intention to honour the meeting by his presence on that occasion. Taking warning from the greatly embarrassed condition of other somewhat similar establishments, the Committee have wisely avoided incurring, at present, the heavy expense of a new building, and they have succeeded in adapting the house which they have taken in George-street, Hanover-square, to the purposes of the Society. The lower floor contains a library and a reading-room, the former numbering 3000 volumes of standard works; and the latter is supplied with the newspapers and periodicals of our own and foreign lands, both fitted up with every regard to the comfort and convenience of the members, without neglecting the elegance of their appearance. The upper floor consists of three spacious drawing-rooms, one of which is opened daily for the accommodation of the members, while the rest are reserved for the soirées. Two of these apartments are fitted up in crimson and gold, and furnished in the Louis Quatorze style, with crimson velvet ottomans and rich damask curtains; the folding doors being richly gilt, and the archway supported by Corinthian columns, elaborately decorated with ornaments of white and gold. The front room is lined with French tapestry and brown watered hangings. The whole of the apartments are loaded with elegant and costly furniture—chandeliers, pedestals, vases, velvet tables, carvings, and pier glasses—each item arresting the attention for some novel and fanciful design. In the refreshment room, hung with blue damask, there are pictures after Watteau; and in the vestibules and galleries are busts of Lord Brougham, Lord Lyndhurst, Sir Walter Scott, the Duke of Wellington, and other worthies.

On Friday evening the announcement of His Royal Highness's intended presence drew together a large concourse of the members, numbering about 800, of whom a large proportion were ladies; and the effect of the elegantly dressed crowd in the brilliantly lighted rooms was pleasing in the extreme. In order to add to the gratification of the visitors, the drawing-rooms were hung with beautiful works of art, lent to the Institute, either for the season or for the evening, among which Mr. Pickersgill's exquisite painting of "The Persian Mother," Mr. Prout's marine scenery, and Mr. Warren's "Sermon on the Mount," were seen to no disadvantage beside the works of Raphael, Correggio, Guido, Murillo, Vandervelde, Zurburan, Teniers, and Janet, which decorated the walls.

About nine o'clock, his Royal Highness Prince Albert arrived, and was received by Mr. Buckingham, the Resident Director of the Institute; and by the members of the Board of Direction, by whom the Prince was accompanied during his stay. After inspecting the library,

OPENING OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN INSTITUTE.

his Royal Highness passed through the drawing-room, and visited the adjoining building, in which two spacious dining-rooms are provided for the exclusive use of the members: and having thus viewed every portion of the building—with the arrangements of which his Royal Highness was pleased to express great satisfaction—the Prince returned to the drawing-room, where some vocal and instrumental music was performed by Madame Dulcken, Signor and Madame F. Lablache, M. Benedict, Miss E. Birch, and Messrs. Goodban, Ellen, Richardson, Rendigle, and Garrett.

Shortly after ten o'clock his Royal Highness departed, graciously conveying to the Directors his satisfaction at the proceedings of the evening.

His Royal Highness was habited in elegant evening costume: a black coat, with the star of the Order of the Garter, the blue ribbon crossing a white waistcoat, and the Garter at the knee; and the Order of the Golden Fleece suspended by a red ribbon

The members remained a short time after the departure of the Prince, and at about half-past eleven the assembly separated, having thus successfully ushered into existence an Institute, the rapid advance of which in public favour is a sufficient testimony to the excellence of the principles on which it is based.

In the suite of the Prince were the Marquis of Exeter, Lord George Lennox, and Colonel Wylde; and among the other noble and distinguished guests we observed the Earl of Devon, the President of the Institute, the Earl of Dalhousie, the Speaker of the House of Commons, Lord James Stuart, M.P., Lord W. Lennox, Colonel Sir E. Codrington, Lord Courtenay, M.P., Sir Geo. Staunton, Bart., M.P., his Excellency Chevalier Bunsen, the Brazilian and Sicilian Ministers, Mr. Fickersgill, Mr. Behnes, and many individuals of high distinction in the literary world.

Amongst the various works of art exhibited during the evening, was a bust of Espartero, by Mr. Jones, of Cannon Row, which was the object of general admiration. The presence of the original afforded a severe test of the merits of the artist, which greatly enhanced the value of his contribution.

THE DUBLIN STATE TRIALS.

(Continued from page 91.)

incidents scarcely covered by a period of nine or ten months. The memory fails to recal all those circumstances brought in evidence, and the judgment to distinguish what is important from what is not so. It was hard to say what the true question really was. Its entire strength seemed to consist in the cabalistic word "conspiracy." There was a legal definition given of it, which declared it to consist in seeking what was unlawful, or what was lawful by unlawful means. These were like two hooks to one line; but as to the second branch he could not admit it. Conspiracy was not to be spait out by casual circumstances.

My lord (and the honourable and learned gentleman), I submit that there should be an agreement to constitute a conspiracy, and not such an agreement as is made in that way before the world—not an agreement which is made, for instance, in the presence of the law officers of the Crown, of the learned Attorney-General or Solicitor-General, or of her Majesty's Sergeants-at-Law. You see the absurdity, gentlemen, of calling such an agreement a conspiracy; is it indeed, common sense? Is it to be endured by rational men that we should be told that such an agreement is a conspiracy? But when was the agreement made, or how, or where, was it made? We are in the winter season, or in summer, in spring, or in autumn? Was it on a holiday, or a week day? What was the hour, or day, or week, or year, on which it was entered into? Who was it that proposed it, or who seconded it? Gentlemen, I appeal to your common sense and reason, and ask you to place yourselves in my position, and to suppose that you address a Catholic jury, as I address you, and would you not feel—I will not call it indignation—but would you not laugh to scorn the idea that such a jury should find you guilty of "conspiracy" under such circumstances? There is not the slightest evidence before you of any connection which would be required in the crime of conspiracy. I do not know whether I am correct in having been present at the formation of the conspiracy; but, surely, if so, some time ought to have been pointed out, that I might have the benefit of an alibi. I could make it out (Laughter.) But here, my lord, there is a spread over so much time, and in so indefinite a way, that I should only take it as a toss-up whether or not I was present on the occasion. Was the agreement in writing, or was it a parole one? Really, gentlemen, if an agreement was arrived at supported by such evidence, and that you were to try the case, if there were even no more than a £10 contract at stake, I ask you, could you find a verdict that the contract existed? It is not here a £10 contract at stake, but the liberty of the subject is contested, your honest view of the case will be, that if a conspiracy exists, it must be proved and if not proved, that it does not exist. The Attorney-General, in good sooth, leaves it to your imagination to discover what this conspiracy was. A conspiracy ought to be a reality, but he leaves it altogether to you to imagine it. I do not speak in any disparagement of his talents. I admit that he has shown much talent, and much ingenuity and industry in having thrown this conspiracy. He occupied eleven hours—eleven mortal hours in his statement, yet in what part of it did he tell you where the conspiracy existed? Wait, said he, till I come to the close; and when he got to the close, he said, no, no, not the beginning—go through the whole of it, and find out the conspiracy the best way you can. It is not with any affectation that I say it, but if any one could have found out the proofs of a conspiracy existing, he would be the most astonished man in the court. If he did take eleven hours to throw into your box, for you to find out that there was a conspiracy, the Pilot, Nation, and Freeman. Read them, says he; it is good enough for you; make out the conspiracy, if you can, out of the materials I have thus given. I remember once, on the Munster circuit, the celebrated Egan was defending a case which was stated by a Mr. Hoare, a gentleman of a dark appearance, who made a very strong speech. Egan, in reply to this speech, by the way, he was sure of his jury, which is an excuse I want—said, "I am sure you will not be led away by the dark oblivion of a brow" (a laugh). Why Egan, said some one to him, "that is nonsense; why did you say so." "To be sure it is," was his reply; but isn't it good enough for a jury" (laughter)? So eleven hours is good enough for you. Gentlemen, it is monstrous—it is criminally monstrous—to say that that is a conspiracy which takes eleven hours to develope it. Hardy was tried for constructive treason, and to celebrate his acquittal, an anniversary was held. When the health of one of the jurors was drunk, one of the jurors not much acquainted with public speaking, made a speech. He said, "Mr. Chairman, I tell you I acquitted Hardy because Lord Eldon (then Sergeant Scott) took eleven hours to state the case; eight or nine days giving evidence: and I know that no man would be really guilty of treason, when so many words were used to tell it, and such a long time to prove it (a laugh). I have made up my mind to convict a man of high treason when the case is proved; but I won't help an Attorney-General to manufacture newspapers in order to make out a case" (a laugh). The case was one exactly in point. If a conspiracy existed, the Attorney-General would not have taken an hour, or half an hour to prove it; it would have stripped it of its garbage—(he would, as a barrister, (for though I am not in my wig and gown, I will stand up for the bar still), have stated a plain case to the jury—he would have laid his hand on it, he would have shown you when, where, how, and where the men were at the time, the acts, the circumstances; but he leaves it all to yourselves; it is good enough for you (a laugh).

The learned gentleman then proceeded to say that the Attorney-General had disappointed public expectation in not being able to show any facts or incidents connected with this charge which were not previously perfectly well known. What had become of all that was deep, dark, and dangerous, which it was insinuated would be brought to light on this trial? Where were all the "Green Boons and chimeras dire?" Nothing of the kind was disclosed. The prosecution was, in short, a purely Ministerial one, and the question raised was one between the present Ministers, who were going to enlarge their franchises, and the Whigs, who promised much and did very little. And now as to the evidence, what did it bring to light? There were every temptation to men to exaggerate, to falsify, or betray; but nothing was betrayed, for the simplest reason in the world, because there was nothing to betray. Would the jury believe that he (Mr. O'Connell) had entered into a public conspiracy? He had refused the high office of Master of the Rolls—it was a question if he had not also refused that of Chief Baron—and would the jury believe that, after this, he could have the cruelty, the folly, to enter into a conspiracy of this kind? They could not believe it. They must repudiate it.

The learned gentleman next alluded to the extensive combination which had been formed in England for the purpose of putting down the slave-trade, and asked why was not Wilberforce indicted for conspiracy? The venerable Clarkson was yet alive—why was he not also indicted for conspiracy? He (Mr. O'Connell) had also a share in that conspiracy, and yet nobody presumed to interfere with him. Let the jury beware of devising men into corners and the dark, and forcing them into real conspiracies—for that would be exactly what they punished such proceedings as these. He asked, if Parliamentary Reform or Catholic Emancipation would ever have been carried if it were not for great meetings and the great agitation which was got up to carry them? On one day they had held their great simultaneous meetings, and yet the Attorney-General of the time never thought of turning them into evidence of a conspiracy. Such a proceeding was reserved for the Attorney-General of the present. The Anti-Corn-law League in England held great meetings and collected money—so did the Anti-Slavery Society—and they had not been prosecuted. And was a proceedent for such a proceeding to be sent for to Ireland? In England they were safe in the integrity of the jury-box—they had an angel wing protecting them in that tribunal. Now, gentlemen, said Mr. O'Connell, addressing himself to the jury, will you not protect us as an English jury protects them? I ask no more—I will be satisfied with no less.

The learned gentleman next adverted to what he called the machinery of the evidence: it consisted of monster meetings and newspaper publications.

I admit (said Mr. O'Connell) that those meetings took place, that they were most numerously attended, and I boast of it. I ask, was there any life of man, woman, or child, or even of any animal, lost at any of those meetings? You will unanimously answer no, not one! I ask, was any man, woman, or child, struck, detained, or assaulted? And you will again answer no, not one! Any person injured? Not one! Was there any female, young or old, treated with indelicacy of speech or conduct? Not one! Was there a single shilling's worth of property destroyed or injured in any way? Not one! Oh, yes, there was. I exaggerate. A policeman who attended at Mullaghmast, in coloured clothes, swore that there was a ferocious onslaught of people from Carlow. He swore, positively, that they committed violence on some gingerbread stands. (Laughter.) Yes, exactly the amount of all the acts of violence committed at those meetings, was the overturning of a gingerbread stand. (Renewed laughter.) Now, I submit, bespeaks a foregone conclusion, for if any other act of violence had been committed, it could have been readily proved. The poor woman who suffered the loss has not complained, and the whole catalogue of mischief done to those meetings resolves itself into a "ferocious onslaught"—these were the words of the witness—upon a gingerbread stand. (Laughter.) Yes, it is ridiculous, but it is the prosecution that is so. There was no violence at those meetings, no tumult, no battery nor assault, no injury to property, no violation of good morals, or even of good manners, and is curious that not a single accident—not even a casual accident—occurred at any one of them. Yet the Attorney-General would tell us that I have infatuated the people, that I have excited them till they are ready to rebel, they whose conduct has been characterised by the absence of mischief to person or property, whose mutual courtesy has been remarkable, that not even an accident occurred at their most crowded gatherings. The grown matrons were there with their daughters, the young mothers with their infants, and such as she passed in safety through the very midst of their fearlessness and the helplessness of her infant was her best protection. Oh! it was delightful to see how the crowd gave way, and formed a rampart of protection for the mothers and the children. Yes, for the brothers and fathers of those women were there, and—to help me Heaven—no, I withdraw the solemnity of asseveration; but no more emphatic proof could have been exhibited of determination to observe peace, quietness, and perfect tranquility, than in the electrical feeling which used the mother and the nurse in the full assurance of safety, that electrical spurt of mutual kindness in whose pure atmosphere all was gentleness and courtesy. I burn boldly and proclaim, that there is not in the world another country where this could occur. The people of Ireland are oppressed and impoverished; they have been subjected to much contempt; the Times described them as a "filthy and felonious multitude," but I proclaim at least, that assembage no other people could such assemblages. It may be said that I am making an admission, but they have been educated to it for forty years, during the agitation for Emancipation, and subsequently during the agitation for Repeal. They have been subjected to pacific determination, which, thank Heaven, has not been ruffled in the slightest degree by anything which has occurred in this court. They abide your verdict, and though it may well disappoint them, there will be no violation of the law; no, whatever may be the fate of the man whose glory it is to have educated the people to peaceful, legal, constitutional, and continuous exertions.

The learned gentleman next commented on the character of the evidence, which consisted of publications in the newspapers; and protested against being made responsible for such productions. The Repeal Association had no newspaper organs, and gave its sanction to none of them. But, besides this, if the newspapers published libels, why were not their proprietors made responsible for them? The learned gentleman next spoke to his own political text,—"The man who commits a crime gives strength to the enemy." He declared himself the founder and the apostle of a new sect, whose object it was to effect political changes, without touching any law, or bridling one drop of human blood.

My mottoes of peace (observed the hon. and learned gentleman) have been proved over and over again in this court. I belong to a Christian persuasion, the principle of which is, that no quantity of advantage—no quantity of profit to church or state, not even Heaven itself was permitted to be attained at the expense of any one crime; and that no sin could be justified or palliated by any amount of advantage, however considerable. My lords, it has been proved sufficiently in the newspapers—and it is not to be perfectly well known—that no man ever possessed so much of public confidence as I do. I will say "possess it." No man has so unremittingly as I have obtained the confidence of the Catholic laity of Ireland, not only those who are my party, and may look to a change for amelioration, but the Catholics of the middle classes—the higher orders, the Catholic clergy, and the Catholic episcopacy. I have obtained their confidence by the assertion of the principles which I have avowed—by the sincerity with which I have entertained and announced them. A Catholic I am, pleading before a Protestant jury, in the presence, I may say, of the monarchs of the people of the earth; and I put it to you whether you would find a verdict against your fellow-countrymen, including many Protestants of the first respectability, by any verdict which would seem to doubt for a moment the perfect sincerity of my whole life—not of my life—but of the basis of my existence—the comfort and consolation of my declining years, and my hope for a higher and more awful tribunal. You, therefore, cannot believe that I would direct, or countenance, or sanction, or encourage any intentional act inconsistent with everything that has yet occurred in my public conduct. But it is not upon these grounds alone that I rely. There have been other incidents in my political career which will enable you to form a satisfactory estimate of my intentions and sentiments. There is not one of you, gentlemen of the jury, who does not, I presume, remember the fearful system of combination which prevailed eight years ago in Dublin. It was by my single exertions that you were enabled to-day—(he dares to say it? Could I not have easily made myself popular with these conductors? I opposed them publicly—I stood alone—I opposed them at the peril of my life; and it was by the exertions of my little band in the Royal Exchange, at which many operatives differing from me in religion and politics attended, to the protection of the police. You will find, too, my perpetual opposition to Ribandism.

But no my condemnation of Ribandism been read over and over again? Have not my warnings to the people—my denunciations to the police, calling upon them to publish the proclamations which I had caused to be published to the world? and, if I were in a conspiracy, should I not have been glad to have been assisted by other conspirators? If my object and my end were iniquitous, should I not have had an advantage in that iniquity by rousing the Ribandmen upon my behalf in the various parts of Ireland? I had great influence, and I could have used it in this particular. You have the fact that I did not do so before you. It has been proved to you over and over again. My discountenancing the Riband societies is notorious—nay, more, my resistance to all secret societies in my constant denunciations of them are before the world. Take these things into your consideration, and say, if you believe in your conscience that the man is a base hypocrite who, without any worldly motive whatever, but adherence to principle, opposed and flung away all the instruments that could tarnish his cause, however useful they might be.

The learned gentleman here travelled over a great many incidents of his political life, in proof of this position. In the course of this excursion he glanced at his opposition to the Poor-law—the evidence of Mr. Bond Hughes (which he highly praised, as having been given in a manly straightforward manner) his repudiation of American slavery—his refusal of co-operation with the republicans of France—and his respect for Henry the Fifth, or whoever should be the legitimate heir to the ancient hereditary monarchy of France; his protest against the Chartists, and his having effectually prevented the Irish in England from joining them and his constant allegiance to the Sovereign. He had come to that time of life when the Queen could do nothing for him, but never had he been disrespectful to majesty; if any such expression had been attributed to him, he denounced it as a falsehood.

I have to complain here (said Mr. O'Connell with emphasis) that I have been badly treated. I mean the learned gentleman (the Attorney-General) no disrespect—I do not wish to be disrespectful—but I tell him that it is utterly false that I ever used such a word as that attributed to me of "Victoria" instead of Majesty. I disclaim, abhor, and hate—despise the man who could use such language to the Sovereign of Majesty. I have never been accused of discourtesy to the gentler sex, who form so much of our happiness; and, least of all, could I apply such terms to one who is as once our beloved Sovereign and of a sex which forms our chief source of consolation. I have detained you longer than I thought, respecting my public conduct. To you I leave it, but having to reserve the consolation of knowing, that though my means may be feeble, my talents confessedly small, and my exertions unflinching, my ardent, my enthusiastic, and burning love of Ireland and of liberty is unquenched; it is a portion of my very vitality, and forms the entire of my political interests.

Here the learned gentleman commenced a regular Repeal speech—gave a history of the Union, and went through all the topics which have made the materials of his public speeches on this question for many months past. He denied that Repeal was a bad or injurious object, and he hoped, before he sat down, to be able to prove to the satisfaction of every man in court—the neutrality of the Bench alone excepted that they should all become Repealers. This declaration excited a laugh, but the honourable and learned gentleman proceeded confidently to fortify his position, and adverted to the period of 1782, and the conduct of the Irish volunteers in demanding and obtaining their country's rights.

The learned gentleman then proceeded to quote a variety of authorities for the purpose of showing that subsequent to the settlement at that period Ireland progressed in prosperity with a rapidity unparalleled in the history of civilized society. He then dedicated at great length the means by which the Union was carried; and after showing the disastrous results which had followed, and flown from the measure, he proceeded to notice and direct the attention of the jury to a protest against the Union, signed by nineteen Irish peers; and in which it was asserted, that the basest means had been adopted by the English Ministry to effect the measure. The learned gentleman then proceeded to show that Ireland had been defrauded in her franchise, in her representation, in her finances, by the Union; and, after referring to the inconvenience to which it led, as demonstrated in the expenses for carrying local or private bills through the Houses of Parliament, and the enormous expense of Irish election petitions, he asked if he had not presented such a picture as would stimulate every honest man to seek for a remedy of the evils the Union had inflicted upon Ireland? The jury had a right to know how he proposed to repeal the Union. He would tell them that he did not contemplate or wish to effect his object by separation. He commenced his political life in 1800, by a speech in Dublin against the Union, and from that period to the present he had been the consistent friend of self-legislation. On that occasion he avowed that he would prefer the re-enaction of the penal code, in all its horrors, to the extinction of Irish nationality; that he would rather throw himself, and the Catholic claims, upon the generosity of his Protestant brethren, than submit to the union of the two countries. In 1810 he had avowed the same sentiments at a public meeting of the citizens of Dublin. There was one thing very strange in this newspaper conspiracy. The Nation had published prose and poetry, the Pilot prose alone. But did the one ever copy the other? On the contrary, was there not great professional jealousy between them? And yet the Attorney-General gravely called on the jury to connect these gentlemen of conspiring with each other, as to the writing and publication of these productions. The learned gentleman next referred to the Arbitration Courts, in the establishment of which he was mainly influenced by a desire to put a stop to profanation of the name of God, by the taking of oaths in the courts of justice. With respect to the means by which the Repeal was to be carried, he had always averred that it was to be carried by peaceful means alone, and in accordance with the rules of the Association before them, which showed that they not only did not contemplate an appeal to physical force, but proved that it was by legal and constitutional agitation that they proposed to restore to Ireland the rights of which she had been defrauded by the Union. The learned gentleman then read an extract from the document put in by the Crown, entitled "A plan for the renewed action of the Irish Parliament;" and contended that it contained nothing but constitutional doctrine; for it not only contained a distinct declaration of allegiance to her Majesty, her heirs, and successors for ever, but every principle which it asserted was in strict accordance with constitutional law. That document was the evidence of the Crown, and on that evidence he called for an acquittal. The learned gentleman then proceeded to show that the Union was unconstitutional, and, in support of this proposition, quoted largely from Locke's work on Government, and the speeches of Sawin, Plunkett, and Bushe, in the Irish Parliament, during the debate on the Union. He adopted the language of Mr. Saurin, and, in that solemn court of justice he declared that "the Union was not binding upon conscience, and that resistance to it was in the abstract a virtue."

The honourable and learned gentleman then went on to say that the Union had the effect of abstracting six millions yearly from Ireland, to be spent by an absentee proprietary; and it was urged that the agitation prevented English capital being sent into the country; but they did not want English capital—leave them their six millions per annum, and they could well afford to dispense with the surplus capital of England. During the last four years £74,000, the produce of the quit-rents of Ireland, had been spent upon the Thames Tunnel and the improvement of Trafalgar-square; they wanted a new bridge over the Liffey in Dublin, and why, he asked, should the £74,000 spent in London not have been devoted to that purpose? He then read a variety of documents, in which a horrible picture was given of Irish misery and destitution; and thus concluded:

The people had not food to eat, although plenty was transported to England. Was there no remedy for such a state of things? Yes, there was; and was the man—were those who sought to alter such circumstances to be hunded as conspirators—were they to be prosecuted and persecuted because, upon public grounds, called on for their country's good, Government, that sent a spot in Ireland more than thirty miles distant from a good harbour—take the map of Ireland—I say there is not a spot more than thirty miles remote from a good harbour, and why is not the country improved? Did I not read to you the magical prosperity which followed upon our legislative independence? Did I not read from the writings of men who were absence to Ireland? Have I not read the evidence of increasing prosperity under our own Parliament? What happened once may happen again. Oh, gentlemen, this is a struggle to rescue the poor from their poverty, and to give employment to those who are now unoccupied, to free the country from the gentry amongst us, for at once their Parliamentary interests would bring them here. An example has been set by the present Ministry in the absentee tax. I leave the case in your hands. I deny I have done anything to stain me. I eyed with contempt the threats of the appellant bar. I have acted boldly in the open day, in the presence of the magistracy—there has been nothing secret or concealed. I have struggled for the restoration of the Parliament of my native country. Others have failed before me, but, succeed or fail, it is a struggle to make the fairest land in the world possess those benefits which nature intended she should enjoy.

The learned gentleman having closed his speech, the court adjourned to ten o'clock on Tuesday.

TWENTIETH DAY.—TUESDAY.

CLOSE OF THE TRAVERSERS' CASE

The Court sat at 10 o'clock, and the arrangements were present except Mr. Burty, of the Nation. The attendance of spectators was but limited.

Mr. Moore, Q.C., addressing the Court, said—The counsel for the traversers have now concluded the case for the defence on behalf of them last night, and they do not think it would be right to go over the evidence in this case which has been already proved. They have come to the conclusion that the facts and circumstances upon which the traversers rely will receive better and fuller defence, already sufficiently appear before your lordships and the jury. They have been under the necessity of bringing a very considerable number of witnesses up to Dublin, who, for the most part, are now in town, but a very considerable number of facts which the counsel for the traversers think are already sufficiently in evidence; they have, therefore, come to the conclusion that they would not be warranted in unnecessarily taking up the time of the Court to prove that which they consider already sufficiently established, and, therefore, I am happy to announce, that, with a few exceptions, the facts are already sufficiently established, and we do not mean to waste the public time in the remaining evidence to be adduced.

Frederick William Conway, Esq., the proprietor of the Evening Post, was examined by Mr. Hatchell, and stated, that in 1810 he was editor of the Freeman's Journal, and in that year he acted as secretary to a meeting held at the Exchange, in order to petition for a Repeal of the Union. Sir James Riddle, the High Sheriff, was in the chair; the father of the Recorder was also present, and a number of respectable citizens. (The witness here proved the general accuracy of a speech made on that occasion by Mr. O'Connell). In 1830 the Evening Post was the property of Mr. Magee. There was in it a report of a meeting, held in that year, to express hostility to the Union, and Mr. O'Connell expressed his sentiments on the subject; the name of witness was to an address from a Committee of which Mr. Shaw, the representative of Dublin, presided in the year 1810, and expressive of hostility to the Union; witness also read the answers of those two gentlemen, which Mr. Sheil had stated in his speech; witness was a member of the Catholic Association.

Mr. James Perry was called, to prove the rules of the Society of Friends, in reference to arbitration; and read a rule of the Quakers in 1696, recommending their members to have their cases referred to arbitrators; and in 1797 they recommended that any member should be expelled who did not obey the award of the Friends. Those rules were uniformly acted upon. Witness had a case in the Court of arbitration of the Royal Galley, and Mr. Brewster pleaded before it. (Laughter.)

Mr. William Corgave, a solicitor, deposed that he was secretary to the Angel Gaiety Chapel, since 1810; when an arbitration was referred to the case—he signed a printed deed of submission; the members consisted of forty, and the mercantile body it was which generally submitted their disputes to those gentlemen, sometimes lodged from three to four guineas each for the expenses of the arbitration.

Cross-examined by Mr. Bennett: It was open for any one who had a dispute to go before the gentlemen; there were no meetings held.

Mr. Charles Vernon, Registrar of Newspapers, was next examined, to prove several speeches of Mr. O'Connell and others in 1841, which, the traversers were of opinion, mitigated the strong language used in other addresses.

William Morgan, examined by Mr. Hatchell.—I reside at Tullamore, and follow the business of a coachmaker; I can perfectly remember the meeting held at Tullamore, on the 16th of July last, and know where Mr. Dease's house is in that town; on the morning of the meeting, at ten o'clock, I saw an arch across the street; there was a motto on the arch, "Ireland and her Parliament; not the world in a blaze." I assisted in taking down that motto; I know Mr. Steele; but he did not speak to me at the moment the arch was taken down; Mr. Steele ordered it to be taken down, and said he did so at the instance of Mr. O'Connell, who was very much annoyed at having been put up at all.

Cross-examined.—I heard there was a committee to get up the meeting; Mr. Dean, from whose house the arch was suspended, was a painter; the arch was erected in the front of the chapel. There was a large attendance at the chapel that day. Mr. Dean is in town, and came up with me.

Sir Colman O'Loghlen gave in evidence the resolutions adopted at several meetings to petition Parliament for a Repeal of the Union.

After the examination of Mr. Vernon, the traversers' counsel applied to allow the Rev. Mr. Power to be examined the next day. He was unwell, and had not yet arrived in town.

The person who served the subpœna stated that he only went down on Saturday to effect service.

Their lordships were of opinion that the trial could not be delayed because service had been effected so lately on Mr. Power.

Mr. Fitzgibbon said, that what he would have been examined to was the letter on "the duty of a soldier," which Mr. Power was ready to swear.

Mr. Moore, Q.C., having consulted with the other counsel, said that the evidence for the traversers had closed.

TWENTY-FIRST DAY.—WEDNESDAY.

The Solicitor-General commenced his reply on Wednesday morning, immediately after the sitting of the Court, and occupied the entire day. His speech is a most able and argumentative one, replete with legal knowledge, and more impressive from its absence of all personality, while at the same time he dwells in earnest language on the facts which appear in evidence. For upwards of three hours he adverted to the various arguments used by the counsel for the traversers, and gave his answer to each of them succinctly and clearly. He then entered into a chronological detail of the facts which the Crown relies on, as establishing the several steps in the "conspiracy," which they charge to have been in existence since March last, at least.

TWENTY-SECOND DAY.—THURSDAY.

The Court sat at the usual hour (ten o'clock), and the Solicitor-General immediately resumed his speech, and with the utmost clearness continued his observations on the several proceedings which formed links in the conspiracy—the subject of the prosecution. At five o'clock, when the Court adjourned, the learned gentleman had brought down his comments to a meeting held at the Association in March 1843. We regret that want of space obliges us to omit even a summary of the arguments in our present edition, but we will endeavour to do justice to it at the close. The learned gentleman was to resume his address on Saturday morning.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

Amongst the important arrivals which may shortly be expected in our metropolis, no less a person may be looked for than one rejoicing in the designation of General Tom Thumb. His son of the west is on his way to the Old World, with letters introductory to the Court of St. James's. The General is only twelve years of age, his height is 23 inches, and he weighs but fifteen pounds. The General is very handsome, and a great favourite with the ladies, who have made several attempts to clope with him. His parents are persons of the ordinary height, and he has two sisters, fine full-grown girls.

It is stated upon the best authority, that Capt. Howard will accept the Chiltern Hundreds, and that Lord Morpeth will, in a day or two, issue an address to the electors of Morpeth, as a candidate for their suffrages.

The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have this week promulgated an order that no tobacco is to be issued to seamen or mariners on board ship, while in port, in consequence of the enormous extent to which smuggling in that article has lately been carried on.

Accounts from the Havannah, state that, in the interest of the planters, a considerable reduction has taken place there in the export duty upon sugar and coffee, and that the export duty upon rum and molasses has been entirely suppressed.

It is stated in a letter from Vienna, of Jan. 23, that the Count d'Atoms, an aged resident at Goritz, had been found murdered in his cabinet. As the old had been robbed, the cause is ascribed to private vengeance.

The High Sheriff of Gloucester has refused to convene an anti-vaccination meeting, on the ground that its avowed objects appeared to be not so much to give the inhabitants of the county an opportunity of expressing their sentiments, as to listen to the arguments of strangers.

The term being up for clearing away the land lately purchased by the Crown, at Old Ford and Bethnal Green, for the commencement of the new park, the Crown took possession of them and the unexpired property on Monday last.

From Rome we learn that copper-plate engraver, Signor Lanzaronolo, has discovered a method of fixing on the lithographic stone the images obtained by the daguerreotype; so that a large number of impressions can be taken on the instant.

It is rumoured that there is a company projected for establishing a regular line of packets between New York and Hull.

We understand that the system of "day tickets" is about to be adopted at the London and Birmingham Railway—thus enabling persons to go and return at a reduction of one-third from the ordinary fares. The plan has succeeded admirably on other lines.

On Monday, 22d ult., George Wharton, the oldest man in Yorkshire, paid the last debt of nature, having attained the patriarchal age of one hundred and twelve years.

Tuesday last witnessed the completion and opening to the public of the railway between London and Dover. It was resolved by the inhabitants, by public hall assembled, that the event should be commemorated by a public dinner, to be given by the Corporation.

By the last accounts from Berlin, we learn that the physicians of the Queen of Prussia have announced that her Majesty is in full convalescence, and that no further bulletins will be published.

The Lords' Select Committee, appointed on Monday, to consider the laws affecting gaming, &c., and to report thereon, are the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President, the Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Winchester, the Marquis of Normanby, the Earl of Eldon, the Earl of Ripon, Lord Foley, Lord Brougham, Lord Stratford, Lord Montcagle, and Lord Campbell.

The police constables have received instructions that during the frosty weather they are to assist the inhabitants in every possible way, in order to have the pavements, &c., opposite their dwellings cleared of the snow before their doors, under the penalties of the Act of Parliament, in order to prevent accidents.

His Excellency Boghos Youssoufl Bey, Minister of Foreign Affairs and of Commerce to Mohammed Ali, Viceroy of Egypt, died in the afternoon of the 10th ultimo, at the age of about 72.

The mail guard says that the snow is very deep in many parts of the country, and several of the canals frozen over, so as to prevent the free navigation.

The Mary Sharp, the first regular line of Post-office packet ships for New South Wales, sailed from Gravesend last week for Sydney, carrying out all letters which were posted at the General Post-office up to Thursday evening.

On Saturday last Major Charles Fitzroy, of the Lower Foundation, was installed as Governor, during divine service, in St. George's Chapel. The Rev. W. Canning was the Canon in residence, who admonished the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. The new Governor was then led to his stall by the two senior Knights, Captain Alien and Captain Flemming.

Mr. Merewether, of the Western Circuit, has been appointed Recorder of Devizes.

A letter from Rome (20th ult.) states that the apprehensions which were entertained of the Carnival being interdicted are dissipated. The Governor of Rome, M. Zucchia, has issued a decree, allowing it to take place according to ancient custom.

On Tuesday evening the Old Steyne, at Brighton, was lighted with a Bude light, which produced a brilliant effect for some fifty yards round. It is erected opposite the statue of George the Fourth.

The Committee of the last Birmingham Musical Festival, has recently paid over to the General Hospital nearly three thousand pounds, being the amount realised by the late meeting in that city.

Mademoiselle Fanny Elssler has addressed a letter to the Débats declaring that certain articles, published periodically in London, under the name of "Fanny Elssler at Barnsley," were never written by her—that they are the production of some illicit speculation, and that they are calculated to seriously injure her, from the ridiculous turn of the language, and the inexactitude of the facts.

The ball which was to have taken place at the Tuileries having been countermanded, the Queen ordered the various dishes at meat prepared for the supper to be distributed among the hospitals of charity on the following day. This division took place on Monday, when 2501b. of meat was sent for the poor to each bureau.

At Guildhall, on Tuesday, Mr. Alderman Gibbs was unanimously elected Chairman of the Commission of Sewers for the ensuing year.

A select dinner party, consisting of noblemen and gentlemen connected with the Fox Club, took place on Saturday, at Brooke's. Among those present were Lord Macclesfield, the Earl of Ilchester, Lord Ferrers, Lord Sawley, Lord Holland, Lord Duncannon, Lord John Russell, M.P., Lord Strafford, the Hon. Col. Ponsonby, M.P., Lord James Stuart, M.P., and the Hon. Fox Maule, M.P.

A chair which has been in Mr. O'Connell's family for 300 years was received a few days since at Washington, as a present from the great agitator to Mr. Robert Tyler. The President of the United States was the first person to sit in it.

It will surprise those interested in the coal trade to learn that the quantity delivered last month is nearly double that delivered in the corresponding month of 1843. In January, 1843, 119,618 tons were imported, whilst the quantity for January, 1844, appears to be 220,603! Of these, 96,917 tons were from the Tyne; 54,583 from the Wear; 47,707 from the Tees, and the residue from Yorkshire, Wales, and Scotland.

Her Majesty's Government has issued a free pardon to Valentine Marshall, the man who was convicted and transported for life by Mr. Justice Coleridge at the special reform riot commission, at Nottingham, in 1831, for setting fire to Colwick Hall, the seat of John Musters, Esq., Nottinghamshire, and from the effects of which Mrs. Musters, the famous "Mary" of Lord Byron, met with her death in the shrubbery.

We have been requested to contradict officially a statement which has appeared in some of the daily and provincial journals, to the effect that convict labour is about to be employed in all the Government establishments, and that other labourers are to be taken in their stead.

Letters received from Varna (in Turkey) mention the total destruction of that city, by which a loss of four millions of piastres has been caused.

Incendiarism is very much on the increase in Essex and Suffolk, scarcely a night passing in which some intentional destruction of farm buildings and stock does not take place.

The new Plenipotentiary to China, John Francis Davis, Esq., resides at Hollywood-house, near Henbury. This is the second appointment to China from the neighbourhood of Bristol.

An edition of the Italian poet Boccaccio, printed at Venice in 1471, has been purchased by Lord Spencer, at Rome, for a thousand pounds.

A notion having gone abroad that the Mint intends calling in the silver coin and issuing new coin in its place, we can positively assert that there is no intention of the kind. The Mint is merely coining to an increased demand for silver consequent upon the discredit which has lately been thrown upon the gold currency.

Monsieur Jullien intends opening Vauxhall Gardens in the ensuing summer.

The Presbytery of Edinburgh have suspended and deprived the Rev. James Hamilton, the present minister of the Scotch Church, Regent-square, London, and declared him no longer capable of holding any preferment in the Church of Scotland, or in connection with it.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—FRIDAY.—We have had but few arrivals of English wheat up to our markets this week, while the show of samples of that article here to day was small. All kinds met a steady sale at full the prices of Monday. The trade with the Essex and Kent was firm at previous rates. There was a good display of barley samples. Superfine malting qualities sold freely, other kinds slowly at late currencies. The malt trade was comparatively steady at full prices. All other kinds of grain were quite as dear.

ARRIVALS.—English—Wheat, 2380; barley, 8280; oats, 2230 quarters. Irish—barley 300; oats, 1470 quarters. Flour, 2000 sacks. Malt, 3230 quarters.

English—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 42s to 48s; ditto white, 50s to 55s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 42s to 45s; ditto white, 45s to 48s; rye, 28s to 30s; grinding barley, 22s to 23s; distilling ditto, 26s to 31s; malting ditto, 32s to 38s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 60s to 65s; brown ditto, 52s to 55s; Kingston and Ware, 60s to 65s; Chevalier, 65s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire malt, 51s to 57s; potatoe ditto, 37s to 37s; Tweedal and Cork, black, 19s to 19s; ditto white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 28s to 34s; ditto, old, 34s to 36s; grey peas, new, 28s to 30s; ditto white, 32s to 36s; Indian corn, 30s to 32s per quarter. Flour—ship, 23s to 30s; Suffolk, — to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 38s to 40s, per 20 lbs. Foreign—Free wheat, 40s to 46s; Dantzic, red, 40s to 43s; ditto white, 46s to 48s. In Bond—Barley, 28s to 30s; oats, new, 17s to 18s; ditto feed, 21s to 24s; beans, 34s to 36s; peas, new, — per quarter. Flour, Americ, 21s to 23s; Baltic, 21s to 22s, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—There has been very little doing in any kind of seeds since our last per prices are supported.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 50s to 60s; Baltic crushing, 28s to 37; Mediterranean and Odessa, 28s to 32s; hempseed, 28s to 35s per quarter. Coriander, 15s to 18s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 12s to 13s; white 4ditto, 10s to 16s; tares, 40s to 44s per bushel; English rapeseed, — to —; ditto 36s per last of 10 quarters; linseed cakes, English, 8l to 10l per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s to 5l 10s per ton; coriander, 9s to 10s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 8½d to 9d; of household ditto, 6½d to 8d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Averages.—Wheat, 52s 6d; barley, 32s 4d; oats, 18s 11d; rye, 33s 10d; beans 35s 8d; peas, 36s 6d.

The Sale Averages of the week ending Christmas Day.—Wheat, 51s 2d; barley, — 0d; oats, 18s 8d; rye, 32s 2d, beans, 35s 9d; peas, 36s 10d.

Potatoes. Wheat, 10s; barley, —; oats, 8s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 11s 6d; peas, 10s 6d.

Tea.—There has been a very steady demand for all descriptions of tea this week, and the prices are supported in every instance. At public sale on Tuesday, 5,000 packages of tea were offered, out of which 1200 were sold, at very full rates. The stock is now 300 360 pounds larger than at the same time in 1843. The quantity on which duty has been paid in London, Liverpool, Hull, and Leith, this year, to the 31st ultimo, was 2,767,000 pounds, against 2,885,408 pounds last year to the same period.

Sugar.—The market has been steadily supported with fair colory parcels of raw sugar, owing to which, full prices have been realized in every instance. In other qualities not much business has been transacted.

Coffee.—Ceylon and British plantation coffee has been in demand, at full quotations, but in other kinds exceedingly little has been doing.

Cocoa.—The article is still dull, and sells at barely late rates.

Fruit.—The stock of all kinds of fruit is very small. Cephalonia and Zante currants are held at 45s to 50s. Valencia raisins, 44s to 48s per cwt.

Oils.—The demand for cocoa nut oil is dull, and prices are quite 1s per cwt. lower. Linseed oil is in good request, at full quotations

Tallow.—In Russia tallow a fair business has been done, at full prices, or at 41s on the spot. For forward delivery little is doing, at 41s 6d to 42s 0d.

Wool.—The supply of new hops coming continues small, and most of the large growers are out of market, the demand for such is active at very full prices. Indeed, in some instances, West of Kent, in pockets, have commanded 2s. per cwt. more money. In old hops a good business is doing, at the late improvements in their currencies. The rates paid for-day, for new hops, were as follow:—Weald of Kent pockets, 48s to 4l 5s; Mid Kent, 4l 1s to 4l 10s; East Kent, 4l 15s to 5l; Sussex, 4l 0s to 4l 15s; Farnham, 4l 15s to 5l 15s; Mid Kent bags, 4l 12s to 4l 18s. Wool—The public sales have gone off with considerable spirit, whereby the value of the quantity of wool offered having found buyers, at an advance of 1d to 1½d per lb

Waterford.—Most kinds of potatoes are in good supply and steady demand, while the prices range from 4l 10s to 5l 5s per ton.

Smithfield.—The supply of beasts on sale here to-day was but moderate as to number—and for the best part of middling and inferior quality. As heads of beef, however, the demand was in a very depressed state, and Monday's prices were with difficulty supported There was a very small number of sheep in the pens, owing to which the mutton trade was active at very full rates, and at which, a clearance was readily effected. Calves were in full average supply, and heavy demand, at a depression of from 2d to 4d per 8lbs. In pigs little was doing, at new quotations. The following Mowed of the top prices of the week:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 8d to 3s 10d; second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; prime large oxen, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 10d to 4s; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; second quality ditto, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 8d to 4s; prime Southdowns ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 6d; large coarse calves, 3s 10d to 4s 2d; prime small ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 10d; large hogs, 3s 2s to 3s 6d; neat small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s; sucking calves, 18s to 2l; quarter-old store pigs, 16s to 21s each. Beasts, 968; cows, 130; sheep, 2060; calves, 164, pigs, 236.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—I nine qualities of meat sold freely, and other kinds slowly, on the following prices Inferior beef, 3s 2d to 3s 4; middling ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime ditto, 3s 10d to 4s; inferior mutton, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; ditto small ditto, 3s 8d to 3s 4d; large pork, 2s 8d to 3s 4d, inferior ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 10d to 4s; small ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 8d, Veal, 3s 6d to 4s 8d; small porkers, 3s 4d to 4s; per 8lbs by the carcass.

ROBERT HERBERT

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

Since the turn of the year the foreign demand for manufactured goods has given increased employment to our productive labourers. For our North American possessions, the promissory duties imposed on the introduction of British goods into the United States, render the demand for them at present more than doubly active, for the wants of the needy republic cannot be supplied in a hurry from the country this channel by smuggling is done. Likewise imposed by the different European Powers, are now producing consequences wholly favourable to our manufacturing interests. The value of our export trade consequently continues to exceed that of our imports, and, therefore, to the extent of the balance drawn from hence on foreign merchants continues to increase in difficulty. On the Royal Exchange, last foreign post day, the supply of bills was again larger than the wants of remitters required, and the rates of the exchanges consequently render a further importation of bullion impossible into the country, unless absolutely necessary to meet the balances of our foreign commerce. Thus is capital weekly on the increase in this country, which is effectively profitably to employ it in proportionately increasing. In the shape of advance our late transactions in the money concerns, especially amounts to a considerable result, for notwithstanding the numerous new undertakings of the same description, which have been lately submitted to the public for their approval, and notwithstanding the inquiry which the Legislature is about to institute into the manner in which those in existence are managed, the value of all of them has been well supported throughout this week to the end of the month, and the value of all of them has been well supported throughout this week many of them, and the value of all of them has been well supported throughout this week The Foreign Stock Exchange also, much business has been again done, chiefly for the actual investment of money, and the demand for Austrian, Belgian, and Rhenish securities, has been to very considerable, that they are severally at least two per cent. higher than we noted in the week of our public securities. Consols are 2 per cent. lower, while India Stock has advanced to 280, in consequence of the favourable nature of the last advices from Bombay. Bank stock, our London shares of the London and Westminster Bank, and of the Union Bank of London, a further improvement has also occurred, and, on the whole, the money trade continues in a sound and healthy condition in all its departments.

BRITISH FUNDS.—Bank Stock, 192½ to 192¾; 3 per Cent. Reduced, 99½ to 99¾; 3 per Cent. Consols, 99¾ to 99¾; 3½ per Cent. Reduced, 103½ to 103¾; 3½ per Cent. New, 103 to 103¼; 5 per Cents, 120¾; South Sea Stock, 99¾; India Stock, 278¾ to 280; India Bonds, 84½ pm.; Exchequer Bills, 61¾ to 62¾ pm.; Consols for Account, 99¾; Colonial Bank, 11¾; London and Westminster Bank, 34¾; Union Bank of London, 14¾; Australian Joint Stock Bank, 15¾; British North American Bank, 40; Union of Australia, — to —; Canada Company, 21¾ to 22¾.

FOREIGN STOCKS AND SHARES.—Spanish Fives, 23½; Spanish Threes, — to —; Portuguese Converted, 48¾; Five, 79 ½; Minutes 34¾ to 35; Dutch 2½ per C — to —; Dutch Fives, 101½; Danish, 86 to 88; Colombian, 15¾ 2 to 15; Venezuela, 20 to 21; Buenos Ayres, 73 to 73; Belgian 101; Buenos Ayres, 81; Austrian Bonds, 113 to 116, Peruvian, 3-4, Russian, 118 to 119½; French 5 per Cents, 81. 80c, ex 85c. 50c.

PRICES OF SHARES IN JOINT STOCK ASSOCIATIONS.—Birmingham and Derby, — to —; Bunkhead Railway, 8; Birmingham and Gloucester, 70. Eastern Counties, 10¾, new 12¾; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 60 to —; Great North of England, 91 to 92 Gravesend and Chatham, 25; Great Western, 89; Grimsby, London and Brighton, 48 to 47 to 45¾; South Western, 77 to 78; London and Croydon Trunk, 18¾; London and Greenwich, 9¾; Lancaster and Carlisle, 58 to 60; Manchester and Leeds, 115¾ to 118; Midland Counties, 89¾; Norwich and Yarmouth, 17 to 18¾; Paris and Orleans, 87¾; Paris and Rouen, 29¾, Rouen and Havre, 14¾, South Eastern and Dover, Scrip, 9¾; York and North Midland, New, 87 to 88, Ord, 128; Hull and Selby, 80 to 81; North Midland, — to —; Birmingham Stock, 240 to 242; Manchester and Birmingham, — to —; Northern and Eastern, 21 pm.

THE LONDON GAZETTE.

TUESDAY, FEB 6.

BANKRUPTCIES.—HENRY TISOE, Hertford, carpenter.—FRANCIS HILLAM, Cambridge-terrace, Edgware-road, stonemerchant.—NOEL THOMAS SMITH, Jun., Lime-street, City, stockbroker.—THOMAS GEORGE HIGGINS, Trentham Wells, stonemason.—THOMAS WHITE, Regent-street, Marylebone, lace dealer.—ROBERT BONE, Hatton-garden, jeweller.—JOHN HARDLEY, Newport, Hampshire, miller.—CHARLES MILNTON, Southampton, grocer.—MARY OGSTON, Dames-street, Berkeley square, widow —JOSEPH ROGER, Ilminster, draper.—THOMAS GREGORY, Pudsey, Wilts, shire, miller.—CHARLES RESSEY, Stamford, miller.—RICHARD CHAPMAN, Scarton, Yorkshire, innkeeper.—JOHN and GEORGE EWART, Newcastle upon-Tyne, merchants.—GILBERT WALTON, Stockton-on-Tees, wine merchant.—SAMUEL BLACKBURN, Rotherhead, Chiswick, woollen-draper.—MATTHEW TILDESLEY, Porto Bello, Stafford-shire, tumber-dealer

SCOTCH SEQUESTRATIONS.—R. P. M'BRAIR and D JOHNSTONE, [illegible] gow, engineers.—A. OPPENHEIM, Edinburgh, leading-plate manufacturer.—R. M'FIE, Thornhill, Dumfriesshire, tanner.—G. I [illegible] and J. WILSON, Glasgow, baker.—C. M'ALPINE, Glasgow, ship-smith.—J. HOWIE, Milton, horse-[illegible]

BANKRUPTCIES SUPERSEDED.—J. W. THOMAS, silk warehouseman, Milk-street, [illegible].—J. COULSON, and H. PHIPPS, shipping commissioners, Clement's-lane, Lombard-street.

DIVIDENDS.—J. M'MINN, [illegible] Lane Penetentiary.—J. SCOTT, apothecary, Mount Pleasant, Clerkenwell.—J. [illegible] and C. [illegible], Manchester, warehousemen, Queen-street.—C. TREASDALE and R. TOULSON, Gresham-st. warehousemen, Warwick-square, Warwick-street.—N. LEONARD, butcher, Frances-street, Golden-square.—W. LEWIS, banker, Bristol.—J. ALDRED, stationer, Nottingham.

BIRTHS.

At Florence, the lady of Charles Monro, Esq., of a still-born son.—At 21, Banks-town, Sheerness, the lady of Joseph R. Starritt, Esq., surgeon, her Majesty's ship Ocean, of a son, still-born.—At Guildford-street, Russell-square, Mrs. Stafford Brandiles, of a daughter.—At the Terrace, Upper Clapton, Mrs. W. Hurd, of a daughter.—At the Grove, Southwark, Mrs. Jones Dain, of a son.—At Poona, the lady of Lieutenant Henry Russell, Assistant of the 3rd Regiment of Bombay Native Infantry, of a son.—At Grove-terrace, Kentish-town, the wife of W. L. Cope, Esq., of a son.—At Greenlands, Buckinghamshire, the wife of George Jackson, Esq., of a son.—At Kensington, the lady of Captain Barlow, of the 52nd Regiment, of a daughter.—At Sevenoaks-street, Totnam, to Henry Bent, of a daughter.—At No. 3, Upper Woburn-place, the wife of William T. Thornton, Esq., of Midfield-lane, Highgate-hill, of a son.—At Hastings, the lady of E. Fuller, Esq., of a son At Cheltenham, the wife of the Rev. H. Jenkins, of a daughter.—At Framlingham, Suffolk, the wife of W. Waring, Esq., of a son.—At No. 7, Cavendish-square, the lady of Edward Marcenbanks, jun., Esq., of a son.—At No. 7, Park-crescent, the wife of W. Forsyth, Esq., barrister, of a daughter.

MARRIAGES

At the parish church of Halifax, Courtney Kenny Clarke, Esq., Haughend, to Delia Prestly Edwardes, eldest daughter of H. L. Edwardes, Esq., Pye-nest.—At Shaw Church, the Rev. Caleb Williams, M.A., incumbent of Saxon-near Seaton, to Henry Elsworth, third daughter of the Rev. Thomas Heathcote, of Shaw-hill-house, Wilts.—At St. James's Church, the Rev. C. S. Exeter, Rector of Kutterford, Somerset, to Sarah Ann Young.—At Lanternam Church, Captain Cumberlege, of the 91st Regiment Madras Native Infantry, to Amy, daughter of John James, Esq., Llantarnam-cottage, Monmouthshire.—At St. Peter's Church, Albert Pannier, Esq., youngest son of Louis Pannier, Esq., of Boulogne-sur-Mer, to Matilda, second daughter of William Oliver, Esq., of Fitzroy-square —At the Church of St. James's, Bermondsey, Henry R. Watts, Limeside's son fields, to Mary Thomas, only daughter of Mr. William Fawcett, of Cruiscott-street, Bermondsey.—At St. Mary's, Paddington, Charles Main, eldest son of Charles Worthington, Evesham, Heath, Esq., to Helen Mary, youngest daughter of Hugh Hume Hume Campbell, of Ramsbury, Wilts.—At [illegible] to Mary Louisa, second daughter of Mr. John Bennett, of Russell-square.—At [illegible] Mr. Henry Jones, to Miss Sarah Ann Wood,

Price 15s. in cloth, or 18s. in morocco, gilt edges,

THE SHORT-HAND NEW TESTAMENT.

By GEORGE ODELL.

London: G. ODELL, 18, Princes-street, Cavendish-square; and R. GROOMBRIDGE, Paternoster-row.

Also, ODELL'S SYSTEM OF SHORT-HAND (Taylor's improved). 30th Edition, price only 9d. Sent free for 11 Postage Stamps.

THE CHEAPEST GEOGRAPHY FOR CHILDREN,

With Two new Coloured Maps, price 9d.

WHITTAKER'S IMPROVED EDITION of PINNOCK'S CATECHISM of GEOGRAPHY, greatly enlarged and remodelled, by G. H. SMITH, Esq., and illustrated by 10 Maps. Price 9d., sewed.

"Considering the number and excellence of its illustrations, and the quantity of information conveyed in it, this is certainly the cheapest school book we know of. It is admirably arranged by one evidently profoundly acquainted with his subject, and has been remodelled to the scientific view now taken of the subject."—"Monthly Magazine."

The CATECHISM, on the original Plan, (corrected to the present time), and illustrated with Nine Maps, can also be had, price 9d.

WHITTAKER and Co., Ave Maria-lane, London; and of all Booksellers in the United Kingdom.

PHILLIPS'S FIRST BOOKS FOR CHILDREN, in 18mo. sewed.

The LONDON PRIMER. By Mrs. PEAKE. 96th edition, 6d.

The FIRST CATECHISM of USEFUL KNOWLEDGE. By Mrs. PEAKE and D. BLAIR. 342d edition, 9d.

ROSSUT'S FRENCH and ENGLISH WORD BOOK, 1s.

ROSSUT'S FRENCH and ENGLISH PHRASE-BOOK, 1s.

ROSSUT'S FIRST FRENCH GRAMMAR, 2s. 6d. cloth.

ROSSUT'S EXERCISES in FRENCH SYNTAX, 3s.

ROSSUT'S ITALIAN WORD-BOOK, 1s.

ROSSUT'S ITALIAN PHRASE and IDIOM-BOOK, 1s.

ROSSUT'S LATIN WORD BOOK, 1s.

BLAIR'S ENGLISH GRAMMAR, with many Hundred Questions and Exercises, systematically arranged. Price 2s. 6d. bound ADAIR'S QUESTIONS on MURRAY'S GRAMMAR. 18mo., 1s. sewed.

WHITTAKER and Co., Ave Maria-lane.

PHILLIPS'S GEOGRAPHICAL and ASTRONOMICAL WORKS for SCHOOLS.

GOLDSMITH'S GEOGRAPHICAL COPY BOOKS; or, Outline Maps to be filled up by Pupils. In two parts. The first giving the outlines of countries, and the second only the lines of lat. and long., with tables, &c. Oblong 4to. Price 3s. 6d. each, sewed. The same, on a larger scale, for room in writing. Price 5s. 6d.

ATLASES, to accompany the Copy-books. Demy 4to., 2s. 6d. plain, and 3s. 6d. coloured; royal 12s. plain.

PRIOR'S VOYAGES ROUND the WORLD, with 100 Engravings. 20th edition, 18mo., 3s. 6d.

GOLDSMITH'S GRAMMAR of BRITISH GEOGRAPHY, with Maps and Views. 18mo., 4s. 6d. bound.

CLARKE'S HUNDRED WONDERS of the WORLD, with 100 Engravings. 47th edition, 12mo., 10s. 6d. bound.

EQUIER'S GRAMMAR of ASTRONOMY, and the PHENOMENA of the HEAVENS. New Nor 18mo., 7s. 6d. bound, with numerous Engravings.

SHAW'S ATLAS of NATURE, with several hundred Engravings and brief descriptions. Folio, 6s.

BLAIR'S PRACTICAL GRAMMAR of the ELEMENTS of NATURAL PHILOSOPHY. 18mo., with numerous Engravings and Wood cuts, 4s. 6d. bound.

NICOLSON'S TABLES of LOGARITHMS, from 1 to 10,000. Also, of Logarithmic Sines, Tangents, and Secants, and Co-Sines, Co-Tangents, and Co-Secants, with Natural Sines and Co-Sines. 8vo., 5s. boards.

Whittaker and Co., Ave Maria-lane.

BY COMMAND. UNDER THE SPECIAL PATRONAGE OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT.

THE SPORTING REVIEW for FEBRUARY, 1844, is beautifully embellished with TWO SPLENDID STEEL ENGRAVINGS, viz.—

Plate I.—PUDICITIAE, engraved by S. Hacker, from a Painting by J. F. Herring, sen. And Plate II.—WILD FOWL SHOOTING IN THE HEBRIDES BY MOONLIGHT, Designed and Engraved by H. Beckwith.

Contents:—Hyde Marston, or Recollections of a Sportsman's Life, by the Editor, Chapter XXXVI. Notice Vexatia, by E. T. Vyner, Esq. The Horse of the Days of Good Sporting Fergusonians; the Duke of Rutland's, Duke of Beaufort's, Lord Redesdale's, and Lord Gifford's Hounds, by Robin Hood. The Horse and the Hound, by Trasby. Sporting Writers. Thomas Smith, Esq., late Master of the Craven Hounds, by Nimrod. Wild Sports in the West, by P. St. John, Esq. The Stud Chase, by Cuthbert W. Johnson, Esq. Memoirs of W. K. Taggart. The Life of a Jockey, by Lord William Lennox. A Day on the Irish Mountains, by Silvanus. The Horse and his Management at Home and Abroad, by H. D. Richardson, E.S.P.S.S. Stallions for the Season. Angling in February, by Piscator. Hunting Menus, by Rightway. Public Amusements of the Metropolis. State of the Odds, &c. Turf Register: Redman, Leicester, Beaconsfield, Oxford, Redditch, Bedford, Lee Bridge, Lincoln, Monmouth, Hastings and St. Leonard's, Perth, Liverpool Autumn Meeting, Royal Caledonian Hunt and Wanderers Hunt and Steeplechases, Lesser, Game, &c. Description of Mr. Alexander's Draining Plough. The Currency; by C. F. Bancks. Richmondshire Farmer's Club. On Bringing Land into Cultivation; by Mr. Peter Anderwood. Cornwall Agricultural Association. On the Form and True Principles of Breeding Demonstrated Accurately; by George Vasey, Nottingham Farmer's Club. Mr. Hudson's Remarks on the Farmers' best Friend—the Mixen; by a Friend to Agriculture. Prestwood Agricultural Meeting. Burton-upon-Trent Farmers' Club. On the Possibility of Growing Wheat Economically and Profitably on the Same Land for Many Years in Succession; by Mr. Manshardt, and the Currency: Five Letters to Sir Robert Peel. Dawson and Haines's Report of the Liverpool Wool Trade. Hughes and Rogers's Report of the Smithfield Cattle Trade. Roads and Husbandry. Frobus Farmers' Club. Maidstone Farmers' Club. Pleasant Prospect to the Farmer on the Repeal of the Corn Laws. Wrexham Farmers' Club. Reports of New Books. On the Agricultural Improvements of Lincolnshire; by Philip Pusey, M.P.—Books. On the Agricultural Improvements of Lincolnshire; by Philip Pusey, M.P.—(From the Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society of England.) Carpetow Farmers' Club. On Artificial and other Manures. Agricultural Queries. Answers to Agricultural Queries. General Agricultural Report for January. Calendar of Horticulture for February. Stallions for the Season. Racing Calendar. Sporting Memoranda for January. Prices of Grass, Seeds, Hops, Potatoes, Provisions, Wool, Manures, &c. Prices of Shares.

Office, 34, Norfolk-street, Strand; and may be had of all booksellers.

THE NEW MONTHLY BELLE ASSEMBLEE for FEBRUARY, a Fashionable and Literary Magazine, under the immediate patronage of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, is beautifully illustrated with highly-finished Portraits of the Nobility, accurately coloured in the costume of the Month, combined in the first style, as they arrive from Paris.

Contents:—St. Valentine's Day, by W. G. J. Barker, Esq. To the Snow drop. The Water-spirit, by Elizabeth Yeoatt. Sonnet, by Emily Bird. Minor Morals, by Miss Camilla Toulmin. The Lay of the Lurley Maid, by Angus Bethune Reach. "The old Storm King," by George Lambert Bankes. Fashion and Aristocracy, Farewell to Love, by E. Gladstone. A Sister's Memory, by Grace Gordon. Hints for Pictures, by Miss Camilla Toulmin. Woe is the World, by Leigh Hunt. Mrs. Wyndham Portrait Gallery. No. II. Caleb Campbell. The Cousins, by Myrtha. Lines on the Death of Mr. t. by Mrs. S. M. Song of Exile, by Richard Lapalum. Song of the Moon by Night, by Egbert. The Overture, by Miss Anna Bayard. "Our End is Near," by Eglantine Charles Wilett: a Tale of the Revolution. The Forsaken, by Silasbeth. The Spectral Hand. The Proud Lodge. Sc. Elmo. An Impromptu to Nature. Poetical Portraits, No. III, by Morris Lemington. "The One I love so Well," by Ada. Broken Vows: a Legend of the Twelfth Century. "Best Friends." Our Mutual Table. La Revue Musicale. Anniversaries of the Month. Fashions for February. Description of the Plates. Parisian Sketches. To Correspondents.

"The Magazine should find its way into every drawing-room in the kingdom." The News. "In every respect well worthy the distinguished patronage conferred on the work." —Review Gazette. "Is entitled to the fashionable world."—Reading Mercury. "This elegant and amusing periodical deserves well the patronage of the female sex." Newcastle Courant.

May be had, by order, of all booksellers. Office, 24, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.

ADVANTAGEOUS INVESTMENT for CAPITAL at 5 per cent. payable half yearly.—To be Sold, by Private Contract, a Mortgage for £2,000, secured in a Brewery and Twenty-one Public Houses, and Premises (besides other property), of more than double the value of the Mortgage, situate in the immediate neighbourhood of Southampton; the premises may be inspected, and further particulars had, of Mr. Joseph Hall, 105, High-street, Southampton, or to E. B. Butler, Esq., 7, Furnival's Inn, London

CHAPPED HANDS. J. and E. ATKINSON beg respectfully to recommend their COLD CREAM for Softening the Skin, and preventing its Chapping. It is prepared of the finest Cream in the most approved manner, and will keep good for a long time, even in a foreign climate; but they prefer it fresh may always procure it, as its extensive sale requires that it is made at least once a week. N.B.—To Ladies whose hands are much chapped, their PALE ALL MIXTURE, with peculiarly prepared gloves, are a sure remedy.—24, Old Bond-street. February, 1844.

MOULD CANDLES to burn WITHOUT SNUFFING.—MR. KEMPTON'S PATENT CANDLES are now actually in Use, and do not require snuffing, they burn longer, and are cheaper than any other candle, the flame is steady and brilliant. No metallic or deleterious matter is used in the manufacture. Price 8d. per pound.—Sold by G. H. Farrah, Agent for Carpetowa, 214, Strand-street, City and at the Manufactory, Old Barge-house, Christchurch, Surrey.

MR. COCKLE'S PILLS for INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, &c.

"If you are in possession of better means,

Candidly inform me; if not make use of these."—HORACE.

This FAMILY APERIENT will be found particularly valuable in every form of indigestion, with torpid liver and inactive bowels, also in gout, bilious attacks, sick head-ache, and nervous irritability from a deranged state of the stomach, &c.—May be had of all medicine vendors.

"On est ordonné de la rhubarbe si dit scha
Mais non, c'est le poor nature
Moyen plus doux."—SCRIBE.

IT is pleasant to eat a light delicate SPONGE CAKE: but by ordinary baking it is rendered an unsavoury mass, which is unsavoury and unwholesome; but unsavoury and unwholesome is better. All you that cannot take physic: all mothers with spoilt children, who will not be coaxed to take what is to do them good; look to this, and send for a packet (1s. 1½d.) of DRABBLE'S APERIENT BISCUITS which are a delicious confection without cakes, and in the pleasant disguise of a sweetmeat. Sold by W. DRABBLE, Chemist, 26, Bedford-row, and all Venders.

SUPERIOR WATERPROOF WRAPPERS and OUTSIDE GARMENTS of all kinds. An extensive variety of the above, also of BERDOE'S well known VENTILATING FROCKS (in lieu of the Mackintosh) always kept ready, guaranteed to exclude any description or continuance of rain whatever. Those who require really good, efficient, and respectable garments, at the lowest price possible, consistent with TRUE economy, or wish to avoid disappointment and vexation, will not regret the inspection now confidently invited. First rate clothing of every description made to order, at equitable charges.—W. BERDOE, Tailor, Waterproofer, &c., 69, Cornhill (north side).

PATENT LEVER WATCHES, London Made.—A. B. SAVORY and SONS, Watchmakers, 9, Cornhill, London, opposite the Bank.—Patent Lever Watches, mounted in silver cases, four guineas each, or, in gold cases, ten guineas each. They have the detached escapement, jewelled, and maintaining power for the watch to continue going whilst being wound. The performance warranted.

CONTRARY to all expectation, the news by the Overland Mail has produced a FALL in the price of useful TEAS. The East India Tea Company are the first to give the public the benefit of it. The 6lb. bag of good sound Black Tea is now 12s. The 4lb. bag of fine Hyson is one sovereign.

Offices, 9, Great St. Helen's, Bishopsgate.

JONES' £4 4s. SILVER LEVER WATCHES are selling at the Manufactory, 338, Strand, opposite Somerset House. They comprise every modern improvement, and are warranted to perform well for half a year per watch, and possess a great reduction of price at once sets aside all rivalry either of the Swiss manufacturers or any other house.—Read Jones's Sketch of Watchwork, sent free for a 2d. stamp.

BAKER'S PHEASANTRY, BEAUFORT-STREET, KING'S ROAD, CHELSEA.—GAME of every description. Gold, Silver, White Pied, and common Tame Pheasants for Aviaries; Wild ditto, for Preserves; Great variety of prince's head, demi-crested, Chantic Fowl, for ornamental waters. Eared and Crested Fowls. Poultry, Fancy Pigeons, Bantams &c. Storks, Swans, Carolina Ducks, Shealdrakes, &c. And at HALF-MOON PASSAGE, Gracechurch-street, City.

PLATE SUITED for PRESENTATION.—Committees of public institutions requiring cups and articles of PLATE for presentation may, by addressing a card letter, have drawings sent for their approval. A number of large articles, as Epergnes, Cups, Waiters, &c., are always on hand, either in the Silver or Electro Plate, from the Factory of COLSAWORY, Silversmith, &c., 47, Cornhill, (seven doors from Gracechurch-street), London.

MARYLEBONE and PADDINGTON MECHANICS' INSTITUTE and TEMPERANCE HALL.

A PUBLIC MEETING will be held in the Hall of the Literary and Scientific Institution, Edward-street, Portman-square, on Monday, February 12, 1844. The Chair to be taken at Seven o'Clock precisely, by BENJAMIN BOND CABBELL Esq., F.R.S., F.S.A., will take the Chair.

RED or GREY HAIR, WHISKERS, &c.—W. HALLETT respectfully informs the Nobility and Gentry that he has discovered a means of changing Grey or Red Hair to a beautiful Brown or Dark one in a few days without the least difficulty or unpleasantness. Those labouring under the disfigurement to personal appearance may, at a saving of time, trouble, and expense, have the same changed from the unpreferable and unbecoming grey to nature's most pleasing adornment—the agreeable brown or splendid dark wood tint.—No. 23, High Holborn, near the Gaiety and Blue Posts.

NEW PATENTS.—I. and E. ATKINSON, Perfumers, beg respectfully to inform the public that they have received from the south of France their STOCK of NEW PERFUMES, the produce of last season, and that they are finer than they have been for many past years. They are sole Agents for the Sale of Essences, Extracts, and all the variety, distinguishing the flower gardens of Nice, Grasse, Montpellier. They have, also, several new Perfumes for the present year, and they hope an inspection will be found worthy of that patronage they have hitherto so kindly experienced.—N.B. A stock is always kept ready for exportation.—24, Old Bond-street. February, 1844.

EDWARD DODD'S ANGLO-ROMAN STRINGS for all VIOLS, VIOLONCELLO, and BASS.—Manufactured for H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge—which Strings, for power of tone and durability, are equal to the best Italian Strings, at 50 per cent. less, and far superior to those in general use. They have a peculiar property of resisting the ill effects of damp, and are not affected by the hottest climate. Also improved Silver Strings, warranted not to turn green.

EMPLOYMENT.—Persons having a little time to spare, are desirous that Agent continue to be appointed in London and Town to the EAST INDIA TEA COMPANY, for the sale of their celebrated TEA (Offices, 9, Great St Helen's Churchyard, Bishopsgate-street). They are packed in showy tinsize canisters from an ounce to a pound. The quantities and weight marked on each packet, and but little trouble is occasioned by the sale; the houses a only 11s. per annum, and many during the last seventeen years have retained considerable incomes in the Agency, without 1s. lot or loss. Application to be made (if by letter, post-paid) as above.

NAPLES SOAP.—The complaints of many Gentlemen of the difficulty they have in procuring good NAPLES SOAP, have induced J. and E. ATKINSON, Perfumers, to appoint one of the most experienced houses in Naples to purchase them with the very best article that can be made, regardless of expense, and they can with confidence recommend these genuine soaps as the finest quality, and as nothing is made at all equal to Naples Soap for shaving, and also for Washing, particularly where the skin is hard, or liable to chapping, they are certain the more good Naples Soap they use the more it will produce the desired cause of a delightful satety in discipute, is in consequence of the inferior quality of the Soap imported for so many years past. N.B. Country Druggists supplied with 2lbs. and upwards, at wholesale prices.

24, Old Bond street. February, 1844.

TOOTH BRUSHES.—J. and E. ATKINSON, Perfumers, in answer to some complaints from the country, that Tooth Brushes purchased as of their manufacture have not been found good, they beg to state that many of the brushes supplied by them to country shops are only warranted if their name is stamped on the handle, cheap priced Tooth Brushes are not made by them, but are made for them, as they say the good Tooth Brush, as they do not last half the time, and indeed this applies to Hair Brushes and every other description of Brush. The Tooth Brushes, stamped with their name, are the best that can be made, both in the material and workmanship, and if it happens, which is very rare, that some hairs become loose, they not only change them but are obliged to the customer for returning them to them. They are also manufacturers of the best in bone, or set in ivory, &c. N.B. Tooth, Hair, Nail, and Shaving Brushes, of the best quality, for exportation, and at the usual allowance.—24, Old Bond-street. February, 1844.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL.—Patron, the QUEEN; President, the Marquis of WESTMINSTER.—The aid of the affluent is earnestly requested for this Hospital, which, since the commencement of its useful operations, has received upwards of 6,000 in-patients, and has given relief to 40,000 out-patients, exclusive of the immediate assistance of cases of accident and emergency. About 6,000 poor sufferings objects are annually relieved at the Hospital, and the Governors have now the painful duty of stating that the regular income of the Charity falls so far short of the amount required for its support, that were it not for the kind donations of the benevolent, the Institution would be compelled to close its doors, or curtail its operations. Subscriptions are thankfully received by the Committee, Treasurer, and Secretary, at the Hospital; at Messrs. Drummond's; Messrs. Coutts'; Messrs. Hoare's; and Messrs. Barnett's.

JOHN ROBERTSON, Hon. Sec.

TO LADIES. ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, Patronised and sanctioned by her Majesty the QUEEN, the Royal Family, and the several Courts of Europe.—This Eastern Balm realises the most sanguine expectations of the fair. Sallow Blotches, Redness, Tan, Freckles, and other defects of the Skin. The radiant bloom it imparts to the Cheek, Neck, and Arms, is unrivalled. It imparts to the Hands, Arms, and neck, render it indispensable to every toilet. As a safeguard against Chilblains and Chapped Skin its virtues are universally acknowledged. Price 4s. 6d. and 8s. 6d. per bottle, duly recorded.

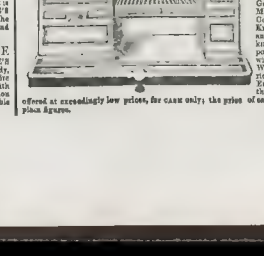
CAUTION.—The genuine article has the words ROWLAND'S KALYDOR printed on the wrapper, and A. ROWLAND and SON, 20, HATTON-GARDEN, London, on the Government Stamp affixed on each bottle. Sold by them, and by Chemists and Perfumers.

* * The words "ROWLAND'S" All others are SPURIOUS IMITATIONS!

NELSON'S PATENT OPAQUE GELATINE, Half the Price of Isinglass.—CAUTION. From the increasing demands for NELSON'S OPAQUE GELATINE, many spurious articles are imposed on the Public; to guard against which, and secure a genuine preparation, each packet of the genuine has, by most respectable chemists, grocers, and oilmen, in town and country, at 1s., 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 5s., 10s., and 15s. each packet, bearing Patentee's signature, Dr. Nelson, Leicester-square, dated, 1st, 1840: "I find Mr. C. Nelson's Patent Opaque Gelatine to be at least equal in strength and purity, if not superior, to the best isinglass, for every culinary purpose. It is entirely free from any impregnation of sand, and will serve for soups or calves' feet jelly, as well as the London market." The Opaque Gelatine is an article well adapted for hotels, taverns, cabinet and ship stores, and for each and profitable community for exportation.—Exmoor Main Warwick; and 14, Buckleriebury

COMBINATION, ECONOMY, and QUALITY, versus EXPENSE and INFERIORITY.—Messrs VINCENT and PUGH, Distillers and Brandy Merchants, of New Fenchurch-street, beg to call the attention of the Public to their article of BRANDY. The two essentials, QUALITY and PURITY, are hereby combined in the manufacture. The spirit is made from sugars specially selected for the purpose, and in the first rate, free chemists of the day, testimonials of which can be produced to prove its perfect equality with the finest Foreign Brandy imported, the Proprietors can confidently defy competition to produce its equal. For the convenience of Private Families, they have bottled a large quantity, both PALE and BROWN, in handsome bright glass bottles, covered with a neat metallic capsule over the cork, and labelled "Messrs. Vincent and Pugh's Pale Sugars and Cognac Brandy." Sold in quantities of not less than two gallons, equal to one dozen in bottles, at 44s. per dozen, bottles included. Agent, W. M. Hall, Wine Merchant, No. 14, Porter-street, Newport Market, and No. 1, Great Newport-street, Leicester-square.

MOURNING—Court, Family, and Complimentary.—The Proprietors of the London General Mourning Warehouse, Nos. 247 and 249, Regent-street, beg respectfully to announce to the Nobility, those who have occasion to order mourning attire, that every article (of the very best description) on sale for a complete outfit of mourning may be had at their establishment at a moment's notice. Widows' and Family Mourning is always kept made up; and a note descriptive of the quantity required, will receive every thing necessary for the occasion, being sent (in town or country) immediately. Ladies not in mourning requiring new and fashionable Black Mantles, Cardinals, Cloaks, &c., lined or in velvet, satin, or moreen, for carriage, promenade, or travelling, will find some of the most exclusive patterns of the season at this establishment, as well as black velvets, satins, and damages for dresses, of a superior texture. The Snow Rooms are replete with every novelty that modern taste has introduced, in mourning, millinery, flowers, collars, handkerchiefs, &c., &c. Regent street (near Oxford-street).



PANKLIBA! NON IRON WORKS, BAZAAR, 58, BAKER STREET, PORTMAN-SQUARE.—Wardesale and Retail GENERAL FURNISHING IRONMONGERY, Copper, and Iron Cooking Utensils, Table Cutlery, best Sheffield Plate, German Silver Wares, Papier Maché Tea Trays, Tea and Coffee Urns, Stoves, Kitchen Ranges, Fenders and Fire Irons; Baths of all kinds, shower, hot, cold, vapour, plunging, &c., together with Ornamental Iron and Wire Work, for Conservatories, Lawns, &c., and Garden Engines. All articles are of the very best description, and offered at exceedingly low prices, for CASH ONLY; the prices of each article being marked in plain figures.

Just published, price 1s.,

RICHARD THE THIRD, AND HIS TIMES. A LECTURE delivered in Crosby Hall, Nov. 8, 1843, by MILES BEALE, M.R.C.S. To be had at the Crosby Hall Institution, Bishopsgate-street; and ENTICK and ELSLEY'S Cornhill.—For an account of Crosby Hall, with engraving of Interior, see vol. I., p. 249, of the "Illustrated London News."

TO THE MILLIONS!—The Proprietors of THE DEATH WARRANT have much gratification in announcing to their subscribers, in furtherance of Henry Grattan's grandest project, Clontarf and Chapel Interment, an abomination which the late Dr. Adam Clarke denounces as shocking "to God, decency, and health," are preparing to present gratuitously to each subscriber for Six Months, a Grand National Prospectus, the Metropolitan Cemetery Companies to the Millions, consisting of a Magnificent Steel Engraving on Steel, measuring 36 inches by 24, printed on superb drawing paper, the great Bearing

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 94, Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 17, 1844. [Sixpence.

PROSPECTS OF IRELAND.

THE public anxiety is at rest upon one point: and now that, after a long and exciting trial, the verdict of a jury has decided that Mr. O'Connell and others were guilty of conspiracy, in their persevering efforts to obtain a separation of England from the Sister Isle—now that it has been clearly enunciated in a court of law that the Union is part of the constitution of the empire, and that to seek dismemberment is to excite disaffection—now that monster meetings of hundreds of thousands of inflamed and dissatisfied beings, not physically violent, but exhibiting, as it were, a passive passion, and making their imposing presence a sort of peaceful danger to the State, are proclaimed to be disturbful of the harmonies of society, and exciteful of burning irritability and discontent—now, in a word, that the particular course of agitation which has followed the footsteps of Daniel O'Connell, and marked the present epoch of Ireland's history, with so many elements of storm, is declared a crime against the Crown, a conspiracy against the English Throne and people, and a bane to Ireland herself—we hope to find the traces of the late tempest clearing away, and look into the future for some happy beacon that may cheer the restless spirits of Irishmen, and guide their beautiful country into some haven of prosperity at last. It is to the good sense of the English Government and the English Parliament that we turn for this fortunate omen.

We know in the outset how deep and strong will be the struggle against it, and how desperate will be the efforts of the Agitator and of all those who have so recklessly pledged themselves with him to Repeal, to keep up that excitement which Ireland ought bitterly to feel as a clinging curse upon her destiny; but still we believe that after the striking of this first blow—and by it the maiming of the power which it has made illegal, if it has not all suppressed—the sudden and radiant presence of some happy line of policy—the exhibition of cordial sympathy and an earnest spirit of inquiry into wrong—the determined expression of a desire to promote the wealth, the liberty, and the happiness of Ireland—to bring home her rich to relieve her poor—to stimulate her commerce and to reconcile her religion—that all these gifts of justice, tendered with sincerity from England's heart, would woo away the people from their turbulence, and complete, with a peaceful influence, that task of admitted difficulty, the first beginning of which has just been determined by the law.

We grant that no encouragement is to be found at the hands of the Repealers, who, with a sort of roystering and joyous insolence, proclaim that, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, they are Repealers still. We know that a hundred quibbles will yet be raised to nullify the trials, and to hold out the hope to the people that that verdict will be no verdict at all. We saw how O'Connell, on the very morning of its solemn record, went to the temple of the Repeal Association, and, in the presence of half-stifled thousands of his countrymen and women, declared that they should have a Parliament on College-green, and that his conviction had only hastened the event—we heard how Mr. Smith O'Brien denounced the Attorney-General and the Judge, and proclaimed that he would bring the bench of justice before the Parliament of the land—we heard how Nicholas Maher, the new member for Tipperary, assented to all the violence of his leader—we heard O'Connell tell the people that he would not leave them—that nothing should tempt him to go to London—that it would not be prudent—it would not be wise, and that in his present position he questioned whether it would be either legally or morally right; and the next evening we found him embarked for the English metropolis! We know that he brought with him Sir Colman O'Loghlen and Mr. O'Hea, laden with all the pith and circumstance of his trial for the information of Lord John Russell on the Irish debate; and we know also how much Irish debate there will be during the session, which will assert the purposes of agitation, and nothing more; but, for all this, we do not despair of achieving some tranquillity, and many blessings for Ireland, if Ministers will only be determined, conciliatory, generous, and just.

For, depend upon it, with all the outward bravado of the Repeal party, and despite "the laugh that covers tears," there is a disappointment—a settled melancholy disappointment—gone into the hearts of the people. It is hard for them to deny that O'Connell is all-powerful and invincible, but they feel it nevertheless. They (we do not speak of the mere City of Dublin, but of the country—the rent-paying, ill-fed, warm-hearted peasantry—in a word, the people) feel that a blow has been struck which they dare not notice—that it has been dealt openly and received peaceably—that no consequences of riot, or bloodshed, or revenge, have ensued—that even patriotic exhibitions and the pageantry of processions have been forbidden them by their leaders, and that the great Dan has been wounded in the very heart and root of his power prosecuted publicly and condemned in a court of law without any of those manifestations which they would have held to be the natural consequences of such an event—if, indeed, they could have been brought to believe that such an event were possible at all. They have the same love for O'Connell, for he has blended himself with their affections; his influence over their hearts is a thing to inspire a beautiful envy; he has them to live or die for, what he wills; he has unquestionably acquired among them a surpassing mastery over the natures of his poor countrymen, who look up to him with glistening eyes, and souls half smiles half tears, as to the source of some bright river from whence is to flow their happiness, their regeneration, and the gladness that shall bless their homes! But their love, as we have said, is tinged with melancholy; there is a damp upon their spirits now; and although they still recognize the virtue and patriotism of O'Connell, their faith in his power has begun to fade

COLOSSAL STATUE OF THE QUEEN, AT THE ROYAL INSTITUTION, EDINBURGH.—See next page.

Now it is of this feeling that we would see prompt and permanent advantage taken. Every step in the opposition to the verdict will enhance it, every successive defeat will strengthen it, and the bringing up of the traversers for judgment, after all their tedious legal procrastinations, will crown it all. The Government have, therefore, the opportunity of taking advantage of it, and let them do so; and let the advantage they do take of it be—JUSTICE TO IRELAND.

The field is open—let Ministers enter it at once;—now they may meet and conquer their "great difficulty;" and if it be not conquered now, it will never be overcome till Ireland is in rebellion again. Defy O'Connell by engendering prosperity—do more than vindicate the promise of the Royal speech—adjust vigorously, and at once, the differences, and the causes of the differences, between landlord and tenant—and, if you can, attach the absentees; but, at all events, abolish the Poor-law—endeavour to direct unemployed English capital and enterprise into a region so fertile as Ireland for converting them into productive prosperity and permanent wealth—and see if, without injury to Church or State, without damage to the Protestant religion, or the exercise of too much tolerance, against your conscience and your creed—you cannot devise some panacea for religious animosity. Try whether you cannot sow the seeds of education, and give to the religious teachers of the people some boon that may conciliate their prejudices, and make the poor grateful and glad. Act in the spirit of your first concession of Catholic Emancipation, and, without heeding the voice of agitation, see if you cannot drown it deep, and for ever, below the waters of charity, brotherhood, and love. Let Government so conquer O'Connell, and it will be a great day for Ireland indeed.

COLOSSAL STATUE OF THE QUEEN.

Enthron'd already in thy people's hearts,
A marble monument is more imparts
To thy great fame, young Queen! of all men's love,
Than this: that fondly—truly it doth prove
A nation wills to its posterity,
A semblance of the life it priz'd in thee!
Happy the artist whose ingenious hand
Hath plac'd thine image in his native land!
Like the old Roman lyorist, he can say
"My work is not intended for a day;—
"My Queen's my subject, and by side her name,
"I'll run a lengthen'd parallel with Fame!
"No sun shall scorch—no winter's cold shall chill
"The double object of my love and skill!"
W.

This magnificent statue has just been placed on the colonnade of the Royal Institution at Edinburgh, facing Prince's-street. Its dimensions are on a more colossal scale than any statue that has yet been exhibited in this country, being nearly four times the size of life; while, from the elevation of the pedestal, this gigantic figure is reduced to a natural proportion, and harmonizes with the massive building on which it stands. It is, moreover, the first public statue of her Majesty which has yet been erected in any part of her dominions.

In the Edinburgh Evening Post this statue is deservedly characterized as "a remarkably fine and successful work of art; and the sculptor, Mr. Steell, has not only overcome the obvious and peculiar difficulties of the situation, but, in fact, has drawn from them the means of adding to the effect of the statue. The danger was that so massive a body would appear as a mere excrescent weight upon the building; but, from the harmony of its proportions and the flowing character of the lines, not only is the mind reconciled to an apparent incongruity, but the eye experiences a sensible pleasure from what seems but the completion of a perfect design. So far as regards the combination of sculpture and architecture, this statue is, therefore, an important addition to the beauty of this edifice."

The style and feeling of the statue are decidedly abstract and classic; and the whole composition has been modelled in the style, and on the severest principles, of Grecian art. The lines of the figure are of great breadth, and the arrangement and flow of the massive drapery, in true grandeur.

It must not be supposed, however, that the statue is a mere abstraction on the contrary, it conveys a strong and striking likeness of her most gracious Majesty. The Sovereign is represented seated on a throne with the diadem on her brow, representing that worn by her on all state occasions; her right hand grasps the sceptre, and her left leans on the orb; the head is slightly inclined towards the right, and rises naturally from the bust, which is exquisitely soft and rounded, and admirably relieved by the rich and flowing drapery falling in massive folds around the lower portion of the figure. All the details are executed with much talent; the chiselling, in fact, seems as soft, and, at the same time, as sharp, as if the spectator were only a few feet from the statue, instead of the great distance at which it can only be fully seen

In the Edinburgh Evening Post, the attitude and expression are much commended for their graceful dignity. "But, at the same time," adds the editor, "we see an English lady; and accordingly the artist has conveyed that sweet and placid smile which marks the feminine character in its elevated aspect. The entire statue is thus imbued with all the majesty which belongs to the office of the Sovereign, rendered interesting and attractive by the gentle and natural expression which belongs to the woman. It is, in fact, impossible to look upon this production without admiration and love—a sentiment which has been freely and warmly expressed by all who have seen it."

The statue is, altogether, a noble addition to the ornaments of Edinburgh, and must raise, or rather popularize, the fame of the distinguished sculptor. When the Scott monument, and the equestrian statue of Wellington shall have been completed and both are rapidly going forward—Princes-street, which is destined to rival Regent-street, will be the most highly ornamented, as it is at present the most picturesque promenade in Europe

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

Lord CLARENDON stated, that in consequence of the illness of the noble lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, he should postpone his question on the state of affairs in Spain until Monday next.

On the motion of Lord BROUGHAM several verbal amendments were made in the Gaming Bill, when was then read a third time and passed.

Lord CAMPBELL introduced a bill, which [illegible] obnoxious libel, which was read a third time, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

There being only thirty-five members present, the house adjourned until to-morrow (this day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—SATURDAY.

The house met to-day at the usual hour.

Mr. S. CRAWFORD gave notice that on the motion for going into Committee of Supply he should move that the committee be postponed until the grievances of the people were inquired into.

The Committee on Railroads was appointed.

The Metropolis Improvement Bill went through committee.—Report on Monday.

In answer to a question [illegible]

Lord STANLEY said [illegible] would not protect [illegible] exporting [illegible] and he [illegible] the proper [illegible] law [illegible] into the present [illegible] Wales and the north of England. He [illegible] proving the birth of illegitimate children [illegible] and in most respects to follow the law of Scotland on the subject. He should also propose to make considerable alterations in the law of settlement. The [illegible] another would have summary applicat on to magistrates for the support of a child —that application to be made within forty days after its birth; that the maximum allowance be four shillings a week, subject to appeal to the Court of Quarter Sessions. It was, in fact, assimilating the law on this point to the law of Scotland, which he considered would be attended with great advantage.

Mr. BENJAMIN HAWES asked what proof would be required of the putative father? Sir J. GRAHAM said, he should require some corroborative proof beyond the mother's evidence. He also proposed that asylums should be opened for one night to destitute persons, in order that their cases might be inquired into; and to allow it, also, for a second night to ascertain the right of settlement. He also intended to make alterations in plurality boards, and other alterations, which he would name more particularly afterwards. Mr. S. WORTLEY hoped some alteration would be made relating to the separation of man and wife in union workhouses.—Sir J. GRAHAM said the question had been considered and would be attended to.—The bill was then brought in, read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday next.

Sir J. GRAHAM then brought in a bill for the more speedy trial of offences committed on the high seas, which was read a first time and ordered to be read a second time on Monday.

After a short discussion, Lord J. RUSSELL said, that at present it was his intention to proceed with the notice he had given relating to Ireland on Tuesday next.

The house adjourned at a quarter before six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

On the motion of Lord COTTENHAM, a bill to carry into effect the recommendations contained in the second part of the Insolvent Laws Commissioners' Report was read a first time.

On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, a bill to amend the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts was read a first time.

The Earl of RIPON moved a vote of thanks to Sir Charles Napier, and the officers and men who served under his command in the late military operations in Scinde. In doing so, his lordship strictly abstained from enunciating any opinion upon the policy that dictated, or led to, the brilliant achievements performed by the gallant general and his little army, contenting himself with giving a brief but well digested narration of those dashing exploits which have shed so much lustre on our arms. He put it to their lordships to be the judgment, the decision, and the boldness displayed by Sir Charles Napier in the critical position in which he was placed; he gave due meed of praise to the officers who served under him, for the active, zealous, and hearty obedience and co-operation they afforded their general; and he passed a high eulogium on the privates, both English and native, for the courage, discipline, and high fidelity manifested by them in the most trying emergencies.

The Earl of AUCKLAND seconded the motion, declaring that he "cordially and without qualification" concurred in the vote of thanks.

The Duke of WELLINGTON supported the vote, in a speech remarkable for its wonderful force of expression, and more so to those who had the pleasure of hearing it, for the earnestness, the energy, and the gallant bearing with which it was delivered. Sir Charles Napier, he said, just stands to the judgment, the decision, and the boldness displayed by Sir Charles Napier in the critical position in which he was placed; he gave due meed of praise to the officers who served under him, for the active, zealous, and hearty obedience and co-operation they afforded their general; and he passed a high eulogium on the privates, both English and native, for the courage, discipline, and high fidelity manifested by them in the most trying emergencies.

The vote of thanks was agreed to without a dissentient voice.

The Earl of CLARENDON (after reviewing and commenting on the late events in Spain—charged the French Government with a systematic hostility to the consolidation of a constitutional government in the Peninsula, and after having mentioned the right, reported to be asserted by France, to confine the choice of a consort for the Queen of Spain to the House of Bourbon—asked the Foreign Secretary upon what basis the "cordial understanding," mentioned in the French King's speech, rested, and what policy was to be hereafter adopted with reference to Spain under the new state of things? Already it were true that the Count de Trapani, the brother of the King of Naples, was the consort selected by France whether that choice was to be enforced on the people of Spain without their concurrence?

The Earl of ABERDEEN said it was impossible to give any intelligible account of the events, with the motives that instigated them, that had followed each other in Spain since the death of Ferdinand VII. One said, "this was planned in Paris," another said, "this was contrived in London." His noble friend knew that if, on the one hand, it was asserted that the downfall of Espartero was planned in Paris; on the other hand, it was equally asserted that his elevation had been concocted in London—that, in short, one was to be attributed to English influence, or was the other to the interference and assistance of France both statements being equally made without reference to truth. Those on both sides knew that his noble friend (Lord Clarendon) was believed to be the author of the revolution of La Granja, and that his name would go down to posterity in the history of Spain as a disorganizer in that country, and not as one who saw that he was the author of, and been a sharer in that revolution; but this he knew—that he had meddled too much in the internal affairs of Spain. Having disposed of Lord Clarendon's speech, the noble Foreign Secretary replied to questions put to him. He did not think the "cordial understanding" between this country and France was based "on the anxious desire to maintain the complete independence of Spain." He desired to maintain the independence of Spain on constitutional grounds—the desire to check, by all proper and legitimate means, every description of violence and revolution—the desire to develope the just natural resources of that fine country, and promote the prosperity and happiness and general welfare of its people and government. With respect to the choice of a Consort for the Queen of Spain, that was a subject for the entire Spanish nation alone; and the Government at this country had carefully abstained from demanding or desiring that this country had carefully abstained from demanding or desiring that this country should interfere with the complete independence of Spain in making their election.

Lord HOWDEN deprecated the introduction of this subject by Lord Clarendon as prejudicial to the interests all parties ought to be anxious to promote.

The discussion then terminated, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at four o'clock.

Sir HENRY HARDINGE informed Captain Pechell that he had inquired into the assault and riot at Brighton, in which five soldiers were implicated, which he found to be incapable of being dealt with by the magistrates and accordingly by the civil tribunal, and as the Commander-in-Chief had taken the most effectual steps to prevent the recurrence of such an affair, he deemed it unnecessary to remark upon it in that house.

Mr. FERRAND gave notice of his intention, on the motion of Mr. Cobden, for a select committee to inquire into the effects of protective duties on imports upon the interests of the agricultural classes and farm labourers, to move an amendment to the effect of the inquiry into the emigration of agricultural labourers into the manufacturing districts, at the request of the millowners of Lancashire.

Mr. HUME gave notice of the following amendment to Mr. Milne's motion for a provision for the Roman Catholic clergy: "An address to her Majesty praying that her Majesty would be pleased to direct an inquiry to be made for the purpose of ascertaining whether the number of persons dissenting from the Established Churches of England, Ireland, and Scotland was not greater than the number of those in communion with those Churches; and, if so, whether the time had not arrived when the property which had been devoted to the uses of those Churches ought to be withdrawn, regard being had to existing interests, and whether the greater portion of it ought not to be devoted to the promotion of national education."

To a question from Mr. Ferrand, Sir J. GRAHAM answered, that he did not intend to introduce a clause into the Poor-law Amendment Act, giving to mothers the custody of their children, whether they were seven years old.—Mr. FERRAND gave notice to move a clause to that effect.

Sir J. GRAHAM replied to Mr. Ellice, that the Lord Advocate would introduce a bill this session to provide for the better regulation of Scotch burghs.

To a question put by Capt. Pechell, Sir R. PEEL replied, that a projet de loi was about to be submitted to the French Chambers, continuing the fishery convention agreed between Great Britain and France, but that it could not before the requisite legislative sanction of France would soon be given to the regulations prepared at the instigation of the two Governments.

To questions from Mr. Ross and Lord J. Russell, Sir R. PEEL replied, that he was not prepared to alter the Irish Landlord and Tenant Commission, by the introduction of any tenant-farmers; and that the particular branch of their report, which the commission were about to make, was left to their own discretion.

The Factory Bill was read a second time, and the committal of it fixed for [illegible] next week.

The Metropolitan Improvements Bill was read a third time. On the motion that the bill do pass, Mr. HUME moved that the words empowering the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to lend money for contributions improvements be struck out.—Mr. MASTERMAN supported this amendment.—Mr. C. WOOD suggested that the sum to be lent should be limited.—Sir R. PEEL acceded to this suggestion; but Mr. HUME pressed his amendment to a division, when there were—

For the amendment	.. ..	79
Against it	.. ..	145
Majority	.. .. ..	—75

The bill was finally passed with an an amendment, limiting the sum to £500,000.

Sir R. PEEL moved a vote of thanks to Sir Charles Napier, and the officers and men, English and Sepoy, of his army, for the gallantry displayed by them in the battles of Meeanee and Hyderabad. In doing so he could not forbear to offer his congratulations on the conduct of the gallant commander in a most brilliant speech. Lord J. RUSSELL shortly but heartily seconded the motion. Lord HOWICK complained, that while the noble seals of [illegible] declared against the policy of the noble seals of [illegible] Sindh, and became the noble seals of brilliant achievements had only occurred "by accident." He would not, however, divide the house. Sir HENRY HARDINGE and Sir HOWARD DOUGLAS repelled the imputation of any jealousy on the part of the noble seals of [illegible] Sindh services. Mr. SHARMAN CRAWFORD, not satisfied with Lord Howick's objection without a division, moved the previous question, which was seconded by Mr. BERNAL. After a speech from Lord PALMERSTON, cordially supporting the vote of thanks, the house divided—

For the vote of thanks	.. ..	164
For the previous question	.. ..	9
Majority	.. ..	—155

The vote was then agreed to amidst loud cheers.

Mr. CHRISTIE moves, for a select committee to consider the expediency of regulating the presence of strangers at debates, and the publication of debates under the pleasure of the house; and to consider and report what regulations may be necessary for that object.—Mr. DUNCOMBE seconded the motion The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER objected to it, as unnecessary for any useful purpose, and not worth the risk of a change.—After a short discussion, Mr. CHRISTIE struck out that part referring to the exclusion of strangers, and confined the motion to the publication of reports. On this amended motion the house divided—

For the motion	.. .. ..	37
Against it	.. .. ..	84
Majority	.. ..	47

On the motion of Mr. WALLACE, the evidence taken in the last session respecting the Custom-house frauds was ordered to be laid on the table.

The Offences at Sea Bill was brought in and read a first time.

Adjourned at half-past twelve.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

Lord STOURTON gave notice that on the day most convenient to their lordships, either on Friday or Monday, he purposed to bring before their lordships the construction of the Roman Catholic oath.

The Marquis of NORMANBY then rose to propose the following resolutions, of which he had given notice, with regard to the affairs of Ireland.

"That this house having, in answer to her Majesty's most gracious speech, assured her Majesty that they entered into her Majesty's feelings in forbearing from observations or comments on Ireland, in respect to which proceedings are pending before the proper legal tribunals; that it, in consequence, to be their duty to take the earliest opportunity, when no prejudice can arise therefrom in the minds of the jury, to record their intention to examine into the causes of the discontents now, unhappily, so prevalent in that country. That with a view to the removal of existing evils, and the restoration of confidence, this house look to the full development of the only principles of a perfect union, by securing to her Majesty's subjects, of all classes and persuasions, in all parts of the United Kingdom, the practical enjoyment of equal rights."

The noble Marquis accused the Government of having adopted the do-nothing policy when they should have stepped the advance in the bud, and of having taken up the active policy when the agitation was about to expire of its own exhaustion. He charged them with having attempted the greatest of political faults that of carrying on a Government by means of a majority. He impeached them for having appointed a man to the Attorney-Generalship who had once declared that he believed Roman Catholics had little or no regard for the sanctity of an oath. He blamed them for excluding from the members of the Administration all Irishmen, with the exception of the Duke of Wellington, who had lived out of the country the greater part of his life, and all persons who had a local knowledge of Irish wants, feelings, and prejudices. He arraigned the conduct of the late Government in the matter of the empanelling of a jury—including in his censure the law officers, the justice who summoned up, and the Government. Public opinion, he said, in all the countries of Europe was supplied to every great transaction of the day in the world, and that he could say, that strongly as he had at some times spoken, from his keen interest, of the wishes and grievances of Ireland, he had never talked with a foreigner, let his political sentiments be what they might, who was not astounded at the history of governments, who did not give it as his decided opinion that the miseries of Ireland were owing to the domination of England. If this opinion were general, it was as just as it was general, and he believed that the mis-government, which all lamented, arose out of neglect and ignorance of the real wishes and interests of the people. The time would soon arrive, when even those who were most opposed to the concession of equal rights would feel that they could no longer resist the power of public opinion, and surely it was far better to yield with a good grace than to maintain a resistance as contemptible as it was ineffectual. (Cheers.) If their lordships were prepared to go with the attempt to govern Ireland by a minority—if they were resolved to persevere in what never had succeeded in any country, in any age, or under any form of government—if they were determined to resist the imperial administration of justice, and to exercise their influence in connection with it those who professed the faith of seven-eighths of the population—if they were satisfied to continue to exhibit to the eyes of Europe the spectacle of a free country ruled by military occupation if they were content to assert that the sword was the fittest instrument to convince Ireland of the benefits of British institutions—if by a vain abuse of the name of religion they were willing to maintain a system of doing to others what the attempt to govern Ireland by a minority—if they were resolved to persevere in what never had succeeded in any country, in any age, or under any form of government—if they were determined to resist the impartial administration of justice, and to exercise their influence in connection with it those who professed the faith of seven-eighths of the population—if they were satisfied to continue to exhibit to the eyes of Europe the spectacle of a free country ruled by military occupation if they were content to assert that the sword was the fittest instrument to convince Ireland of the benefits of British institutions—if by a vain abuse of the name of religion they were willing to maintain a system of doing to others what they would not have done unto them, they would reject the present motion for inquiry, and refuse to affirm the resolution he had laid upon the table. (Cheers.) If, on the other hand, their lordships were disposed to go with the attempt to govern Ireland, in accordance with the fitness of conferring equal rights—even yet there might be time for success; delay would be the only impediment opposed to such a method of conciliation; but if their lordships would join in such a welcome deliberation, and if the power of the strong opinion of one branch of the Legislature—as the loyalty of all classes in Ireland was undoubted—he was confident that its purifying and tranquillising effects would be speedily manifested in their generous and benefiting influence; until then, he would be able to offer to the Sovereign of these united realms that security for her throne and for the greatness and stability of her empire which was to be derived from the affectionate loyalty of a happy and powerful, because an enlightened people. (Cheers from all sides.)

Lord WHARNCLIFFE, though he could discover nothing objectionable in the words of the resolution, could not let the speech, which contained so many grave charges, pass without an answer. It had never been the opinion of the Government that the Repeal meetings would wear themselves out, but they were confident that before the hard-headed Irishmen of even their own friends in patience, until they obtained legal proof of the illegality of the whole series of meetings, which individually could not be called illegal. The repeal of the Union was a question peculiarly legal in character, and difficulty was to convict those who concocted them of illegal and seditious designs. This had been done as soon as possible; and, whatever might be said to impugn the verdict that had been obtained, he was convinced that it would be agreed in its justice. Of Mr. Smith he had never heard until he was appointed Attorney-General, and, therefore, knew nothing of his speech about the Roman Catholics and their oaths. The Irish Executive President of the Council described the appointments made by the Government—explained the striking of the jury—vindicated the whole proceedings in the state trials, and maintained that the Government had done everything in their power to assert the supremacy of the laws, and to restore the country to tranquillity. But, now that this was accomplished, he agreed with Lord Normanby that the time was come to look forward, and to see what was to be done. Besides the commission had been appointed to inquire how matters, manifestly unjust, between landlord and tenant, could be remedied. It was proposed by Government to enlarge the county franchise, and, moreover, to remove the restrictions from the necessity of paying rates to which they are now compellable before registering their votes. Then an additional grant for education was in contemplation, and measures for the better training of schoolmasters. Besides these, Government hoped to give facilities for the endowment of Roman Catholic glebes, chapels, and institutions. These were the views of the Government. They were willing to make every concession to the Repeal Catholics of Ireland consistent with the maintenance of the Established Church and the Act of Union.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE contended that the real question was the present state of Ireland, in contrast with what it was on the accession to office of the administration. That country was now held by military occupation, and neither tranquillity nor civil government was to be found in it. The prosecutions had not put down the Repeal agitation, for the seditious and language uttered and struck at present were, if possible, stronger than before the State trials. He regretted that the measures contemplated by the Government were so few and feeble, though they promised, at least, to go in the right direction.

The Earl of RODEN attributed the present miserable circumstances in which Ireland was placed to the conduct of Lord NORMANBY when Lord Lieutenant, whose chief policy consisted in a total abandonment of the magistracy.

The Earl of DEVON explained the intentions of the Landlord and Tenant Commission, and omitted the progress it had made in its inquiries.

The Marquis of WESTMEATH supported the resolutions.

Lord MONTEAGLE, believing the resolutions proposed to be ill-timed, mischievous, and effective only in embarrassing the Government, could not give them his support.

Lord BEAUMONT gave his support to the motion.

On the motion of Lord CAMPBELL, the debate was adjourned to Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The SPEAKER took the chair at the usual hour, after a number of petitions had been presented,

Lord JOHN RUSSELL rose pursuant to notice, to bring forward his motion for a committee of the whole house to take into consideration the state of Ireland. He said it was a notorious fact, that that country was filled with troops, that all the preparations going on there showed an expectation of civil war, and that the country was governed, but not governed, by those to whom its interests were at present committed. Such was now the condition of Ireland, which two years ago was delivered tranquil and undisturbed into the hands of the present Government. He took it for granted that those he was addressing were all desirous to see the Legislative Union and an Imperial Parliament maintained, but if so it was their duty to see that the conditions of that union had been faithfully kept. And, if not, it was their duty to go into examination of England. His next remedy would refer to the franchises of the people of Ireland. He might be told that the concession of political privileges would not put food into the mouths of the people, but he confessed, unless those who looked upon the political rights as constitutional liberty as one of the best securities for national prosperity. In 1793 the Irish Parliament granted the franchise to the 40s. freeholders. Lord Stanley had proposed the £10 franchise in this country as a substitute, but in consequence of difficult conditions and so much of vexatious litigation, that none could have made use of it but those who were favoured by their landlords. It was a bill forced on by the noble lord, as all times, in season and out of season, till the house at last consented to entertain it. Lord Morpeth then proposed on the part of Government, a measure for the same purpose, but that was indignantly rejected, on the plea that it was founded on false premises. It proposed a more extended franchise; that proposal was scouted; and now the very men who had so scouted it has introduced it into the speech of the Queen. He believed, indeed, that Lord Stanley's bill had been framed for him by others of a lower, and more contracted liberality than his, and had been intended covertly, and insidiously, but practically and effectually, to annul the Emancipation Act; and that was the fit answer to the charge against Lord Morpeth of false pretences. He came now to the question of the eligibility of Roman Catholics to office. That eligibility was enacted by statute, but not fulfilled in fact. Many judicial offices had become vacant under this Administration; but not one had been conferred upon a Roman Catholic. It was pleaded that the Roman Catholics were always to the present Ministry. But why were they so? Certainly not from any general dissaffection to authority; the Roman Catholic creed was not, like that of the Protestant Dissenters, a creed that tended to liberalism; but for those very qualities in Dublin traversers, of exciting ill-will among one people against the other, had been committed by eminent men in the present Ministry, with only a transposition of the words; they had been committed, but to excite ill-will, not among the Irish against England, but among the English against Ireland. Were there not those in England, who had sought to excite an ill feeling against the people of Ireland, by describing them as "aliens?" "aliens?" "aliens?" He particularly alluded been prosecuted by the Attorney-General? (a laugh. No, he had been placed at the head of the magistracy of England, and that more for his superior merits as a judge, than for those very qualities in which he had indulged against the Irish people. How was it to be expected that the Catholics of Ireland could feel any political sympathy with a party by whom they were treated with such contempt? In 1831 Ireland was delivered over to the right hon. gentlemen opposite in a state of tranquillity. The accumulated evils of centuries had not been all corrected, but there was an increased confidence in the administration of justice, and the higher classes of Ireland enjoyed an improved prosperity. The appointments then made, particularly that of Lord Eliot, inspired him (Lord J. R.) with some confidence in the new Government, and there was no doubt on his mind that, if placed in different parts of the country. To some persons these meetings appeared dangerous, while others believed the wiser course would be not to interfere with them. Neither course was pursued. The meetings were allowed to go on, but the magistrates were cautioned them were dismissed. At last a meeting was prohibited within a few hours of the time fixed for holding it, and had it not been for the exertions of those very persons against whom legal proceedings had lately been taken, it was extremely probable that an attempt to prevent that meeting would have been followed by bloodshed. The noble lord went on to censure, in strong language, the whole conduct of the late trials in Dublin. The line of conspiracy was not the ancient law of the land. It was a judge-made law, and one that ought to be used with extreme caution. It was a law that might be made applicable to the Anti-Corn-Law meetings, to the agricultural associations formed in opposition to that League. The noble lord then complained of the exclusion from the panel of every Roman Catholic, an act that could not but leave on the minds of the Irish people an impression that the jury had been packed with an express view to obtain a conviction. Well, a conviction had been obtained, and what result was now expected from it? Mr. O'Connell sent to a prison by a jury of Protestants would certainly not lose any of the sympathy of his countrymen. Yet must there not be a course by which a better feeling might be established between the people of the two countries? Let Ireland, in the first place, have an impartial, and not a sectarian administration of justice. Let the franchise be made large and extensive, and equivalent to that of England. The corporate franchise ought also to be the same as in this country. Let there be no exclusion from office on account of creed. What he should propose, if the house went into committee, would be, firstly, to get rid of all sectarian policy; secondly, to give a fair and equal franchise, corporate as well as parliamentary; next, to abolish the system of civil exclusion. Then, as to the question of the ecclesiastical establishment. It had been urged, as a main objection against the voluntary system, that the clergy maintained by it were too apt to make themselves, and even their doctrines, subservient to the prejudices of those who paid for that maintenance. Now, this objection existed in Ireland with respect to the spiritual guides of 6,000,000 of people; and those guides were thus forced into politics and agitation. After some observations, by which the noble lord sought to show that Parliament need not be deterred from dealing, to the best of its judgment, with the temporalities of the Established Church, he proceeded to what was, perhaps, the most difficult question of all—namely, the struggle that constantly took place for the possession of land. A commission had been appointed to inquire into this subject, but it might be doubted whether any further information was required on the part of the landlords, at least, in Ireland were exercising a fearful power. He would not undertake to suggest a complete remedy for so great and long-enduring an evil, but he would at least wish to see an augmentation of the number of superior magistrates. Parliament had still an opportunity—a late one, but not too late a one—to deal by Ireland as had been done by Scotland, and thereby to make the political measures a popular one. It was, perhaps, the most delicate question of all—namely, the struggle that constantly took place for the possession of land. A commission had been appointed to inquire into this subject, but it might be doubted whether any further information was required on the part of the landlords, at least, in Ireland were exercising a fearful power. He would not undertake to suggest a complete remedy for so great and long-enduring an evil, but he would at least wish to see an augmentation of the number of superior magistrates. Parliament had still an opportunity—a late one, but not too late a one—to deal by Ireland as had been done by Scotland, and thereby to make the political measures a popular one. It was, perhaps, the most difficult

1. DANISH HONG. 2. BRITISH CONSULATE. 3. AMERICAN CONSULATE. 4. THE E. I. COMPANY'S.

THE HONGS AT CANTON, BEFORE THE LATE FIRE.

THE LATE FIRE AT CANTON.

We have been favoured, by a Correspondent at Canton, with the following very interesting letter, vividly describing the late fire at the Hongs, briefly alluded to in the intelligence from China in our last week's paper. The communication is accompanied by a drawing executed by a Chinese artist, which shows the precise locality of the conflagration, and is engraved above. To give an idea of the extent of the calamity, it should be understood that the Hongs extend 400 feet in depth. No. 1, the Danish Hong, is now a heap of ruins. No. 2, the British Consulate, is nearly destroyed. No. 3, the American Consulate, remains uninjured. No. 4, the East India Company's Hongs, are burnt to the ground; and the Dutch Hongs adjoining are quite consumed. We subjoin our Correspondent's letter:—

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

Consulate, Canton, Nov. 12, 1843.

The evening of the 24th of October was one of the pleasantest of that hot month; the breeze came up at intervals cool from the river, and brought variety in the ten thousand sounds and cries that spread far along its low, level, living banks. Barber, butcher, baker, greengrocer, fishmonger, floated there, and thus have floated for years beyond years, sensing forth, night and day, the same mingled murmur.

Hark! that boat's a perfect Babel! Oh! it is a racer, belonging to the working natives, taking their evening's amusement. See, she has fifty paddles! All rush, and look, and laugh, and talk, and wish more speed to the swift canoe. The light-hearted people!

The sound of the heavy gong, the report of the occasional gun, is from some Chinese war-boat—listen! Fewer boats, shop boats, lurchers, opium schooners, smugglers, clipper-built, dancing on the water, with a certain laughing, reckless devil, in their rake—the cumbrous junk. None are silent, and almost from your very feet rise the solfeggiamos of the sampans, "manned" in many instances by women, and then—how shrill.

Such is Canton river, as it interests man—the life on it—the life of it. Such the voice, the throbbing of a great sea city.

This is pulsation—its pulsation; as in man, liable to every casualty, having no lease of the current hour, no shield against the impending danger. In a moment it may be stilled for a time, or stayed for ever.

Had the fire of this awful night once touched the boats, which were often threatened, out of the many, many thousands, not one would have been saved. All the skill of man would have been taxed to extricate a single vessel from the vast fleet; and the water of the river could not have availed to quench the general flame of the locked vessels.

Destruction, however, was elsewhere glutted—say with 1400 or 1500 houses, the habitations of 12,000 people. But of this, too soon.

I was a stranger in Canton. The evening was most inviting; the scene per fectly novel. I sat down in a mandarin's terrace of flowers, open, by the kindness of the owner, to foreigners. It was built over the water. Here I enjoyed the panorama.

Beside me was an Armenian, from Calcutta, swarthy, hairy as Esau—good-humoured and fat. We talked of Byron, Venice, and the College there; his church, and scattered race. Next him, sat Parsees, clad in white robes, reaching to the ground, and high, various coloured, yet grave caps—fine-looking men, with black moustaches, of a tawny skin; keen, dark-eyed, wealthy merchants, with strange names, all Jee, jee, jee—herkien to Pestonjee, Merwanjee, Hurajee, Framjee, and then the Englishman firm, collected—his compressed lips and air of decision contrasting well with the undecided caste of Chinese physiognomy. The reflective and bold brow spoke of one who knew that he was a unit among millions, alien in blood, language, and religion; and knowing, grew in self reliance from the thought. Beneath, in the country-boats, or strolling around, were the Lascars of the East India traders—their hair black as night. They spread about the place their turbans of all the bright colours, and in the gay attire of a shawl or scarf costume, dyed to the richest hues, and bound round their finely built frames, flowing gracefully along their elegantly modelled and nervous limbs. Jack too, not other than Wapping knows him, was there. At seven o'clock I left. In half an hour the alarm of fire was given—in double that time the devoted city was revealed by a light clearer than day.

I stood on the top of a high building, and watched destruction grow. "Oh, it was a glorious sight for one who had no friend, no brother there." I had not even a second coat. A house, half a street, was but a moment's meal, and the unappeased monster marched on. I saw the town devoured. I heard the crash, crash, crash of the shivering timbers and falling walls. A strange, horrid interest gathered over the scene, as settles on the page of history where a city dies in a night.

On, on, on—unsatisfied by the hecatombs it had already demanded—vast, inexhaustible, torturing—rushed the fire; a spreading hell, pyramids of darkness above it, and the lurid glare of its own demon nature around it.

Here then some stately pile stood in strong resistance; and then and there would be a pause of a minute. One in particular, a factory of the Danish Hong, occupied by Messrs. Gibb, Livingstone, and Co., maintained its ground lobily. Here the interest thickens; now obscure, as within a portico of columnal smoke and a curtain of fire. Now revealed, cut off, hemmed in on every side. It endures, and is well; but, ah! the unequal contest cannot last.

Through Canton's narrow streets (you can touch the wall on each side, walking in the middle), passed and repassed, pouring the way for coolies, goods, soldiers, 10,000 lanterns. Peacefully, orderly, quickly, the goods were saved. The China men sending to the city; the foreigners to boats, hired at a great price. There passed the bullion of the Hongs—in uncounted wealth—the various merchandize—no strange sight—multitudes thronged, all armed; coolies with two swords each, which fitted into each other, and into a common sheath, and neither of which would cut anything. These were rattled against each other to inspire terror or give warning. The soldiers—and such soldiers—1000 English are a match for 20,000 of the ship-shod loose-looking military I have seen. The soldiers are rather better armed, though their guns reminded me of the things we buy for 5d. in the toy shops. They acted well, however, and kept the mob in order, and the thieves at bay.

By the command of the authorities, the foreign Hongs were well guarded by these men, and mandarins of high station appointed and presented aid to the merchants and terror to the evil-doers. The officials manifested the very best feeling, were devoted in their attention, and most serviceable. They deserve the thanks of the British—their warmest thanks. Without them our goods would have been plundered, perhaps our treasury and ourselves insulted, if not molested. In England you will learn these particulars with pleasure. It will give you confidence in the stability of our relationships with this singular but highly important nation.

At a moment when they might have been lukewarm, and still have saved their credit to a certain extent, they have been earnest, honest, zealous, effective.

They have forgotten prejudice, flung aside chicanery, and accepted in good faith the proffered right hand of Great Britain. Long may such relations last.

You have the public account of the fire; it is all I can give. Known only to Him who careth for the desolate is the hidden story of vast individual distress.

He may raise up for the sufferers new houses here. He can provide them with far happier hereafter.

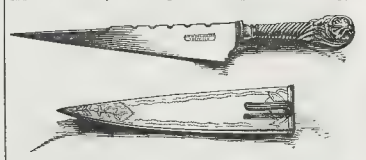
Our Correspondent adds, that many, if not all, the principals of the China-English houses are about to settle at Hong-Kong, where dwellings are being built for them. The colonists are already much attracted by Chinese theatricals; a general idea of which may be obtained from the annexed sketch.

CHINESE THEATRE.

THE BOWIE KNIFE OF AMERICA.

(From a Correspondent.)

Unsparingly as Brother Jonathan has been treated by his Britisher creditors, Sydney Smith, and all, on the subject of his mercantile blunder touching the doctrine of "repudiation," which "wasn't smart no how at all," neither "genuine shaving," nor "Yankeying;"



BOWIE KNIFE.

taunted, moreover, with his smarting reputation, we almost wonder that he has not long ago called out his Britisher antagonist to a contest with the choice weapon of his national chivalry, the Bowie Knife, which has so often closed a senatorial harangue on the floor of Congress. Paragraphs have frequently appeared of late in the Times, taken from American journals, in which this mysterious implement plays the premier rôle; and, in the days of our ignorance, great was our awe at every fresh allusion to it. "Knife" spoke for itself; but "Bowie?"—there was Anglo-Saxon antiquity in the very sound! Was it a Runic term for some heroic weapon wrought by the gnomes of the elder Northmen? We searched Wheaton's "History," but the American historian has made no allusion to his natural weapon; and our curiosity was left unsatisfied. Fresh accounts of the feats performed by this wondrous weapon served only to whet us still further. The fatal results of its use, so frequently recorded, suggested its being an admirable substitute for the bayonet of our troops; and in an access of ungovernable patriotism and curiosity we resolved to cross "the cod preserves," and see with our own eyes. While on the voyage, we often attempted to get our skipper "in a line" on the Bowie subject; but he always professed ignorance, and maintained that such things were only known in "the Far West." Landed in New York, from a Yankee pedlar we gleaned the information that no such "notions" as Bowie knives existed in those parts; but that in the south and west they were "as thick as hasty pooden."

There are several varieties of these weapons, plain or ornamented, according to the taste of the owner. The engraving represents a specimen, made by Unwin and Rodgers, of Sheffield; the handle and sheath are of Albata. It is the "enchilla" (small knife), and our correspondent remarks that we need not fear contamination by touching it, for had it ever belonged to a "Rowdie" we should even protect our tongs from the degradation of contact with it.

Col. Stoddart and Capt. Conolly.—Captain Grover has communicated to us the following interesting intelligence just received from Dr. Wolff. On the 8th December, he reached Ashkabah, and thus describes what took place:—"At Ashkabah I found again three dervishes from Bokhara, who left Bokhara four months ago. I asked them whether they had seen at Bokhara some English travellers. Bokharalee: 'Yes, and it was reported for some time that they had been killed, but there was no truth in it; but one of them came from Koban, with whom the King of Bokhara was angry, believing that he did assist the King of Koban, and, therefore, put both the tall and short Englishman into prison, but let them out after some time, and they now teach the soldiers of Bokhara the European exercise.'" Dr. Wolff gives the names and places of abode of these dervishes in Bokhara, and further states that at Erzeroum a Sheik of Bokhara, named Shah Jemand Addeen, of the family of Nakshbanchi, called upon him and said that he would find his friends alive and promised him letters. The fall of snow at Erzeroum has been extraordinary: eight men were brought in dead, and guns were fired every five minutes, in order to direct travellers their right road. There is no truth in the report that the doctor travelled on foot, and entered Erzeroum in silk stockings and a mackintosh! The doctor was well mounted, and Mr. Stephens, our excellent consul at Trebizond, had the kind consideration to send a Turk, named Omar, with him, who walked near his horse, and the doctor says, "an excellent fellow he was." The kindness of Col. Williams, her Majesty's commissioner at Erzeroum, and Mr. Brant, the consul, are beyond all praise. Colonel Williams had the kindness to write to Captain Grover, to state that the doctor was in excellent health, and would start on the 27th of December for Tabreez. Everything possible has been done by the Earl of Aberdeen to ensure the safety and comfort of Dr. Wolff. The next accounts will probably be from Tabreez.

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

PARLIAMENTRY PORTRAITS.—V.—VI.

[In our paper of the 3rd instant we commenced this series of Illustrations with Portraits of the Earl of Eldon and Lord Hill, the Mover and Seconder of the Address in the House of Lords; and of Viscount Clive and Mr. Cardwell, the Mover and Seconder of the Address in the House of Commons. We now resume with Portraits of two of the most distinguished Leaders of the Debates of the past week.]

THE MARQUIS OF NORMANBY.

It is an established practice for every great political movement to be carried on simultaneously in both houses of parliament. It has no been departed from in the case of the debate on Ireland. While Lord John Russell was moving his resolution in the Commons, the Marquis of Normanby was urging the peers to agree to one of a similar tendency. His speech was not equal to the address of the noble lord in the other house. It was less sustained, and less connected as a whole; this is only saying that the noble marquis is not so skilled an orator as the scion of the House of Bedford; but in intention his address was the same, portions of it were strong both in the facts and the deductions from them, while his position, as having been Viceroy of Ireland, made him speak "as one having authority." While in that country he certainly endeavoured as much as possible to soften the differences between parties of divided religious and opposing politics; and he could also boast with truth that during his government the island was not held by military occupation. We give a sketch of his lordship, adding only that he is favourably known to the literary world as a clever novel writer of the "fashionable" school. He is a man of accomplished and elegant manners, which are set off by a tall and commanding figure. He sat in the House of Commons as Lord Normanby; he was created a marquis in 1838. He has been Home Secretary, Lord Privy Seal, Secretary of State for the Colonies, and Governor of Jamaica.

THE MARQUIS OF NORMANBY.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

The debate on the affairs of Ireland commenced on Tuesday evening, and, still proceeding, promises to be one of the most important that has ever taken place with respect to that country, and the "chief difficulty" of the Conservative party has been often discussed. It will be rendered still more interesting by the presence of the great leader of the agitation, who has announced his intention of appearing, for the first time, after an absence of more than a year, in his place in the senate, to take a part in the discussion. In a legal sense he will sit there as a state criminal; but in the position of parties there is a large section of the house who will look on him as the champion of his country, and who will hail his appearance with satisfaction. The speech of Lord John Russell on the opening of the debate has done much to increase this feeling: it was a powerful address, and fell with great effect on the opposite benches. Never before did the leader of the Whigs express so openly, so cordially, or so unreservedly, his admiration of Mr. O'Connell, his sympathy with his exertions, or his gratitude to him for his assistance in former days in preserving the peace and tranquillity of the country. The speech is at once an elaborate defence of Mr. O'Connell, and a keen dissection of the whole proceedings of the late trial. One part of it conveyed a strong censure on Lord Lyndhurst, for the careless manner in which the noble lord states that he discharges his judicial functions.

The present debate is one of the epochs in the history of parties important at the present moment, but of far greater importance in its effects on future events in both England and Ireland. We give a sketch of the noble mover of the resolution; we have given a biographical notice of his lordship in a former number.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

THE DUBLIN STATE TRIALS.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

LONDON, THURSDAY, FEB. 15, 1844.

Having repassed the seas, made the harbour of Liverpool, shaken myself to a jelly in the eternal train, achieved a satisfactory landing at the Euston-station, and cabbed my way into the Strand, I am now able to address you from your own office no longer your Dublin Correspondent, but still your Correspondent about Dublin. I have now only to detail to you the routine of occurrences as they fell out, from the close of the defence of the traversers up to the period of my leaving the city after the great meeting—which succeeded the verdict of the jury—at Conciliation Hall. I must, I know, write at a disadvantage after the journals have already published by expresses of extraordinary rapidity and expense (I allude, by the way, only to the Times, Post, and Advertiser, for the Chronicle and Herald missed fire, and had no arrangements made), not only the details, but the great result of the trials, still I feel that your readers are entitled to the last of the pictures which I have humbly attempted to give with fidelity and effect, and therefore at once I spread my canvass for the finale, and work my pen upon the outline of my closing sketch.

When O'Connell had ceased speaking, and the defence for the traversers had closed—so far as forensic oratory was concerned—the good people of Dublin went home and speculated upon the nature of the evidence that was to be adduced by the "Liberator," or "Conspirator" (I sacrifice both terms at the shrine of impartiality), and his friends. Rumour put her lips of mystery to her trumpet of brass, and blew a blast of expectation abroad, that set down the duration of the trials at a twelvemonth at the least. Two hundred witnesses (some said two thousand) were to be examined seriatim, and every man's evidence would occupy a day! Here was a pretty prospect. I began to think seriously of asking permission to pitch my tent in the Four Courts, with a sleeping apartment in one of the judge's chambers, and a sort of eternal conviction pervading my mind that there was

No rest but the grave

(except in the said sleeping apartment) for a pilgrim to the temple of a State prosecution. As you will have seen, however, it turned out tout au contraire—and the defence examinations, instead of spreading over one year, dwindled into the span of one day.

Pity the sorrows of a poor old man
Whose days have dwindled to the shortest span.

Pity the blank countenances of calculators who had set their hearts upon a whole twelvemonth of prosecution, and suddenly found that it would be over within a week!

The evidence was not much, and was greatly interspersed by law argument as to its admissibility, the judges on the bench differing as to one or two points. The Society of Friends and the Ouzel Galley Club were brought forward as recognised conspiracies, whose courts of arbitration were not even cavilled at, for one of the witnesses had seen Mr. Brewster there, and Mr. Brewster did not exclaim, "flat burglary!" when he heard him say so. The real truth, however, is, that the testimony brought forward was really unimportant, and it certainly made no great play in the trial.

On the following morning the Solicitor-General commenced his defence, which occupied the whole of one day, and the commencement of the next. It is a document of wonderful argument and force, and created a powerful impression upon the public, greatly damping the spirits of the traversers, and gradually destroying their hopes of a favourable verdict. As I have done most impartial justice to the beautiful defences of Sheil and Whiteside, and, indeed, to the speeches of the traversers' counsel generally, I must render equal justice to this most able advocate of the validity of the prosecution, and the interests of the Crown. A most distinguished bearing did the Solicitor-General maintain all throughout his calm, argumentative, and memorable display. Conspicuous for a good humour with which he had armed himself at all points, "he would not pin a quarrel to his sleeve," no matter what challenges beset him, but preserved the gravity of the lawyer with the dignity of a gentleman; and certainly exhibited more undisturbed decorum (with a certain and admirable firmness of demeanour) than any other counsel that had yet addressed the Bench. Unruffled, though not un-taunted—un-angered, though not unprovoked—he plunged in medias res into the very pith and marrow of the case, clearing away the brushwood, and making the path plain, and then advancing upon it with a rapidity proportionate to its smoothness, a facility commensurate with its breadth. It was soon perceptible that he was stripping the traversers' case—nay, scalping it! Bit by bit the skin was being shed, the feathers were moulting and falling off, the bark was peeling from the tree, the gilt was torn from the gingerbread, the tinsel vanishing from the garment, the mask falling from the face. Preceding oratory was almost forgotten under the cool judgment of this experienced flayer, the flowers of rhetoric were fading, the fruits of declamation were dead! There was no denying it; there stood the grinning skeleton of the naked deformity; there was the conspiracy stark, palpable, and unveiled! And all this was brought about so quietly, with such perfect self-possession and mind mastery, that one almost wondered how so gentle a gladiator could deal such heavy blows—how so much mildness of manner could be compatible with the slaughter it achieved. It was really, in all senses, a most clever speech, and is generally considered to have greatly raised the character of its speaker. His law was never doubted; but his reply in this case is greatly added to his character for—not exactly eloquence, but something which with him is more than a substitute for it, inasmuch as it includes the power to destroy its plausibility in a very extraordinary degree.

So much for the Solicitor-General; and now for the Court.

As soon as the Crown lawyer had concluded his reply, the tone of public feeling was greatly altered and instead of hearing at all corners o the city, "There will be no verdict—there will certainly be no verdict," the phrase was varied to, "All will now depend upon the summing-up -everything now is centred in the Judge's Charge." "But all four Judges will charge," said one—and "Perrin will differ from the rest," said another—and "If that's the case there will be no verdict," rejoined a third.

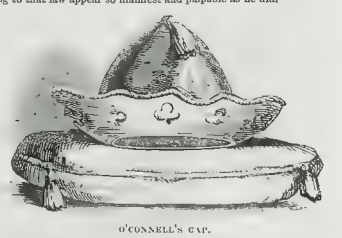
So did speculation disport itself—and the butterfly-folly which assumes knowledge in uncertainty disport its wings about the Irish heart. The truth was nobody knew anything, and everybody was wrong.

When the charge really eventuated, it was a very simple but a very strong affair. The Chief Justice delivered it; and, to the dismay of many, announced that the judges were all agreed, and consequently there would be no necessity for more than one of them to address the jury, and after this he delivered himself up to his arduous duty. His interpretation of the law of conspiracy was very luminous and good, and his after dissection of the facts of the case was a beautiful illustration of the law of order in the judicial minds which separates, classifies, arranges, and admits of no confusion or tumult of ideas. Much of what he said bore upon it the grave impress of undeniable justice—and so convincing was it that I heard a Radical and a Repealer exclaim before it was over—half in hopelessness and half in conviction—"If I were trying my own father for conspiracy I would find him guilty after that charge."

Another consequence of the Chief Justice's summing up, however, was an accusation that it savoured of partizanship, and yet Judge Perrin was there, hearing, recognising, and giving the "consent of silence" to all he said. Yet, I confess, that the charge told so forcibly (so deservedly it may be), but, I will add, so terribly, against the traversers, that had the Judge been the advocate, he could not have been more earnest and severe. He must have held that course to have been his imperative duty—in vindicating the majesty of the law—or certainly he would not have made the guilt of the traversers according to that law appear so manifest and palpable as he did.

THE RECORDER'S COURT, DUBLIN.

The above engraving, which represents the Recorder's Court, Dublin, as it appeared on the revision of the jury lists a few days previous to the State Prosecutions being tried in the Court of Queen's Bench, has been over since then in deference to the more exciting scenes which took place in the latter locality, although in point of fact the proceedings were not less interesting. Here it was that the citizens of Dublin—the sick, the halt, and the blind—were summoned to attend, to have their names placed on the jury list, in order to be properly qualified to serve their country in the forthcoming state trials; and whilst many octogenarians came forward to insist on their right, very few indeed attempted to be excused. The conduct of the Recorder on that occasion has been the theme of praise with both parties, although a man of strong political predilections, but the accident by which one of the slips containing the names of a large number of Roman Catholics and liberal Protestants was lost and excluded from the lottery, gave rise to many severe strictures, which reached, however, no further than the underlings. As we gave in a recent number a biographical sketch of the learned Recorder, it is unnecessary to advert here to his public career. The Recorder's Court may be considered the Central Criminal Court of Dublin. It adjoins the gaol of Newgate, in Green-street.



O'CONNELL'S CAP.

The above drawing represents the velvet cap and green tassel, presented to O'Connell at the Mullaghmast meeting, and which has since taken the shape of a crown in the vivid imaginations of the Attorney and Solicitor-Generals. It will be remembered that the ceremonial which attended the presentation of this specimen of head-gear which is not less velvet than the country cap, invented by Prince Albert), was commented on with great stress by the lawyers for the Crown, and, to say the truth, there is something suspicious in the imitation of a coronet and the cushion on which it reposes; but, Honi soit qui mal y pense.

At half-past five he ceased, and the jury were sent to their deliberations. After they had been a short time in conclave, the Court adjourned till nine o'clock, and then commenced an excitement mixed up of phrensy, curiosity, uncertainty, and suspense, which told how much depended on the crisis, and how close the crisis was at hand.

Before the adjournment was over thousands of anxious people had rushed into the circular area of the Four Courts, and lined and thronged the street between the Lifey and the Quay. Within the Court itself presented an amazing exhibition. There were but two vacant places there—the jury-box and the judges' seat. Every other cranny was filled to suffocation by the burning and expectant people. The "wreck of matter" might have decently, and but certainly the "crush of worlds" could not have exceeded it. It was in itself a world of crush—an epitome of jam satis—of ram, jam, and cram-satis—of squeezable materials most vigorously squeezed. Fortunately there were no women in the court: it was enough to make men faint—women would indubitably have expired.

The Press-box was indeed a press-box in the most literal sense. You could not see that there were fifteen people in it at all: you perceived, it is true, a number of arms and heads, but only one body. The creatures of the plume had amalgamated themselves into one dense form of shapeless humanity, like a parti-coloured sea cat, or any other monster of deformity. Tom Cooke's two single gentlemen rolled into one," were nothing to the half hundred of well-sized anatomies that here mangled each other into "room for twelve." It was the press hot-pressed with a vengeance. For my part, my principal reflection was the extravagant one, that just then I could have blessed the Christian who would have given me an orange for a guinea. However, I had my business to mind, and this consisted chiefly of ejaculating "Oh dear!" and wauting until the jury had minded theirs. It was some consolation to know that Judge Crampton's patience was being exercised in a similar manner, though none to feel the hardship of my own position, and to recognise the easiness of a Morocco-cushioned chair.

At last the jury came—when it was past eleven—and returned a broad, plain, emphatic verdict of "guilty" upon nearly all the counts, and that settled the destiny of the case; and while the jury were being sent back for an informality in the construction of the verdict (which you will have duly reported), their ears were pleasantly assailed by a groan, which might well have interpreted the concentrated agonies of ten thousand yellow fevers, and of sufficient cholera-morbus to have desolated an Ind. It was, indeed, a "tartation spicy groan," and "loud enough," as Jonathan would say, "to have roused a hospital."

When the jury got back they became fixtures. In vain of no avail for the sheriff to say—

Snail, snail, come out of your hole,
Or else I'll beat you as black as coal.

In their hole they stuck—and when they did come "the midnight curtain fell so thick upon them" that they were out of sorts and into Sunday before you could say Jack Robinson—and the judge was consequently obliged to send them to bed like good children and lock them up for the night.

Meanwhile there had been enough done to know that in some shape or other there would be a verdict of "Guilty," and with this important intelligence a Government express steamer, a Queen's messenger, and two or three reporters, committed themselves to wind and fire, and proceeded across the Channel.

Dublin town continued in a ferment for an hour or two, which, however, died gradually away as the crowds dispersed to their several Lubations.

On Sunday the Nation did not hesitate to publish one of its Repeal lyrics, of which the disloyalty is so abominable and the poetry so good, I quote it for its freedom and power, and because its spirit is more general and less dangerous than the famous and infamous song of '98.

"YES! WITH YOU IT RESTS TO DO IT."

[illegible] it sta to do it
[illegible]
[illegible] through it,
Never pausing till 'tis done.
Each past triumph owes its crowning,
Gives of future victories omen.
Courage! then—be prompt and steady—
Cool in thought—in action ready;
Let your efforts still continue,
All you have to win they'll win for you.

II.

When the Apostle, chain-encumbered,
In his dungeon lay at night,
O'er his fetters, as he slumbered,
Broke a flood of heavenly light;
Starting up, he saw beside him
Stand an angel, forth to guide him;
What obeying, might wonder,
Fast and rivet fell asunder.
God, who made him free, will free you,
If for freedom fit he see you.

III.

Lo! he sid as yours already—
Seek you freedom—earn your time—
Slowly, but assured [illegible],
On it comes with step sublime.
Rejoice, for your [illegible]
[illegible]
Who can [illegible] Heaven?
Yes! you've one can free each sinew,
In the soul that dwells within you!

Perhaps this is not more seditious than Moore, and it is quite as good.

On Monday morning the verdict was delivered to a court of three Judges, put, after a little more haggling, into a proper form, and then all was known and all was over. So ended the trials, and we are not quite sure that the Attorney-General did not exclaim on his way Lomeward, "Sic transit gloria munday."

Judgment was not prayed for, and O'Connell departed in his carriage amid the cheering of the mob.

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.—FRIDAY.

The Court sat [illegible] resumed his address at the sitting of the Court, and concluded at [illegible] o'clock.

The Chief Justice proceeded to charge the jury. He said the Court were then to ask to the facts to be laid before the jury. After referring to the case of Mr. Carey, who having been attended at the meeting [illegible] on the 2nd of October, and in whose favour there was that qualification, [illegible] decided to refer to the terms of the coronation oath, which he contended prohibited her Majesty from entertaining any proposition for the Repeal of the Union, apart from or independent of the Legislature. The law permitted the people, except the lawful Parliament of the country, as settled by Queen, Lords, and Commons, at the present time and therefore, it was incompetent to Mr O'Connel or any other person, to attempt an alteration of the law by illegal [illegible] or violent means. The traverers had with Mr. O'Connel tint the Act of Union [illegible] but, if so, where was the use, he asked, of seeking the Repeal of such an Act? A great many years ago Mr. O'Connel appeared to entertain strong opinions against the Act of Union, and he had given evidence that he entered a meeting in Dublin in opposition to the Repeal of the Union. That meeting, however, was a meeting regularly constituted; not by irresponsible [illegible] but by the High Sheriff of the City of Dublin, at which every freeman [illegible] right to attend. Mr. O'Connell had a right to [illegible] did at that meeting, but the present was the first time [illegible] stirring his acts in 1834 by what he did thirty years ago. It was 6 o'clock the Court separated.

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.—SATURDAY.

Punctually at ten o'clock the Court again resumed, when the Chief Justice [illegible] to the [illegible] referred to the large sums [illegible] remitted to the [illegible] of the Association from England, Scotland, Ireland, and America, and to the Association, thus provided with funds, [illegible] ribed as the instrument by which Mr. O'Connell and the [illegible] work out the object [illegible] the Repeal of the Union. That in itself was a legal and legitimate object, but in pursuing it the traversers had no right to resort to intimidation, or [illegible] to compel the Legislature to come [illegible] intention to the monster meeting [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] pertinent of the [illegible] [illegible] attack on Lord Jeffrey [illegible] and discontent [illegible] [illegible] subjects. He noticed the [illegible] ing, at which Mr. O'Connell spoke of his intention of establishing [illegible] Courts, and the intended meeting of 300 gentlemen in Dublin to [illegible] forms of Repeal. The former he described as a gross and unwarrantable [illegible] of the royal prerogative, and the latter as a new edition of [illegible] miraculous lamp, which conferred on the possessor everything [illegible] According to the Mullaghmast meeting, and the paper entitled "[illegible]" he inquired how it happened, if the [illegible] were [illegible] contrary to the desire, or without the cognizance of the traversers, that the O'Connell police did not put a stop to the selling of it, [illegible] and the while that the O'Connell police in that case would have been assuming a power and authority to which they had neither right nor title a power and authority, by the way, against which the Court of Queen's Bench [illegible] not only protest, but, in all probability, regard as "a gross and unwarrantable interference with the legal and constituted tribunals of the land." He then proceeded to inquire into the real objects and intent of those meetings and especially that of Mullaghmast—which he thought went the full length of showing an agreement between the traversers, and, therefore, establishing the charge of conspiracy. He then recapitulated the meetings which some of the traversers attended, and the publications with which others were connected, and from these he drew the conclusion that all were influenced by the same motives, and labouring for the attainment of the same objects, and through the instrumentality of the same means; and, therefore, that all were more or less guilty of the charges preferred against them in the indictment.

The learned judge having concluded his charge at five o'clock, the jury retired to consider their verdict amid scenes of the greatest excitement, and, there was evinced by those within the court, as well as by the rapidly increasing crowds without.

Mr. Justice Crampton, at half-past seven, returned to the court, but finding that the jury were still out, stated he should be again in attendance at a quarter to nine, and shortly after that hour he was again in attendance.

The foreman was then called upon, when he waited for instructions with regard to the finding on particular counts, after receiving which he retired, and it was not until half-past eleven that the jury came into court.

The Clerk of the Crown then proceeded to call on the jury for their verdict. He said, gentlemen, have you all agreed upon your verdict?

The Foreman.—Yes.—(Great sensation in the court.)

The findings of the jury was then handed to the Clerk of the Crown, which that officer read aloud

On the first count, no finding.

On the second count, no finding.

On the third count you say that Daniel O'Connell, Richard Barrett, and Charles Gavan Duffy, are guilty.

On the fourth count you say that Daniel O'Connell, John O'Connell, Thomas Matthew Ray, John Gray, Thomas Steele, and Charles Gavan Duffy, are guilty.

On the fifth count you say that Daniel O'Connell, John O'Connell, Thomas Matthew Ray, John Gray, Thomas Steele, Charles Gavan Duffy, and Thomas Tierney are guilty.

On the sixth count you say nothing.

On the seventh count you say that Daniel O'Connell, John O'Connell, Thomas Matthew Ray, John Gray, Thomas Steele, and Charles Gavan Duffy, are Guilty.

On the eighth count no finding.

On the ninth count no finding.

On the tenth count you say that Daniel O'Connell, John O'Connell, Thomas Matthew Ray, Thomas Steele, John Gray, and Charles Gavan Duffy, are Guilty.

On the eleventh count there is no finding, but merely the foreman's signature for self and fellow jurors.

Mr. Justice Crampton.—You must take your verdict back, for in the present state it is imperfect in some of the counts—in respect to which you have come to no conclusion as to the guilt or innocence of the traversers. It is your duty to return a verdict of guilty or not guilty; and if you cannot come to an agreement on any count or county you have to say so in your verdict.

Judge Crampton.—With respect to the first count, of course you will say as to so much of it as you find in other counts guilty or not guilty.

Mr. Moore, Q.C.—In saying not guilty to the first count they are quite right.

Judge Crampton.—It is not only right, but it is quite right if they so think.

To the Jury.—As to all those counts upon which you are agreed, you are to say some of the defendants are guilty and some are not. You are to name those whom you find guilty, and those whom you say are not. As to any count on which you are not agreed, you ought to state "we have not agreed on this count." If you are able to arrive at the conclusion of "guilty or not guilty on all the counts," it will be your duty so to do. With respect to the first count, if I understand you correctly, there are parts of it on which you are not agreed, and parts on which you are agreed.

A Juryman.—No, my lord; we are agreed on the first count, there is no difference of opinion among the jury, it is merely the wording of the finding that we are at a loss for.

Judge Crampton.—That is what I thought; you must find your verdict on all the other counts with respect to all the defendants; we shall then be able to take them you come into court on the various points found on the first count.

The Attorney-General then rose to make some observations, when he was interrupted by Mr. Moore, who suggested that the jury should retire.

The Attorney-General and the jury were not bound to find. The first count embraces the several branches of the conspiracy, which are split up afterwards in other words, and if they say that the several traversers, or any of them, are guilty, of course they will decide on such portion of the first count as they think they should find.

Mr. Moore.—I am not desirous of saying anything in the way of argument, but on the part of one of the traversers I certainly object to the direction.

During the observations that were passing between the Bench and Counsel, the crowds in the hall and in the inner avenues of the court were loudly cheering. As soon as the jury had given their verdict, some person communicated to the assemblage in the hall that Daniel O.Connell had been acquitted, and the people there immediately commenced cheering, and the shouts were taken up and re-echoed by the crowds outside.

When the jury had retired about half an hour, the Attorney-General suggested that, as it was just twelve o'clock, the court would not sit till ten and would be given on Sunday, the Court should adjourn until Monday morning.

Judge Crampton. It is not twelve o'clock yet.

The Attorney-General. It only wants ten minutes to the hour. The verdict could not be received until twelve o'clock, and therefore I beg to ask whether it would not be right to adjourn.

Mr. Justice Crampton.—It is necessary that this question should be raised? I should be very sorry further to inconvenience the jury. I should be much better satisfied if the verdict were given to-night. I have received a verdict at two or three o'clock in the morning in capital cases.

The Jury were then called. On their appearing,

Mr. Justice Crampton said—Gentlemen, have you now arranged your verdict?

The Foreman. Not yet, my lord.

Mr. Justice Crampton.—It is very near twelve o'clock; therefore, you had better be quick. (Great laughter.) This noise (observed his lordship) is extremely indecent, and I must request the authority of the Court, if I find any person committing a breach of order.

The jury then retired, and some minutes after, it was observed by Mr. Henn, that it was twelve o'clock. Some conversation then took place, and finally, at a quarter past twelve o'clock, the jury were called into court, and informed that it was too late to receive the verdict, and the Court adjourned until nine o'clock on Monday.

Mr. Henn handed a written notice to the Court, in which he took an objection to the power of the Court adjourning after twelve o'clock.

The crowds which had assembled in the court and its neighbourhood, as soon as they became aware of the true verdict, set up one of those frightful howls so well known among an angry Irish mob. Not the slightest disturbance occurred however, during the night.

All the Editors and Proprietors of the Dublin Repeal journals have acceded from the Repeal Association, as, according to the exposition of the law given by the Lord Chief Justice, every member of the Association is accountable for every word which was published in those papers, so long as the Editors took part in their proceedings.

THE VERDICT.

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY. MONDAY.

The proceedings have been adjourned to nine o'clock this morning to receive the verdict of the jury in the case of the State Trials, considerable excitement prevailed in the [illegible] of the courts long before that hour. A large body of police were on duty in and near the courts, and the avenues to the court were filled at the various gates and passages. A great many were also stationed in the hall, and no persons were admitted even the reporters such as bore about them some evidence that they were connected with the press.

At a few minutes before nine the Court of Queen's Bench was much crowded, the principal gallery being thronged as usual, and the outer bar filled with gentlemen in their wigs and gowns.

Mr. O'Connell and the other traversers were present before the appointed hour, and there was a full attendance of the counsel and agents for the defence. Mr. O'Connell was accompanied by Mr. Smith O'Brien, M.P.

At a few minutes past nine the Chief Justice, with Judges Burton and Crampton, took their seats on the bench, Mr. Justice Perrin being the only judge of the court absent.

Mr. Justice Crampton then said—The Chief Justice and my brother Burton not having been present at the last adjournment of the court, it is, perhaps, for them that I should state what took place on that occasion. The jury having retired on Saturday evening, I remained for a considerable time in my room, and having received an intimation from the jury that they would not be ready for an hour or so, I adjourned the court to nine o'clock. At nine I returned, and found that the jury were not yet ready; and, having remained a considerable time [illegible] in my room, I sent the sheriff to the jury to know whether there were a likelihood of their coming to a decision. In a short time, I think, after eleven, I received [illegible] and having communicated again with the jury, through the sheriff, I had them called out, when they came into the box with a verdict, which they handed to the Clerk of the Crown. The verdict was very [illegible] and as such I could not receive it. The jury were, manifestly, perplexed about the first and second counts, although they stated that they were perfectly agreed as to the verdict. I explained to them the course they should adopt as to the form of the verdict; but I did not give sufficient information on the subject. The jury then retired, and in a short time after the Attorney-General stated that it was then after 12 o'clock, and being Sunday morning the verdict should not be received; and, accordingly, no consent having been given by the traversers that the verdict should be received, I adjourned the court till nine o'clock to-day. These were the circumstances which I wished to state. Whilst waiting for the jury to prepare their verdict, I was engaged [illegible] drawing up issues in the form in which I thought they should be submitted to the jury. There was originally but one issue sent up to the jury; but that, I think, was insufficient, for there are, in reality, five distinct issues in the first

(Continued on page 107.)

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SUNDAY, Feb. 18th.—Quinquagesima Sunday.
MONDAY, 19th.—Copernicus born, 1473.
TUESDAY, 20th.—Shrove Tuesday.
WEDNESDAY, 21st.—Ash Wednesday.
THURSDAY, 22nd.—A. Ferguson died, 1816.
FRIDAY, 23rd.—Cato-street Conspiracy, 1820.
SATURDAY, 24th.—St. Matthias.

HIGH WATER at London Bridge, for the Week ending Feb 24.

Monday.		Tuesday		Wednesday		Thursday.		Friday		Saturday.
M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.
h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.
2 48	3 5	3 33	3 49	4 14	4 31	4 53	5 10	5 38	5 54	6 27	6 40

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS,
TERMS, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

	£	s.	d.
Per Quarter	0	6	6
Half Year	0	13	0
One Year	1	6	0

May be had of all Newsmen and Booksellers, or at the Office, 198, Strand.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CENSUS.—"A Subscriber."—The population of the parish of Oundle, in Northampton, is correctly given in our last, according to the Parliamentary Return.

Omitted.—St. Dennis parish, Cornwall, pop. 893.

"J. M."—The charge, per quarter, for our journal is 6s. 6d., to be paid in advance. The other questions are answered in the present Number.

"J. C. R."—Perhaps.

"Rev. E. T. H."—The influx of Portraits, at the season, will, we fear, prevent our engraving the portrait suggested by our correspondent.

"Fiat Justitia," Temple.—The appearance of the portraits of the three eminent counsel was purposely delayed, in consequence of the re-examination being deferred for a fortnight. They shall appear next week.

"H. A. C.," Leicester, is thanked, but we have not space for the local events at greater length than at present. The other suggestion is not to us a novel idea.

"Damosthenes," London, has, we fear, lost his lantern; he should write to the Postmaster of Glasgow.

"J. W. C.," Windsor.—The covers are charged at a less price than the binding

"F. F."—The failure is already notorious. Our correspondent's suggestion has been in some measure anticipated.

"A Subscriber," Yorkshire.—We doubt the practicability of devoting more space in our journal to sporting matters than is done at present.

"W. B. S." Hazelgrove, County Down.—The chronology of the events of the first half of the year 1843 is contained in the supplement to No. 62 of our journal.

"J. F. Dudley."—The charge for binding the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, by Messrs. Remnant and Edwards, is 5s. per volume.

"A," Mount Pleasant. We have not received the Repeal card.

"Z. A.," Leamington, Warwickshire.—The charge for advertising patent or proprietary medicines is double that of the general scale. Will our correspondent write with real name and address?

"G. K." Wood-end, Scarborough.—We agree with our correspondent as to the railway monopoly, which, it is to be hoped, will be kept down by the Legislature.

"G. H. C.," Bermondsey.—Midway.

"A Cornish Subscriber."—Almost closed. The sketch was taken in court.

"W. J. V." should write to the editor of the "Art-Union."

"J. M. C."—We will endeavour.

"V. B."—No.

"A. B. C."—The group already engraved must suffice. Our correspondent should attend Mr. Cubitt's very interesting exhibition.

"S. W.," Luton. The volumes can be bound to match by giving the requisite instructions to the binder.

"J. W."—We have not room.

"T. M.," Bridge-street, Cambridge.—The sketch is not sufficiently picturesque for illustration.

"J. D." We cannot entertain his proposition.

"J. P. P." should write to the publisher of the "Illuminated Magazine," No. 2, Crane-court, Fleet-street.

"A Reader" is thanked for the diagram of the sun and earth, &c., which is, however, inappropriate for a newspaper.

"J. B.," Battle.—We think not. The Irish trials have been specially and circumstantially reported in our journal.

"C. A. H. R.," Alnwick, is thanked for several hints, of which we may incidentally avail ourselves.

"T. M." Cora Downs, Ireland.—Dr. Mantell's "Wonders of Geology."

"G. N.," Norwich.—We know nothing of the lottery in question except by the advertisement

"Query," Acton, may obtain the information he requires of Mr. R. Hill's publishers, Messrs. C. Knight and Co., Ludgate-street.

"H. S. C." is thanked for the sketch of the restored church window. The subject is not, I suppose, sufficiently popular for engraving.

"T. Hobbs," Tooting.—Dodd's "Parliamentary Companion," which is one of the best and most correct authorities on all matters of this kind, says that "the hereditary title of Don, affixed to the name of the member for Roscommon, is by some supposed to be a corruption of the Latin Dominus, and conferred upon the head of the O'Connor family by the Spanish settlers in Ireland. Others suppose it to be derived from the word don, the colour of the standards of this particular family of O'Connors, which served to distinguish it from the Black and Red O'Connors."

"Constitutional" would be a very envious reader, or he would see that there is no ground for his complaint. One of the sources to which he refers us for information is very stale indeed, and shows how little he is aware of our superior intelligence.

"J. S.," Leamington.—We have no connection with music shops. We would advise our fair correspondent to make personal inquiry at some respectable establishment where new publications are in constant succession.

"A Subscriber," Penzance.—Apply to Mr. Brewer, Hanway-passage, Oxford-street.

"A Subscriber," Market-hill, Cambridge.—Inquire at a music shop; booksellers do not deal in woodcuts.

"A Purchaser of our Paper."—There are no very definite rules in Persian grammar, but the accent is on the second syllable of the word in question.

"S. L." The lines will not suit.

"Bran" must surely have gathered "the nature of the offices of the Attorney and Solicitor Generals" from the recent trials at Dublin.

"J. H. S."—Will our correspondent favour us with the article? The engravings are in hand.

"J. B."—We have not room for the lines.

"H. D. G." Our opinion was fully expressed in No. 26 of our journal.

"E. S.," Leeds.—Probably an account will appear in a few days.

The tales or sketches sent by "Alfred W——" and "W. T." are not adapted for a newspaper.

Will "A Lover of the Intellectual Drama" take into consideration the crowded state of our columns?

"W. M."—We shall be glad to receive the proposed article; we have a picturesque engraving of the place.

"Honestus" should write to any Parliamentary agent.

INSERTIONS.—Poor Reginald's Rhymes. Lines on the Distressed Needlewoman, by E.; Sonnet to the Dear Infant; Rural Pleasures, by M. W.; Lines by a Student in the School of Christ, Impromptu, by Dundrum, Dublin; Epigrams on a Recent Incident, &c.

ERRATA.—In the tale of "The Young Flageolet Player," in our last number, for Calton read Stanton Lees and Hill; and for Joudgrave read Youlgrave.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1844.

In the midst of the excitement of a party debate, based to a considerable extent on the conduct and result of so unusual an occurrence as a state trial, it is not improbable that the recent measure for the amelioration of some of the provisions of the Poor Laws may pass with less notice than it deserves; yet, the measure is the most important as to practical results of the Session. It proves that the Government see the complaints made of the working of the law to be in some respects but too well founded; it also proves what we are glad to see exists, but what we wish had been manifested earlier—a disposition to relax some, at least, of the more objectionable enactments. The Bill introduced does not certainly err on the side of tenderness; after examining it, it will be found to leave untouched much that has been and will continue to be objected to. Some of the details of workhouse management, for instance, which have been more dwelt on, and caused more irritation than the absolute provisions of the law itself, are passed unnoticed. We refer to the practice of separation between the mother and the infant, and the aged man and wife, in those abodes of destitution—the Union Workhouses. This is explained by the allegation that both these regulations are not laid down in any part of the Act; they are practices ordered by the Commissioners, and the Commissioners' orders, when certified by the Home Secretary, have, as Sir James Graham observes, the "force of a legal enactment." Now, it is very easy to issue a general order; but the misery of the thing is this—that this uniform and general order falls with dreadful inequality and horrible hardship on different persons, under different circumstances. It is the great fault of such an order that it is general—that it is uniform—and that the acting on it is compulsory. The Bill should have contained some clause giving a discretionary power to those who have to carry out the details of workhouse management, to deviate from the order in certain circumstances. From what has been published of the usual habits of the subordinates of the great system, it does not appear likely that they will err much on the side of indulgence; they are of the class whom the continual sight of misery hardens into indifference to it. "Seldom when the steeled gaoler is the friend of man." They are not gaolers, perhaps, though union workhouses are often called "Bastilles." But we think that there need be no fear that a discretion given them would run into laxity. But it would have this effect—it would prevent the infliction of much suffering under the shelter of the "commissioners' order," which, like charity (almost its complete opposite, by the way), has frequently covered a multitude of sins—especially of sins against the great Christian virtue of humanity. It is right to make simpler the law of settlement—it is still more praiseworthy to establish such regulations as shall secure immediate relief to the fainting, diseased, or hunger-stricken wretch who may come, or be brought to, the workhouse gate—a Lazarus without the Dives—irrespective of his strict legal title to the bread, or shelter, or medicine, that may preserve a fellow-being from perishing. It is right to do this—and this the bill does; but it would not be wrong to do

Not only this, but more also.

But these further ameliorations may be gained in time; in the meanwhile we are grateful for the steps in the right direction which public opinion has compelled the Government to take.

Both Houses of Parliament have been this week engaged in serious discussions of the laws relating to gambling more particularly that kind of gambling pursued by means of betting, and, to go a step further, chiefly and prominently that betting which takes place on the turf. Except the Japanese in their cockfights, no people in the world bet so often, so freely, or so indiscriminately as the English. Betting is with us a test of opinion; if a man will stake his money on what he believes or affirms, there is an end of the dispute till the result proves him to be right, or transfers the said money to the pocket of his opponent in the argument. In fact,

"Most men, tis by losing rendered sager,
Will back their own opinions by a wager."

The favourite candidate at an election is as often betted on as the "favourite" for the Derby; and, at Dublin, during the solemnities of the state trial, "the odds" were given and taken on the verdict. An Englishman, being commercial in everything, likes to mix the chance of gain with the certainty of amusement, and hence bets in all classes of society on the vicissitudes of the turf And yet all this betting is an absolute breach of the laws of the land! There has been a national ignorance on the subject it seems, for all have offended, and every third person you meet in society has made himself liable to a qui tam action. Thus we have "Laws for all faults, but Laws so countenance!

That the strong statutes
Stand, like the forfeits in a Barber's shop,
As much in mock as mark."

But society in general has just been apprised that the Law was not dead, but sleeping only. Certain noble lords, members of Parliament, and scions of the aristocracy, who, like honourable men, pay their bets when they lose them, have been brought in contact with people of lax notions on this point, receiving when they happened to win, but not reversing the process when the chances were against them. The offenders were, therefore, excluded from certain places where the lovers of sport most do congregate—the exclusion being, of course, a brand upon them that they were not to be trusted. Racing flesh and blood is no more exempt from human infirmity than any other, and the excluded cast about how they should revenge themselves; the statute book presented them a weapon in the shape of two acts of the reigns of Charles II. and Queen Anne, which impose penalties on all persons staking money on a horse-race in which a money prize may have been run for. We are not certain but that even the gallant loss of a pair of gloves to a lady on the winning horse might not be brought under the act; even that may be—proof abundant of the staking of money was procured, and a large number of noblemen and gentlemen are now under the lash of an information, by which penalties to the amount—according to Mr. J. S. Wortley—of nearly half a million sterling, can be recovered. But the "nobility and gentry" having the keys of the fountain of the laws, can open and shut it at pleasure; and it seems they are not to be caught. They put in a plea of "ignorance" of the law, allege the bad character of the prosecutors, who do not even affect a regard for morality, and ask Parliament to suspend these actions, and allow them be got rid of altogether by paying the costs out of pocket which the parties bringing them have been put to. There appears every probability that, as far as suspending the actions, they will succeed; but there are many who will hesitate to pass any act that will countenance the practice of betting; and there have also been some strong animadversions on people of rank doing what certainly no poor man would be able to do—coming to Parliament for protection against the consequences of their own acts, it being a legal maxim that ignorance of the law is no excuse for breaking it. The Bishops of London and Exeter, but more particularly the latter, have spoken out on the question. They will not oppose the suspension of the actions, seeing that they are brought from a malignant motive. But care must be taken that this proceeding is not made a precedent,

"Or many evils by the same example,
Will rush into the state."

It is with unfeigned cordiality that we congratulate the country upon the fine and honourable meed of thanks which Parliament has bestowed upon one of its best and bravest defenders. We love the frank and free spirit which has rewarded the gallant soldier who has gathered laurels for us abroad. Sir Charles Napier (all who bear his name have made themselves illustrious) has set up his fame as one of the landmarks of our own national glory; it shines upon us from the burning Ind, and we have a right to cherish the brightness and preserve the radiance of the star. We say nothing of the war in which he was engaged—it was a war of the Government, and not of the general; but the splendid old warrior had an honourable and dangerous trust, and like a splendid warrior he fulfilled it before the world. The great testimony of the Duke of Wellington was beautifully given in the House of Lords—not to the mere chivalrous ardour of the fine old man—not to the young fire dwelling in the aged heart alone—but to the consummate generalship of his campaign: one episode of which the great duke described "as one of the most curious military feats of which either his experience or his reading had informed him."

It was creditable alike to Government and opposition—to Lord Ripon and Lord Auckland—to Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, and Lord Palmerston, that they should have thrown party aside to carry together this just expression of a nation's gratitude.

It is true that a few sneaking spirits crept in to grumble out their grudging meanness over the bestowal of the gift of thanks, but their words were unavailing as their numbers were few; and their names are only registered in the division as marks for scorn, contumely, and disgrace—the contempt, pity, and derision of every patriotic and generous mind.

The new insurrection in Spain is a deplorable—a miserably deplorable event. It dishonours human nature—it disgraces Christianity. We do not speak of the mere fact of the semi-revolution, or even of the parties (greatly provoked) who have engaged in it, but of the lamentable consequences that have sprung from it—of the curse of blood that is over the throne and the Government of Spain. General Narvaez must be less than man, if not more than devil, that he should so scatter his ordinances of slaughter, that twenties and thirties are to be swept into their bloody graves, upon the mere fact of recognition, without semblance or form of trial. Here are black crimes to fix upon the conscience of a young Queen, a mere child-like girl, who, if she were in England, would be in her study or her school! Here is a lesson of crimson tyranny to teach to early and corrupted power—here is a preparation of present infamy for after remorse! And are the peace, the sovereign's mercy, the woman's gentleness, the honour, the humanity, the religion, of the young Isabella to be so sacrificed by the incarnate cruelty and treachery of her General upon the shrine of blood, hate, and vengeance! What a horrible tragedy in the history of nations is this! The sign manual of a delicate girl giving the pass from life to death of men with mothers, sisters, wives, and, perhaps, daughters, with less beauty and power than her own, but far more grace and tenderness—if she can so tamper with the awful question of eternity, at an age so young But the royal signature is form—mere form. Not it!—it is no mere form if the cry of the widow and the orphan proclaim the misery and the guilt which have been consummated by the dash of the regal pen—not form, if their voice, which finds no echo in the palaces, be heard at the footstool of the throne of God! We tell the bad Narvaez, that in procuring the young Queen's signature to his bloody ordinances—or in procuring her consent that they shall be promulgated in her name—he is selling her immortal soul; he is covering her, as he has covered himself, with a horrible and revolting guilt, which a reign of mercy, and life of tears, could only expiate through a REDEEMER'S love! Meanwhile civilization droops, and Christianity shudders, over the fearful spectacle of national depravity which Spain exhibits to Europe in these dreadful deeds.

THE COURT AND HALT ON.

We hear that in consequence of the recent bereavement in the Royal Family, her Majesty and her Royal Consort and illustrious family are not expected at Buckingham Palace for the season until after Easter, its second week in April. On Sunday morning her Majesty and Prince Albert attended divine service in the private chapel in the Castle, and afterwards visited the Duchess of Kent, at Frogmore. During the week the utmost privacy was observed at the Castle, and music was strictly prohibited.

HOLYROOD PALACE.—On Wednesday afternoon, the 7th inst., the Princess MARY, Marchioness of Douglas and Clydesdale, was, after a few hours' illness, confined of a still-born son. We are happy to add that her Highness is progressing satisfactorily towards recovery.

We are sorry to state that Lord Stuart De Decies is prevented by illness from attending his parliamentary duties.

The worst fears are apprehended for Viscount Sidmouth, who is very unwell at Richmond Park. He is in his 87th year.

Lord Carlisle, accruing to the last accounts, was gradually improving in health.

The funeral of the late Duke of Saxe Coburg Gotha took place on the 3rd instant, in the church attached to the palace at Gotha, amidst salvos of artillery and the solemn tolling of bells. The body lay in state, the day before, in one of the principal apartments of the palace, and was visited by several thousands from all parts of the dukedom, all testifying deep regret. The procession was composed of all the officers of State, and of the household of the august deceased, a considerable number of officers from the Prussian garrison of Erfurt and Langensalza, and the great bulk of the population. The troops of the duchy and civic guards lined the way on each side. After the service was chanted over the coffin, which was carried up to the altar by twelve gentlemen of the Court, M. Jacobi, the Court chaplain, delivered an affecting discourse, reminding his hearers of the many virtues of their departed Sovereign. The crowd then dispersed.

SIR ROBERT PEEL left town on Saturday afternoon to attend her Majesty at Windsor Castle. The Right Hon. Baronet returned to his residence in Whitehall-gardens at an early hour. During the evening the Right Hon. Bart. and Lady Peel gave a grand dinner to the principal members of the diplomatic corps at which several Cabinet Ministers were present. Lord Brougham was amongst the guests.

It is understood that the Earl of Aboyne will shortly lead to the hymeneal altar Miss Pigou, daughter of the Rev. Mr. Pigou, and the Countess of Lindsay, and consequently step-sister of the Earl of Lindsay and Lady Charlotte Gurel.

The marriage of the Hon. Colquhoun Denman, son of the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, with Miss Watts Russell, was solemnised on Monday last. A dejeuner to the wedding circle was given at the Clarendon Hotel.

The Baroness de Moncorvo, lady of the Portuguese Minister, was safely delivered of a daughter on Saturday, at three o'clock in the morning.

It is currently reported that Lord Randegal is the author of Used Up, the amusing comic drama, in which Mr. Charles Mathews has lately made so successful a coup at the Haymarket Theatre.

The Hon. Spencer Cooper has lately given his sisters, Lady Ashley and Lady Jocelyn, £20 000 each Lady Eleanor Page, eldest daughter of the Earl of Uxbridge, is to be united to Mr. Cavendish. We hear that Miss Cunningham, first cousin to the Earl of Eglinton, is to be married to the British Consul at Nice. A marriage is talked of between Lord Foley and Lady Dufferin.

ARRIVAL OF MR. O'CONNELL IN ENGLAND. Mr. O'Connell arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday morning at half-past eight o'clock, by the first mail. A large concourse of his countrymen awaited his arrival on the pier, who received him with enthusiastic cheers, and drew him in a hackney coach up to the Adelphi Hotel, whence it was supposed he would take his departure for London by the half-past ten o'clock train. Mr. O'Connell was accompanied by John O'Connell, Esq., Morgan O'Connell, Esq., R. Lalor Shiel, Esq., and Sir Colman O'Loghlan, The hon. and learned gentlemen slept at Birmingham on Wednesday night, and arrived in town at one o'clock on Thursday.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

With deep regret we announce the death of the Very Rev. Thomas De Lacy, Archdeacon of Meath, in the 73rd year of his age, and the 44th year of his incumbency of the Archidecanory of Meath.

The Rev. Dr. Rook, Vicar of Leeds, preached on Sunday morning at St. John's Church, Westminster, in favour of the national schools, in one of the districts of the parish. A liberal subscription was afterwards made on behalf of the funds.

The Rev. Peter Almerie le Heup Wood, of Magdalen College, Cambridge, has been appointed to the stall of St. George, in the Royal Collegiate Church of Middleham, in the county of York, vacant by the decease of the late Rev. Sir Laurence Squier, late canon of the said stall.

The following appointments have taken place:—The Rev. W. G Barker, M.A., of St. John's College, Cambridge, to the Rectory of Matlock Bath, Derbyshire; the Rev. A. A. Oakes, M.A., of Jesus College, to the Rectory of Newton, near Bury; the Rev. H. Hopwood, M.A., of Queen's College, to the Perpetual Curacy of Worthing, Essex; the Rev. W. Peete Musgrave, M.A., of Trinity College, to the Bishop's Canonry in the Cathedral Church of Hereford; the Rev. Harry Baker, M.A., of Trinity College, to be Minister of the New Church of St. Paul, at Forebridge, near Stafford; the Rev. Thomas Griffith, M.A., of Queen's College, to the Vicarage of Llanfawr, Merionethshire; the Rev. William Henry Flowers, M.A., of Jesus College, to the Curacy of Horncastle, Lincolnshire.

OXFORD. It is understood that the Fellows of Pembroke College, friends of Dr. Jeune, have forwarded a counter appeal to the Duke of Wellington, as Chancellor of the University, stating their case, and it is very doubtful, after all, if Dr. Jeune will lose the Headship. The Laudian Professor of Arabic resume his lectures at the Clarendon, on Wednesday last.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

STATE OF THE STREETS.—On Tuesday the Court of Sewers met at Guildhall for the despatch of business, Mr. Alderman Gibbs in the chair. Complaints were lodged against Mr. Gore, the contractor for clearing the streets, for neglect of duty, but as his foreman adduced a plausible pretext and promised amendment in future, the penalties incurred, which amounted to several hundred pounds, were reduced to £120.

HUNGERFORD SUSPENSION BRIDGE.—The general half yearly meeting of the proprietors of this bridge took place on Thursday last, at the Office, Villiers-street, Strand. William Hawes, Esq., presided. The directors' report stated, that although they could not report the entire completion of the works, still they hoped, from the arrangements made by the contractor, that ere long the bridge would be open to the public. The report added, that the amount of toll to be charged had occupied the attention of the directors, and they had arrived at the conclusion that it would be for the interests of the proprietors that the toll should be one half penny, with return tickets, and other facilities. The report of the engineer, Mr Boswell, referred to the progress made in the completion of the bridge, and the expenditure of £12,000 on the chains, and the suspending portion of the bridge. It further appeared that the contractor has undertaken that the whole shall be completed and opened to the public in the summer, and before the next meeting. Both reports having been received and adopted, the usual routine of business was gone through, and a vote of thanks having been passed to the chairman and directors, the meeting separated.

LONDON AND BLACKWALL RAILWAY COMPANY.—On Thursday last the fifteenth half-yearly meeting of the proprietors was held at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, Mr. W. Dundas in the chair. The report directed the attention of the proprietors to the traffic during the winter months of 1841 as compared with those of 1842. The increase during the half year had been 173,672 in the number of passengers, and £7007 8s. 3d. in the receipts. The report then stated, that the recommendation of the directors, and of many of the proprietors, for the establishment of a guarantee fund in aid of steam-boat traffic in connection with the railway, had been adopted by a considerable number of the proprietors, but not to an extent sufficient to warrant the directors in carrying it out according to the proposition of the committee of inquiry. The report added, that the directors have, for some time past, been engaged in obtaining information on the atmospheric principles, in its various branches, as tested in Ireland. The revenue account showed an available surplus of £6851 12s. 9d., after payment of Income Tax, and the report concluded by recommending that a dividend be declared at the rate of two shillings and sixpence per share The report was finally adopted, and the usual business having been gone through, the meeting separated

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

ACCIDENT AT THE DUKE OF BEAUFORT'S STABLES.—On Tuesday afternoon Thomas Enwright, a groom in the service of the Duke of Beaufort, was injured in a shocking manner by a horse belonging to his grace, at his stables, Apple-tree-yard, York-street, St James's-square. It appears that Enwright was about to remove the horse from his stall, and, on arriving near him, he called to him in the usual way, when the animal suddenly kicked out and struck the unfortunate man in the face, hurl ng him with fearful violence against the wall of the stable opposite. On proceeding to his assistance, scarcely a feature of his face was discernible, the nose being completely flattened, one eye forced from its socket, and a long and deep wound, so as to admit therein two fingers, across the opposite side and under the forehead. A medical gentleman was called in, who, however, directed his immediate removal to St. George's Hospital, where he was attended by Mr. Keate, one of the house surgeons. Notwithstanding the injuries the patient has received, some slight hopes are given of his ultimate recovery.

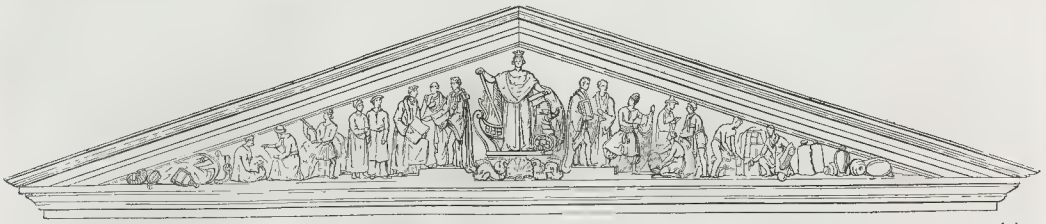
LOSS OF LIFE ON THE ICE.—Last week a number of boys and young men ventured on the ice at Kirkleith, near Leslienation, in Scotland, where the ice giving way five of them were precipitated into the water, two of whom were rescued, but the other three found a watery grave. One of the deceased was brother to the two lads who were saved.

SHOCKING ACCIDENT. A serious accident took place on Wednesday, shortly before twelve o'clock, in Upper Grosvenor-street, Grosvenor-place, similar to that which took place some time ago in the Marine Barracks. A number of men were employed in an excavation eighteen feet deep, and in consequence of the nature of the soil (a dry, red sand), every precaution had been taken to prevent accident by shoring-up both sides with more than usual care. When the accident occurred the men were about proceeding to dinner, several had already reached the street, but five poor fellows were in the cutting when the earth on the north side, to the extent of about fifteen feet by six feet, was observed to give way from beneath, and settle down, crushing in the shoring planks, and burying beneath several tons of earth four of the individuals above alluded to. A number of men were immediately employed to extricate the poor fellows; but, such is the nature of the injuries they have sustained that little hopes are entertained of their recovery.

THE MISSING WEST INDIA STEAM SHIP.—LIVERPOOL, Wednesday. The Superb, Gaskell, from Mobile, arrived at this port to-day, reports having, on the 29th Jan., in lat. 23 40, long. 84 30, seen a large steamer, under command, apparently steering for Havana; she was painted black, and had white quarter boats, and white life-boats inverted over the paddles. Mem.—This is supposed to be the Royal West India Mail steamer that was due at Southampton on the 4th inst.

ARRIVAL OF THE AVON, WEST INDIA STEAMER.—The Royal Mail Company's steamer Avon, arrived at Liverpool from Vera Cruz on Tuesday morning, and cast anchor about one o'clock. The Avon having been so long overdue, considerable anxiety was felt for her safety, not only by those more immediately connected with the spirited company to which the vessel belongs, but more generally by the whole host friends or relatives on board. It appears that on the last of January, when this vessel was steaming in the Gulf of Mexico, she was caught in what is termed, in nautical phraseology, a "norther," a wind peculiar to that locality. It lasted two whole days, and although the vessel was tossed to and fro from one billow to the other, she bore up against the tempest right gallantly. Indeed, during the whole passage up the Gulf, the weather was so bad that the Avon was under steam for thirty-five days. In consequence of this the coals at length were consumed, and the captain (Strutt) was obliged, in consequence, to resort to the necessity of breaking away the bulk heads, the woodwork cabins &c., to turn into fuel. In this state the Avon reached Mexico. She left Mexico again on the 6th. Everything was quiet there. The Avon left Demerara for Bermuda on the 20th of January and on the following day another tremendous gale came on, the wind increased, blowing a perfect hurricane, it continued for forty-eight hours; but in fact the weather was very boisterous, tempestuous the whole of the passage. The sea ran so high at times that the vessel could make very little way. The fever had quite left Bermuda; everything was healthy. The same, in fact, may be said of the whole of the West India Islands. Sir Charles Adam, the Commander-in-Chief, was at Jamaica, on his way to Vera Cruz.—A list of passengers on board: Mr. Escuera and Son, from Vera Cruz; Mr. Garay, Vera Cruz; Mr. Moro, Vera Cruz; Captain Hosking and Son, Vera Cruz; Mr. Pleas, Jamaica; Lieut. Hopkins, R.N., Nassau; Mr. Cappege, Barbadoes; Mr. Gregor, Jamaica; Mr. Peck, Jamaica; Mr. Hamilton and Lady, Jamaica; Mr. Reiner, Haiti; Archdeacon Braithwaite, Barbadoes; Colonel Malliaco, Demerara; Mr. Lagerstead, Trinidad; Mrs. Smith and three daughters, Bermuda; Mrs. Walsh, and four children, Bermuda, Mr. Lamerick, Grenada; and John Holmes, James Moffat, Robert Hamilton, James Aeching, and George Brewer, distressed British seamen, from Nassau.

SCULPTURE FOR THE PEDIMENT OF THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.



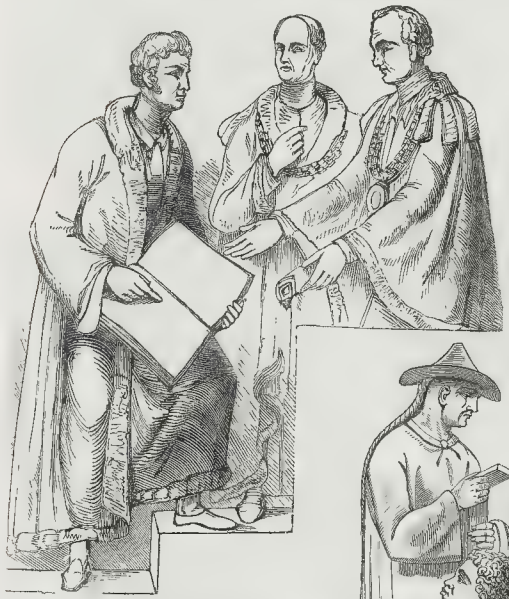
We have been favoured with a view of these very interesting works, in the studio of the sculptor, Mr. R. Westmacott, jun., the successful candidate in the competition for the commission to execute the sculptural embellishment of the pediment of the New Royal Exchange.

The figures, seventeen in number, will, as our first engraving shows, entirely fill the tympanum of the pediment, in itself the noblest work of its class in the metropolis. The material of the figures is compact limestone, the admirable chiselling of which, in great measure, atones for the non employment of marble. They are cut in alto relievo, as Mr. Westmacott's engagement with the City stipulated; but, with two exceptions, they are modelled as entire and detached figures: that in the centre is 10 feet high, and the standard of the other figures is 7 feet. This is an improvement upon the original compact, highly honourable to the genius and liberality of the sculptor.

The entire composition is shown in the uppermost engraving; and so far the general effect of the group is sufficiently illustrated. But, for the purpose of doing justice to the great merit of the several groups, we have engraved them of larger size than could be accomplished in their actual position in the tympanum, within our page.

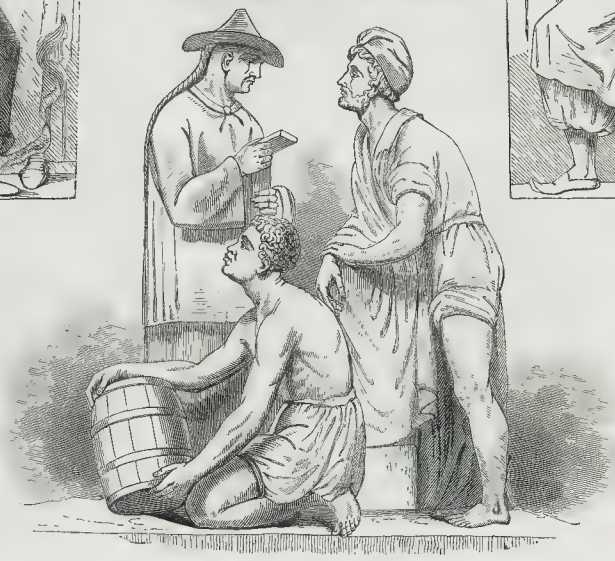
The emblematic story of the grand national tableau may be thus briefly told. The principal figure, the key-note of the whole, is a colossal impersonation of Commerce, 10 feet in height, being, of course, the centre and point of reference for all the others. This is the only allegoric figure in the composition; and classically beautiful as it is, per se, we do not admire its introduction between two lines of figures from actual and every-day life. A figure of Sir Thomas Gresham, the founder of the Exchange, would have been a far more graceful introduction. However, Commerce, in this classic impersonation, wears a mural crown, and is accompanied by accessories allusive to wealth and enterprize, as a cornucopia, beehive, &c; in her left hand she holds the charter of the Exchange, while her right is connected with part of a ship; and the supporting pedestal consists of two dolphins and a shell. We should prefer Gresham in the flat bonnet and other costume of his time, to this allegorical creation, which reminds us too much of a fire insurance office; and its juxtaposition with the flanking figures is by no means happy. But here objection ends.

BRITISH FACTOR, AND MERCHANT SEAMAN.



LORD MAYOR, ALDERMAN, AND COMMON COUNCILMAN.

LONDON MERCHANTS, AND PERSIAN TRADER.



CHINESE, AFRICAN, AND LEVANTINE TRADERS.

Immediately on the right of the figure of Commerce, is a group of three British merchants, habited in civic robes—as Lord Mayor, Alderman, and Common Councilman. Next to them are two Asiatics, natives of our Indian possessions, the one a Hindoo, the other a Mahomedan, each readily distinguishable in person as well as costume. Next is a Greek, carrying a jar; he is connected with the others by seeming to move towards them, while he is also in relation with the remaining figures by his attention being turned towards them. The two remaining figures on this side are an Armenian and a Turk: the former, the banker and the scholar of the East, is occupied with a scroll; and the latter, the Osmanli merchant, may be supposed to be busied with his daily accounts; he closes the series of figures on the right; the extreme angle of the tympanum being filled with an anchor and other nautical emblems.

The first group of figures on the left of Commerce, shows two British merchants, robed similarly to those on the right; and to whom a Persian is showing some woven fabric. To him succeeds a group, of a Chinese, a sailor of the Levant, and a Negro; followed by an unmistakeable British sailor cording a bale of cotton. The remaining figure is a supercargo or factory agent, or some other commercial functionary; and this angle of the tympanum is filled with jars, and other packages, &c.

THE QUEEN AND HER CABINET MINISTERS.

THE QUEEN AND HER CABINET MINISTERS.

Victoria, quæ facit vera, a curis.—Varro. Rer: divin: lib. i.

VICTORIA! (Nice or Vacuna nam'd*
In times of old,
As we are told
By men for ancient learning fam'd,)
Presiding Goddess over Peace!
We pray thee now,
Whate'er ascend thee, never cease
To bend thy brow
With more of olive than the leaf,
Which, while it breats
Of conquer'd hosts,
Must bring both victors and the vanquish'd grief!
For, every laurel on a living head
Proclaims:—elsewhere there's a cypress for the dead!
Thou attest here among
The few, but faithful throng
Of those who are the guardians of thy pow'r—
But in thy own right hand
Thou hast enough command
To rouse a people, were there needful hour!
Once within the Salone groves
Thine was a name
Most dear to even the gentle doves—
Although it could inflame
The hearts of warfare to to
And fill their souls with martial fire!
But now it dwells all peacefully
Upon a happy throne with Thee,
VICTORIA! Queen of peaceful Victory! W.

*Vide Plin: lib: iii., cap: v.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, BART.

In furnishing a brief outline of the lives of those members of the Government who compose what is called the "Cabinet," we must necessarily give precedence to Sir Robert Peel, who is the political head of the Government, though, in rank as a peer, and in reputation as the great warrior of the age, the Duke of Wellington might claim to be the head of the list. In the narrow limit to which we are confined, we cannot attempt anything like a biography of one whose career has been so full of political incident. We can only mark a few of the principal epochs; indeed, little more is required of a man whose history must be so familiar to all. Sir R. Peel was born on the 5th of Feb., 1788, at Bury, in Lancashire; his father, if I well known, rose from a humble station to the rank of a baronet and the wealth of a prince by an union of the qualities of sagacity and perseverance by devoting himself to a pursuit that was then in its infancy, but grew to a gigantic system, and by being in the possession of an immense field of speculation at the commencement of the long European war. His son was not required to engage in business; he was intended by his father to be a politician; for the elder Peel was not without ambition. He was sent to Harrow School, where he was the form-fellow of Byron, who has left in one of his letters a characteristic sketch of both, that might serve to all time as the description of unruly genius by the side of patient application. From Harrow he went to Christ Church, Oxford, where, in 1808, he took a double first-class degree, and in 1809, was returned to Parliament for the borough of Cashel. In 1810 he seconded the address, and made his first effort of oratory in that arena, where he was destined to struggle so long, and to attain what he now possesses, such "sway and masterdom." Of the "many called" to fill the ranks of political party, "few are chosen" as the real instruments of political power. But the young member had that which could not be overlooked. His powers of application made him useful in managing official business. his talent as a debater gave him influence in the House; his great wealth secured his position with the country. These advantages are not often found united, but they combined in the young Mr. Peel, and his progress through the different stages of political life was as rapid as he could himself have anticipated. In 1810 he was appointed Under Secretary of State for the Colonies; in September, 1812, he was made Secretary for Ireland, by the Duke of Richmond being the Viceroy. At that time, and for many years afterwards, he was looked on as the head of the "Protestant ascendancy" party. In 1817 he was returned for the University of Oxford; in 1819 he resigned his Irish Secretaryship; in 1819 he was selected by the Government to act as Chairman of the Bank Committee; in that capacity he introduced the act for the resumption of cash payments, called "Peel's Bill." In 1822 he succeeded Lord Sidmouth as Secretary of State for the Home Department, and for the first time had a seat in the Cabinet. He still remained the head of the Anti-Catholic party, and divided the House on the question of Catholic Emancipation, till the dissolution of the Liberal Administration in April, 1827, when Mr. Canning being dead, Lord Goderich unable to form a Government, and the Duke of Wellington called on to undertake the task, five of his colleagues On the 8th of March, 1828, was not long spared to the enjoyment of his elevation, Peel resigned his office of Home Secretary under the Duke of Wellington. This was in January, 1828; at that juncture strong times were approaching. In that year the Ministry, outvoted, were obliged to yield the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, and in the following year, yielding to the "pressure from without," he granted the Concession of Catholic and the Catholic Association, to avoid "a civil war," which the Duke of Wellington declared appeared to be the alternative of a refusal. In consequence of this change he resigned his seat for the University, but ventured to contest it again in the following election, and was ousted by Sir Robert Inglis, who still represents that learned corporation. Peel was immediately returned for the borough of Westbury. From this epoch the Tory party stood in a false position. There acts had been in direct contradiction to their speeches and opinions; they were divided among themselves at the very time when they ought to have been united. The succeeding 1830, brought the Revolution of July, and the Reform agitation in England. The Ministry were in a minority on the Civil List, and in November resigned office, and took what was destined to be a "long farewell of all their greatness." The long discussions of the Reform Bill followed, and throughout them Sir R. Peel acted as the leader of the Tory opposition; in 1834 there was a short gleam of official sunshine, and he formed a Ministry; but it was broken up by the Liberal majority. In 1839 he again attempted to construct a Government, but failed in consequence of the Queen refusing to dismiss the Ladies of her Bedchamber, which dismissal Sir Robert made a sine qua non. But in 1841, the Whig party was so reduced in numbers and influence, that the "pear was ripe" for the Tories, and this time was plucked with success. The Whigs dissolved the Parliament, and were defeated by a majority of 91 in the one newly elected.

From August, 1841, Sir R. Peel has been Prime Minister, with a party numerically strong, and, at the present moment, more united than they were last year, while there is peace abroad and a full exchequer at home. In the state of Ireland there is "a mote to trouble the mind's eye," as Lord John Russel, too, has found under debate in the house is a "difficulty." But O'Connell knows the people quiet better than an armed force, and in the house there is the "majority," which the Whigs will hardly succeed in breaking; and in prospective are some measures of concession and amelioration for Ireland, which it may be hoped will not be without their good effect. Altogether, we may look on it as pretty certain that the Tories will hold the "sunny eminences" of office for the rest of the duration of the present Parliament at least; and if they repeal the Income-tax, a majority in the next may be hoped for.

Sir R. Peel is in age, "inclining to three score;" and time has somewhat thinned his hair, and the toils of leadership have long ago taken the freshness from his cheek, but he is a man of remarkably well-preserved appearance, and therefore gets through more labour with less fatigue than those who by fits and starts are idle and energetic. He looks tolerably hale and passably portly. In the house he is early at his post, which he never quits as long as any business has to be done. He is the head of the Government in every sense of the word—in reality as well as name. His acc rate information on all questions of policy, and his clearness of statement, are always apparent, on great occasions, his language, always fluent, not seldom dignified, but rarely impassioned, and, above all, his perfect knowledge of the House of Commons, make him a powerful debater. He is not extreme in any of his opinions, and has more than once alienated the feelings of the ultras of his party. But he is a necessary of the time, and without him the party would be broken up. In addition to his office of First Lord of the Treasury, he is a Lord of Trades and Plantations, a Commissioner of the India Board, a Governor of the Charter-House, a Commissioner of the Duchy of Cornwall, of the Land-tax, and of the Church Building Society (to whom he last year presented the greater part of the salary of his office); he is an Official Trustee of the British and Hunterian Museums; he holds some other honorary offices of a similar kind; he was made a Privy Councillor in 1812, and was elected Lord Rector of Glasgow University in 1837.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

The Duke of Wellington, for some time after the accession of the present Ministry to power, held a seat in the "Cabinet" without filling any positive official situation. Thus, though representing the Government, and conducting its business in the upper house, he could still reply to certain memorials sent him, that "he was not in the political service of her Majesty." The declaration was scarcely so true in the spirit as it was close to the letter. Since the death of Lord Hill, however, he has been Commander-in-Chief of the army, and still represents the Government in the House of Lords; his political services may therefore be considered as still voluntary. Of the Duke of Wellington we need not here write much; his life and military career are matters of history, familiar to the world at large. His grace is the third son of the Earl of Mornington, and was born at Trim, in Ireland, on May 1st, 1769. He was sent to the school of Eton, and afterwards to the military academy of Angers, in France, where he was for some time, under the able tuition of Pignerol, the celebrated tactician. The French teacher little thought probably that his lessons would be so well profited by at the expense of his country. His first commission was in the 41st Regiment. His first active service was in the unfortunate campaign of the Duke of York, in Flanders, in 1794, where it had been better for the country if the royal commander-in-chief and the subaltern officer had changed places. In 1797 he accompanied his brother, the Marquis Wellesley, to India, and was there actively employed against Tippoo Sultan, beginning with the taking of Seringapatam, and ending with the battles of Peiss and Assaye. On his return to Europe he was sent to the Peninsula, and, from 1808, when the battle of Vimiera was fought, down to the great conflict of Waterloo, in 1815, he was constantly engaged against the armies of Napoleon in Spain and Portugal, commanded in turn by the most able of his generals and marshals. The mere list of his battles would be long—and besides being long, would be unnecessary, for their names must be known to every Englishman.

From the peace of 1815 till the present time, the name of the Duke of Wellington is intimately connected with the Government; he is said to entertain an opinion that Nature intended him rather for a statesman than a soldier. The world scarcely coincides with him on this point. His grace has been linked with that of Sir R. Peel; he has opposed the same measures and granted the same concessions as the right honourable baronet. His Grace is now seventy-five years of age, but still transacts business with the same dispatch and regularity as in his early years. He is in his seat in the House of Lords every evening at five o'clock, as punctual as the clock itself; and any question that may be asked meets with a ready and always a straightforward answer.

On the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo (June 18th) the Duke entertains those military officers of rank who served under him in that memorable struggle, and who are in London or its neighbourhood. In reference to this festival it has been remarked by a popular writer, "We cannot imagine any occurrence more interesting to men who have borne a conspicuous part in great events, than this occasion for a friendly and festive recall of sympathies, which, many years before, a common danger and a common glory had created."

LORD STANLEY.

The Right Honourable Edward Geoffrey Smith Stanley, Lord Stanley, son and heir of the Earl of Derby, is her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies. He was born March 29th, 1796. The house of Stanley is conspicuous in English history, having produced both statesmen and warriors of the highest eminence: it was the first Earl of the name who crowned the Earl of Richmond, as Henry VII., on the field of Bosworth. The political career of Lord Stanley commences with the Administration of Lord Goderich, when he was Under Secretary for the Colonies. On the accession of Earl Grey to power, he was named Secretary for Ireland, which office he held till 1833, when he was made Secretary of the Colonial and War Department. This he held till June, 1834, when he seceded from the Liberal part. on the Church question, at that time till the Tories were recalled to power he remained with Sir James Graham in opposition. He is considered—and justly—one of the ablest members of the Government.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM.

When Lord Stanley seceded from the Grey Administration, Sir James Graham accompanied him. In that Ministry he held the office of First Lord of the Admiralty; but he became alarmed at the extent to which the Government expressed its intention of reforming the Church. With the present Ministry he was restored to office as Home Secretary. He is a man of good abilities, and an able debater; but his influence was materially damaged by the change he made in his principles. He sits for the borough of Dorchester

MR. GOULBURN.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is an important member of any Cabinet. The office is at present held by the Right Hon. Henry Goulburn, the member for the University of Cambridge. He has gone through the usual routine of office, having, under the Earl of Liverpool's Ministry, commenced as Secretary for Ireland, and Under-Secretary for the Colonies. He was Chancellor of the Exchequer from 1822 to 1830 under the Duke of Wellington's Ministry. When Mr. Abercrombie retired from the Speakership of the House of Commons, Mr. Goulburn was a candidate for the vacant chair against Mr Shaw Lefevre: Mr Goulburn had 295 votes, and Mr. Lefevre 317. He resumed his office of Chancellor of the Exchequer on the construction of the Peel Government in 1841. Since then, the most important measures connected with his department—the Income Tax, the Tariff, and the change in the Corn Laws—were all proposed by Sir R. Peel. For the last year or so, the management of the Exchequer has been pretty plain sailing; but his proclamations calling in the light sovereigns, by which he contrived to shake the confidence of every one in the coinage of the country, and to cause the greatest embarrassment to the trading and commercial interests, were almost universally condemned.

SIR EDWARD KNATCHBULL.

Sir Edward Knatchbull, a baronet of a very ancient family, and far advanced in years, is the present Paymaster of the Forces. It is the most unaccountable appointment in the Cabinet; for he is perfectly useless to the Government in the House, as, during the debates, he yields to the weakness of his years; or, if he speaks, which is very rarely, he generally makes some absurd admission, which covers himself with ridicule, and damages the party not a little. He is, besides, rich, and cannot want office for its emolument. He is only known for his extent to the old Corn-laws: as far as influence in the Government is concerned, he is a mere cipher. He represents the Eastern Division of Kent.

SIR HENRY HARDINGE.

Next to the Paymaster of the Forces naturally comes the Secretary of War. In this appointment the Government has exhibited a sound judgment. Sir Henry Hardinge is a gallant soldier, while his talents are fully equal to the creditable discharge of his duties, both in Parliament and out of it. He represents the borough of Launceston, is a Major-General in the army, and Colonel of the 97th Foot. During the Peninsular War he was Deputy Quartermaster-General of the Portuguese army; at the Battle of Waterloo he lost an arm. It would give great satisfaction to the navy, if the Secretaryship of the Admiralty was filled, in the same manner, by one of the naval profession.

LORD LYNDHURST.

The foregoing, with the exception of the Duke of Wellington, are members of the House of Commons; the rest of the Cabinet are peers. First in rank is, of course, the Lord Chancellor, John Singleton Copley, Baron Lyndhurst. His father was a painter of considerable talents, who came to this country in his infancy, and died poor and employment. A memoir of the noble lord has already been given in this journal; we need only state then that he was eminent as a barrister, and successively filled the offices of Solicitor-General, Attorney-General, and Master of the Rolls. He was made Lord Chancellor during the Wellington Administration; during that of Earl Grey, he was Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer; and again Lord Chancellor, from November, 1834, till April, 1835. He was appointed once more Chancellor, on the resignation of the present Ministry. He is a man of vast talents, both as a lawyer and an orator. But he has just had a severe attack made on him by Lord J. Russell (on Tuesday evening), for the manner in which he discharges his judicial duties.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE.

James Archibald Stuart Wortley, Lord Wharncliffe, is the President of the Council. He was created a baron in 1826. He was born in 1776. He has been long connected with the Conservative party, to whom, in the House of Lords, he is at all times useful.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH.

Walter Francis Montague Douglas Scott, Duke of Buccleuch, is the Lord Privy Seal; to which office he succeeded on the secession of the Duke of Buckingham from the Government, on the Corn-law question. He is a Scotch peer, and sits in the house as Earl of Doncaster his second title is the Earl of Dalkeith. He rarely speaks, but is generally selected as one of the Lords Commissioners, for giving the royal assent to bills. He is very wealthy, and a man of great influence.

EARL OF ABERDEEN.

The office of Secretary of State for the Foreign Department is at present filled by the Earl of Aberdeen, George Hamilton Gordon, whose second title is Lord Haddo. The first peer was a judge, and the title was created in 1682. He was Secretary for Foreign Affairs, under the Wellington Administration, and Secretary for the Colonies, in 1834-5. He was again appointed to the former office in 1841. He is President of the Society of Antiquaries; his lordship having a very decided taste for the pursuits which it is the object of the so ciety to encourage. He is a slow and deliberate speaker, but always clear and intelligible.

EARL OF HADDINGTON.

This noble Earl sits in the Cabinet as the head of the Admiralty He is a Scotch peer, and the ninth earl of the title, which was created in 1619. He sits as Baron Binning in the House of Commons he bore his second title of Lord Binning. The family name is Hamilton. His lordship is one of the "grievances" of Commodore Napier, who exclaims loudly against a person who knows nothing of the sea, having the control of the naval force of the country. It is certainly something of an anomaly. His lordship was born in 1780. He does not figure much in debates, rarely speaking, except on matters connected with his office.

EARL OF RIPON.

The Earl of Ripon is the President of the Board of Control. He is one of the political names of the last quarter of a century; he is best known, perhaps, as the "Prosperity Robinson" of other days, so called from the very hopeful pictures he used to draw of the circumstances of the country in his Annual Budget. He has filled a great many offices at different times, having been Chancellor of the Exchequer, Vice-President of the Board of Trade, Secretary for the Colonies, President of the Board of Trade, and for a short time Prime Minister, but his shoulders were not equal to the burden, and he soon resigned. He was raised to the House of Lords in 1833.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The entrepreneur of this magnificent establishment is a gentleman certainly of marvellous and most daring enterprize. Not content with the contentedness of his hundreds of subscribers, and thousands of occasional visitors, he will cater still further for their enjoyment, and add

"New perfume to the rose,
"And to the lily whiteness!"

The following arrangements for the ensuing season will sufficiently prove our assertion.

ENGAGEMENTS FOR THE OPERA.—Madame Grisi, Madlle. Favanti (her first appearance at this theatre), Madame Bellini, Mad. Dai Fori, and Madame Persiani. Signor Mario, Signor Corelli (his first appearance at this theatre), Signor Dai Fori, Signor Felice (also his first appearance at this theatre), Signor Fornasari, Signor F. Lablache, and Signor Lablache. Director of the music, composer, and conductor, Signor Costa, as usual, and as we trust he will long continue to be.

The Repertoire will consist of a selection of the most admired works, and amongst the novelties will be presented Persiani's new opera, "La Fantasma;" produced with great success at the Italian Opera, Paris. And Ricci's new opera, "Corrado D'Altamura;" produced with great success at the scala, Milan, and now in rehearsal at the Italian Opera, Paris. And an entirely new opera, composed by M. Costa, expressly for the company, entitled "Don Carlos."

THE BALLET.—Madlle. Carlotta Grisi, Madlle. Adelaide Frasi, of the Teatro di Pergola, Florence (her first appearance at this theatre), Madame Guy Stephan, Madlle. Scheffre, Madlle. Pinnett, Madlle. Forster, and Madlle. Barville (their first appearance at this theatre); Madlle. Fanny Elssler, and Mad lle. Cerito. M. St. Leon, M. Montessu (his first appearance in this country), M. Perrot, M. Coulon, M. Gosselin, J. Gouara, and Carey Bellamy, and numerous and efficient corps de ballet. Arrangements are also pending with Madlle. Taglioni, and there is every probability that the event of this eminent artiste will be secured for a limited number of representations.

THE ORCHESTRA will consist of the same combination of talent which has enabled it to the distinctive merit of being the first in Europe. The chorusses will be under the direction and effective leadership of the Orchestra, M. Tolbecque; Principal Violin of the Theatre Mr. W. Grieve; Maitre de Ballet, M. Perrot, Aide, Maitre de Ballet, M. Gosselin; Regisseur de la Danse, M. Coulon; Leader of the Ballet, Mr. Stoppelaer.

The new soprano, Favanti, is said to be a wonder, and it is reported that Salvi, the tenor, also will make his début in the course of the season.

Madame Persiani and Sig. Fornasari will appear on the first night of the season, in Herold's chef d'œuvre of "Zampa." The début of Mdlle. Favanti will be forthwith arranged. Madame Grisi, Sig. Mario, and Sig. Lablache will appear at the re-opening of the theatre immediately after Easter. Madlle. Fanny Elssler will not appear in a few days, and will appear on the first night of the season, in a New Ballet, founded on Victor Hugo's celebrated work of "Notre Dame de Paris," entitled "La Esmeralda." The part of Esmeralda by Madlle. C. Grisi; the part of Pierre Gringoire by M. Perrot. Madlle. Cerito will arrive in town at the end of April.

Among the novelties in the ballet department will be produced a new grand Ballet, entitled "Jeanne d'Arc." Jeanne d'Arc, Madlle. Fanny Elssler.

Guy Stephan, whose future fame we predicted in former numbers, we are happy to see is to return to us, and it will go hard with, some that hitherto brought themselves into notice, to even compete with her. Carlotta Grisi, Fanny Elssler, Adelaide Frasi, Guy Stephan! Of a verity, four graces instead of three!

The theatre will open in the first week of March, when will be produced Herold's celebrated opera of "Zampa." Zampa, Madame Persiani; Zampa, Signor Fornasari. To be followed by a new ballet, by M. Perrot, with new scenery, dresses, &c., entitled "La Esmeralda." The music by Signor Pugni; the scenery by Mr. W. Grieve. The principal characters by Carlotta Grisi, Mdlle. Adelaide Frasi, Madame Guy Stephan, Mdlle. Scheffre, Mdlle. Plunket, Mdlle. Ferdinand, and Mdlle. Barville. M. Perrot, M. Coulon, M. Gosselin, and M. St. Leon.

Delightful Persians! On the opening night, too, as last year! What a treat in perspectu to the lovers of song and the poetry of motion does the entrepreneur announce!

DRURY-LANE.

Mr. C. Kean appeared at this theatre, on Wednesday evening, in the character of Hamlet, which is, in our thinking, the best of his Shakspearian personations. His soliloquies were marked by apparent reflection; his dialogues by an ease and elegance—his allusions to his friend perhaps too cautiously communicated, but—his reproaches to Gertrude were the very outpourings of an injured and honourable mind, commanded the highest applause. Many find fault with C. Kean, because in some physical "unavoidables" he resembles his father: these are not critical objections: to be more or less identified with a man of extraordinary genius is to be somebody yourself!

COVENT GARDEN.

M. Jullien's Promenade Concerts continue their attractions: they are nightly attended by crowded and fashionable audiences. The music de rigueur is of the description of Pompii: may not probably suit the taste of a Handelian or a Bachite, but there is a great deal of dramatic effect in it, and proves that Jullien knows thoroughly well how to produce it. The mysterious, unexpected chorus, and the thunder and lightning from "Olympus high, the region of the Gods," or, in plain parlance, the one shilling gallery, were productive of novel and startling impression. To enumerate the various excellences with which the different solos were performed would quite exhaust our space.

LYCEUM.

Charles Dibdin defunct the legitimate drama. At the other C. G. (or Covent Garden) music makes merry over its grave, and old Harris might say (if he were alive), in the words of Grattan, "I rocked its cradle, and I now follow its bier!" The drama lived and was in health in the days of Harris; it is now a thing but of reco llection and regret in the minds of a few, who are hastening speedily to make their exits from a scene they are sick of seeing so degenerated into. Nothing can be so heart-sore to a genius and proficient in any art, as to see that art brought into degradation by public apathy or private abuse.

THE DUBLIN STATE TRIALS.

(Continued from page 104.)

count. They should have been sent up in a more specific form; and, accordingly, I prepared them, and will read them before the jury come out. (Here his lordship read the several issues into which the 11 counts in the indictment were subdivided.) I think it right also to state that an objection was taken in the first place by Mr. Henn, to the effect that no evidence was given that any act or proceeding stated in the indictment took place within the county of the city of Dublin; and that another objection was made by Mr. Monaghan, on behalf of Mr. John O'Connell, at a late hour at night, of which I also took a note, namely, that as it was Sunday morning, the Court could not perform any official act, and could not consequently adjourn to any other day, or sit at an earlier day than the first day of next term for the consideration of this case.

The jury then made their appearance in the box, and the names prepared by Mr. Justice Crampton having been handed to them, they again retired.

The traversers severally answered to their names.

The jury, after a quarter of an hour had elapsed, returned to court, and, after handing in the issue paper,

The Foreman said—We anticipated your lordships in the way we should give our verdict, but had not room to write our finding opposite each issue. I am directed by the jury, my lords, to ask for compensation for the loss of their time.

The Clerk of the Crown, without waiting for a reply from the Court, proceeded to call over the names of the jurors. He was then about to read the finding of the jury, when

Mr. Moore, Q.C. (interrupting him), said—Before the verdict is received, I wish it to appear on your lordship's notes that we object to its reception, on the ground of a misnomer appearing in Mr. Rigby's name, who is one of the jurors. When called as a juror on the first day of this trial he answered and stated that his name was John Jason Rigby, although his name appears on the panel as John Rigby, and he was sworn as such.

The Attorney-General.—He was sworn as John Rigby, and that fact will be entered on the record. Your lordships will also recollect that particular notice was taken of the circumstance at the time by the Crown.

Mr. Henn, Q.C.—That is the very objection we make. He is sworn and acted as John Rigby, although his name is John Jason Rigby.

The Chief Justice. The Court will, of course, take a note of the objection.

The Clerk of the Crown then read the following finding, handed in by the foreman:—

ISSUE.

To try and inquire whether Daniel O'Connell, John O'Connell, Thomas Steele, Thomas Mathew Ray, Charles Gavan Duffy, John Gray, Richard Barrett, and the Rev. Thomas Tierney, or any, or which of them, be guilty of say, or which, of the following offences of which they stand indicted, or not.

COUNTS, AND FINDING THEREON.

1st and 2nd Counts—For unlawfully and seditiously conspiring to raise and create discontent and disaffection amongst the Queen's subjects, and to excite such subjects to hatred and contempt of, and to unlawful and seditious opposition to, the government and constitution, and to unlawfully and seditiously conspire to bring into hatred and contempt the government and laws, and to excite ill-will between different classes of her Majesty's subjects, and especially to promote amongst her Majesty's subjects in other parts of the United Kingdom, especially in England, and to stir up jealousies, hatred, and ill-will between different classes of her Majesty's subjects serving in the army, and to cause and aid in causing divers subjects unlawfully and seditiously to meet and assemble together in large numbers, at various times, and at different places within Ireland, for the unlawful and seditious purpose of obtaining, by means of the intimidation to be thereby caused, and by means of the exhibition and demonstration of great physical force at such meetings, changes and alterations in the government, laws, and constitution as by law established, and to bring into hatred and disrepute the courts by law established in Ireland for the administration of justice, and to diminish the confidence of her Majesty's subjects in the administration of the law therein, with the intent to induce them to withdraw the adjudication of their differences with and claims upon each other, from the cognisance of the courts of law and submit the same to the judgment and determination of other tribunals to be constituted and established for that purpose.

"Guilty—Daniel O'Connell, Richard Barrett, Charles Gavan Duffy, and John O'Connell.

"Guilty—John O'Connell, Thomas Steele, Thomas Matthew Ray, and John Gray, omitting the words 'and to excite discontent and disaffection amongst divers of her Majesty's subjects in the army.'

"Not Guilty—As to the words 'and to excite discontent and disaffection amongst divers of her Majesty's subjects serving in the army.' Not Guilty—and Mr. Tierney from the commencement so far and in-

3rd Count—For unlawfully and seditiously conspiring to raise and create discontent and disaffection amongst the Queen's subjects, and to excite such subjects to hatred and contempt of, and to unlawful and seditious opposition to, the government and constitution, and to stir up jealousies, hatred, and ill-will between the different classes of her Majesty's subjects, and especially to promote amongst the subjects of Ireland feelings of ill-will and hostility towards the subjects in other parts of the United Kingdom, and especially in England, and to cause, and aid in causing, divers subjects to meet and assemble in large numbers at various times and at different places in Ireland for the unlawful and seditious purpose of obtaining by the means of the intimidation to be thereby caused, and by means of the exhibition and demonstration of great physical force at such meetings, changes and alterations in the government, laws, and constitution as by law established, and to bring into hatred and disrepute the courts by law established in Ireland for the administration of justice, and to diminish the confidence of her Majesty's subjects in the administration of the law therein, with intent to induce her Majesty's subjects to withdraw the adjudication of their differences with and claims upon each other, from the cognisance of the courts of law and submit the same to the judgment and determination of other tribunals to be constituted and established for that purpose.

"Guilty—Daniel O'Connell, Richard Barrett, Charles Gavan Duffy, John O'Connell.

"Guilty—John O'Connell, Thomas Steele, Thomas Matthew Ray, and John Gray, omitting the words 'and to excite discontent and disaffection amongst divers of her Majesty's subjects in the army.'

"Not Guilty—John O'Connell, Thomas Steele, Thomas M. Ray, and John Gray, as to the words 'and to excite discontent and disaffection amongst divers of her Majesty's subjects serving in the army.'

"Guilty—The Rev. Thomas Tierney, from the commencement so far and including the words 'especially in England.'

"Not Guilty—The Rev. Thomas Tierney, as to remainder of this count."

4th Count—Conspiring to raise and create discontent and disaffection amongst the Queen's subjects, and to excite such subjects to hatred and contempt of, and to unlawful and seditious opposition to, the government and constitution, and to stir up jealous hatred and ill-will between the different classes of said subjects, and especially to promote amongst the subjects of Ireland feelings of ill-will and hostility towards the subjects in other parts of the United Kingdom, and especially in England, and to cause, and aid in causing, divers subjects to meet and assemble in large numbers at various times and at different places in Ireland for the unlawful and seditious purpose of obtaining by the means of the intimidation to be thereby caused, and by means of the exhibition and demonstration of great physical force at such meetings, changes in the government and constitution as by law established.

"Guilty—all, but the Rev. Mr. Tierney Not Guilty

"Guilty—Rev Thomas Tierney from the commencement, and so far as including the words, 'especially in England.'

"Not Guilty—Rev. Thomas Tierney of the remainder of this count."

5th Count—For unlawfully conspiring to raise and create discontent and disaffection amongst the subjects, and to excite the subjects to hatred and contempt of, and unlawful and seditious opposition to, the government and constitution, and also to stir up jealousies, hatred, and ill-will between different classes of the subjects, and especially feelings of hostility and ill-will against her Majesty's subjects in England.

"All Guilty."

6th Count—For unlawfully conspiring to cause, and aid in causing, [illegible] subjects to meet and assemble in large numbers at various times, and at different places in Ireland, for the unlawful and seditious purpose of obtaining by the exhibition of great physical force at great meetings changes and alterations in the government, laws, and constitution as by law established.

A similar verdict was returned on the remaining five Counts.

"All Guilty but the Rev. Mr. Tierney Not Guilty."

ADJOURNMENT OF THE COURT TO THE FIRST DAY OF NEXT TERM.

The Chief Justice.—I suppose I need not retain the jury further.

The Attorney-General.—No, my lord; but your lordship will record the verdict.

The Chief Justice addressing the jury, said—Gentlemen, the pains and attention you have paid this case from the beginning to the end—at great inconvenience and loss of time, in being prevented from following your usual pursuits for nearly a month in this most unprecedented case, are certainly deserving the highest praise; but I am very sorry the Court have no power to order you compensation. The act of parliament does not warrant it: there was no law passed to meet the necessities of such an extraordinary case as this; but it is a duty imposed on every member of society, who must all take their turn when [illegible] to perform it. [illegible] I am sure you will not attribute to the want of proper attention to the [illegible] the [illegible] It is very desirable, but I am sorry to say that [illegible] I trust that [illegible] to the [illegible] and [illegible] to the [illegible] and [illegible] to the [illegible] and

THE NEW GAOL, AT READING.

NEW COUNTY GAOL, READING.

The erection of this new gaol for the county of Berks has excited considerable interest, from its being upon the plan of the Model Prison at Pentonville. The accompanying view is taken from the embankment on the line of the Great Western Railway. The architects, Messrs. Scott and Moffatt, have evinced considerable judgment, not only in the selection of the style of the edifice, but of the carrying out the details throughout of the entire building, both as regards the internal arrangements, and external appearance. Standing, as it does, on the rising ground, at the entrance to Reading, and close to the site of the venerable abbey, this new prison is from every side the most conspicuous building, and, architecturally, by far the greatest ornament to the town.

The work at the new prison is being executed by Messrs. Baker and Son; and, as far as can be at present stated, the cost, inclusive of fittings, fixtures, fences, engineer's works, cooking, warming, and ventilating apparatus, a large building for the reception of county stores, &c., will be about £40,000. This seems to bear a very fair proportion to the cost of the Model Prison, at Pentonville. That prison, including different incidental expenses, has cost, we believe, about £85,000; which, divided by the number of cells (about 520), would give £165 per cell to cover all expenses: while the cost of the gaol at Reading will be somewhat less.

The gaol will be ready for the reception of prisoners about the middle of the Spring. It is built, generally, upon the same principle as the New Model Prison at Pentonville, and contains, inclusive of debtors, about 250 separate cells. On each side of the central gateway are the Governor's and Chaplain's residences, at each end of the front wall those of the Deputy-Governor and Matron; while the other officers are provided with houses at the remaining angles of the prison wall. Having passed through the outer gateway, we enter a spacious court separating the main prison from the other buildings; and it has in appearance, as well as in reality, the strength adapted for such a building on every side.

The front, or north wing of the prison on the east side, contains the apartments for the debtors (who, however, have no communication with the other parts of the prison), the reception cells, and various offices; above these is the chapel. The architects have been successful in giving this the appearance of a chapel from the outside—a difficult task when so mixed up in a miscellaneous building.

The junction of the four wings forms the central, or Inspection Hall, from which the Governor, when seated in his office, has a complete command over every cell door in the prison, as well as the different officers on duty. This hall is open to the roof of the building, it has a groined ceiling, over which is the tower, formed for the purpose of ventilation, and which is externally itself also an ornamental feature.

The ventilation and warming the cells has been executed by Messrs. G. and J. Haden, of Trowbridge, the firm who were employed for a similar purpose at the Model Prison; and, as far as can be judged by experiments, the system will be successful.

The corridors, from east to west, measure 282 feet, and are open the entire height of the three stories and arched over; the floor is laid with black and red Newcastle tiles, in handsome patterns, and has a fine effect when seen from the galeries above.

As at the new prison at Pentonville, each cell is provided with water-closet, washing-basin, hammock, stool, table, and gas-light; and each prisoner has also a communication by means of a gong with his turnkey. The side roofs of the prison have been covered with Claridge's patent asphalte, the gutters and junctions with the water-pipes being all formed with the same economical material as a substitute for lead.

It may be mentioned that, however, in the general arrangements, the architects have adhered to those of the New Model Prison; yet, in the details and general construction, many useful improvements have been suggested by the working of that establishment.

The general character of the exterior of the new gaol is founded on that of the castellated buildings of the latter part of the 15th century. The actual character and expression of the style is that of strength and defence; and, if it can with propriety be used for any modern building, there is, certainly, none to which it can so suitably be applied as to a prison.

The building is inclosed by a high battering wall, very similar to those surrounding castles; at the angles are towers, containing the lodgings of the officers, so placed, not for appearance, but that through their grated windows they may command the flank walls both externally and internally; and thus facilitate the detection of any attempt to escape from within, or to afford aid to such an attempt from without. The gateway is of the same description, having loop-holes in all directions, affording means of defence against any attack upon the gates. The flat battlements would also be serviceable under such circumstances; and may be used as the place of public execution.

An effective lithograph of this new prison, drawn by Mr. J. L. Griffiths, will shortly be issued; and now that several prisons are building upon the same system of discipline, the above publication will be acceptable. It may be interesting here to mention, that a copiously illustrated description of the Model Prison, at Pentonville, will be found in No. 36 of our journal.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XXXIX.

ST. PANCRAS, NEW-ROAD.

This structure is, perhaps, the most beautiful of all the churches erected in London in the present century. It was designed by the Messrs. Inwood in 1819, and completed at an expense of £76,000 in the year 1822. It is scarcely matched as a correct example of the richest and most graceful Hellenic-Ionic style, being externally a copy of the temple of Erectheus, with wings at the east end from the Pandrosion, at Athens. It has a portico of six columns, with richly-sculptured voluted capitals, which has a truly classical air; and the three doors beneath are in the most refined taste and embellishment. The side elevation of the body of the church is, however, marred by the windows. The east end deviates from the ancient temple plan; it has a projecting wing, and another at each side; each of these wings being supported by four Caryatid figures, copied from the Pandrosion; these excrescences form the entrance to the places of sepulture under the church. The tower (168 feet high) is also Athenian, being copied from the Tower of the Winds, or Andronicus Cyrrhestes; it is octagonal, and surmounted with a column and a vane.

The interior, 117 feet long and 60 broad, has galleries supported by columns, copied from the Elgin marbles; and at the east end are six imitative verde-antico columns, with bases and capitals of white marble, copied from the temple of Minerva Polias; these capitals are even richer than those of the front portico; their volutes are very graceful, and the spiral lines elaborately beautiful. The interior fittings and furniture of the church are very costly; and the pulpit and reading-desk are made from the celebrated "Fairlop Oak."

It should be added, that the close imitation of a Pagan temple throughout this edifice has often been objected to as inappropriate for a Christian church. Neither is this incongruity in every respect atoned for by the successful imitation of the classic details the Caryatid figures are ill executed, as may be seen by reference to one of the original Caryatides, from the Pandrosion, now among the Elgin collection, in the British Museum; it is very fine, and is 7 feet 9 inches high.

ST. PANCRAS CHURCH.

THE GRESHAM CLUB-HOUSE.

THE GRESHAM CLUB-HOUSE.

Last week we presented to our readers a superb specimen of the club-house architecture of St. James's. We now engrave a new exemplar of similar accommodation in the City; and, although in extent, it is far exceeded by the "west-end" edifice, the design now before us will, doubtless, be as much admired for the palatial character of its details.

This new mansion is intended for the accommodation of the Club, bearing the respected name of Gresham, the illustrious founder of the Royal Exchange. The Club numbers in its list some of the leading merchants in the City, who are temporarily located in the premises lately occupied by the Commercial Club, in Threadneedle-street; and every day shows, by the additional applications for admission, the necessity of providing a more extensive establishment for the accommodation of the club.

The foundation-stone of the new structure was laid on the 8th inst., in King William-street, at the corner of St. Swithin's-lane, by the Lord Mayor, with the usual ceremonies; there were present, also, the Sheriffs, the gentlemen of the club committee, Dr. Croly, the rector of the parish, and other influential gentlemen of the City. In the evening, the event was appropriately celebrated by a dinner at the Albion Tavern, in Aldersgate-street. The chair was taken by the Lord Mayor, supported by Mr. Sheriff Moon and other gentlemen of position and character in the City; amongst whom were Messrs. Murray, Anderton (Under Sheriff), Murphy, M.P., Jones and Underwood, Sherman Wood, Captain Meeson, and other gentleman connected with the commercial prosperity of the country. All the members for the City and metropolitan boroughs were invited, and the number of guests amounted to 120. During the evening, Mr. Lamie Murray, the chairman of the committee, in returning thanks for the toast, "Success to the Gresham Club," stated that, owing to the judicious arrangements of their architect, they would occupy the new club-house at a rental of £520, including the whole outlay; such rental being charged to the club on the expense of the building, instead of encumbering the members with a heavy debt at the outset. The festivities of the evening were maintained in right civic style to a late hour.

The new club-house is from the design of Mr. Henry Flower, architect, who acknowledges to have sketched the elevation from portions of two palaces in Venice.

For the arrangement of the kitchen and offices, the architect is indebted to the experience of M. Soyer, the ingenious chef at the Reform Club, in Pall Mall. The amount of the builder's (Mr. W. Cubitt) estimate is £8000; and he has undertaken that the building shall be covered by the 15th of April, and the club-house fit for occupation by the end of September.

Our view is taken from the church corner of Lombard-street, and shows the design to best advantage. It is in the handsome Italianized style, now so popular in this country, and deservedly so; for it combines elegance and high convenience with remarkably good effect. We are happy to see the venerated name of Gresham associated with so many noble architectural ornaments of the City of London; thus, in our 60th Number, we engraved the enriched Roman hall just completed at the angle of Basinghall and Cateston-streets, for the College founded by Gresham for educational purposes; and in a few months will be completed a still nobler monument to the genius of this "honourable of the land" in the New Royal Exchange; the sculptural embellishment of which will be found engraved elsewhere in the present paper.

SCENE FROM "THE CHRISTMAS CAROL," AT THE ADELPHI THEATRE.

ADELPHI THEATRE.

We have already given a slight sketch of this happy dramatic adaptation from Dickens's admirable "romance of real life:" we will now proceed to illustrate it, more through the graphical agency of our artist, than by anything we could ourselves indite. Of the production itself, from which the theatrical representation has emanated, we have nothing to say, but "planets!" from beginning to end: it exhibits the author not only as a caricaturist, but a philanthropist, a satirist, and, unlike the censors of old, a moralist. Neither Horace, Juvenal, nor Persius, could "touch the pitch" they wanted to make appear more black, "without defiling their own fingers," but Dickens is never corrupted by his subject; he stands aloof and "shoots Vice as well as Folly" when it obtrudes itself upon his universal surveillance, with—

An arrow shot by Virtue—barb'd by Wit.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

Rich. Lo! here I lend thee this sharp-pointed sword;
Which, if thou please to hide in this true breast,
And let the soul forth that adoreth thee,
I lay it naked to the deadly stroke,
And humbly beg the death upon my knee.
(He lays his breast open; she offers at it with his sword.)
Nay, do not pause; for I did kill King Henry;
But 'twas thy beauty that provoked me.
Nay, now dispatch; 'twas I that stabb'd young Edward;—
She again offers at his breast.
But 'twas thy heav'nly face that set me on.
(She lets fall the sword.)
Take up the sword, or take up me.

We need not say how ably this passage was delivered by Mr. C. Kean. It was one to which his celebrated father gave a new tone of subtlety of persuasion, that almost vindicates the conduct of Lady Anne, and which, without being servilely copied, is fairly rivalled by his son, the inheritor of his genius. The engraving represents the cloisters of old St. Paul's, one of the scenic novelties in the "setting-up" of the play.

SCENE FROM "RICHARD III." AT DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

Madame Catalini has written to the editor of the Lespic Journal the following letter:—

"My dear Doctor Peller—What have I done to the German press, that it should have killed me for the fourth time? Although sixty-four years of age, I am still in good health, and live retired, happy in my past remembrance. The French papers, deceived by those of Germany, have twice announced my death—the English papers once. The news was far from being disagreeable to me, for I read with great pleasure the praises that accompanied it. But I admit that I became alarmed at finding my death so often blazon forth. It is cruel for an old woman to be continually hearing that she no longer belongs to this world. Should it continue, I shall fancy myself already buried. For Heaven's sake, permit me to live! My inheritance is too trifling to excite the desire of my heirs. That which the prodigality of my husband left me I devoted to the arts, whilst at the head of the Parisian Italian Opera. As to the produce of my concerts, the poor divided it with me. The small domain where I now reside gives me a few thousand pounds, and is all that remains of the millions given to me by Europe. Permit me, let me entreat of you, to enjoy in peace this modest fortune, and do not shorten the few days I have yet to live, for, I repeat, the newspaper articles are anything but amusing.—I am, &c.,

"CATALANI."

A Mons Bertuccat, well known in Paris, is singing with applause at the Theatre Goldoni of Florence.

A new opera, entitled Rigoigi, was last week produced at Hanover. The plot related to the period of the French Revolution of 1830, and contained passages and allusions in rather free terms concerning the ancient regime, as well as reflections on the French nobility in general. The King, who was present, left immediately at the conclusion of the first scene, and signified his displeasure at the production of the work, which is not to be represented again.

THE YOUNG FLAGEOLET PLAYER.

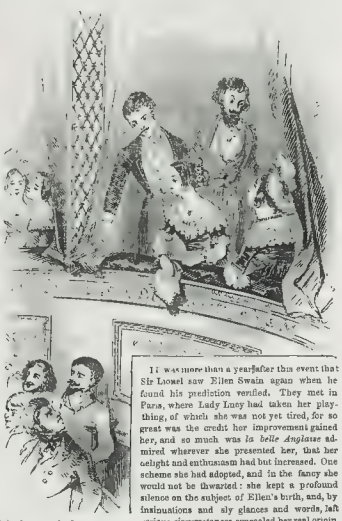
BY

MISS LOUISA STUART COSTELLO.



It was more than a year after this event that Sir Lionel saw Ellen Swain again when he found his prediction verified. They met in Paris, where Lady Lucy had taken her playthings, of which she was not yet tired, for so great was the credit her improvement gained her, and so much was la belle Anglaise admired wherever she presented her, that her delight and enthusiasm had but increased. One scheme she had adopted, and in the fancy she would not be thwarted: she kept a profound silence on the subject of Ellen's birth, and, by insinuations and sly glances and words, left it to be surmised that some mysterious circumstances concealed her real origin. Ellen was obliged to humour the caprice of her patroness, who even bestowed on her another name, calling her Miss St. Clair, as more elegant and interesting than her real appellation.

The latter circumstance, in her letters to her mother, which were read by the hostess of the cottage at the Lees—for Betty Swain was of the old school, and had no book learning—she omitted to name, by order of Lady Lucy, whose secret could not otherwise be safe, and she was one of those who found it impossible to "Drink her tea without a stratagem.

Miss St. Clair became quite the fashion in Paris. It was chiefly in French society that she was introduced, as Lady Lucy avoided her compatriots as much as possible, not wishing to be too much questioned. Ellen, at first, was greatly amused and delighted with her novel position: her spirits were light, and she was naturally fond of excitement; she had a strong passion for acquiring knowledge, and her great aim was to improve herself as rapidly as she could, in order that when she and her brother Edward again met, she might surprise him by the alteration he would find in her. But, as months rolled on, she began to awake from her dream, and to find her situation by no means enviable: she saw plainly that it was not affection, but caprice, that dictated Lady Lucy's actions, and she felt that, though in society she was treated as a gentlewoman by strangers, in private she was merely looked upon by her whimsical mistress as a dependant.

Occasionally the recollection of Arthur Connor would cause her almost to shudder, circumstances had now so much changed their relative positions. "His countrymen are proverbially changeable," she would muse, "and he probably has forgotten me long since; if not, he would have written to my mother, and I should have heard. I hope it is so, for we are unsuited to each other, and I could not now be his wife."

Very different were the reflections of Sir Lionel. He now saw the pretty Ellen Swain all he wished, and, romantic as his mother, with more heart, he had, without weighing the consequences, cherished the little drama begun in Derbyshire, which he intended should find its dénouement in a marriage in Paris. His home, however, was extremely small during his mother's life, and it was to be a half brother that he looked to afford him the means of realizing his visions: he had always understood he was to be his bachelor uncle's heir, but that uncle was so eccentric a personage, that none of his family ever knew where he was to be found. he never wrote to any one, and it was only by some unforseen circumstance they occasionally discovered that he was still alive. He was heard of from time to time in Italy, at Constantinople, even in Russia; and, when least expected, might sometimes be met with in the streets of Paris or London.

It did not occur to Sir Lionel that it would be as well, before he took any step in the matter of gaining his uncle's consent, to ascertain whether the affections of Ellen answered to his own; but he had sufficient vanity to imagine that there was little doubt of that being the case, and he possessed such a feeling of honour a made him wish to avoid raising her expectations till he saw a probability of their being fulfilled.

The question now was how to find his uncle, in order to appeal to him and obtain his sanction to his marriage; he knew his character to be so singular, that, as in one in everything, he felt assured that he would not resist the eloquence he intended to make use of, and he trusted to his mother's doting fondness to assist, instead of her objecting to his wish. Had he known more of the world, such wild imaginings would not have entered his mind, but he was little past twenty, wanting a few months of being of age. He had frequent opportunities of seeing Ellen, and became more and more attached to her every day, and never any private conversation, nor met without his mother being of the party.

"Is she not lovely?" said Lady Lucy to him one day; "I really never expected my plan to succeed so well. If she scarcely is able to converse I have the address of a prayer who was quite the rage last season at Rome; he is just arrived in Paris, and is in the suite of an English gentleman, who, it seems, is no other than my eccentric brother, Clement. I suspect it is some new favourite of his, as I know he is so absurdly enthusiastic about music. As he does not, of course, know I am in Paris, we should meet, as we usually do, by chance; but I have just sent to inform him where we are."

"I will go to him instantly," exclaimed Sir Lionel, with animation.

Accordingly, having ascertained at what hotel he was to be found, the young man hastened to seek him. On reaching his hotel, he was shown into a room, where, seated at a desk covered with music, he beheld a young man of very prepossessing appearance, busily engaged looking over a manuscript score. He was pale, and a thoughtful expression was on his brow, but his graceful air and the sweet smile with which he bowed to the stranger at once interested Sir Lionel.

"I have," said he, "intruded, I fear; I thought to find my uncle, Mr. Ashe, in the romantic cognomen he has adopted, he says himself, in order to win his own scheme succeeding as he desired, and he willingly accepted for his mother and her pa x box at the theatre for that evening, when the Signor was to make his first public appearance.

"I tell my sister I am too much occupied to see her before, but we will meet then," was his remark to Sir Lionel on their parting.

As he left the hotel he met the young Count d'Orseille, who joined him, and seemed anxious to enter into conversation, which, though he endeavoured to avoid, the other persisted in. They therefore took a long promenade in the gardens of the Tuileries, where the loquacious Frenchman's continued talk acquainted him with much which caused him surprise.

"My dear friend," said he to Sir Lionel, as he took his arm, "I have been trying for several days to find you alone, in order to talk over several matters. You may have observed my admiration in a certain quarter; the charming Miss St. Clair is, I have reason to think, not indifferent to my attentions, and I have serious thoughts of offering to her; but although I am aware that you English are all rich, it is as well to ascertain exact facts, and of course, I must have sufficient dower with my wife. My lady's mother, a most accomplished person, has the question is delicate to put to her. To you, I have not the same scruple as to what is the fortune of Mdlle. St. Clair?"

"That young lady," said Sir Lionel, rather sharply, "has no fortune, that I know of, beyond her beauty and excellent qualities."

"Hein!" exclaimed the Count, "that will never do—I am obliged to you—I can draw back in time: of course, such a thing would be out of the question. Hush-bye—singular character Monsieur Ashe—your countrymen are so eccentric, if his son-in-law adopted the Signor Eduardo, and means to leave him all his fortune—do you know if that is a fact?"

"That young lady," said Sir Lionel, rather sharply, "has no fortune, that I know of, beyond her beauty and excellent qualities."

"Hein!" exclaimed the Count, "that will never do—I am obliged to you—I can draw back in time: of course, such a thing would be out of the question. Hush-bye—singular character Monsieur Ashe—your countrymen are so eccentric, if his son-in-law adopted the Signor Eduardo, and means to leave him all his fortune—do you know if that is a fact?"

It was in less brilliant spirits than before that Sir Lionel accompanied his mother and her party to her box at the theatre that evening. His uncle's name had already reached the ears of Ellen, who, as Sir Lionel observed, she was therefore put to unprepared for the surprise that awaited her.

The concert began, but was little attended to, all expectation being centered in the anticipated appearance of the celebrated Signor Eduardo. At length he made his appearance as usual, and attached himself to Lady Lucy, was vehement in praise of the genius of the young performer.

"He is said to be an Englishman, Ashe, of course, adopted an Italian appellation as more taking with the town," said Lo: "ha: he is coming, I behold him; now Mademoiselle," he exclaimed involuntarily, addressing Ellen, "you will be charmed.

Ellen turned her eyes to the stage, and the next moment uttered a cry which was sufficiently audible, as she unconsciously extended her arms, and uttered the words—"Edward!—my brother!"

"C'est donc une artiste," muttered the Count, elevating his eyebrows in amazement.

"Miss St. Clair," said Lady Lucy, angrily, "what can you mean? you astonish me; pray, be more yourse f."

But Ellen heeded nothing, neither the sneer of the Count, the frowns of his mistress, the deafening applause, which was bestowed on the performer, she only saw her brother, and could not contain her delight.

"See Lucy Lucy," she cried, "it is he himself—how very extraordinary—how happy I am—what will he say when he sees me! I had forgotten myself for fear of his being mistaken; poor fellow, how pale he looks!"

And the tears streamed from her eyes and dropped on her white gloves as she leaned over the front of the box, regardless of the attention she attracted. At the moment Mr. Ashe entered the box; all was now greeting between the relatives, which Lady Lucy thought it fitting to assume an appearance of affectionate regard, wherein she was far from really feeling.

"Where have you been, dearest Clement, for so long—this is treating us very ill," she exclaimed, embracing him. "Lionel, you have seen your uncle before; but now, sir," she added playfully; "as for Miss St. Clair, we can introduce her ourselves."

Mr. Ashe had received Ellen with a half-reproving glance; and nodding to her silent, but she blushed deeply and trembled violently; meanwhile, Mr. Ashe made a sign with his finger for silence, for Edward Hale was enchanting his auditors. Charmed was the concourse of persons of the middle class, who had taken their stations some time, and had been applauding vehemently; none of them but himself, however, allowed their attention to be divided, for all were listening with eager delight.

The gazer turned his glance rapidly from Ellen to her brother and back again in perplexed astonishment, and passed his hand across his eyes once or twice, as if mistrusting his sight. It was, however, no fairy vision, and Ellen's honour, indeed, recognised his friends, both of whom were unconscious that he looked upon them. Nor was it strange that they should be so, for Arthur could himself scarcely believe the scene was real when the circumstances had placed him at that moment.

When he wrote to Ellen, mentioning his intention of accepting the Eastern Railroad Company, he little imagined to what his doing so would lead. Several English gentlemen had joined themselves with Frederick Percy in the undertaking, and by them were the English and Irish workmen employed.

Arthur had not only shown such industry in the occupation assigned him, but so much intelligence, as to attract the attention of those in power, and step by step he had risen to the appointment of Engineer and Secretary to a portion of the establishment which required such a responsibility. He found himself, therefore, in a very superior position to any he could have hoped for, and more than ever was he proud of the little learning which had made so great an effect on his humble friends and employers at Derbyshire.

He was entirely ignorant of Ellen's departure from the Hall, though he had been informed of tortoiseshell Ward, and of the career he was likely to pursue; he, however, no feelings of either reached him, he was in total ignorance of their doings, and was pleasing his mind with the hope of an answer to a letter he had dispatched to Ellen herself a few days previous to his being dine'er in the theatre in that letter he had told her his appointment, and had claimed the fulfilment of a sort of tacit promise which had passed between them, and, in all the gaiety of an excited imagination, had cheerfully agreed to accompany a party of his friends to hear the great attraction of the hour, having obtained a day's holiday on occasion of a public fête.

It is earnest [illegible] though unmarked by its object, was intercepted by Sir Lionel who stood in the side of Ellen, watching with undefined feelings the strong emotion she betrayed. He had not heard her exclamation, when Edward appeared and he was at a loss to comprehend what could cause her to be so deeply affected.

"The music moves you, Miss St. Clair, he at length remarked. "Signor Eduardo is indeed a potent magician, he seems to have bewildered more than one person in the house. Yonder companion of yours, for he cannot be a gentleman by his countenance, seems to be almost beside himself. Do look at his strange gestures—it is quite amusing. The Signor's strain is at an end."

Instead of which, all the attention of the audience was at a glance met the eye of Arthur—she started, pressed one hand violently on the arm of Sir Lionel, and covering her face with the other, burst into tears, and sank back in her seat.

Lady Lucy, who, all the time, feared an exposé, now interfered, and professing to feel unwell, and vowing that the heat had overcome her young friend, rose to leave the theatre, dispatching D'Orseille for her carriage, into which Ellen was carried without being able to address Mr. Ashe, who had left them the moment Edward's triumphant scena was concluded.

Sir Lionel and the Count returned to the theatre, and were making their way to their box, when their progress was arrested by a man, who, placing himself before Sir Lionel, uttered in English an exclamation which made him start.

"Where have you carried her—villain that you are?"—cried the voice of Arthur Conner; "by his eye flashing and his cheek flushed with anger, he seized his prey. "I demand her, in the name of her mother—and I will be answered."

"What does the madman mean?" said Sir Lionel, as he attempted to pass on—"who are you sir?"

"I ask for Ellen Swain—for my affianced bride—for her I love better than my existence," cried Arthur—"for whom you have basely seduced from her friends, and I would you knew and fear me."

Sir Lionel stopped, astonished, yet unable to resist affording his attention to this strange appeal.

"You are under some delusion, young man," said he, "or are intoxicated stand out of my way, and go about your business."

"My business is not to be postponed, said Arthur fiercely "tell me at once where Ellen is or—"

"Enough"—cried Sir Lionel; who, observing a crowd collecting round, was anxious to put an end to the scene—"take my card and come to me for an explanation, but elsewhere. You are disturbing a scene which I must request instantly."

Sir Lionel stopped, astonished, yet unable to resist affording his attention to this strange appeal.

"You are under some delusion, young man," said he, "or are intoxicated stand out of my way, and go about your business."

"My business is not to be postponed, said Arthur fiercely "tell me at once where Ellen is or—"

"Enough"—cried Sir Lionel; who, observing a crowd collecting round, was anxious to put an end to the scene—"take my card and come to me for an explanation, but elsewhere. You are disturbing a scene which I must request instantly."

Sir Lionel returned home in a state of great perturbation, but far more so were the feelings which agitated the young flute player, when an hour after he had returned to his hotel, and had thrown himself exhausted on a sofa, a letter was handed to him which contained these words.

"Did you suppose that I would submit to—or are you a man to revenge it? Do admit me instantly. Arthur Conner.

Ward started up in amazement. "Who brought this billet?" he enquired. "The person below," was the answer

"I let him be instantly admitted," cried Edward, and in a few moments Arthur stood before him. His movement was in hurry forward to meet his old acquaintance, but he stopped as he observed the somewhat stern character of the young Irishman's expression.

"Conner," he said, "what does your letter mean? do you know of any danger my sister Perphaps at once.

In a rivid and almost incoherent accents Arthur described having seen Ellen at the theatre in company with Sir Lionel Vane, of their retiring together, of his interview, and subsequent appointment for the morrow.

"You tell me a strange tale," said Edward, much agitated, "it is now more than a year since Ellen left our home: the silence of Ellen has distressed me, but I imagined her occupations and want of habit of writing were the cause. Mr. Ashe, too, has been so long absent from his family that he cannot be accounted with their conduct. Sir Lionel is his nephew—I see him but to day. Can it indeed be Ellen that you have seen? was not his mother in the box?

"I saw," said Arthur, endeavouring to collect his ideas, "no female but Ellen there were several persons in the company, but it was on Sir Lionel that she leaned when she went away. I saw him stoop over her and take her hand. I could no more be mistaken—

"I will go with you to this rendezvous, Arthur," said Edward, "my benefactor Mr. Ashe, left Paris only half an hour since or he might have advised us in this business. Can it be that his nephew is so unworthy of him—his countenance, I do not believe. Sir Lionel is his nephew—I see him but to day. Can it indeed be Ellen that you have seen? was not his mother in the box?

"I saw," said Arthur, endeavouring to collect his ideas, "no female but Ellen there were several persons in the company, but it was on Sir Lionel that she leaned when she went away. I saw him stoop over her and take her hand. I could no more be mistaken—

"I will go with you to this rendezvous, Arthur," said Edward, "my benefactor Mr. Ashe, left Paris only half an hour since or he might have advised us in this business. Can it be that his nephew is so unworthy of him—his countenance, I do not believe. Sir Lionel is his nephew—I see him but to day. Can it indeed be Ellen that you have seen? was not his mother in the box?

"I saw," said Arthur, endeavouring to collect his ideas, "no female but Ellen there were several persons in the company, but it was on Sir Lionel that she leaned when she went away. I saw him stoop over her and take her hand. I could no more be mistaken—

"I will go with you to this rendezvous, Arthur," said Edward,

The Journal des Débats says that Artem Rey, the new Egyptian Minister, is a Roman Catholic, and that he was presented by the Pope with a decoration of the Holy Sepulchre on his departure for Egypt.

The Duc de Nemours, Monsieur, and the Galerie des Tombeaux, at Versailles, are now open to the public.

I never knew our Opera Theatres so dull and uninteresting—the houses are empty. The Italian Opera is well attended; Bramhilla continues one of the greatest favourites. The new ballet at the Grand Opera is to be called "Un Caprice, ou le Marché aux Servantes." Mademoiselle Fleury decidedly leaves it for London. Miss Waldenceller, a celebrated pianist from Vienna, is now in Paris.

Marschner's opera, "Hans Heilerig," was brought out with great success at Dresden.

I have just learnt that Madame Dorus Gras leaves Paris in the 1st of May for London, and that Carlotta Grisi also leaves for London in the course of the present month. It is said that Carlotta Grisi is to receive £10 00 for her six nights' performance.

PORTUGAL.

The Peninsula and Oriental Company's steamer, Montrose, Captain Lewis, arrived at Southampton on Wednesday morning at a quarter past eleven o'clock, bringing accounts to Gibraltar of the 31st inst. Cadiz of the 7th, Lisbon of the 7th, Oporto of the 8th, and Vigo of the 9th. Her mails were forwarded by the fastest and most steady conveyance. Some important news has appeared in the Portuguese papers, which will be found in part in another column; and, further than that report, little has come to hand. Indeed, the Montrose was out of reach of having any.

The Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of London and Middlesex have been summoned by Earl Beauvale to attend at the office of the Lord Lieutenant of Middlesex, in order to attest half of the officers of the militia ballot in each parish in the county, and to make a similar return of the names of such persons as may be returned for service. A similar order has been issued to the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of the City of London.

The 4th Cavalry at Barcelona have recently manifested considerable hostility to the ministry; those troops were commanded by Count de Vasconcellos. The garrison at Lisbon has, it is said, also revolted, and at first the Governor of Lisbon at a late hour of each night, with a large retinue of officers and soldiers, and supernumerary sentinels have been stationed in different places, in order to watch the movements of every suspicious person. The Queen's carriage was at the door of the palace at a late hour last night. Most of the troops that revolted, such was the alarm felt by her ministers that they deemed it advisable to recommend her Majesty to remain at home, which she did.

The insurgents are taking the most energetic measures to suppress the insurrectionary outbreak, and have applied to be armed—

1st. With extraordinary and discretionary powers.

2d. Suspension of the habeas corpus.

3d. Suspension of all newspapers except the Diario.

4th. Authorisation for the loan of 2000 contos.

The following persons have been arrested, and are now confined on board the Duero frigate:—Lourenco d'Oliveira Grigo, formerly Civil Governor of Lisbon, L. Cavares Cabral, editor of the Patriota, Antonio da Costa Mauel, late editor of the Tribuna, and J. L. da Silva, proprietor of a dal factory at Funchal.

Orders have likewise been issued for the arrest of Count Bonfim, Baron de Foscoa, Mendes Leite, Antonio R. Sampayo, J. A. de N. Morais Leitao, and Xavier de Quadros. The three officers of the 2d Rifles imprisoned in the Castle were strong Septembrist partisans.

The persons for whose arrest orders have been issued have thus far contrived to elude pursuit. Of all these, the most important, influential, and dangerous is Count Bonfim, who obtained permission a few days ago in the Chamber of Peers to proceed to Evias, where he usually resides, and where he possesses considerable power. No doubt is entertained that his object is to make a revolt there; and as Evias is a large garrison town, and Count Bomfim is rather celebrated as a military commander, it is dreaded that he may influence the garrison to pronounce against the Government, and this seems a most formidable nucleus of revolt.

Both Chambers, at their sittings on the 6th, co-operated very cordially with the Government. The Duke of Palmella spoke very strongly against the revolt, as of an unnecessary and infamous character; and even the Marquis of Loulé, who usually acts with the Opposition, expressed his unfeigned horror at this attempt. The Minister of the Kingdom likewise spoke effectively, and declared that the arbitrary powers which it was now proposed to concede to him would not be used for purposes of persecution or vengeance. The proposition to grant to the Peers by 35 votes against 6. In the Deputies it was likewise carried by a large majority.

An immense coining and forging establishment has been discovered and broken up at Arada, near Oporto. It kept sixty persons in constant employment within doors, and a powerful cylinder at work. They coined Portuguese silver money and Spanish dollars. Some persons of respectable character are involved, who were connected with a similar establishment at Villa Nova, opposite Oporto. They had forged Brazilian notes in such quantity as to have nearly broken the Bank of Maranham. At Rio there was found a complete set of hospitals of an immense fat box, secretly sealed, and full of these forged notes. Numerous Portuguese in Brazil were connected with this transaction.

The olive crop in the north of Portugal has been ruined by the late frosts; unhappily, too, it has been materially injured for years to come.

The Garonne, on the 11th, and its branches, had so overflowed the surrounding country, that all the steamers have ceased to run, and the diligences on the lower roads arrived one or two days later than under ordinary circumstances. Near Toulouse, also, a great part of the country is under water.

The new line of packets between Marseilles and Egypt is to commence on the 4th of next month, and one steamer is to leave each month. The passengers' fares and other charges are to be the same as those of the Levant packets.

The Cologne Gazette states that letters have been received from St. Petersburgh, announcing a great intrigue against the Emperor, but that there is reason to believe, from other advices, that the Russian Court has consented to remain in taking two villages, and that not without assuming a considerable loss of men.

THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE.—A very limited quantity of English wheat has been received up to this market during the present week, scarce the show of samples has proved small. On each market day the attendance of both town and country buyers has been tolerably numerous, while the demand for all descriptions of the above grain has ruled active, at an advance of from 1s to full 2d per qr., when good consignees have been readily effected. The show of wheat from foreign ports has been very moderate indeed. Bonded corn has met with more inquiry, now that the season for the removal of the duty is at hand; barley has ruled firm at very full rates. Grinding and distilling sorts are quite a dear. The same trade has ruled slow, though at very full rates. Oats have sold at a trifling improvement upon last week's currency. Beans and peas have been in moderate request, and have realised fully previous prices.

ARRIVALS.—Wheat, English, 1,200 qrs.; foreign, 1,000 qrs. Barley, English, 1,000 qrs. Oats, English, 1,000 qrs.; foreign, 1,000 qrs. Beans, English, 1,000 qrs.; foreign, 1,000 qrs. Peas, English, 1,000 qrs.; foreign, 1,000 qrs. Flour, 1,000 sacks.

Mark Lane, Monday Evening, Feb. 12.—The supply of wheat, English and foreign, is very moderate to-day. Fine qualities of the former are in good request, and fully support the prices of last week; but other kinds are dull, and the turn lower. Foreign wheat is in limited demand, and prices are nominally unchanged. Flour is dull, and 6d per bbl lower. Barley is in good request, and fully supports the prices of last week. Malting qualities are in demand, and fetch full prices. Beans and peas are dull, and 1s per qr lower. Oats are in good request, and 1s per qr dearer.

Liverpool, Monday Evening, Feb. 12.—Wheat, 5s to 7s; barley, 2s to 3s; oats, 1s to 2s; beans, 2s to 3s; peas, 2s to 3s per qr. Flour, 1s per bbl.

Beasts.—Our market was tolerably well supplied with beasts this morning, but the demand was very heavy, at a decline of 2d per 8lbs. The best Scots sold at 3s 6d per 8lbs; other breeds, 3s 4d per 8lbs.

Sheep.—The supply was large, and the demand heavy, at a decline of 2d per 8lbs. Prime Downs, 4s 2d per 8lbs; other breeds, 4s per 8lbs.

Calves.—The supply was large, and the demand heavy, at a decline of 2d per 8lbs. Prime calves, 4s 4d per 8lbs; other breeds, 4s per 8lbs.

Pigs.—The supply was large, and the demand heavy, at a decline of 2d per 8lbs. Prime pigs, 4s per 8lbs; other breeds, 3s 8d per 8lbs.

Smithfield.—The supplies of fresh meat in this market are very moderate, and the demand is heavy, at a decline of 2d per 8lbs. Beef, 2s 8d to 4s 4d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 8d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 8d; pork, 3s 4d to 4s 4d per 8lbs.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The superabundance of capital has received some relief, during the week, from new and important sources of employment having been introduced into the money market since the sale. The proposed line from Rugby to Hitchcad has, as a portion of it, about, attracted considerable attention. A good deal of business has been done in the Lancaster and Carlisle line, and likewise in that from Berwick to Edinburgh, the former rendering the communication between Liverpool and Glasgow more rapid and cheaper, and the latter extending the railroad twelve miles to the eastern most of Great Britain. The shares generally have been held at premiums varying from one to two pounds on each. In the shares of the old leading lines the usual amount of business continues to be done at little alteration in their value. None of them are dealt, but rather the contrary, if any difference has actually occurred.

On the Foreign Stock Exchange, confidence in the ultimate security of various descriptions of Foreign Securities is evidently on the increase, particularly in those of the European [illegible] and the transactions [illegible] have been [illegible] and her extensive business has [illegible] a more extended [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Just published, small quarto, price Sixpence,
'98, Another and a Truer Ballad Version of the Events of the Year of the GREAT IRISH REBELLION. By the Author of "The Reign of Horror." PEMAN RICHARDSON, 33, Cornhill.

FOURTH EDITION
In small 8vo, with four coloured Etchings, and Woodcuts by Leech,
A CHRISTMAS CAROL, in Prose; being a Ghost Story of Christmas. By CHARLES DICKENS. Fcp. Five Shillings.
CHAPMAN and HALL, 186, Strand.

Entirely New Work on Knitting and Netting. Now Ready, One Shilling, illustrated,
THE KNITTER'S FRIEND, containing Fifty entirely Original Receipts in Knitting and Netting for Opera Cape, Boots, Shoes, Socks, Cardinal Cape, &c., &c.—J. HORN, 58, Queen-street, Ramsgate. Sold, or obtained, to order, by all Berlin shops.

Just published, price 18s., handsomely bound in cloth,
A TREATISE ON THE GAME OF CHESS, containing an Introduction, and an Analysis of the various methods of beginning the Game; also several new modes of Attack and Defence, particularly in the Muzio Gambit, to which are added Twenty-five new Chess Problems or Diagrams. By W. LEWIS.
A. H. BAILEY and Co., Cornhill

Second Edition, in one volume, cloth, price 5s. 6d.,
CHESS FOR BEGINNERS, in a Series of Progressive Lessons, showing the most approved methods of beginning and ending the Game, together with various Situations and Checkmates. By WILLIAM LEWIS. With Twenty four Diagrams, printed in Colours.
CHAPMAN and HALL, 186, Strand.

UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE DIFFUSION OF USEFUL KNOWLEDGE.
Just published, complete, in cloth, price 10s.; or in nine Numbers, price 1s. each,
THE HORSE: its History, Races, Structure, Diseases, and Treatment. By W. YOUATT. With a Treatise on Draught. A new and enlarged Edition, re-written, and brought down to the present state of Veterinary Science. With an entirely new set of Cuts, drawn by Harvey.—CHAPMAN and HALL, 186, Strand.

COMPLETION OF THE MAPS of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. The concluding Number (10d.), containing Title-pages and Tables of Contents, price 1s., is just published BINDING THE ATLAS.—Specimen Copies, in various styles of binding, may be seen at the Publisher's; and subscribers may have their copies bound in the best and strongest manner, with India-rubber bands, by sending them through their respective booksellers, or direct to CHAPMAN and HALL, 186, Strand.

NEW AND IMPROVED EDITION OF MR. TATE'S ARITHMETIC.
This day, price 2s. 6d. neatly bound,
TATE'S COMMERCIAL ARITHMETIC
And, at the same, new-first published, price 3s. 6d.,
TATE'S KEY TO COMMERCIAL ARITHMETIC.
Schools and Teachers may depend on a regular supply of these superior books in future.
E. FINNIMAN WILSON, 18, Bishopsgate within. LONGMAN and Co., and all Booksellers.

Small 8vo., price 7s. 6d., or in morocco 10s. 6d., HOURS of MEDITATION and DEVOTIONAL REFLECTION, upon various subjects connected with the Religious, Moral, and Social Duties of Life. By H. ZSCHOKKE. Translated from the German by JAMES D. HAAS
"In Germany this work has reached 24 editions, and we will venture to say that no one of the number pu ya devotional books. . . . As this abridgment contains wholesome reflections on 61 very religious and moral subjects, without being confined to any particular sect, it promises to be much read in this country."—The TIMES.—CHAPMAN and HALL, 186, Strand.

DEDICATED TO HER MAJESTY
Just published, at the Office of the "Illuminated Magazine," No. 3, Crane court, Fleet-street
No I. OF THE PRINCE OF WALES'S LIBRARY.
THE PRIMER.
Price One Shilling. Edited by H. MATTHEW; Embellished (with upwards of 100 designs) by J. GILBERT, &c.; Engraved by E. LANDELLS; Printed (in three colours) by WILLIAM SPENCER. HORACE MAYHEW, Publisher.

INSTRUCTIVE WORKS
CELESTIAL SCENERY; or, the Planetary System Displayed. By T. DICK, LL.D. Fifth Tuesday, with upwards of one hundred Engravings. 12mo. 10s. 6d. cloth
THE SIDEREAL HEAVENS, and other Subjects connected with Astronomy. By T. DICK, LL.D. 12mo. with numerous engravings. 10s. 6d. cloth
A LETTER to a YOUNG PIANOFORTE PLAYER. Containing Hints for avoiding or correcting Errors and Inelegancies to which Pupils are liable. By the late Miss MARY JANE GRAHAM. Second Edition, now 18mo., Cloth, 1s.
LE PETIT PRECEPTEUR; or, First Step to French Conversation. By F. GRANDINEAU, formerly French Master to her Majesty Queen Victoria. Fifth edition, with nearly fifty wood cuts, cloth, 3s.—Z. WILL and Co., 37, Farringdon-street.

THE FARMER'S MAGAZINE, for FEBRUARY, 1844, is embellished with—Plate I. CHARLES COLLING; Plate II. BUTTERCUP, a celebrated Heifer, bred by Mr. Henry Watson, of Walkeringham, near Bawtry.
CONTENTS.—Memoir of Charles Colling by Cuthbert W. Johnson, Esq., of Hall, F.R.S. On the Resources which Farmers possess to meet the reduced Prices of their Produce, by Hewitt Davis. Experiments of Drilling Crops down Barley at Lark Rise, Essay on the Management of Fold-Yard Manure. Miscellaneous Matter, Experiments, Answers, and Queries. Farmers' Club Meeting. Agricultural Societies, Leases, Game, &c. Description of Mr. Alexander's Draining Plough. The Currency; by G. P. Bacon. Richmond Shire Farmer's Club. On Bringing into Tillage Old Pasture Land; by Tuns. Underwood. Cornwall Agricultural Association. On the Application of True Principles of Breeding Domesticated Animals, by George Drake. Framlingham Farmer's Club. A few Remarks on the Farmers' best Friend—the Miners, by a Friend to Agriculture. Bucks Agricultural Meeting. Burton-upon-Trent Farmers' Club. On the Possibility of Growing Wheat Continuously and Profitably on the same Land; by Mr. Briggs. Agriculture, Manufactures, and the Currency; Five Letters to Sir Robert Peel. Dawson and Hansell's Report of the Liverpool Wool Trade. Hughes and Ronald's Report of the Liverpool Wool Trade. Spade Husbandry. Prebus Farmers' Club. Thoughts on Steeping Diseased Potatoes. Letter to a Farmer on the Repeal of the Corn Laws. Wrexham Farmers' Club. Reviews of New Books. On the Agricultural Statistics recommended by Philip Pusey, M.P. (From the Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society of England.) Chepstow Farmers' Club. On Artificial and other Manures. Agricultural Queries. Answers to Agricultural Queries. General Agricultural Report for January Calendar of Horticulture for February. Stallions for the Season. Review of the Corn Trade during the month of January. Prices of Grain, Seeds, Hops, Potatoes, Provisions, Wool, Hides, &c. Prices of Shares.
OFFICE, 24, Norfolk-street, Strand, and may be had of all booksellers.

TO PARENTS, &c.—A CIVIL ENGINEER and CONTRACTOR has a VACANCY for a Gentlemanly YOUTH as a PUPIL, either in or out of doors. A moderate premium will be required. Address, S. R. M., Peele's Coffee-house, Fleet-street.

FLAT PATENT LEVER WATCHES, London-made, with the late improvement of placing the balance level with the other wheels of the watch, so as to render it fit for the waistcoat pocket, with the detached escapement, capped and jewelled in four holes, hand to mark the seconds, hard enamel dial mountings power to continue the action of the watch while winding, are offered in silver engine-turned case, price six guineas each, or hunting cases 6g guineas. An undertaking is given with fixed terms, on which the MAKER will always receive attention.—T. COX SAVORY, Watchmaker, Jeweller, &c., 47, Cornhill (seven doors from Gracechurch-street), London. N.B. Second-hand watches purchased in exchange.

THE STATE TRIALS.
On whatsoever subject we may fix,
We never believe we've anything left,
Nor will we violate this self denial,
In our remarks upon "O'Connell's Trial."
We only wish, in mild conciliation,
To make proposals to that Irish Nation.
Their wants are many we must all confess,
And none is greater than their want of "DRESS"
Now if they would avail themselves of "OUR"
They might rely "DRESS" their wrongs by acting thus.
Our "prices," should defy a competition,
Would very shortly be their condition,
Observe the moderate charges that we fix
We've "Beaver Chesterfields" at "ten-and six."
We've "Tag ion Coats" on view as "nine,"
And "Wrapping" "Driving" "Fearnought" "over-hap"
"Warm Winter Trousers" at "and finely wrought,
As low as "four-and-six" and "one-pound four,"
And "any pattern doeskin," if you'll come,
May always be obtain'd for twice that sum.
MOSES and SON have got, among their stock,
"Dress Coats" a pound, and "Frock Coats," "one-pound four."
For "three-and-six pence" we can sell a "vest,"
Suited to winter with a "Double Breast"
For "one-pound-seven" we "order'd Coat" is made,
And for the "very best throughout the trade,"
"Fifty five sudlers" is the most that's paid.
Our "Dresden Trousers" when they are bespoke,
Are sold as low as "Ten" without a joke,
And we can make the "Best-made Cassimere,"
For "one pound-six" which is by no means dear.
These "prices," though we only name a few,
Will give you some idea what we do
Such "charges" soon would make it break smile
And master coachers of the Isaac fair.
READY-MADE.

		MADE TO MEASURE.
Tegliones, velvet collar and cuffs, lined throughout, from	£0 9 0	Winter Coats, of the most approved make and material trimmed in the most fashionable style	£1 5 0
Beaver Chesterfield, velvet collar and cuffs, lined throughout, from	0 10 6	Double milled Tweed Wrappers, lined, from	0 15 0
Codringtons, Paletots, York Wrappers, &c., handsomely trimmed, from	0 15 0	Trousers of the newest fabric	0 10 6
Warm Winter Trousers, from	0 4 6	Or Three Pairs for	1 10 0
Any pattern Doeskins, do. from	0 9 0	Winter Waistcoats in endless variety of pattern and materials, from	0 3 6
Double breasted Winter Vests, from	0 3 6	Dress Coats, from	1 12 0
Dress Coats, edged, &c., from	1 0 0	The best manufactured	2 2 0
Frock do.	1 4 0

Mourning to any extent can be had at five minutes' notice, at the following prices:—Men's Suits, Dress Coat, Vest, and Trousers, from.....£1 16 0
Boy's do., Jacket, Vest, and Trousers, from.....0 18 0
Any article purchased, or ordered, if not approved of, exchanged, or the money returned.
CAUTION.—E. MOSES and SON regret being obliged to guard the Public against imposition, as they learn that the metradesman-like falsehood of being connected with them, or, it's the same cannon, has been resorted to in many instances, and for obvious reasons. They have no connexion whatever with any other Establishment; and those who desire genuine Cheap Clothing, should call or send to 154, MINORIES, to guard against disappointment, &c.
Observe.—E. MOSES and SON, Tailors, Wholesale Woollen Drapers and Outfitters, 154, Minories, and 86, Aldgate, City.

EVANS'S HOTEL, King-street and Piazza, Covent-garden, affords the best accommodation, on reasonable terms. Bed and Breakfast One Guinea per Week. All the Railroad Omnibuses to Charing cross pass within a short distance of this Hotel. Admittance at any hour

CONTRARY to all expectation, the news by the Overland Mail has produced A FALL in the price of useful TEAS. The East India Tea Company are the first to give the public the benefit of it. The Rich bag of good sound Black Tea is now 17s. The 5lb. bag of young Hyson is one sovereign.
Offices, 9, Great St. Helen's, Bishopsgate-street.

PUTNEY COLLEGE.—Established for General and Scientific Education, including every Branch of Civil Engineering.
President—The Duke of BUCCLEUCH, &c., K.G.
The Course embraces Mathematics, Natural Philosophy—Physics—Chemistry—Geology—Civil Engineering—Machinery—Drawing in all its Branches—French and German Languages, and Literature. Applications for admission to be addressed to the Committee of Management, College, Putney, where every information may be obtained.

CHAPPED HANDS. J. and E. ATKINSON beg respectfully to recommend their GOLD CREAM for Softening the Skin, and preventing its Cracking. It is prepared of the finest materials in the most improved manner, and will keep good for a long time, even in a foreign climate, but those who prefer it fresh may always procure it, as the extensive sale requires that it is made at least once a week.—P.S.—To Ladies whose hands are much chapped, their PATE AU MIEL, with peculiarly pure pressed gloves, are a sure remedy.—24, Old Bond street. February, 1844.

MOULD CANDLES to burn WITHOUT SNUFFING.—KEMPTON'S PATENT.—THESE CANDLES ARE NOW GREATLY IMPROVED, and do not require snuffing; they burn longer, and are cheaper than any other candle; the flame is steady and brilliant. The improvement consists in the wick used in the manufacture.—Price 8d. per pound.—Sold by G. E. PARISH, Agent for Exportation, 21½, Bread-street, City, and at the Manufactory, Old Barge-house, Christchurch, Surrey.

THE Toilet of Beauty furnishes innumerable proofs of the high estimation in which GOWLAND'S LOTION is held by the most distinguished possessors of brilliant complexions. This elegant preparation preserves the complexion from the effects of exposure to sea and variable temperature, by refreshing its delicacy, and sustaining the brightest tints with healthful clearness. Sold by 20, ST. PAUL'S CHURCH-YARD, London," in white letters on the stamp of the genuine.—Sold by Perfumers, &c

TO BOOK SOCIETIES, LITERARY INSTITUTIONS, &c.—R. SAYWELL'S select Catalogue of Standard and Modern Works, in Divinity, Classics, History, Biography, Voyages and Travels, and General Literature, may be had gratis on application, or will be forwarded, postage free, to any address. The books are in good condition, warranted perfect, and are offered at very reduced prices.—Featherstone Buildings, Holborn row.

A YOUTH of good education may now meet with an advantageous Situation, as an ASSISTANT in a PHARMACEUTICAL CHEMIST, where, in addition to a large dispensing and retail trade, he would have the advantage of lectures, and the use of extensive chemical and philosophical apparatus. The first medical reference given if required. Apply to Mr. BARNARD DAVIS, Heyward, and Co., wholesale druggists, Bunhouse, Cannon street, London.

MR. COCKLE'S PILLS for INDIGESTION, LIVER DISORDERS, &c.
"If you are in possession of better means, Candidly inform me; it not, make use of these."—HORACE.
This FAMILY APERIENT will be found applicable in every form of indigestion, with torpid liver and inactive bowels, also in gout, rheum, a tacks, sick head-ache, and numerous irritability from a deranged state of the stomach, &c.—May be had of all medicine vendors

TO LADIES.—GRAFFTEY'S DEPILATORY, price 1s. 6d., removes superfluous hair on the face, neck, or arms, in a few minutes, without risk or fear of injury; the directions are plain, and lead to certain success.—Sold only at S. GRAFFTEY'S PERFUME LABORATORY, 26, Warwick-street, Regent street, London where may also be had the efficacious Hair Dye in one, 2s., GRAFFTEY'S POMPEIAN DYE, price 5s. 6d.; also, GRAFFTEY'S POMPEIAN BATIN, price 2s. 6d. Sold by all Perfumers, &c

NEW PERFUMES.—J. and E. ATKINSON, Perfumers, beg respectfully to inform the public that they have received from the south of France their STOCK of NEW PERFUMES, the produce of last season, and that they are more than they have been for many years. They consist of Essences, Pomades, Powders, &c. all the variety, distinguishing the flower gardens of Nice, Grasse, Montpelier, Cannes, and also several new Perfumes for the present year, and they hope an inspection will be found worthy of that patronage they have so long received.—24, Old Bond-street. February, 1844.—N.B. A stock is always kept ready for exportation.—24, Old Bond-street. February, 1844

SAINT PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.—Visitors and the public are most respectfully informed, that BAILEY and Co. have made a large purchase of strong family Linen, at 1s. 11½d. per yard, which is worth 2s. per yard, as nothing can be more economical, the piece containing 26 yards, with the usual over-measure, a lot of Rich Lustre Glaces, at 1s. 6d. per yard, worth 2s. 6d.; 800 Black Chenille Crapes at 1s. 11½d. the full dress.—The Winter Stock of Mandarin Tuncs and Furs clearing out at a great sacrifice. Orders attended to on the receipt of a post office money order. Observe BAILEY and Co., west entrance of St. Paul's Church Yard.

ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, specially patronised by her Majesty the QUEEN, H.R.H. Prince Albert, the Royal Family, and the several COURTS of Europe, is the best preparation for the growth, restoration, and beautifying of the human hair. For rendering it curly, free it from scurf and impurity, and will render it as soft as silk, curly, and luxuriant. It is unrivalled as a dressing, as forming the basis of a beautiful head of hair.—Price 3s. 6d. and 7s. Family bottles (equal to four small) 10s. 6d. and 21s. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers, per bottle.
Beware.—The genuine article has the words "ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL" in two lines on the wrapper. All others are spurious imitations.
Sold by A. ROWLAND and SONS, 20, Hatton-garden, and by Chemists and Perfumers.

ORGAN TO BE SEEN.—G. M. HOLDICH, Organ Builder, having completed a large Organ for Sydney, New South Wales, begs to announce there will be two performances on this Organ on Wednesday next, the 21st inst., at the Mechanics' Institution, Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane, at seven in the evening. Any person wishing to hear and see this Organ, can do so by calling on that day. This Organ, which is one of the most effective ever built, having G. M. HOLDICH'S new stop, the Diaccion, which doubles the power of the Open Diapason, and 12 draw stops, and 1085 pipes.—Manufactory, 12, Greek street, Soho-square, London.—Feb. 16th, 1844.

NAPLES SOAP.—The complaints of many Gentlemen of the difficulty they have in procuring the genuine NAPLES SOAP, have induced J. and E. ATKINSON, Perfumers, to appoint one of the most respectable houses in Naples to supply them with the very best article that can be made, regardless of expense, and they can with confidence recommend it as the finest specimen of the very finest quality, and nothing at all equal to Naples Soap for Shaving, and also for Washing, particularly where the skin is hard, or liable to chapping, they are sure it will prove good. Naples Soap is known, the more it will generally be used. The cause of its being lately in disrepute, is in consequence of the inferior quality of it that was imported for so many years past.—P.S. Country Druggists supplied with 25lbs. and upwards, at wholesale prices.—24, Old Bond-st. Feb., 1844.

EDWARD DODD'S ANGLO-ROMAN STRINGS for VIOLIN, VIOLONCELLO, and HARP.—manufactured to H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge—which Strings, for power of tone and durability, are equal to the best Italian Strings, at 50 per cent. less, and far superior to those in generic use. They have a peculiar Turbequoise, Willey, Lechery Cramer, &c. &c. To be had of the music shops, and at the manufactory 112, Vauxhall Walk, Lambeth. Each bundle wrapped with a blue band with E. DODD'S Anglo-Roman Strings. Beware and ask for E. Dodd's Anglo Roman Strings. Also improved Silver Strings, warranted not to turn green.

EMPLOYMENT.—Persons having a little time to spare, are requested that Agents continue to be appointed in London and Country Towns by the EAST INDIA TEA COMPANY for the sale of their celebrated TEA (Offices, 9, Great St. Helen's Churchyard, Bishopsgate-street). They are packed in sheet lead cases, and contain from an ounce to a pound, with the prices and weight marked on each packet, and but little trouble is occasioned by the sale of Tea; the income is sure, permanent, and during the last seventeen years have realised considerable incomes by the Agency, without la. let or loss. Application to be made (if by letter, post-paid) as above.

NELSON'S PATENT OPAQUE GELATINE, Half the Price of Isinglass.—CAUTION: From the numerous spurious articles now imposed on the Public, to guard against which, and for a protection to purchasers, NELSON'S OPAQUE GELATINE, only in packets only, by most respectable grocers, bearing the Patentee's signature. Extract from Dr. Ure's testimonial, June 6, 1843:—"I find Mr. G. Nelson's Patent Opaque Gelatine to be fully equal in strength and purity, if not superior, to the best isinglass, for every culinary purpose; it is entirely free from any unpleasant taste or smell, and is much better found to retain the whole of gelatine in the London market." The Opaque Gelatine is an article well adapted for hotels, invalids, sailors' mess and ship stores, and a safe and profitable commodity for exportation.—EDMONTON MILLS, Warwick, and 14, Ruckholt-street

TOOTH BRUSHES.—J. and E. ATKINSON, Perfumers, in answer to some complaints from the country, that Tooth Brushes purchased as of their manufacture have turned out inferior in quality, beg to inform them that Brushes supplied by them to country agents are only warranted when the name is stamped on the ends of Camp-ground Tooth Brushes are not only unpleasant, but must derange in the end than a good Tooth Brush, as they do not last half the time, and, indeed, the sights of these Brushes, and every other description of Brush. The Tooth Brushes stamped with their name are the best that can be made, both as to the material and workmanship, and if they lose hair, which in very rare, that some hairs become loose, they not only change them, but are obliged to the purchaser for the information. They are sold in all variety of patterns, at 1s. per dozen, or less in every, &c.—24, Old Bond-street, London. N.B. A stock is always kept ready for exportation, with the usual allowance.—No. 24, Old Bond street. February, 1844.

COMBINATION, ECONOMY, and QUALITY.—EXPENSE and UNEXPENSIVENESS.—Messrs. VINCENT and PUGH, Distillers and Brandy Merchants, of New Park-street, Borough, claim the attention of the public to their article of BRANDY. The two essentials, QUALITY and PURITY, are hereby combined in their manufacture. By the use of their Brandy, the most delicate constitution may enjoy the ever-pleasing elements of the day, testimonials of which can be produced to prove its pre-eminent claims to the Royal Foreign Brandy imported, the Proprietors can confidently defy competition to produce its equal. For the convenience of Families and Private Individuals, a large quantity, both PALE and BROWN, in handsome bright glass bottles, covered with a neat metallic capsule over the cork, and labelled "Vincent and Pugh's Genuine Pale and Cognac Brandy." Sold in quantities of not less than two gallons, equal to one dozen in bottles, at 24s. per gallon.—Vincent and Pugh, 3, 4, 5, and 6, New Park-street, No. 14 Porter-street, Newport Market, and No. 1, Great Newport-street, Leicester square.

LOSS OF TEETH SUPPLIED without Springs, Clasps, or Wires, Loose Teeth Fastened, and Pillow Decayed Teeth with Mineral Marmoran.—MESS. LE DRAT and SON, SURGEON DENTISTS, 42, Berners-street, Oxford-street, continue to restore Decayed Teeth with their celebrated Mineral Marmoran, applied without pain, heat, or pressure, preventing and curing the Toothache, and rendering the operation of extraction unnecessary. They also fasten loose teeth, whether arising from age, neglect, the use of calomel, or disease of the gums. Incorrodible. Artificial, or Natural Teeth, of surpassing beauty, to match a colour and shape those left in the mouth, fixed, from one to a complete set, without extracting the roots, or giving any pain, at the following charges:—A single tooth, 10s.; a set, £5 5s. Arranged on the most approved principles, and restoring perfect articulation and mastication. At home from Ten till Six.—N.B. Removed from 60, Newman-street, to 42, Berners-street, Oxford-street

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

CALCULATION OF LIFE.

An Italian journal contains some curious calculations on the probabilities of human life. It supposes the earth to be peopled by a myriad of individuals, all of whom die in the course of an age. Thirty-three years are counted for a generation, consequently there die every year 30,333,333 individuals; every day, 83,424; every minute, 70; every second, 1. Of a thousand children born at the same time, 740 attain the age of one year; about 600 the age of three years; 536 five years; 540 ten years; 446 thirty years; 329 sixty years; 49 eighty years; 11 ninety years; 2 ninety-five years; and 1 ninety-seven. It is thence concluded that half the children born die before seventeen years, and of ten thousand only one arrives at the age of one hundred years. The following is the number of persons in the different countries, on an equal space of territory:—In Iceland, 1; in Sweden, 14; in Turkey, 36; in Poland, 32; in Spain, 63; in France 99; in Switzerland, 114; in Germany, 127; in England, 152; in France, 163; in Upper Italy, 172; in Naples, 182; in Venice, 198; in Holland, 124; in Malta, 1103.—What a difference between Iceland and Malta.

THE ARTIST'S GRAVE.

It Lea anud the solemn hills—
Far from the house of mortal away—
Where mustrel wnids, and late like rills,
Breath'-ofer the green a mortal bay.
No mortal eye hath seen the spot
In winter's wrath or summer's bloom—
When silence, forgetful
The tenant of that lonely tomb!
Or which, as if they too could grieve,
A shroud the leaves of autumn weave.

And there, when evening in the sky
Hath her cloud-pillars tipped with fire,
The lone bird, slowly winding nigh,
Shuns the wide track its wood-mate flies,
And tarries
With softer
Than ever they
On earth's most royal burial place,
And not a fem shall dare intrude,
Save angel's, in the solitude.

For he was Nature's cherished child,
Loving, how well! and Loved by, her!
Ah! shall not such, in the hour we read,
Protect the sleeping worshipper?
And as the ages roll away
To press the matter shut of Time,
Shall she not still unwearied
Above his sepulchre so
Then rocks to shun never that nit name
May never gild the roll of fame?

The uttered when the tempests start
From prison skies, in many a tone;
And shrined within the idol's heart
Whose mighty throbbings marked his own
Yet great and gentle as it was,
Of Heaven, when through its cloudy bars
Its rose serene breathes upon
The tenant of unnumbered stars!
Lo! round and some of the same
He—rests—he tenant of the spot
That he by man may sleep forgot?

Sleep on, beneath the robe of flowers,
Oh! holiest one that walked the earth
Since man, in Eden lost, may house
Lost his pure diadem of worth
Still did'st thou wander from the throng,
Through so rem wood, to catch the tone
Of wind and river at their song;
While with the stars and God alone,
That ever in the soul wind,
Or lay mysterious whisperings smiled.

Sleep on! the tones which thou hast caught
From minstrel wind and late like rill,
Have not been lost; but, glory-fraught,
They sung e with thy visions still!
The colours which thou watch at where'er
They gleamed, on Nature's canvas set,
Like sweet, lone memories, in that sphere
Above, are with their lingering yet—
Sarah's pilgrims—tossing in thy sky.
"THE BEAUTIFUL can never die."

W. W.

OSTENTATION OF THE SICILIANS.

In Sicily every house is a palace, and every handicraft a profession; every respectable person is addressed as his excellency, and even a servant on an errand is charged with an embassy. This attachment to ostentation is so inveterate, that the poorer nobility and gentry are penurious to an extreme in their domestic arrangements, and almost starve themselves, to be able to appear abroad in the evening with an equipage, often mean, and calculated rather to indicate poverty than comfort.

LONDON NEWSPAPERS.

The increase within the last ten years in the number of newspapers published in London has been so great as almost to exceed belief. The weekly average of the number dispatched by the mails to the provinces was, in December, 1833, 209,000; in the present month it exceeds 470,000. The newspapers, too, have so increased in size, that, while at the former period the weight per week was about nine tons, it now exceeds forty tons. But within the same week a great disproportion exists, the papers published on Saturday much exceeding those published on any other day. The weight of newspapers now passing by the mails on every Saturday night is not less than eighteen tons. It is no puff of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS to say that the Post-office authorities have found it no trifling addition to the weekly tonnage of that establishment.

HONESTY IS THE BEST POLICY

A man named Mallony, an auctioneer, formerly residing in Ballurtel, forged a draft for £130 some time ago, and effected his escape to America. Whilst there he learned that he was heir to £30,000 in dispute in Ireland. He had the hardihood to return, made good his claim, was immediately afterwards arrested, was recently tried in the Commission Court, Dublin, convicted of forgery, and sentenced to seven years' transportation. The treasure is, of course, consigned to the Crown. Baron Lefroy, in passing sentence, intimated that, if an application were made to the Crown, the property might be granted to the children.

PHRENOLOGY.

A lady, a disbeliever in the science, asked a learned phrenologist, with a view of puzzling him, "What kind of people are those who have destruction and heroism equally and largely developed?" "These, madam, are the persons who kill with kindness."

DEATH.

"But who shall teach thee when to look for me,"—MRS. HEMANS.

Art thou of earth, and hast thou numbered years
Looking on graves, and marked the engulphing sea
Roll o'er the hopes and fears
Of lost forgotten man—and ask'st for me?

Where am I not? What hour can old Time fast
Pluck from my grasp, and bid me "Come not now!"
Hath ever man past
Without my signet stampt upon its brow?

Is youthful Beauty strong? I lurk unseen
To blast its promise by my withering frown;
And while the bud is green
On manhood's towering crest—I strike it down!

Who talks of reverence for the aged head?
Its hoary honours are my certain prey.
My fingers snap the thread—
The visage changes, and is sent away!

Toll to the mountain's snowy height sublime—
Pierce the wild trackless forest—I am there!
Speed the tost ocean's untried clime,
And who shall tell thee I am bribed to spare?

I stand beside the peasant's pallid couch;
I seize the reveller when the feast is high;
I lay my freezing touch
Upon the victor's plumes, and low they lie!

Above, beneath thee, and on every side—
At midnight and at noon in woe or glee—
I come to crush and hide
And thus I teach thee—"when to look for me."

SELF-WILL.

The will of man is a sour and stubborn piece of clay, that will not frame to be of any use without much working. A heart hardened with a long custom of sinning is like a rock, very recent in old age, that hath run long drying in the sun; it must be a hard wedge that will enter, and it must be handled with some skill to do that.—Bishop Saunderson.

THE LANGUAGE OF NATURE.

Oh! there is in the great world around us a philosophy never dreamt of in the deepest speculations; a meaning not found in the most erudite books; a poetry which surpasses the artifice of numbers; a music which excels the brightest tones of the most exquisite instrument. A single flower, that, in the midst of words; an harmonious melody which leads you into a sweet captivity, and fills up the full measure of the heart. Here is a language which tells clearly of the benign God. In the sun it conveys to us the profound darkness or stars of night—in all nature this language is heard, and its words will sound to the end of the world.—A. L. B.

A PERTINENT QUESTION.

"We were all children once, my dears." "La! ma, then who took care of the babies?"

LIFE BUT TRANSITORY.

Did we but consider this life as it is in itself, even as wise men, we might easily find that the world was never intended for a place of rest; but that it was a laboratory to fit and prepare men for a better and more abiding state: a school of exercise and discipline, to bring into habits of obedience and obedience, till we are perfected for another station; a little narrow nursery wherein we may be dressed and pruned, till we are fit to be transplanted into the garden of peace.—Sir Matthew Hale.

THE TURKISH AGA.

The Aga invited me to enjoy the evening breeze, and accompany him in a walk round his garden. As I proceeded my companion plucked an orange, and tasting a few from his girdle, and cutting the fruit in half, offered me one most delicately, and threw the other away. More than once he repeated this ceremony, where somewhat varied my notions of the habits of abstinence and economy. At length he inquired my opinion of his fruit. I answered, and with sincerity, on its admirable quality, the racy sweetness of its flavour, which I esteemed unequalled; but I could not refrain from expressing my surprise, that at least a moiety of so exquisite a morsel should not, as considerable a portion "Effendi," said the Turk, with a grave though gracious smile, "to friends we give only the sunny side."—Author of "Eothen Grey."

NOTICE.—All communications respecting the transmission or non-arrival of the paper, must be addressed to the person who supplies the paper, or who receives the subscription.

London: Printed and Published by WILLIAM LITTLER, at 198, Strand, where all communications for the Editor are requested to be addressed.—SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1844.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 95, Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 24, 1844. [Sixpence.

ENGLISH LEGISLATION.

We cannot be said to have been either neglectful or supine upon the subject of Ireland. In common with other journals, we have borne our share of toil and expenditure over the "great fact" of the O'Connell State Prosecution; we have stated and advocated the redress of real grievances, and a conciliation of the wounded spirits of the people; nor have we hesitated to recommend immediate legislation upon the subject in the Imperial Parliament. But, giving to the Sister Isle her fair portion of our anxieties for the public welfare, we are really unwilling to accord her more, and to sacrifice the imminent and paramount interests of Great Britain to a sort of catching mania for purely Irish agitation. It is against this that we would fain guard Parliament, the Government, and the country. The nation's time must not be all-absorbed by disturbed and irritated Ireland. Her one eternal wail must not drown all the wrongs and sorrows that have grown up upon the English soil—her voice of lamentation must not be suffered to silence every other, as it does.

The great O'Connell must not convert Parliament into a whirlpool that shall completely engulph John Bull. He declares that he wants the Irish for Ireland; he may have more, he may have the English for Ireland, so far as sympathy, goodwill, and even good legislation are concerned; but he must not have the English for Ireland alone. We want the English for the English, too. In plain words, we do hope that the whole time of the British Legislature, during a session which ought to be in all senses momentous and advantageous to the destinies of the country, will not be wasted upon frutless, and therefore unnecessary, discussions upon Irish affairs. We do not object to the strong acts of a strong opposition—they frequently goad governments into the performance of what is right, and shame them from the impropriety of what is wrong; but we wish to see such strong acts turned, whenever it is practicable, to the true purposes of legislation. If Government fail or refuse to propound wholesome measures for Ireland, or any other part of her Majesty's dominions, let the opposition take the duties of Government, though they do not wear its mantle—and propose, urge, discuss them of their own accord. But let not the mere principle of thwarting prevail. Let some tangible object beyond mere party cavil or triumph be held in view. Let the nation see that some good may result from the expenditure of the time of the Legislature, and do not force the conviction upon the country that it is merely passing away a session, and not passing acts of Parliament for the public advantage. Above all, do not fret the impatience, insult the grievances, and provoke the anger of the English people by motion after motion about Ireland, which is to impede the progress of legislation, keep alive the fever of agitation, and, after all, arrive at no practical result.

We have just had an immense dose of Irish debating—and at the very commencement of the session the surfeit is beginning to be felt. We do not find very strong fault with the recent discussion, because it seemed to spring naturally out of the great event of the State Trials; but we should have liked it much better had the motion upon which it was founded proposed any substantive good—had it been anything, in fact, but what it was—a peg upon which to hang the cap and cloak of party—a stalking-horse for declamation and debate. The motion can only be assimilated to the quality of usefulness, in so far as it indicated the position of parties, and evoked the opinions of public men in something like a clear, earnest, and determinate form. In all other respects it has been productive of positive injury to the English public. It has delayed the progress of Parliament—postponed almost the commencement of public business—obstructed Government, and wasted hundreds of hours of valuable time. It has produced one or two indecorus and unseemly displays of feeling, and poured salt and vinegar into the smarting wounds of Ireland, though certainly not with the intention of healing them so much as of aggravating the smart. We do hope that this profusion—spendthrift profusion—of oratory may cease to waste itself over the one eternal theme. We trust that O'Connell is not to make another motion, and Sharman Crawford another, and Smith O'Brien another, until "another and another still succeeds," merely to exhibit with what volubility time and genius may be wasted, and to prove by the nothingness in which it ends that Parliamentary discussion can be brought to resolve itself into practical force. It is something too much to cover the passing history of England with the map of Ireland. We really should like to get a glimpse at our own affairs through our Legislature, as well as through our press; and we seriously suggest that it is beneath the dignity of the representatives of the English people to merge the interests of their constituencies in the interests of the Repealers of Ireland, without the excuse of propounding one single alternative for the benefit of the Sister Isle—or one single scheme whereby to legislate her prosperity. We last week emphatically called for Justice to Ireland—we now as emphatically ask for Justice to England.

See how much there is do. Are our slaves to go unemancipated? Are our poor to live ever unredressed? Are the factories to weave evermore with the thread of tyranny, and from the loom of crime? Are our mines to echo till the crack of doom with the wailing lamentations of oppression and despair? Are the officers of our coroners to resolve themselves into a perpetual commission of inquiry into the cases of paupers who have been ground or starved to death? Are our workhouses to remain prisons till the end of time? Is the iron of the law still to enter into the human soul, and break the domestic loves and ties which Heaven has rivetted with such holy and affectionate links? Are our gaols to maintain their fearful discipline? Are we still, with solitary confinement and the curse of silence, to make maniacs of culprits, and to drive wretches mad? Are our criminal laws to be revised? or must we still punish men, who are presumed innocent, and before trial, as if a jury of their country had branded them with infamy and guilt? Is our civil law to be cheapened? or must we still pay "for justice—more than justice—true and beautiful as is its worth?" Is imprisonment for debt still to linger amongst us—one of the damning signs of an ancient barbarism? and are such men as Oastler to be its victims at the pleasure of implacability, until the spirit of pitying charity gets up and gives unto the Shylock his pound of flesh? Is no education to go forth among the people? Are the poorer classes to go without the lessons of instruction or the word of God? Are we not to have the mind legislated for as well as the body? There are oppressions among the labouring poor—among the working denizens of dense and groaning cities;—are we to redress these? Is the poor sempstress—the pining workwoman to be relieved? In a word, is the whole cause of humanity to be undertaken by the British Legislature? If so, there are topics enough and to spare: we have only shadowed forth a few of them, and yet, perhaps, enough to indicate how much ought to be done before "the occupation of Parliament be gone"—enough to show that not for Ireland only must the voice of patriotism and the appeal for justice be raised, but that England has a large, a crying, and a comprehensive claim, and that, of those whom she has sent to represent her rights and wants in Parliament, "she expects every man to do his duty." Now, then, let the English Government and representatives set about the business of English legislation.

THE GOTHICS FANCY DRESS BALL AT THE HANOVER-SQUARE ROOMS.

THE GOTHICS' FANCY BALL.

It has been once written, and very often said, that whilst in the country if you have a leg of mutton for dinner, everybody is anxious to know whether you had caper-sauce with it, being as perfectly aware of the fact as yourself; yet in London you may have a dwelled elephant for luncheon, without your next door neighbour knowing or caring anything about it. From this metropolitan ignorance of provincial occurrences, possibly the greater part of our readers are not aware of the existence of the "Gothics" Costume Ball, which took place on Monday evening last, at the Hanover-square Rooms. This annual réunion, which has now reached its ninth anniversary, is decidedly the most picturesque affair of its class that takes place in London; and although numbering three hundred visitors, yet, from the excellent arrangements of its ruling powers, and the stringent regulations for vouchers and introductions, it may almost be looked upon in the light of a large private party, chosen, for the most part, from the literary and professional circles of the metropolis. Every gentleman is required to appear in a fancy costume; the same rule is not enforced with regard to the ladies, who are left to dress according to their taste or inclination, but some fanciful attire is usually chosen.

By a capital regulation, introduced for the first time this year, all modern military and naval uniforms, professional robes, and hunting or club dresses, were declared inadmissible; and the result was that a superb coup d'œil was formed by the costumes of the parties assembled, at about eleven o'clock, when all the visitors had arrived. Those who remember the fancy ball of eight or ten years back, overdone with Greeks, Turks, and Swiss peasants, would have been struck with the immense improvement in the taste of the characters. There were very few dresses either of the gentlemen or ladies on Monday night which were not in themselves pictures; and many of them derived considerable additional interest from having made their first appearance at Her Majesty's bal costumé, in 1842.

Amongst these numerous beautiful and picturesque assumptions of character it is difficult to pick and mark out any remarkably prominent for taste or effect. Perhaps, the most fanciful and elegant were those of a party of eight ladies and gentlemen, four of the former appearing as the Queens of Hearts, Spades, Clubs, and Diamonds, and their accompanying swellers as the Knaves of the respective suits. The "making-up" was perfect and splendid; considerably enhanced by the personal charms of the fair monarchs. With the gentlemen, the picturesque dresses of the magen age were in the ascendant—the dark velvet tunic, red trunks, and pointed shoes. An "Ivanhoe" in a purple doublet covered with gold crosses, and the motto "Desdichado" embroidered on the breast —a Templar in a costly suit of light brown cloth, and a Pursuivant of the fifteenth century,—were amongst the best dresses of this species. The foreign costumes were all effective, and some remarkably characteristic: we may briefly particularize a Khoordish chief (very faithful), a Chinese, and one or two dresses of Central Russia. Several gorgeous court suits of the commencement of the eighteenth century, with the Sir Roger de Coverleys, &c., of bygone times, were capitally arranged; and one or two Debardeurs, Postillions, and other truly French dresses considerably enlivened the diversified groups. The ladies were chiefly attired in the piquant fashion of Watteau, although there were many in Plantagenet tunics trimmed with white fur; one of these, of pink velvet, was very becoming.

At one o'clock, the supper-rooms were thrown open, and excellent arrangements had been made, by which every guest was enabled to sit down comfortably. At this time, the appearance of the assembled visitors was quite gorgeous. The supper consisted of every conventional delicacy appropriate to the season, with an unlimited supply of champagne, which infused fresh spirit, if indeed it was needed, into the visitors. Dancing was resumed after supper, to Adam's band; and continued with unabated energy until seven in the morning, when the party finally broke up, the band playing the national anthem. It would be doing Mr. Corrie an injustice, not to mention the very efficient and courteous manner in which he performed the duties of Master of the Ceremonies; and arranged the different quadrilles and other dances with so much tact and attention, that no one was neglected or uncomfortable. In conclusion, we cannot but recommend our readers, if they are fortunate enough to know any of the committee who arrange the ball, to be present next year, and become a portion, as well as spectators of one of the prettiest sights London can offer.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, FEB. 20.

SPAIN.

The insurrection, since my last, had lost ground, and it is more than probable that ere long the whole of the coast along the Med.terranean will have been restored to order—but not tranquility: Narvaez and Bravo, so long as they have the means to pay the army will keep its supports, but no longer; and it is a fact that the great mass of the people are decidedly against them, and will, I feel certain, at no distant period, loudly declare against them. They are the dictators of Spain, but their power is based on military, despotic measures, dyed with the blood of those who aided in raising them to their present position! Let England be on her guard—powerful intrigues are afloat—and unless the greatest caution be observed, Spain will become not the ally, but the dependent of a neighbouring power! I trust my warning will be attended to, and that, ere it be too late, such an imposing attitude be taken as to insure to Spain a free, national, and independent government. Espartero and Spanish liberty, Christina and Narvaez—it is folly to say anything of the baby Queen—are determined to reign, coute que coute, reign, but not govern! Decrees of blood will be issued, honours and decorations prodigally lavished, but the political government of the country will be in the north of the Pyrenees.

Christina has left Paris. On Saturday last she slept at Chalons-sur-Saone, and the next morning she embarked on board a steam-boat for Lyons; at Montpellier she will receive the Spanish deputation, enter Catalonia by Perpignan, from there proceed by Figueras, Barcelona, and Valencia, to Madrid.

The disturbances at Malaga on the disarming of the National Guards had likely to have been very serious, but the energy of the military authorities, and the shooting of the ringleaders, soon restored order and tranquility.

General Roncoli, with General Pardo, is blockading Alicant. On the 9th he had his head-quarters at Villa-Franqueza; several of the insurgents had gone over to him.

The insurgents of Orchuela have abandoned the town and retired to Carthagena, which fortress was also blockaded. It was reported that Baron de Meer, convicted of the good feeling of the inhabitants of Barcelona, had sent two regiments to reinforce Roncoli.

The capital continues in a state of great agitation; daily persons of influence amongst the Liberals are arrested and placed in solitary confinement; 40 senators and 72 deputies have presented an address to the Queen, in which they state, "that faithful to the duty which they owe to the country and to the Crown, they would be wanting in that duty, if, under circumstances so serious, they did not hasten to offer to her Majesty's Government their cordial support and co-operation for the maintenance of the throne and the constitution." Her Majesty made a suitable reply!

ITALY.

I have seen several private letters from different parts of Italy; the greatest tranquility reigns in every part and the public roads are safe to travellers. The English nobility having quitted Nice, are flocking to Rome, where the carnival is most gay. Cardinal Bussy, Archbishop of Benevento, died at the begnning of the month, at his country seat, near to Rome. The Cardinal was born in July, 1758, at Viterby, and invested with the purple by Leo XII. in May, 1824.

GERMANY.

The different manufacturers of Prussia and those of all the states of the German Customs, are preparing for the public exhibition of National Industry, to be opened at Radzn this summer. A great influx of strangers is expected in the Prussian capital for the occasion. The Prussian Government is seriously occupied with the different projects for railroads, presented to them by German speculators; consent has already been given for the formation of a line from Frankfort-on-the-Oder to Posen. The line from Cologne to Bonn was opened to the public on the 13th. The gambling in railway shares has become so general that the Public Chamber of Vienna has posted a notice on the Exchange prohibiting all transactions in public stock or shares not quoted in the official list sanctioned by the Government.

The Manheim Journal contains a letter from Constantinople, dated 24th of January, in which it is given as certain that the difference between Turkey and Persia had been settled through the influence of the English and Russian Commissioners. It was reported in a letter from Jassy, that the Boyars had come to an understanding, and were determined to force Prince Stourdza to abdicate, and that Russian agents were assisting them.

FRANCE.

The general subject of conversation in Paris is the formal possession taken, by the French Admiral, Dupetit-Thouars, of Otaheite, and deposing the Queen. The Journal des Debats gives a long correspondence from M. Eugene Gosse, containing most detailed particulars, from which the British missionary Pritchard, is rather harshly treated. Most of our papers comment rather seriously on this affair.

[The details of the taking of Otaheite will be found elsewhere.]

M. Schnell, the celebrated Swiss publicist, committed suicide on the 4th of February, by drowning himself in the Aar, near to Langenthall

The Duke de Levis has arrived in Paris on a visit to Louis Philippe.

A few days since in digging the canal near to Rheims, the workmen found a well-preserved medal of Julia, the mother of Alexander Severus. Julia was assassinated at the same time as her son.—A.D. 235.

General Pajol, on leaving the court ball, slipped and fractured his thigh. The General lies in a very precarious state.

Sunday we had the annual exhibition of the "Bœuf Gras;" the Boulevards were well attended, but few masks. The ox is a fine animal, but too bony. To-day, being "Mardi-Gras," the ox will be again paraded through the streets. Our post-office clerks take their holidays since the office, and compel me to close my letter in haste.

We have nothing fresh in the musical world.

P.S. I have just learnt, but I cannot give you as certain, that M. Guizot intends disavowing the act of the taking possession of Otaheite.

PORTUGAL.

We have advices from Lisbon by the Lady Mary Wood steamer, to the 13th inst. The Duke of Saldanha, who had revolted at Torres Novas, had proceeded to Castello Branco, the civil governor of which province of Lower Beira, about 80 miles from Lisbon, and had there gained over another detachment of the same regiment of Lagoens, 40 in number, and 400 men, with their officers, of the 12th Regiment of Infantry, which garrisoned the former place. The object of the revolt was purely military, and from no part of the kingdom had the slightest disaffection arisen. The insurrection was then ten days in existence, and not a town or village in all Portugal had pronounced against the Government. The insurgents, in fact, were treated by the people every where with profound indifference.

Baron Leiria, with the column of all arms, had arrived at Abrantes, within a few leagues of Castello Branco, and troops were likewise marching against the insurgents from Estremoz and Chaves. A crisis must speedily ensue, and there seemed to be little doubt that the insurgents would in a few days be compelled to retreat across the Spanish frontier. Count Romolin had failed in his attempt to produce insurrection in the garrison of Elvas.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Advices to Dec. 21st from the Cape of Good Hope, and the 14th of that month from Graham's Town, contain nothing further respecting the Boers, but that the necessity of precautionary measures against them was well understood. This refers in those who reside beyond the Orange river, and whose proceedings we noticed recently. The locusts had not disappeared, although in some districts they had been destroyed to a great extent.

AMERICA.

The royal mail-steamer Britannia, Captain Hewitt, arrived at Liverpool on Sunday evening last, at half-past eight o'clock. She sailed from Boston on the 3rd instant, being detained by ice, which froze up the harbour and stopped the navigation. Great and laudable exertions were made by the inhabitants of Boston to get her clear of the ice, a meeting having been held, the Mayor in the chair, for the purpose of raising the necessary funds. A passage had been cut through several miles of the frozen water, in order to afford her a passage, and at noon, on the 3rd, she was got into the main stream, when all was proceeded slowly down the harbour; amid strong gales, and in a heavy cross sea, she struck the ground several times. Having to contend against thick and tempestuous weather, she did not reach the mouth of Long Island Sound till the afternoon of the 6th instant. She set out from Halifax at seven o'clock on the morning of the 8th, and had moderate weather during the greater part of her passage to England. She has made the passage across the Atlantic in eleven days, and has brought over sixty-five passengers.

The intelligence from Washington is to the 30th ult. The President had not appointed a Secretary to the Navy, nor was he likely to do so till the Senate acted definitively in the Cabinet appointments before them.

The New York Herald of the 30th ult., has the following as to the probable legislation in Congress on the tariff and the Oregon question:—"The expected arrival of the new minister from England, and the opening negociations at Washington, may have a tendency to postpone any defensive or warlike action upon the part of Congress. No doubt the Oregon bill will be the stock in the afternoon of the 6th instant. She set out from Halifax at seven o'clock on the morning of the 8th, and had moderate weather during the greater part of her passage to England. She has made the passage across the Atlantic in eleven days, and has brought over sixty-five passengers.

The intelligence from Washington is to the 30th ult. The President had not appointed a Secretary to the Navy, nor was he likely to do so till the Senate acted definitively in the Cabinet appointments before them.

The New York Herald of the 30th ult., has the following as to the probable legislation in Congress on the tariff and the Oregon question:—"The expected arrival of the new minister from England, and the opening negociations at Washington, may have a tendency to postpone any defensive or warlike action upon the part of Congress. No doubt the Oregon bill will be the stock in trade speeches made by the western members, for the Oregon question seems to be a hobby with the self-electioneering captrops upon. The same may be said upon the question of the annexation of Texas. Of Post-office reform we can hardly tell what to expect or what to feel."

MEXICO AND TEXAS.

From Mexico, the Havana Diario, of the 10th ult., has intelligence of the settlement of the difficulties between Great Britain and Mexico. By the first article, all projected hostilities on the part of Great Britain against Mexico are to be suspended. By the second, the English squadron was to visit the Mexican ports under the English flag, which was to be appropriately saluted by Mexican guns. Thirdly, a certain commercial house is to be indemnified for any injuries sustained by it through the acts of the Mexican Government. Fourthly, the English Government binds itself to recall the late Minister, and to send another, with the approbation of the Mexican Government, who should not be allowed to present his credentials until all the conditions above named should be complied with. The news from Texas is to the 10th ult.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

On the motion of the Duke of RICHMOND, the Witnesses' Indemnity Gaming Bill was read a second time, and the committee negatived.

Lord BROUGHAM introduced a bill to give authority to the Committee of Privy Council to further extend the period assigned to a patent conferred on Lord Dundonald with regard to improvements in naval steam power, by the act of 1835. Lord CAMPBELL suggested the propriety of enlarging the bill in clauses granting a power to the Committee of Privy Council to divorce à mensâ et matrimonii. The Lord CHANCELLOR objected to the project of mixing together in one bill two subjects so distinct as the law of patents and that of divorce à mensâ et matrimonii. The bill was read a first time; Lord Brougham promising to draw up a special bill to deal with the question of divorces.

On the motion of the Lord CHANCELLOR, the Metropolitan Improvements Bill was read a third time and passed.

To a question from Lord Roden, the Lord CHANCELLOR replied that judgment would be given on Friday next in the appeal before their lordships regarding Presbyterian marriages in Ireland.

The Lord CHANCELLOR laid on the table an account of the fees received in the Court of Chancery during the last year, and congratulated the country on the beneficial effect of the alterations lately made in these fees.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Speaker read the letter of Mr. S. BUREL, acknowledging the thanks which had been voted to him for his services in the Chinese war.

Mr. BOTHWICK gave notice of several amendments to the Poor-laws Amendment Act.

The adjourned debate on Lord J. Russell's motion, to inquire into the state of Ireland, was resumed by Mr. HORSMAN, who complained of the spirit in which the Irish Attorney-General had conducted the late trials, with reference to the refusal of the list of witnesses, to the strike of the jury, and to other alleged vexations. It was said that these trials had quieted Ireland; but this quiet would cease if a foreign war should break out; and, if they persisted to trample on Ireland, they must trudge to America with Peel, the trial. Peel had hoped that Ireland was not to be again made a battle-field of party. For his own part, he was anxious for such improvement in the situation and position of the Roman Catholic clergy; for the energy in countries where they were elevated but little above the people had not their due weight in the community. He, however, felt the difficulties of that subject, and feared that, in existing circumstances, it would be in vain for any Government to attempt to adjust it. But he had good hopes of the results to be produced from the proposed measures of increase to endow the Roman Catholic Church, of extended education, and of adjustment between landlord and tenant—measures which, he trusted, would produce a more wholesome state of public opinion, and which were, at all events, an earnest of the sincerity with which the Government were endeavouring to establish civil equality between Protestant and Roman Catholic, in spirit as well as in form. He drew a happy omen, too, for Ireland, from the tolerant tone of the Protestant speakers in this debate, when the only religious acerbity exhibited had come from the opposite party.—Mr. J. O'CONNELL said, that he should employ the little liberty which might be left to him before his sentence in renewing with undiminished zeal the efforts which had earned for him the honour of a conviction. He only wished that, as he was young and strong, and able to bear punishment, a heavy measure of it might be inflicted rather on him, than on those whose years and constitutions were less adapted to endure it. The people had been deprived of all hope from the Government by the declaration of a Minister that concession had reached its limit, but their measures and meetings for redress had been conducted in the most peaceable manner. He could not believe that the authors of the placard forbidding the assembly at Clontarf intended murder; but, if murder had been their object, they could not have taken more effectual means than that placard. He complained that, on the trials in Ireland, the traversers had been denied every indulgence which is usually granted to defendants in England. He would not accuse the jury of falsifying their oaths: no, he believed that their verdict was given in the fullest sincerity of bigotry. He had heard it reported that two members of the Irish Privy Council had recommended that no proclamation should be issued, but that when the meeting should have assembled, and excitement raised to its highest point, the troops should be brought up, the Riot Act read, and a bloodthirsty example required of assembly to disperse. If this report was untrue, it should be distinctly denied. The Government talked of new measures for Ireland. Would they propose an increase in the number of her representatives? Her population was a third of the whole people of the United Kingdom, and her taxation heavy; yet her share in the representation was not one-fifth. On the landlord and tenant question, it was indispensable that Government should take some strong measure, unless they desired to have, not merely a political outbreak, but an universal and maddening revolution. It was the interest of England, even in a fiscal point of view, to exert herself for the advancement of Irish prosperity. He would not use the language of menace, but was it well for them to have one-third of their whole people in a state of discontent? He called on the British Parliament and people to be just to Ireland: if they should persist further in injustice, let the consequences be on their heads.—Colonel VERNER bore testimony to the good conduct and forbearance of the Protestants in the north of Ireland, under circumstances of much irritation. He vindicated the late strike of Newry magistrates from the jury, and made some references to facts within his own knowledge.—Captain LAYARD expressed his horror of the present state of society in Ireland, speaking from what he himself had witnessed in the districts stationed with his regiment in that kingdom.—Mr. FERRAND animadverted on the indecorum committed a few nights ago by that small republican party in the house who had cheered Mr. O'Connell on his entrance into it. The loudest among them all was Mr. Hume, who had, not long since, advised the Canadians to shake off the baneful domination of the mother country. He repeated and censured some of the language employed, and some of the acts done, by Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Shiel.—He condemned the attempts which the opposition were making to plunder the Protestant Church. The motion of the noble lord had weakened the Whigs: he had smashed both himself and his party.—Sir G. NAPIER thought the trials would be productive of much benefit to Ireland, but deemed it right not to be understood to be a Repealer. He contended that a provision should be given to the Roman Catholic clergy, and that their hierarchy should be permitted to take their proper place; and cited an opinion of a Presbyterian divine, that the Protestant Establishment was not much better than the Roman Catholic Church.—Mr. MONTAGU GORE approved the vindication of the law's supremacy, and wished to see a more liberal distribution of patronage by a conciliatory policy.—Mr. J. O'BRIEN (Limerick) gave an historical sketch of "the Irish question" in very sonorous and measured language. The Repeal agitation, he said, originates not with the Irish people, but with party: it is the constitutional means which your policy has forced upon them. The dangers you apprehend from Repeal are nothing in comparison with the dangers already in being. He defended agitation, enumerated the various benefits which Ireland had derived from it, obtained by it, and took credit for Magna Charta as among the number. The Irish agitators had confederated, not conspired.—Mr. MILNES regretted that the noble mover had raised up what comparatively insignificant details of the process in the late trials with the important subject of the general state of Ireland. He condemned the unseemly animadversions which had been made in this debate upon the conduct of one of the Irish judges. He asserted the necessity of maintaining the Established Church of Ireland; but attributed to English impolicy the evils of that country, and contended for the necessity of an endowment to the Roman Catholic clergy. Nay, he would not be frightened even at the notion of two or three clergymen with purple stockings sitting in the House of Lords. He recommended a return to relations of diplomacy with the Court of Rome. Meanwhile he warned the opposition to beware of the spirit which should revive among the Protestant people the No Popery cry, or even the riots of Lord George Gordon; and brought the house to leave off harping upon past grievances, and legislate rationally for the present and the future. Mr. MACAULAY said it formed a primâ facie case for a committee of inquiry that a great country, with so many natural advantages as Ireland, and with a population amounting to more than a fourth of the whole people of the empire, should at this day be governed, not by love, but by force. The original source of ill will was the conquest and tyranny of a race over a race. The reformation had prevented ill feeling in Ireland from taking the form which took place in England. Whatever the ideas had been associated in the minds of English Liberals with the country's greatness, the ideas of religious and civil liberty, and the names of King William and the Whigs, were associated in the minds of the Irish Catholics with their own degradation and oppression. He traced their sufferings through the period of the penal laws; and coming to the date of the French revolution, contrasted the policy of Mr. Pitt, who had sought to conciliate only the Crowns, but the hearts and affections of the people. Mr. Pitt had proposed to give franchise to the Irish people, and a high and honourable station to the clergy; and if that great plan had been carried, the details of the process should not be unpracticable as the union with Scotland. At last emancipation was carried, but carried too late, and carried not voluntarily, but by inevitable necessity. Was it wonderful that such a concession so said should be ungracious? The Minister of this day, who had once described himself under the type of a physician, had treated his patient, Ireland, with a series of irritants, which had exasperated her disease. Lord Melbourne Government had produced a transient feeling; and if that Government had possessed the same Parliamentary strength with the present Ministry, all evil might have subsided in the course of a generation. But the present Ministry, by opposing with a force powerful in numbers and in talents, selected the conciliatory policy of the late Lords-Lieutenant as the especial objects of their attack. Every term of contumely was thrown by their partisans upon Lord Ebrington, Lord Morpeth, and Lord Normanby appointed to office, and still worse, upon the whole body of that priesthood to whom the Roman Catholic people were so affectionately attached. They got up a registration bill to counteract the popularity of the Reform act—a measure, from the spirit of which they were now about to depart, for no reason, except that they were now in office, with official responsibility; considering probably that they had no right to injure party events by any attempt when they were in opposition. He could that they would gladly promote Catholics, if there were any Catholics qualified by their character and talents for promotion, who were not among their enemies; but there was no wonder that persons should be found to entertain party views of the Catholics in the kingdom their enemies? Certainly not by reason of their creed, which ever leaned to the Government side in politics, where the Government was not the party which oppressed them. He condemned the Irish Government for not having earlier put forth their proclamation against the meeting at Clontarf, he came to the subject of the prosecutions. To warrant such proceedings, it was not enough to have a case of conspiracy which might end a conviction; it was necessary to have a case which would carry a general feeling of the Government's wisdom and moderation. But the leader, who was the chief defendant in those prosecutions, was a man having an unexampled popularity among his countrymen, and exciting a universal interest throughout Europe. That man had suffered by the blunder respecting the lists, a clear wrong; for he had been deprived of the chance of an additional Protestant juror, and consequently of an additional chance of an acquittal. The Government, no doubt, had made, technically, a good case about the strike of the Roman Catholics; but was it possible, with such one leader, Catholic on the jury, to have a fair trial in this great conflict of religions and races? An alien has a jury, six of whom must be aliens. You call the Catholics aliens when it suits you; but the privileges of aliens you do not allow to Catholics. It was said that the people of Ireland were now quiet. Yes, till the sentence, for fear of aggravating it against their leader; but from the time a prison should close upon him the difficulty would begin. Then would still remain the question, in this discussion, his presence would be wanted to allay it. A Registration Bill was promised; but it must destroy either the last remains of Irish representation, or the last remains of Ministerial power. Peel would not do the work as Lord Grey had done it. Lord Stanley had contended that the church must not be touched, because the Catholics, before their emancipation, disclaimed all intention of touching the church; but Lord Stanley had not disclaimed the intention when he himself was the minister assailed, Mr. Wilberforce and all its other opponents used to declare that not slavery, but only the slave trade, ought to be abrogated. He trusted that Sir R. Peel would take a broader view—a broader view of inquiry, he said 40 years ago about the church, but whether the Irish church was NOW a good or a bad institution—whether or not it accomplished its ends—whether it was in reality the poor man's church—the source of gratuitous education to the people.—The SOLICITOR-GENERAL addressed himself to the legal question of the state trials, and the proceedings on which they were founded. He ably described the formation of the jury-panel, and the mode of challenging, and contended that they were conducted with the utmost impartiality and consideration for the due administration of justice in the case.—The debate was again adjourned.

On the motion of Mr. GLADSTONE, an instruction to the committee on railways, that they have power to consider of any arrangements advantageous to the parties with regard to certain railways in Lancashire, in which, in the opinion of the committee, Parliament might justly give its sanction, was agreed to

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY

Their lordships sat only for a quarter of an hour, for the purpose of advancing a few bills a stage each, and then adjourned until Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Several motions were postponed in order that the house might proceed with the adjourned debate, which was resumed by Mr. HAWES, who complained of the determination expressed by the Government to maintain the Irish Church inviolate, and to govern Ireland by an English party. The other speakers on the same side during the evening were the O'Conor Don, Mr. E. Buller, Mr. Osborne, and Sir Thomas Wilde, who closed the debate, and on the other side were Lord Claude Hamilton, Sir Walter James, Mr. Lascelles, and Mr. Stafford O'Brien. There was very little new matter introduced into these speeches, with the exception of that of Sir Thomas Wilde, who arraigned in severe and indignant terms the character and conduct of the prosecutions, and as the hon. and learned member's legal eminence gives weight and authority to his opinions, we are obliged, in order to make room for a summary of his speech, to content ourselves with merely mentioning the names of the other speakers.

Sir T. WILDE said, that when a country with so many natural advantages as Ireland had been so long unhappy, it was but reasonable to inquire into the policy by which she had been governed? All courses had been tried but one—that of good faith and justice. The Union had been a union but in name; it had not given to Ireland that share in her own government which she was entitled to expect. Emancipation too had been but nominal. What Ireland was now, the Tory party had made her. Her opinion they had been most active and vigorous to resist all that was proposed in favour of Ireland. The Whigs had been taunted with having done little for her; but that was because the strength of the Opposition prevented them. That position then was—Out in power; and it was not to be expected that such a party should feel an interest for a country whose welfare they had been so much accustomed to defame. It was time, therefore, now to make the experiment; that this motion, a strictly constitutional one, proposed. It had been said that a civil war would be preferable to a repeal of the union; but how long would the English nation allow such a war to continue? Ireland's opinion they had been in her Church Establishment; your answer is, "The union forbids it;" and to this she has a right to reply, "Then repeal that union." The leader who convened the meetings uniformly declared his intentions to be peaceful. If you thought them otherwise, why did you not earlier prevent them? They ceased at once upon your proclamation. Was it that you were laying a trap for a political opponent? It was announced that the Clontarf meeting was to be the last. The Government said, "No, other meetings were expected." Then what could be said of the Lord-Lieutenant and the Lord Chancellor, who at such a crisis remained absent from Ireland? However, after mature deliberation about the effect of a slight change in the wording of Mr. O'Connell's hand-bill, they returned to Dublin; and then, having got a case for a conviction, they determined to prosecute what for nine months they had allowed to go on uninterrupted. A coercion bill might, in some cases, be defensible; but for greater was the evil of a strain like the present upon the common law of the land—a stretch which would be a precedent for tyrannical interference in all times to come. The form of the indictment on these prosecutions for meeting to excite dissatisfaction and overawe the Legislature had long existed; but it had been generally stigmatized in Westminster Hall. The law had been truly stated by the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland—that it was conspiracy to combine, either by lawful means for an unlawful object, or by unlawful means for a lawful object. Which of these offences was that of Mr. O'Connell? By this law, the opponents of the New Poor Law, or of the law of slavery, might just as well have been indicted. Undoubtedly, the language of Mr. O'Connell had been wholly unjustifiable; but it was nature that his meetings should be a terror to evil-doers in the legislature. It was not enough that the prosecution was illegal; there was hardly anything a bad minister could desire which he might not effect by the law. This jury had most sufficiently understood the character of the simultaneous act of men who have previously agreed to do it. Mr. O'Connell, he would firmly state, had not been truly stated by the Chief Justice of Ireland—that it was conspiracy to combine, either by lawful means for an unlawful object, or by unlawful means for a lawful object. Which of these offences was that of Mr. O'Connell? By this law, the opponents of the New Poor Law, or of the law of slavery, might just as well have been indicted. Undoubtedly, the language of Mr. O'Connell had been wholly unjustifiable; but it was nature that his meetings should be a terror to evil-doers in the legislature. It was not enough that the prosecution was illegal; there was hardly anything a bad minister could desire which he might not effect by the law. This jury had most sufficiently understood the character of the simultaneous act of men who have previously agreed to do it. Mr. O'Connell, he would firmly state, had not been truly stated by the Lord oppose his insulting extravagance, until Admiral Thomas, commander-in-chief on the English station in the South Sea, ordered the Vindictive away, and replaced her by the Dublin, which frigate has remained a peaceful spectator of what was going on, and never neglecting the courtesy due to our officers.

BAY OF ITI.

The French now considered it urgent to settle on a definitive basis their relations with the Society Islands; and for this purpose, the Uranie frigate arrived at the Marquesa Islands, bringing out the Governor of the French possessions in Oceania, and King's Commissioner to the Queen of Otaheite. She found in the roadstead of Taio-Hae the Reine Blanche, bearing the Admiral's flag, and the Danae. M. Dupetit Thouars and M. Bruat agreed to present themselves before Papaiti with the three frigates. The French considered this demonstration necessary, as the Society Islanders had been persuaded that France had but one large man-of-war, and that it was always the same vessel which called there at different times, painted in a different manner to prevent recognition.

QUEEN POMARE.

The Admiral then endeavoured to persuade the Queen to admit the treaty she had signed and ratified, and to rehoist the flag of the French; he, however, failed in his object, and, accordingly, on Sunday, Nov. 5, the Admiral dethroned Pomare, and declared that, next morning, the three French frigates, Uranie, Danae, and Reine Blanche, would land their men, and the tri-coloured flag would be immediately hoisted in the Queen's palace, and preparations were made to salute the national colours at day-break.

In the night, the orders were changed, and a delay till noon was granted. At that hour, says the letter:—"The quarter decks of all the vessels in the roadstead, including that of the English frigate, were crowded with officers; all their telescopes were directed towards the Queen's Palace, and men were posted in the tops on the look out. The hour past; the flag of Pomare was still waving; Pomare—the blind, the obstinate Pomare—refused to yield to our demands. 200 artillery and marines were landed, with 300 or 400 sailors, and surrounded the Queen's house, in which everything was silent—the flag of Pomare was removed; M. Aubigny, the Governor of Tahiti, exclaimed, 'Officers, soldiers, and sailors, and you inhabitants of these islands, to whom we bring justice and peace, in the name of the King our august master, I take possession of this country. We shall all be content to die for the defence of the glorious tricoloured flag. Hoist the flag.' This order was executed amidst the rolling of the drums, and cries of 'Vive le Roi.' Queen Pomare has ceased to reign, and we now stand on French soil.

"The flag of the English Consulate was immediately struck. A large number of natives had assembled before the residence of Mr. Pritchard, who was haranguing them with great vehemence; his exhortations did not, however, appear to have much success. In the evening the town had resumed its usual tranquility; the men smoked their cigars with the same carelessness, and the women grinned and showed their white teeth, as though they had not in the morning been present at a revolution.

"The Governor-General was installed on the 8th, and proclaimed the Council of the Government, which was composed of M. D'Aubigny, captain of the corvette, Lieut. Clon, and M. Morrenhout, ex-Consul of France.

"Papaiti is declared a free port; no anchorage dues will be claimed, nor any custom-house duties: pilot dues will alone be demanded."

We annex a view of the scene of the above event, and a portrait of the deposed Queen Pomare. Papaiti Bay lies towards the north-western extremity of Tahiti, the largest of the Society Islands, and estimated to be in surface equal to the county of Bedford. This anchorage is now most frequented by European vessels. Queen Pomare has a country establishment at Papawa, in the neighbourhood. According to Sir Edward Belcher's account, her South Pacific Majesty appears to have been for some time much harassed by threats of vengeance from various nations, besides having "a great scamp!" of a husband, who, in a fit of intoxication, attempted to murder poor Pomare on the high road with a stone: the Queen, however, forgave the wretch.

Pomare is growing old for a Tahitan, being about 32, and very corpulent. She is very fond of her children; but is, at times, violent and passionate, especially in her arguments with the British Consul. She occasionally took tea with Sir Edward Belcher, who, by the way, states that she does not possess one single trace of the pretty girl he recollected as Aimaita in 1825.

EXPULSION OF THE LITHUANIAN JEWS.

It remains to be seen how the poor perplexed Pomare will act in her new dilemma. Her "protectorate," as the French style themselves, may have coveted her dominions from their contiguity to the Marquesas Islands, recently the scene of French conquest.

The ex-Queen is said to have retired to the English Consul's house. In the Journal du Havre of Saturday it is stated that the Commodore of the English frigate, on going on board the Reine Blanche, told Admiral Dupetit Thouars that he was about to receive Queen Pomare on board his ship, and to hoist the flag of Tahiti, and salute it with twenty-one guns. The Admiral replied to him in a firm tone, "You may take this woman on board, if you like, but take care not to hoist the flag of Tahiti; and, if you salute it with twenty-one guns, you will make yourself responsible for all the consequences that may result. You are now warned, and you will act as you may think proper." The flag was neither hoisted nor saluted.

The Society Islands are estimated to contain from 16,000 to 20,000 inhabitants, most of whom can read and write. Their moral conduct has become more regular, and their social condition much improved. They have acquired the knowledge of various useful arts, and profitable branches of commerce have been opened; whilst vessels of from 30 to 80 tons burden trade between the several Islands.

The subject of the French occupation of Tahiti was referred to in Parliament on Thursday evening in both houses; the above statements were allowed to be correct, and regretted by the Ministry.

A general view of Tahiti, with an account of the previous interference of the French, will be found in No. 47 of the Illustrated London News.

THE SNOWY OWLS AT THE SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

A pair of these rare visitants from the "icy north," arrived in St. Katharine's Docks last week, on board the Montreal American Packet, and were purchased for the Surrey Gardens. The snowy owl (surnia nyctea, Selby) is one of the most remarkable species of the accipiture group of rapacious birds. It derives its name from the snowy whiteness of its plumage, which is only interrupted on the head and neck by a few minute dots of dull brown, and on the rest of the body by regular transverse crescent-shaped streaks of the same colour, but narrower and lighter on the under than on the upper surface. These streaks do not extend to the legs, which are covered down to the claws by long, thick, shaggy hair, like feathers. The whole of the plumage is extremely soft, close and thick, affording a most effectual protection against the severities of weather to which this bird is constantly exposed in the Arctic regions it inhabits.

From the diminished extent of the disks of feathers surrounding their eyes, the small size of their ears, and the absence of tufts on their heads, the aspect of these birds is void of that look of stupid gravity with which we are familiar in the common owls, but possess more of the fire and spirit of a hawk, which they also resemble in the power and duration of their flight, and the mode of seizing their prey. They feed almost indiscriminately on birds, quadrupeds, fishes, and even carrion; and are stated by Hearne to be extremely troublesome to the hunter, whom they will follow for a whole day, perching on the highest trees, and skimming down, when a bird has been shot, with such rapidity as to carry off the prize before the sportsman can get within reach of it. "They are," he adds, "so great a hindrance to those employed on the hunting service, that the same premium is given for one of their heads as for that of a hawk."

SNOWY OWLS, AT THE SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

The snowy owl is a native of the northern divisions of both continents; but in Europe is seldom met with further south than Sweden. It affects solitary, stony, and elevated districts, where its similarity in colour to that of the rocks, renders it difficult to be discovered, and the inequalities of surface afford it shelter from the rays of the sun; but on the approach of twilight it may be seen perching on the exposed eminences. The specimens at the Gardens were caught at Hudson's Bay. Although at present in immature plumage, they are apparently full grown; the female, which is rather larger than the male, measuring two feet in length, and more than five in the expanse of the wings. They exhibit, in confinement, somewhat of their natural characteristics, not appearing to be at all incommoded by the open light of day, but constantly advance towards the front of their cage, staring abroad with their great, bright, orange eyes, at all that is passing, and seeming to be gratified at the admiration they excite.

PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS IN LITHUANIA

Intelligence has lately been received of the very startling extent to which the persecution of the Jews of Lithuania is now being carried by order of the Government of his Majesty the Emperor Nicholas. "With him," exclaims the Courrier Universal, "persecution is a means of government, and the transportation en masse of 10,000 families is a simple measure of administration. According to an ukase carried into execution about the 15th of January, the entire Jewish population of 150,000 souls has been transported from their residence in Lithuania to within twelve leagues of the frontier, and delivered over to the brutality of the police during the rigours of a northern winter, without distinction of age, sex, or condition! Thus willed the Salmanasar or the Nebuchadonosor of St. Petersburgh. This atrocity is the result of the association of two despotisms, of two barbarisms—imperial despotism and the despotism of the protective system—Russian barbarity and prohibitive barbarity. The Jewish population is suspected of devoting itself to smuggling; and instead of punishing the guilty, the Czar found it more convenient to chastise the whole body of Israelites. It is not only against the Jews of Lithuania that this system has been enforced by Russia; the same measure is applied to all the Jews in the neighbourhood of the Emperor's dominions. The Israelites of Moldavia, over which province Russia already reigns, have been compelled to expatriate themselves. We need not remark how much such an act savours of insanity. The Emperor Nicholas, when he displays such severity, is merely a custom house officer in a rage. Such is the result of the omnipotence of the tariff, of the prohibition under the crown, and of the protective system enforced by the Autocrat."

Thus, at a moderate estimate, 150,000 persons of both sexes, and of all ages and conditions, are at this moment, in the midst of all the rigours of a Lithuanian winter, expelled their houses, and forced to seek a resting-place in strange countries, and not merely among strangers, but among people predisposed to view them as outcasts, and objects for extortion, persecution, and violence. Our engraving represents a family on their distressing route from a frontier town.

Lithuania will be recollected as a large tract of country, which now forms some important provinces of the Russian empire, but which once constituted an independent and powerful state, until it was united to Poland by the accession of its reigning dynasty to the throne of that country

With reference to the above outrage upon humanity, the writer of a letter from Warsaw, published in the Times, thus appeals for intervention:—"Sacrificing a great principle in order to protect a suffering race, Europe interfered between the Greeks and their butchers. Here is a case for intervention not less urgent. Will the Christian Powers of Europe remain silent and inactive in the presence of such horrors?"

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.—VII—VIII.

THE EARL OF RODEN.

The name of Lord Roden is pretty well known by the debates in the Upper House, where he is not an unfrequent speaker; but almost as much, perhaps, from its having been one of those which has been "hitched into rhyme," by Thomas Moore, in several of his brilliant little squibs, in admiring the cleverness of which, we almost regret that tune should have deprived them of so much of their interest. He was, and is, the head, the chief, and the champion, of the most ultra of the Conservative, or rather we should say of the Orange party in Ireland. As a matter of course, he always speaks of O'Connell in terms of the strongest denunciation.

THE EARL OF RODEN.

It was Lord Roden who, towards the end of last session, urged the Government to arm the Protestants of the north, for the purpose of checking the agitation then prevailing. The Government very wisely refused to do any such thing; it would in fact have been almost literally a letting slip the dogs of war, and bloodshed would have ensued not to be contemplated by any Christian without horror. All extremes are dangerous, but the extreme measure proposed by the noble earl was the most dangerous that could well be conceived. The noble earl is the third possessor of the title, which was created in 1771. He is an Irish peer, sitting as Baron Clanbrassil. He has never held any political office in England, but enjoys a pension of £2700 a year, as compensation for the abolished office of Auditor-General in Ireland. Notwithstanding his strong political predilections, Lord Roden is regarded in private life as a most estimable man, and as a landlord has very few equals in Ireland, being greatly beloved by his tenantry of all persuasions, towards whom he invariably acts with the most kind indulgence.

The family name is Jocelyn, and the eldest son of the noble lord, Viscount Jocelyn, is in the House of Commons, as member for Lyme Regis; he is one of the handsomest and most intelligent of the youthful members of that assembly; he is well known as the author of a well-written work called "Six Months in China," containing the observations made by him as military secretary to the Chinese expedition. The Earl of Roden spoke in the Irish debate in the House of Lords, but did not take so decided a part as might have been expected. Probably he is somewhat more satisfied with the "something" that has been done, and does not disapprove of the Dublin verdict. The principal point in his speech was an assertion that the state of Ireland might be in a great measure attributed to the "wholesale discharge" of prisoners from the gaols by Lord Normanby—an imputation that the noble lord has frequently answered. The noble earl is fifty-five years of age.

MR. SERGEANT MURPHY, M.P.

In presenting the public with the corporal lineaments of Sergeant Murphy, we fondly calculate on gratifying the whole body, rank and file, of our readers. Few among the rising men of our day, whether of Young England or la jeune Irlande, have secured such general acceptance among those whose approval is worth possessing—none has laid more broad and deep foundations for a superstructure of future eminence. Time will evolve many things; and we shall surely look again at this portrait with some interest when another Lustrum or Olympiad shall have passed away.

Though born (1807) in the diocese of Cork, his father was "a man of Ross." The south of Ireland never knew a more benevolent old gentleman; his public charities were princely; his secret almsgiving incredible; and if the tears shed by the poor over his sepulchre (where it still casts its evening shadow on the western outlet of the city) were to be garnered up, as of old, their own homely jars must have been put in requisition, not slender "lachrymatories." Old Dr. Geoffrey Keating, in his Irish history, notices the family 'scutcheon, with its motto, "Fortis et Hospitalis:" energy and hospitality formed in truth the badge of their whole tribe in the city of Cork; and yet not more so, perhaps, than is recorded of the famous FUGGER family in Nuremberg, or the Genoese family of Spinola, which surname, in old Italian, signified a corkscrew, as Murphy is modern delia-cruscan for potatoe.

These good folks, probably without having read a remarkable passage in Bacon*, (no fool in his generation) acted on it instinctively, and sent their gifted youth to Clongowes-wood, county Kildare, a sylvan solitude then devoted to serious study. Many were the babes in that wood besides the stripling O'Connells, with Valentine Blakes, and Orson O'Gormans, not omitting two sons of Thunder (honorers of a Dublin brewer), and scions innumerable of the auld aristocracy, but not one of them at his egress compelled the recognition of ripe scholarship from the neighbouring Trin. Col. Dub. (egregrens ephus vicina coegit, hem,) to the extent of "Frank" Murphy. He obtained the classical gold medal in the year 1829. Much of his collegiate success was no doubt attributable to his Gamaliel, the Rev. Charles Boyton; we oft heard that accomplished man predict the upward career of his pupil.

The brilliant collegian became of course a candidate for the honours and emoluments attendant on forensic distinction, and after a sedulous course of reading, little suspected by all who met him in the gayest haunts of men, nor knew how he redeemed such apparent frivolity by nights of study, he was called to the English bar in 1833. In selecting his sphere of action, the northern circuit, circumstances have stamped his choice as judicious. His legal abilities and dexterous promptitude were quickly appreciated by the men of the north. He was leader of the Liverpool Sessions from the year 1836 until he was made a sergeant in the year 1842.

He sat subsequently on the bench at York, and we marvelled much at the gravedignity of his deportment—calm, instructive, mild, and impressive; for we had known him in his convivial hours, the very Sheridan of the board. There is a notion prevalent, even in quarters where we would expect more sagacity, that none but dull-dogs make good functionaries. To uphold this doctrine, the dunces of the earth are in a permanent conspiracy against the wits: their oldest device was to give an auk, for emblem, to the Goddess of Wisdom—an arrangement which has taken place, doubtless, invitâ Minervâ. But an appeal lies to the experience of mankind, whenever high talent has its fair opportunity for the result we back the Sergeant.

MR. SERGEANT MURPHY.

The above portrait is a good likeness of the learned subject of our memoir, and the only one we believe ever published; but his bust, executed by Jones, is allowed to be the artist's chef d'œuvre.

Sergeant Murphy was returned to Parliament for his native city in 1841, by a combined feeling among the townsmen, of respect for his revered father, and just pride in their gifted fellow-citizen. A more able representative they cannot have, if their object be to secure weight to their wishes in the Imperial Legislature, where he is heard with growing favour by all parties, convinced of his thorough independence. His style of eloquence is remarkably terse, flowing, and pellucid—with the flash of the gem, its solidity too—his address manly—his matter curiously happy in selection—he now and then is found alluding to those refined studies, the charm of youth, as the solace of busy manhood. We know not what share he had in the Pronteen writings of his schoolfellow M., some years ago, but we have been favoured with a late ballad in his praise by some poet among his constituents, who does not overlook his courtship of the muse, ex. gr.:—

> Though a lawyer 'cute, or
> An expert disputer,
> Yet he's still a suitor
> Of sweet POESIE.
> And oft the sergeant
> Walks with that "vargint"
> All along the margint
> Of the river LEE!

* Consule scholas jesuitarum: nihil his melius.—De Dignit. Scient. Lib. vii.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

THE PEAK CAVERN.

Few of the natural curiosities of our country are so celebrated as this magnificent limestone cavern, now generally known as Peak's Hole, or the Devil's Cave; at about ten minutes walk from the inn at Castleton, in Derbyshire. It is situated at the extremity of a deep and narrow rocky chasm, in which Castleton stands, where craggy projections hide it from the traveller until he approaches pretty near. The entrance is a tolerably regular arch, about forty feet high, and above one hundred wide, extending in length nearly three hundred feet. This part is inhabited by persons engaged in making twine and pack-thread, the shrill cry of the cordwinders, and the busy hum of their numerous twisting wheels, strike the ear with a hollow and supernatural sound, as if the interior of the cavern were peopled. Here, too, they have built a rude cottage, on which the sun never shone and the rain never fell.

At the end of this natural vestibule the arch contracts, and the visitor is compelled to stoop until he emerges into a spacious vault, called "the Bell-house," having been previously provided with candles, and a Bengal light is used with effect for all parties who will pay the extra charge of one shilling. A second contraction, where the rock closes almost down upon the surface of a stream of water which occupies the passage, conducts to a third cavern, said to be 200 feet wide, and in some parts 120 feet high. To this the visitor passes by lying down in the bottom of a rude boat. "It is said that Byron felt the liveliest emotions when crossing this dark pool with the object of his first love, Miss Chaworth." (Adam's Guide.) He next reaches a series of cavernous chambers, at the extremity of the farthest of which the rocks close down upon the stream of water, so as to preclude all access to other caverns supposed to lie beyond.

PEAK CAVERN.

The entire length of the cavern is 750 yards, and its depth from the surface of the mountain 207 yards. An intelligent foreigner has described the approach to the entrance as forcibly reminding him of the rock of the "Fontaine de Vaucluse."

NEW DEPOT OF THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, PATERNOSTER-ROW.

The premises for the use of this excellent Institution having been, for many years, in so dilapidated a state as annually to require large sums to be expended in repairs, the committee at length resolved upon the erection of a more commodious structure. Accordingly, the City authorities consented to take a surrender of the existing leases of the site, and to grant a new lease for the term of 61 years, at a considerably reduced rent, on condition that the premises should be rebuilt on a plan satisfactory to the City surveyor.

Tenders for the new premises were received from nine respectable builders, and the lowest offer was taken, being £9537. In addition to this sum, there will be a considerable expenditure in completing the premises for business purposes, so that the total outlay will exceed £12,000. To meet this expenditure the committee have set apart a portion of the funds derived from the sales of the society's works, which amounted on November last, to about £5000; being also sure that the society's income should continue to be wholly devoted to its gratuitous operations at home and in foreign lands. A portion of the balance remains to be raised.

NEW DEPÔT OF THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY PATERNOSTER-ROW.

The new premises are a handsome architectural pile. The front, next Paternoster-row, extending about 120 feet, is divided by recesses into a centre and two wings. The eastern wing, which was formerly built over, is now left open to the passage communicating between St. Paul's Churchyard and Paternoster-row.

Each of the centre and wing compartments, as well as the eastern front, next Canon-alley, presents on the principal or ground story, a façade of Italian architecture, with four Ionic columns raised on pedestals (the columns at the angles being coupled), the general character of which is taken from the examples in the college of the Vatican, at Rome; with appropriate entablatures, and block cornices executed in Portand stone.

The stylobate continued the whole length of the building; the intervals between the centre and wing compartments being pierced for the windows, giving light to the basement story, with openings of a segmental form. The parts recessed on the ground story have windows with semicircular heads, and archivolts, with a key-stone in the centre of each; and the piers between the same have moulded bases and imposts. Above the entablature, and extending the whole length of the building, is a balustrade, which receives the windows of the first story. The centre of the building is relieved in a striking manner by a Venetian window, entirely executed of Portland stone in two stories, each having columns and appropriate entablatures; the lower one of the Ionic, and the upper one of the Doric order, surmounted by a circular pediment, of a segment form.

The distinct on of the wings at each extremity is also denoted by a Venetian window, with plain architraves and cornices.

The recesses between the centre and side compartments have windows with segment heads in each story; the centre and wing buildings are denoted by rusticated quoin stones at the angles, and the upper part of the building is finished with a bold block cornice, surmounted with a stone balustrade and pediment in the centre.

The works have been executed under the superintendence of Mr. Young, of King-street, Cheapside, for many years the able assistant of Mr. Montague, the late City Surveyor.

The interior of the building will be fitted up plainly and substantially, in every respect, as a warehouse. On the ground floor, one continuous room, the entire length of the building, will serve as a shop and country department, in which it is important to have a supply of every work on the society's catalogue in all their various bindings; for this purpose, a vast extent of wall room is required; and, in order to render the entire height (about 14 feet) available to this end, there will be a light iron gallery. On each floor, except the shop, there is a small iron-road from end to end, to convey the work from any part of the premises to the hopper at the east-end of the building, which communicates with every floor.

It may be interesting to glance at the amount of the proceedings of the Society for whom these extensive premises have been constructed. The institution was formed in 1792 to promote the circulation of religious books and treatises in foreign countries, as well as throughout the British dominions; and assisted by the disinterested labours of many esteemed friends, and the devoted missionaries of different Christian denominations, the Society has printed important books and tracts in about ninety-four languages; its annual circulation from the Depository in London amounts to nearly seventeen millions, besides a considerable number printed in foreign countries at the expense of the Society; and its total distribution to March 1843 had been about three hundred and seventy-seven millions of copies of its publications.

The Works of the Society are almost as varied in their size and contents as the characters of the readers for whose spiritual good they have been prepared. They commence with the little hand-bill, and extend to a commentary upon the Holy Scriptures, to even a complete edition of the Bible itself. They include publications suitable for all classes of people, from the child of penury to the richest noble in the land.

The following may be taken as a summary of the Society's proceedings to March, last:—

Different works in the Society's works are published	..	94
Annual circulation during the year	..	377,000,000
Printed during the year	..	912
Publications in the Society's Catalogue	..	3,683

About 2,500 grants have been granted since 1832 at reduced prices, exclusive of those sent to foreign lands, the cost of which, at subscribers' prices, would be upwards of £17,000.

Total receipts for the year, including the sales £52,605 7 9

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SUNDAY, Feb. 25th.—First Sunday in Lent.
MONDAY, 26th.—Napoleon escaped from Elba, 1815.
TUESDAY, 27th.—Hare-hunting concludes.
WEDNESDAY, 28th.—Ember Week.
THURSDAY, 29th.—
FRIDAY, March 1st.—St. David.
SATURDAY, 2nd.—Clock fast 12m. 21s.

HIGH WATER at London-bridge, for the Week ending March 2.

Monday.		Tuesday.		Wednesday.		Thursday.		Friday.		Saturday.
M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.	M.	A.
h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.	h. m.
0 44	1 2	1 23	1 41	2 31	2 51	3 15	3 35	3 59	4 19	4 43	5 3
12 59	13 18	13 48	14 6	14 26	14 46	15 10	15 30	15 54	16 14	16 38	16 58

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.
TERMS, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

				£	s.	d.
Per Quarter	..	..	..	0	6	6
Half Year	..	..	..	0	13	0
One Year	..	..	..	1	6	0

May be had of all Newsmen and Booksellers, or at the Office, 198, Strand.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"D. B. X."—Mount Herald.—We cannot decide without the sketches or their subjects are before us.

"Colefard."—Birmingham is not, strictly speaking, a city, but an incorporated town.

"H. F. J."—Monmouth, cannot legally oust before the month's end.

"Iota."—The interior of the Temple Church is engraved in No. 26 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

"An Old Subscriber,"—Carey-street, is thanked, but the subject is not of sufficient importance.

"Iota."—The sketch of the Union Bank, Glasgow, is not sufficiently correct in its details.

"O. J.," Greenwich.—Apply to a solicitor.

"Pax." Kilsmere Port.—The tale of "The Sisters" was commenced in No. 45 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. All the back numbers are kept in print.

"M. P., Bullingarry.—We have not room for the sketch.

"J. B. B." and "W. E. B."—The lines shall appear.

"R. W. S.," Poynton.—"Lord W."

"A Poor-Law Guardian," Suffolk, is thanked. We shall not desist.

"E. B."—The likeness is incorrect.

"A Shonian" should provide himself with Booth's "Principles of English Apportion" and the "Intellectual Calculator."

"W. L. B."—Not within these two years.

"Emily."—We cannot at present entertain the proposition.

"F. H. C." is in the minority of public opinion, certainly.

"Rutlan,"—Perhaps.

"E. M." should apply to the Commissioners of Police.

"A Country Cousin" should select a well-established hotel, perhaps, in Coventgarden.

"T. S. L.," Mile End Road, should show the coins to a medallist. The engravings are mostly from original drawings.

"Jane" should make further inquiry. "A Bible Class" neither signifies whether it be formed to read or discuss the Bible.

"C. B. A." The Venerable" is the customary prefix to the title of all Archdeacons.

"J. C.," Banbury, reminds us that in Vol. I. of our journal, page 289, is an engraving of the Edinburgh Royal Institution, on the top of the colonnade of which building has just been placed the beautiful statue of her Majesty, engraved in our last number. Our correspondent should order the Saturday's edition.

"H. W.," Cambridge, is anxious to obtain the address of the Edinburgh mechanic who has invented the means of propelling a vessel by a revolving cylinder, and thus dispensing with paddle-wheels. (See our journal of the 10th inst.)

"H. A. G."—We have not room for a copy of the execution of King Charles I., which, by the way, has already been lithographed.

"C. A. F.," Sheffield.—A passport is not requisite, unless you proceed further than Calais or Boulogne.

"J. B. K.," Puddington.—Address a letter to the Town Clerk, Guildhall.

"T. W.'s" letter has been forwarded to the Secretaries of the Art-Union of London. The omission must have been accidental.

"Miles."—Only one of the parties (Sir Robert Peel) was a member of the House of Commons at the period alluded to. Mr. O'Connell was arrested in London on his way to France, where the duel was to have taken place.

CHESS.—"D. C."—Received.

"Alfred Baker."—You can exchange the pawn for any piece you wish, no matter whether such piece may have been previously captured or not.

"C. S."—The king cannot castle when a square over which he passes is guarded by one of your antagonist's pieces.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1844.

The debate on Ireland continues to exclude all other subjects from the field of discussion. The only measure that has made its way into and through committee is the bill for releasing certain lords and gentlemen from the legal consequences for illegal bets on horse-races. There was some opposition, however; Mr. Bright proposed that the operation of the bill should be extended to all actions instituted by common informers. Lord Howick also had an amendment to the effect that the bill should not extend to future bets, made after the 25th of March. Both these propositions were, however, overruled, and the several clauses agreed to with considerable velocity. The measure will pass in a very brief space of time. When we compare its swift progress through its "stages" with the snail-like pace of other measures we could mention, it is easy to see how much the reception of a bill in the legislature—like "bills" of another kind in the commercial world —depends on its being "well backed."

The only incident of the week that is of much political interest, is the first appearance of Mr. O'Connell at the meeting of the League, on Wednesday evening; the interest of the event was much increased by his speech on the occasion, being the first address he has made in England since his secession from the House of Commons. We have no doubt that many persons expected he would refer at length to some of the points connected with Repeal and the prosecutions; but, with great good taste, he did not make one allusion to the first subject, and the other he only adverted to for a moment in connection with the extraordinary fact of the Dukes of Northumberland and Richmond taking a formal legal opinion as to whether, in forming an Agricultural League, they are not making themselves liable to a prosecution for conspiracy! This is a grave fact, and is much more serious than may at first sight appear. It shows that men are doubtful of the safety even of the most innocent kind-concert or combination; to act in common against anything that a Government may determine to uphold, will come under the law of conspiracy, so that even Peers of the Realm cannot meet their tenantry, pass resolutions, and subscribe money, without the safeguard of an opinion—which, after all, is an opinion only, and might not save them from an indictment. To this Mr. O'Connell could legitimately allude, as connected with the Corn-law question, and this he did; but his speech was an exclusively free-trade speech, and contained neither party politics nor allusions that were anything personal to himself. He did not turn, or attempt to turn, the occasion to an opportunity of defence of himself, or of attack on the Government. Considering the immense number assembled, and the cordial manner in which he was received, many will be inclined to wonder at his forbearance. We presume that the £100 presented by him as from "A Lover of Justice," is from himself.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—Her Majesty, the Prince, and the Duchess of Kent, are attended divine service within the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay officiated. The Duchess of Kent dined in private with her Majesty. The terrace was re-opened to the public on Saturday. The State apartments remain closed, but will probably be opened in the course of next week. At present many of the rooms are filled with pictures from Hampton Court Palace, and it will necessarily occupy some time in arranging them.

On Ash Wednesday her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and part of the household suite, attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. Prayers were read by the Hon. and Rev. Charles Leslie Courtenay. Owing to the disagreeable state of the weather for some days past, the Royal Family have not been able to take their usual exercise in the open air.

The Countess of Bective was safely delivered of a son at Headfort House, on Sunday, the 11th ult.

The Queen Dowager entertained much rejoicing on the extensive estates of the Marquis of Headfort in the counties of Meath and Cavan.

THE MARCHIONESS OF DOUGLAS.—We are happy to announce that the latest accounts state this distinguished lady to be going on most favourably. The Duke of Hamilton is also recovering from the hurt in his leg.

The Lepaux Gazette, a journal generally cautious and well informed upon home affairs, states that the late Duke Ernest of Saxe Coburg and Gotha has left personal property to the amount of twelve millions of florins, and has not disposed, by any will or testament, of this large fortune. According to the laws of inheritance in Saxony, personal property left by a father is equally divided between the children; and there only being the now reigning Duke Ernest and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the latter's share will be about six hundred thousand pounds, if the statement proves correct.

His Grace the Duke of Wellington honoured Messrs. Henry Graves and Co. by a visit to their gallery, Pall Mall, on Wednesday, to view the two pictures painted by Mr. Knight, the Royal Academician, "The Heroes of the Peninsula," and "The Heroes of Waterloo." His grace looked remarkably well, and passed some time in minutely inspecting these pictures.

Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and several others of the Cabinet Ministers, had interviews on Thursday morning with Sir R. Peel, at the right hon. baronet's residence in Whitehall Gardens.

THE KING OF SWEDEN.

The following are the official bulletins received by the Hamburgh mail on Wednesday, and which reach to the 9th inst.:—

STOCKHOLM, Feb. 7.—His Majesty felt yesterday, in the afternoon, a little more easy; his appetite, however, had returned only in part; the night he was very uneasy, and his sleep much disturbed, partly from pains in his foot, and also from restlessness in general, without, however, having much fever. This morning his Majesty has been much weaker than during the previous days, and his appetite is still decreasing. As to his foot the symptoms are the same.

Feb. 8.—His Majesty took some food yesterday afternoon, and afterwards enjoyed an hour's quiet sleep. During the night he was again very restless and uneasy. This morning he feels a little better. The foot is in the same state.

Feb. 9.—His Majesty's state is the same as since the last bulletin, with the exception that his sleep has been still less, and more disturbed last night than during the previous one.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

On Monday last a meeting of the Society for Promoting the Enlargement, Building, and Repairing of Churches and Chapels, was held at their chambers in St. Martin's-place, Trafalgar-square. The Lord Bishop of London was in the chair, and amongst the members present were the Bishops of Bangor, Llandaff, Norwich, Hereford, and Lichfield; the Revds. the Dean of Chichester, Dr Spry, Dr. Shepherd, J. Jennings, H. H. Norris, and Benjamin Harrison, Messrs. F. H. Dickenson, M.P., Edward Baldeley, William Davis, Nevel Connop, J. S. Salt, and William Cotton. The business commenced by the secretary (the Rev. Mr. Bowlby) reading the reports brought forward from the various sub-committees, after which the meeting proceeded to examine the cases referred to their consideration, and eventually voted grants of money for the following purposes:—Towards building additional churches or chapels at Mowbray and Causeway Head, in the parish of Holme Cultram, Cumberland; at Barnard's-green, in the parish of Great Malvern, Worcestershire; at Smallwood, in the parish of Astbury, Cheshire; at Cockham Dean, Berkshire; at St. Giles's-in-the Fields, London; and Lengham, in the parish of Manpreston, Dorsetshire; towards enlarging, re-building, the church at Bawdswell, Norfolk; and towards enlarging and otherwise increasing the accommodation in the churches at Poulersbury, Northamptonshire; Berrow, Somersetshire; Upton-cum-Chalvey, Buckinghamshire, Emanuel Church, Bolton-le-Moors, Lancashire; Monkseliver, Somersetshire; St. Mary, Haverfordwest, South Wales; and Kentish Town, parish of St. Pancras, London. It is worthy of remark that in the places of worship just mentioned there has been hitherto accommodation for only one-seventh of the population, while the free seats have been in the proportion of only one sitting for thirty persons; the latter will now be increased to the rate of one in twenty. The treasurer further reported that a handsome bequest had been made to the funds of the society—namely, a legacy of £200 (free of duty), bequeathed by the late James Hunt, Esq., of Stamford Baron, Northamptonshire. Some minor business having been completed the society adjourned.

GLASGOW UNIVERSITY FETE CHAMPETRE DINNER.—The University Club dinner took place on Monday evening in the Black Bull Hotel, the chair being filled by Sir James Campbell, the late Lord Provost of the city, Bailie Bogle acting as croupier. The usual loyal toasts of the "Queen," the "Prince of Wales," "Prince Albert," the "Queen Dowager," and the "Royal Family," &c., were drunk with all the honours. The chairman apologised for the absence of Mr. Forbes, M.P., and other gentlemen who had been prevented by various causes from being among them. A number of other toasts were given and duly honoured, and shortly after ten o'clock the company separated.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

COURT OF ALDERMEN.—On Tuesday a court was held for the despatch of business, Alderman Musgrove reported that 58 persons were confined in Newgate under sentence, and he said it was impossible that proper discipline could be observed in those gaols. The Recorder said the subject was under inquiry before the proper authorities. Alderman Wilson presented a petition from Castle Baynard ward, praying that the neighbourhood of St. Paul's Church-yard might be relieved of the nuisance of disorderly females who congregate there. Mr. Keating (one of the petitioners) stated that on applying to Mr. Harvey, the police-commissioner, that gentleman said it was of no use to take up women of the town, while the magistrates discharged them without punishment. Mr. Alderman Copeland said that he had never heard a more gratuitous piece of impertinence than the observation of the commissioner. Some rather warm discussion ensued, and the conduct of the magistrates was vindicated. The Recorder read the section of the City Police Act, to show that it was not exactly according to the statute to take into custody and imprison such persons without committing for trial. The petition of the petitioners was rejected. After some further business of little importance, the court proceeded with closed doors to consider the subject of the appointment of a deputy governor of her Majesty's gaol of Newgate.

COURT OF INDIA DIRECTORS.—On Wednesday an adjourned court (specially convened in the first instance) of the proprietors of India stock, was held at the India House, for the purpose of considering the papers relative to Scinde. The chair was taken at twelve o'clock (East India House time), by Mr. John Cotton, and the minutes of the last court were read. The chairman observed that the papers which had been laid before the court embraced all the proceedings that had taken place in Scinde, whether under the government of Lord Auckland, or under that of Lord Ellenborough, and he had no intention in saying that he saw in those papers great cause for regret in much that had occurred. On the other hand, he was not prepared to concur, as an act of this court, in the proposed resolution, which was calculated to paralyse and weaken the Indian Government at the very time it required all the support they could give it. They were now engaged in reviewing the whole of the proceedings, and, above all, they would give their serious consideration to the cause of the deposed Ameers, with the view of ameliorating their condition, especially such of them as may be free from any imputation of treachery. Under these circumstances he would submit to the court the propriety of postponing at present, as he stated were the sentiments on the subject; they had better leave the matter in the hands of the Court of Directors. Ultimately Mr. Sullivan withdrew his resolutions, and the motion of adjournment was carried.

THE CITY POLICE FORCE.—According to a statement just published by Mr. D. W. Harvey, the City Police Commissioner, the total cost of the City police (including some serious extra items, which it is hardly fair to place to the annual expenditure) is £41,551, which, including Commissioner, officers, and men (548 in all), is £76 per head; the cost of the Marylebone police (181 men) exceeds £74 per head.

MR. ALDERMAN GIBBS AND THE PARISH OF ST. STEPHEN, WALBROOK.—On Thursday the adjourned meeting of the inhabitants of this parish was held, in the vestry room, for the purpose of adopting measures in relation to the conduct of Mr. Alderman Gibbs, who, it will be recollected, since the last meeting, published a document purporting to be the parish accounts for eighteen years. Mr. Cunliffe, who presided, addressed the meeting at some length, remarking that the accounts of the parish had been demanded from Alderman Gibbs, who had, in reply to the demand, published what he stated were the accounts, but which he (the chairman) denominated as incorrect. This he, together with five of the inhabitants, could fully prove. After some further remarks from the chairman respecting the inaccuracy of the alderman's statements, he concluded by remarking that the inhabitants were determined, through the Court of Chancery, to have a statement correct, and properly audited. Mr. Rock, who spoke at some length, proposed a resolution setting forth the inaccuracy of the accounts, which, being seconded, was carried unanimously.—Another resolution respecting the improper audit was next put and carried.—The meeting then separated.

ASH WEDNESDAY.—Wednesday last being the first day of Lent, Divine service was performed in the morning at Buckingham Palace; the Chapel Royal, St. James's; the Royal Chapel, Whitehall; Westminster Abbey, St. Paul's Cathedral, and at all the churches and chapels throughout the metropolis. At Christ Church, Newgate-street, by the Archdeacon of London; at St. Andrew's-under-Shaft, by the Archdeacon of Essex; at St. Clement Danes, by the Archdeacon of Middlesex; and at St. Giles's-in-the-Fields, by the Archdeacon of St. Alban's.

REFORM IN THE MEDICAL PROFESSION.—At a meeting of medical men held on Wednesday evening with Mr. Green, at the Crown and Anchor, in the Strand, at which Mr. Wakley, M.P., Dr. Lynch, Mr. Cooper, and other gentlemen, were present, an address was adopted, setting forth, in very pointed and intelligible terms, the indignation of a portion of the medical profession at the late Charter to the College of Surgeons, and the measures of medical reform propounded by the Government. Mr. Wakley addressed the meeting, among other gentlemen, and congratulated them on the appearance of unanimity presented by their present proceedings. For twenty years that he had been writing against the abuses under which the profession laboured, he had always had to contend against the want of concentration and united action exhibited by medical men. He promised them, now that they seemed determined to persevere, all the aid he could give them in PARLIAMENT; and it would be their own fault if they did not get Parliament know what it was they wanted. The address was approved of by the meeting, and it was agreed that it should be submitted for adoption to an aggregate meeting of the profession, to be called next month.

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—The sale of the first portion of Bank-buildings, which was commenced on Monday by Mr. Pullen, the auctioneer, and concluded the following day, has realised a good return, amounting to about £7300, the property abutting on Threadneedle-street, including the spacious banking house and residences of Messrs. Ladbroke and Co., and some other houses. On Monday next the sale of the second portion will be commenced among the buildings to be sold, being the site of the Royal Exchange Fire Office. By the conditions of sale the buyer must remove the first part in 28 days; the same period being allowed for the removal of the second division. The whole will be cleared away by the end of March.

STEAM-BOAT RACE FROM HULL TO STOCKTON.—On Monday night a meeting of the journeymen broad silk-weavers of Spitalfields was held at the Crown and Anchor, Commercial-street, Bethnal-green, to hear the report of the Committee relative to their interview with W. E. Gladstone, Esq., M.P., President of the Board of Trade. Mr. Gale in the chair. Mr. Sherrard, Mr. Burrowes, and Mr. Poynton, stated that they had an interview with Mr. Gladstone, at the Board of Trade; Mr. Gladstone said he was aware of the difficulty in protecting trade as they feared it could not be carried out; he thought it would be impossible to get a law to protect wages. Resolutions to the effect that nothing but legislative interference would check the growing rapacity of the unprincipled manufacturers, whose tyranny and cruelty were destructive of the physical capabilities, morality, and religion of the work people, and injurious in causing parochial burdens to the country generally, were carried.

THE CASE OF SUFFERED TRANCE AT DEPTFORD.—Upon inquiry concerning the supposed trance of the young man, William Frances, who lies at the Oxford Arms, Church-street, Deptford, Dr. Arthur, and other medical gentlemen, who have watched the case, say decomposition has begun to manifest itself in the neck and abdomen.

UNEXPECTANT INQUESTS.—On Tuesday an inquiry took place before Mr. Carter, the Coroner for Surrey, which ended in the jury being discharged without a verdict. The summons served upon the parties called on them to decide as to the cause of death of Dr. Daniel Stevens, who died at No. 2, Davidge-terrace, under such circumstances as the coroner thought demanded some investigation. Upon the arrival of the coroner at the Ship Tavern, Waterloo-road, where the jury had assembled, Mr. Carter then said that he wished to have the opinion of those gentlemen who were on the jury as to whether they thought an inquest in this case should be held. If they chose, he would go on without the jury, but he would never hold an inquest that might be considered unnecessary. The facts of the case he understood to be these: The deceased gentleman held a high official situation under Government; he had been ill for three days, and previously for many months, but at last could not attend to his business. It seemed, too, that he had not called in any one but his own and his medical attendant. In suggesting that he (the coroner, ought to withdraw the warrant for holding the inquest, he begged to say that he had no intention to prevent justice being done, but he did not think that was a case for a coroner's jury. A certificate of Mr. Buck, the surgeon, was then read, which stated that he had attended the deceased man's opinion was, that the deceased had died from the bursting of a blood-vessel. After some observations, the jury discharged themselves.

THE AQUATIC BIRDS IN THE PARK.—Within the last few days some of the wild duck, widgeon, and teal, which have been domesticated upon the waters of the above enclosures, have pen-gratified in pairs for the breeding season. This circumstance denotes the breaking up of winter. Last year a team of flappers (young wild ducks), were hatched on the estate of Lord Mansfield at Caen Wood, near Highgate. They were quite as tame and as easy of approach as the birds in the parks, but as soon as they acquired sufficient strength of wing to migrate, they were conducted by their parent protectors to their accustomed haunts in the Regent's Park.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Government has resolved to adopt the most active measures to put an end to the traffic in slaves on the African coast, and the French Government has also determined on the same course. The Penelope, 22, steam-frigate, Captain W. Jones, and Prometheus, Lieutenant-Commander W. M. J. G. Pasco, and two or three other steamers, are about to be despatched to the coast of Africa, which they will enter in three latitudes where this nefarious traffic is carried on. Three French steamers are being equipped for similar service on the African coast. Six iron steamers, of 250 tons each, are being built by contract for the use of Government, or despatch boats.

The Albion, 90, Captain Lockyer, is now lying at Cork, with the flag of Rear-Admiral Bowles.

The Vindictive and Albert royal steam yacht is ordered to be got ready early in June, for the use of her Majesty. She has had her boiler removed, and is being fitted with tubular ones.

NAVAL APPOINTMENTS.—Commanders: G. A. Fraser to the Lucifer; J. Wolfe to the Tartarus. Lieutenants: G. T. C. Smith to the Lucifer; John Reid to the Agincourt; James Wilcox to the Vixen; T. D. Purvis to the Penelope; H. J. Julien to the Cornwallis; Richard Hooper to the Tortoise; T. O. D. Whipple to the Camperdown; Robert Hull to the Camperdown; H. R. Crofton to the Tortoise; W. F. Read to the Camperdown; Charles G. Hembert to the Grecian. Assistant Surgeons: James H. Steele to the Revenge; Harvey Morris to the Tortoise. Naval Instructor, G. F. Bowne to the Excellent. Mates: F. K. Hawkins (Acting Lieutenant) to the Gypsy; W. G. Herbert to the Grecian. Assistant Surgeons: John King to the Tortoise, for service on the island of Ascension; Andrew Lillie, Andrew Coates, David Booth, and Ebenezer J. Brown to the Penelope; James J. Paul to Greenwich Hospital. Archibald Elliott, M.D., to the Tortoise; John G. G. Ballantine and John Andrews to the Tortoise, for service on the coast of Africa. Midshipman H. Rogers to the Camperdown.

The Rattler steam-vessel, with Mr. Smith's screw propeller, formed of three distinct pieces, went down the river from Woolwich, on Monday, on an experimental trip, but the alteration has not been approved of, as she did not equal her former speed. The propeller with three pieces has been detached, and workmen are at present employed in adding two pieces of iron to the original screw, for the purpose, apparently, of giving it greater purchase in the water.

The Sappho, 10, Captain Miller, has been taken into dock. She did not touch the ground at Cove, as reported.

RAISING OF THE BLOCKADE AT ARICA.—ADMIRALTY, Feb. 21.—Sir,—I am commanded by my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to state, for the information of the Committee for managing the affairs of Lloyd's, that Captain Nicholas, of H.M.S. Vindictive, in a letter dated the 11th Nov. last, has reported that the blockade of Arica has been raised; so that merchant ships may again enter freely into all ports of Peru. I am, &c. &c. (Signed) JOHN BARROW.

—To W. Dobson, Esq., Secretary, Lloyd's.

LIVERPOOL, Feb. 21.—A sloop was on shore yesterday near Southport; she life-boat has gone to her assistance

MAJOR-GENERAL HERIOT.—Died, on the 30th of December, at Comfort Hall, Drummondville, Canada, after a protracted illness, Major-General the Hon. Frederick George Heriot, K.B. and C.H. He entered the service at the age of fifteen, and attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel at twenty-seven, after having been engaged in all the stirring events in these provinces, from 1801 to 1806: his whole service to the Sovereign has been in Canada. He was born in the island of Jersey, on the 11th of January, 1785.

DEATH OF MAJOR-GENERAL SIR GREGORY WAY, BART.—The hon. baronet expired at his residence, Brunswick-square, Brighton, on Monday, after a very short illness, in the 66th year of his age. He was attacked with influenza, and sank rapidly under the malady. He entered the army in 1797, attained the rank of lieutenant-General in November, 1841, served in the Bahama Islands, at Gibraltar, Minorca, the capture of Malta, the siege of Valetta, the expedition to the North of Europe in 1805, and was wrecked off the Texel with the left wing of the 5th Regiment, and captured by the Dutch. Served subsequently at the Cape of Good Hope, the Rio de la Plata, Monte Video, and the attack on Buenos Ayres, on returning from which, in the year 1808, he became Major of the 92nd, by purchase, and served with that regiment in all the early battles of the Peninsula; was present at Roliça, the capture of Lisbon, Vimeira, Corunna, the heights of Orgon and Pouzo, at Redondo, the passage of the Douro, the capture of the Oporto, the battles of Talavera, Busaco, and Albuhera, was severely wounded at the latter, and left arm fractured, after which he succeeded to the command of the 92nd on the field; he also received the Albuhera medal.

Count Leslie, of Balyntain, and the officers of the 79th Highlanders, gave a grand Highland ball to the nobility and gentry of the vicinity, at the County Rooms, Aberdeen, on Wednesday last.

ROYAL ARTILLERY.—A court-martial was held on Tuesday on gunner and driver Swinfield, of the 1st battalion Royal Artillery, for having permitted the escape of gunner and driver William Blake, under sentence of transportation for fourteen years, over whom he was placed as sentry in the Ward-room at Gosport. The decision of the court was, that gunner and driver Swinfield be imprisoned for two months for neglecting his duty.

ARMY ESTIMATES.—The number of officers, non-commissioned officers, and rank and file which it is proposed to maintain for the service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland (exclusive of the troops employed in the East Indies) for the year, from the 1st of April, 1844, to the 31st of March, 1845, is 100,199, being less than the number voted for the present financial year. The number to be employed in the East Indies for the ensuing year is 29,382; five regiments of cavalry (one additional to the force for the present year), and twenty-three regiments of infantry; the expenses of which are defrayed by the East India Company. The whole charge for the effective service for the year is £4,880,505, but of this sum the East India Company is to pay £939,000, leaving £3,916,505 to be paid by the people. The charge for the non-effective service is £2,225,048, the East India Company contributing £764,000 per annum on this account. The whole sum to be provided this year for the expense of the army, deducting appropriations in aid, is £5,984,554.

COURT-MARTIAL AND ESCAPE OF THE PRISONER.—A general court-martial was held at Woolwich, for the trial of gunner and driver William Blake, of the 8th battalion Royal Artillery, for desertion and robbery. The prisoner was found guilty, and, knowing his punishment would be transportation, reported himself sick, and was admitted into the guard-room ward, and, during the period of his confinement, managed to loosen the fastenings of the outer door of his room, leading into one of the passages. At ten o'clock on the night of Thursday week he was shut into his room, and a sentry posted over him as usual; but about half-past ten he managed to elude the sentry, and made his way into the passage. The sentry at the outer door, seeing somebody pass from the guard-room ward, gave the alarm; but, before any assistance could be obtained, the prisoner jumped upon the water sash and out at the passage window into the back-yard, and escaped over the outer wall, and has not been heard of since.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

COLLISION IN THE CHANNEL.—On Thursday, Feb. 15, the Bremen bark St. Virginia, Captain Jansen, ran down the French bark La Seine, Captain Grimard, a few leagues off the Start Point. The collision took place about half-past ten o'clock, when the night was pitchy dark, and the wind blowing strongly from the west. The French bark was first struck on the starboard bow, near the fore shrouds, and, swinging, was again struck on the starboard side, near the quarter, by which her mizen shrouds were carried away, and the upper part of the vessel cut down. The watch, consisting of five hands, had just furled topsails, and hearing the hail of the St. Virginia, called all hands up; they had just time to gain the deck when the collision took place. Captain Grimard ordered the pump to be sounded immediately, but three of the watch and two of those from below, seeing their danger, got on board the Bremen bark and the vessels separated. A light was observed in the rigging of La Seine for an hour after, when it suddenly disappeared. Most probably she went down, being heavily laden with the machinery of a new steamer of 250 horse power. The French bark, 156 tons, had a crew of ten hands, and was bound from Havre to Bordeaux, ballast. Such was the fury of the blows, that it was found impossible to enter the cabin to get out the apparel of the vessel, the entrance to which was choked by the fragments of the vessel. The St. Virginia came into Plymouth on the 6th with loss of jibboom and cutwater. She is bound from Bremen to St. Ubes.

LOSS OF THE BRITISH BARK BOLIVAR.—CAPE VERDE, Oct. 2.—The Bolivar, Francis Wheate, bound from Sierra Leone to England, with a cargo of timber, in consequence of making much water, endeavoured to get into one of the ports of these islands, but the leak increasing, the captain and crew abandoned her, and took refuge on board the English bark Africanus, which had wrecked by them for three days previous. The captain and crew were landed at Porto Praia, and sent from thence to the British Consulate here. One man has died, and the whole, including captain and mate, have received sustenance and clothing, with medical attendance when it was necessary.

FALMOUTH, Feb. 21.—The Gallovidea, Ray, from Newcastle to Liverpool which put in here on the 18th inst., with pumps choked, has been surveyed, and is discharging her cargo.

HAISBOROUGH, Feb. 20.—The Asenath, Banfield, of and from Sunderland, with coals and coppers, struck upon the outer bank, and has become a total wreck; crew saved.

YARMOUTH, Feb. 21.—The Anna Malvina, Fenwick, of and from Shields, for London, got on the Scroby Sand last night, and has become a wreck; crew saved.

HARWICH, Feb. 21.—The William and Nancy, Armourer, of Leith, from Carlong to Sheerness, got on shore on the South Sand yesterday morning, and subsequently sunk in deep water; crew saved.

SWANSEA, Feb. 20.—The Chester, Carter, from Sligo to London, has put in here leaky, and with loss of bulwarks, stanchions, &c., chain plates, and other damage; having been in contact, on the 15th inst., off the Black Rock, near Sligo, with the schooner Toronto (apparently in ballast), it blowing strong at N.W. at the time.

We regret to state that the brig Margaret, Rd. Lander, master, on her voyage from Tunis to Hull, was wrecked on the 8th instant, near Cape Farina, to the westward of Cape Carthage, in a heavy gale of wind; and that the brig Harcnet, William Wylie, master, on her voyage from Smyrna to Liverpool, was also wrecked on the 9th inst., on the island of Galati. We are happy, however, to say that no loss of life has occurred.

TRADE OF LONDON.—The number of sailing vessels at present entered outward at the Custom House for foreign ports is 216, of which 23 are for the Australian Presidencies, 9 for China, 2 for the Cape of Good Hope, 11 for Sydney, 2 for New Zealand, 32 for the West Indies, and 11 for Constantinople and Odessa

SHIP ABANDONED AT SEA.—Captain Paine, of the Devon, arrived at Torquay on Monday from Oporto, with a cargo of wine, &c., reports having passed, on the 18th inst., in lat. 44 46, long. 9 36 W., a brig, waterlogged and abandoned, the masts, and nothing but her forecastle and bowsprit standing. She was apparently North American built.

SEAMEN'S WAGES.—During the past week the seamen of Newcastle, Shields, Sunderland, and other northern ports, who are at present on a strike for an advance of wages, viz., £4 per voyage in the coal trade to London, and £3 per month in the foreign trade, have held several meetings, all of which have been characterized with the most orderly deportment.

FALMOUTH, Feb. 20.—The Hamburgh brig Maria Elizabeth, Captain Fokkes, fifty days from Buenos Ayres, and Rosario, 25 days, reports having left Buenos Ayres on the 5th ult., in lat. 44 46, long. 9 36 W., a brig, waterlogged and abandoned, the masts, and nothing but her forecastle and bowsprit standing. She was apparently North American built.

SEAMEN'S WAGES.—During the past week the seamen of Newcastle, Shields, Sunderland, and other northern ports, who are at present on a strike for an advance of wages, viz., £4 per voyage in the coal trade to London, and £3 per month in the foreign trade, have held several meetings, all of which have been characterized with the most orderly deportment.

FALMOUTH, Feb. 20.—The Hamburgh brig Maria Elizabeth, Captain Fokkes, arrived off here for orders yesterday, from Buenos Ayres, Dec. 12, being 67 days later in date than the advices previously furnished by a vessel here some days ago. Orally it is reported by the captain that matters in Her Majesty's La Plata continued in the same position as by former accounts, no offer declared, having taken place between the contending armies at and before Monte Video, and that Europeans at Buenos Ayres had become listless to the reports of the almost victorious on either side. Trade was reviving, and shipping was coming more busily. Passage at 8 per hundredweight. Several cargoes were destined for Falmouth for orders. Her Majesty's steam-frigate Penelope, Captain Jones, arrived off this port, passing down Channel, and the Prometheus, Lieut. Pascoe, put in here to day, both from Plymouth, bound for the coast of Africa.

POLICE.

CLERKENWELL.—A POLITE PENNY POSTMAN.—On Thursday James Tredgett, a letter carrier, was charged with assaulting the gaoler of this court, with having assaulted him in the execution of his duty, and also with having conducted himself disorderly in the passage leading to the court. When the defendant was placed at the bar before the magistrate, he had his hat on, and persisted in wearing it, although the usher had previously desired him to uncover.—The Clerk: Why don't you take off your hat, sir, in the presence of the magistrate? Defendant: What is that to you?—The Clerk: I say that you shall take off your hat.—Defendant: Out of respect to the court, sir.—Defendant: I'm in her Majesty's service as well as that gentleman there (pointing to the magistrate), and you see he sits with his hat on.—The magistrate on this point of etiquette was terminated by the usher quietly knocking off the defendant's hat, and taking it from him. The Clerk: What is your name? Defendant (surlily): What's that to you? I might as well ask you what your name is!—The magistrate desired the charge to be proceeded with, but ultimately the defendant gave his name as above.—Waddington stated that the defendant went [illegible] the court, and was about to enter the court, but as there was no business then going forward, he (Waddington), acting under general orders of the magistrates, desired him to return, but he refused to do so, and forced himself into the court. Witness, on endeavouring to prevent the defendant entering the court, was struck a violent blow in the face by him, on which he took him into custody. The blow was struck outside the court.—The defendant, in answer to the charge, said he came there to deliver a letter, and not to take off his hat. The people at the outer door refused to receive the letter, and therefore he had insisted on entering the court to perform his duty.—Mr. Greenwood said he should not decide the case, but would report the defendant's conduct to the Postmaster-General.—Defendant: And I'll report your conduct to Sir James Graham, you may depend on it!—The man was ordered out of the court.

WORSHIP-STREET.—On Tuesday a young man named William Bowen, who has been in the habit of exhibiting with his brother, an itinerant lecturer on mesmerism, was brought before the magistrate, he had his hat on, and persisted in wearing it, although the usher had previously desired him to uncover.—The Clerk: Why don't you take off your hat, sir, in the presence of the magistrate? Defendant: What is that to you? That am I to take up hat off for?—Clerk: Out of respect to the court, sir.—Defendant: I'm in her Majesty's service as well as that gentleman there (pointing to the magistrate), and you see he sits with his hat on.—The dispute on this point of etiquette was terminated by the usher quietly knocking off the defendant's hat, and taking it from him. The Clerk: What is your name? Defendant (surlily): What's that to you? I might as well ask you what your name is!—The magistrate desired the charge to be proceeded with, but ultimately the defendant gave his name as above.—Waddington stated that the defendant went [illegible] the court, and was about to enter the court, but as there was no business then going forward, he (Waddington), acting under general orders of the magistrates, desired him to return, but he refused to do so, and forced himself into the court. Witness, on endeavouring to prevent the defendant entering the court, was struck a violent blow in the face by him, on which he took him into custody. The blow was struck outside the court.—The defendant, in answer to the charge, said he came there to deliver a letter, and not to take off his hat. The people at the outer door refused to receive the letter, and therefore he had insisted on entering the court to perform his duty.—Mr. Greenwood said he should not decide the case, but would report the defendant's conduct to the Postmaster-General.—Defendant: And I'll report your conduct to Sir James Graham, you may depend on it!—The man was ordered out of the court.

WORSHIP-STREET.—On Tuesday a young man named William Bowen, who has been in the habit of exhibiting with his brother, an itinerant lecturer on mesmerism, was brought before the magistrate, charged with having, upon a charge of stealing a linen sheet from the possession of Mrs. Mary Holden, a mangler, in whose house he lodged. The prisoner, after he was locked up in the police-station on Monday morning, was observed to fall into a deep state of sleep, but occasionally answered questions. His brother, and a Mr. Swadling, who visited him there, declared he was, and had been for some time, in a mesmeric sleep; and having performed a variety of manipulations, left the gallery with him, they elicited from him, in reply to a question, that he must awake until next Saturday week at eight o'clock in the evening. When placed before the magistrate he fell into a deep sleep, and appeared to be still asleep, and was in the same state when conveyed to prison in the police van in the evening, and up to that time had not tasted any kind of nourishment since the Monday evening, on Sunday evening. When placed at the bar he awoke on Tuesday, he winked very much occasionally at the statements made against him, and seemed half-inclined to fall asleep again. Mrs. Holden said that the sheet had been entrusted to her by a landress to be mangled, and she did not miss it until after the police constable came to ask her about it. The prisoner had been her lodger about two months, and had been turning the mangle the same evening. P.C. Sinclair was charged with having disposed of the pretended mesmeric trick by a penalty of 20s. for unlawfully pawning, and 2s. value, or to be imprisoned six weeks. The prisoner's brother endeavoured to persuade the magistrate that the offence was the imagination of the prisoner, and that he had been awake on Tuesday morning, and that it had been asserted that he would not awake until Saturday week, but the assistant of Mr. Wakefield, the prison surgeon, having examined him, pronounced unequivocally that he was in a mesmeric slumbering at the same time that, if that proved ineffectual, he should, upon his return, have his patient's head completely shaved, and covered with a similar poultice. Any further application, however, became unnecessary, for in a few minutes the prisoner opened his eyes, and was wide awake. The statement of the rapid cure effected by the prison surgeon created a hearty laugh. The prisoner was remanded in default of payment of the penalty. The prisoner retired with a despairing look, for his printed bills had been distributed announcing a lecture for that evening, and his brother (the prisoner), who acted as his patient, was to have performed the necessary phenomena of "clairvoyance," reading with his eyes closed and bandaged, answering questions while asleep, &c.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

LADY SHOPLIFTERS.—On Saturday afternoon, about five o'clock, two elegantly-dressed women entered the shop of Mrs. Rose, jeweller, &c., Farringdon-street; and, after looking at several articles, made a small purchase, and departed. Mrs. Rose, however, having reason to suspect them, sent her lad to watch them, and, after proceeding down Farringdon-street, the younger person entered the shop of Mr. Flemming, pawnbroker. As soon as she had left the shop Mr. Flemming missed that she had pledged a handsome gold locket, for £2. The lad now followed them and gave them into the custody of police-constable Adams, 214, who conveyed them to the Fleet-street police-station, where the younger woman was perceived to drop a knife from a pocket made in her boa. The knife, which was a silver one, was identified by Mrs. Rose as her property, and the locket above alluded to was subsequently identified as the property of a silversmith in Cheapside. The latter gave their addresses Mrs. Enshaw and Miss Wells, No. 8, Park-street, Camden-town, where City police-constable Wardle, 325, accompanied by the above constable, went, and on searching the younger woman's trunk he found a large quantity of the most costly description, all of which, together with seven trunks and one carpet bag, were removed in a coach to the Fleet-street police-station, where the latter articles, which were packed in the trunks, were found to be filled with silks and satins, &c., chiefly not made up. In one of the trunks was found a quantity of jewellery, consisting of gold watches, brooches, rings, &c. One of the watches bore the Liverpool Hall-office, were broken into and robbed of plate, silver, gold, and a quantity of plate, amounting in value to about £360. The thieves made an entrance by scaling the garden wall, and forcing their way through the outhouse and kitchen into the pantry. The letter-bag, which had been dropped the previous evening by the Hastings mail, had been broken open, and the letters it contained opened, and their contents torn into fragments, and strewed on the floor. The larder was completely ransacked, empty wine-bottles and glasses, with the contents of which the thieves had made free previous to their departure.

ACCIDENT AT LORD HILL'S MANSION.—On Wednesday morning a man named Michael Flinn, a labourer, fell from some scaffolding erected in front of the residence of Lord Hill at Bayswater. The poor fellow had reached nearly the summit of the building with a hod of mortar upon his shoulder, and having placed one foot upon the scaffolding, was in the act of drawing the other forward, when he slipped and fell to the pavement. He was conveyed to St. George's Hospital, where he lies in a hopeless state, having sustained a shocking fracture of the skull, besides other serious injuries.

NEWINGTON WORKHOUSE.—On Tuesday night considerable sensation was created at Newington, in consequence of a report that the workhouse was on fire. It turned out the fire originated in the bakehouse. Owing to a plentiful supply of water, the flames were speedily extinguished, the damage done being very trifling.

FIRE.—On Wednesday morning a fire broke out on the premises of a bat and dog-maker, Friar-place, Blackfriars-road, near the Magdalen. From the combustible nature of the stock, great alarm was created in the neighbourhood; but the arrival of the engines from the Southwark-bridge-road station soon put an end to the panic; and, by the exertions of the firemen, the damage was confined to the spot where it originated.

DARING ROBBERY.—On Wednesday information was circulated throughout the metropolitan and city police districts of the following robbery:—Between seven and nine o'clock on the previous evening it was discovered that the house of Mr. Dean, No. 31, Albemarle-street, Piccadilly, had been robbed of a sequestered box, secured with red leather, which contained four £5 Bank of England notes; a five-guinea piece; a gold watch, makers' name "Dubois and Wheeler, Gray's Inn-court," ten sovereigns, in a packet, which had been sealed up since the year 1826, in which year, or the previous one, the gold was dated, and were all new coin; a silver breast-plate, or gorget, of the 67th Regiment, with the royal arms on it; a gold chain and bracelet, with a gold heart; a ditto, set with green stones; two hair ditto; a gold Geneva watch, maker's name "Treundle;" with hair chain, and two gold seals, and a number of other valuable articles of jewellery. The robbery can in no way be accounted for.

POSTSCRIPT.

To-day is the birth-day of the Duke of Cambridge, who completes his 70th year.

The Right Hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons will hold his sessional levees on the 2nd, the 9th, and the 16th of March.

WINDSOR, Saturday Evening.—The second amateur performance of the officers of the Life and Grenadier Guards, in aid of the charitable institutions of Windsor took place this evening, and the anxiety of the nobility and gentry to obtain tickets of admission to the theatre exceeded, if possible, that which was manifested on the former occasion. Every seat in the pit (which was converted into stalls), as well as in the boxes, was full before some time past been secured. The pieces were—"The Dream at Sea," "Two in the Morning," and the burlesque burletta of "Othello Travestie."

EMPLOYMENT TO THE POOR OF THE METROPOLIS.—Yesterday (Friday) a meeting, which created considerable interest, was held at the Hanover-square rooms, for the purpose of adopting measures towards the assisting of able-bodied poor by employing them in the cleansing of the streets, roads, footpaths, &c. The chair was taken shortly after one o'clock, by Benjamin Bond Cabbell, Esq., F.R.S., who was supported by several gentlemen. The proceedings having commenced, the chairman made some introductory observations, after which the secretary read a report prepared by the association for the promotion of improved street-paving, &c., which contrasted the present condition of the streets, and referred to the advantages of the macadamized system, and to the many disadvantages felt by the inhabitants of the metropolis on account of the filthy state of the streets. After some lengthened details the report concluded by stating that proposals had been made to the proper authorities for having the plans suggested for the cleansing of the streets, and the employment of the poor. Mr. Cochrane, President of the Association, addressed the meeting at some length, and explained very minutely the advantages to the working classes in favour of the proposed objects, which he considered would be productive of much advantage to the public, while a large amount of employment would be given. He concluded by proposing a resolution in accordance, which was seconded by Mr. H. Powell, and carried unanimously. Two other resolutions were next proposed and carried unanimously; and thanks being passed to the chairman, the proceedings terminated.

LONDON HOSPITAL.—Thursday a general meeting of the subscribers to the accumulating fund was held at No. 3, Crowby-square, Bishopsgate-street, John Capel, Esq., in the chair. From the statement laid before the meeting by Joseph Cecil, Esq., honorary secretary, the additions to that fund during the past year was £268, and the gross amount figured £5155 10s. In May, 1838, a transfer of £3739 11s. from this fund was made to the general estate.

THE TAME VALLEY CANAL was opened on Wednesday last. By means of this very valuable and important communication, coal, iron, and merchandise of all kinds will be conveyed at a reduced cost both in tonnage and haulage, from the Staffordshire and Worcestershire mineral district to the lower part of the town of Birmingham, and the large and populous agricultural district on the line and in the neighbourhood of the Tame Valley Canal also, by the route of the Coventry, Oxford, Warwick, and Grand Junction Canals, to Oxford, Tamworth, Coventry, Northampton, Banbury, Oxford, and other markets in the midland counties, as likewise to the metropolis.

THE Gloucester Canal will be opened on Monday next as far as Wiltshington, about three miles and a half from Hereford.

WOOD PAVING IN CHEAPSIDE.—Thursday a notice was posted up at Guildhall, by order of the Commissioners of Sewers, stating that, on and after Monday, the 4th of March, Cheapside will be closed to vehicles, for the purpose of carrying out a resolution of the commissioners for re-paving the whole of that thoroughfare with wood.

TWO VESSELS ON FIRE.—Intelligence was received on Thursday night of a fire having broken out on board the Sarah, Captain Brady, belonging to Stockton, and lying in the Thames. It was discovered on Thursday morning at which time the vessel was about midway of the Shipwash and the Whiting, port of London. An immediate alarm was raised, and all hands did all that possibly could be done to extinguish the fire; whilst they were so engaged, the vessel struck on a wreck with such violence that it is supposed that her bottom was stove in. The captain, finding that the vessel was fast filling, gave orders to launch the long-boat, in which was placed the crew and the Sarah's mate. The Sussex, Capt. Hamilton, some time after, in passing, picked them up, and took them on board. The Ramona steamer, however, took them on board at a subsequent hour and landed them at Ramsgate. The disaster must be somewhat considerable, and it is not known, as yet, whether the vessel was insured. Every accommodation was shown to the captain and crew by the captains of the steamer and schooner. Intelligence was likewise received on Thursday of a fire of a very alarming and destructive nature having occurred on board the Rose belonging to, and lying in, the harbour of North Shields. The vessel was built at Newcastle in the year 1826, and has been for several years engaged in the North American trade. The fire broke out on Tuesday night, and when the flames were first discovered on the long-boat, which was lashed to the vessel's stern, so, that its destruction appeared almost certain. Great fears were also entertained for the safety of other vessels lying in the harbour. A steamer was therefore obtained, to which the fire-ship was towed, and it was towed out of the pier, and laid on the land side. Notwithstanding all that was done to extinguish the fire, it was not mastered until the Rose was almost burnt to the water's edge. The total loss must be very heavy. The origin of this fire, like the preceding one, is unknown.

POLICE.—BOW-STREET.—SINGULAR DETECTION OF TWO PICKPOCKETS.—YESTERDAY (Friday), two well-dressed young thieves, named Stack and Forcroft, were charged with picking the pocket of a gentleman named Lucas, a student in the Inner Temple, at No. 3, Fig Tree Court, of his purse, containing £21. The circumstances were as follow:—Mr. Lucas, having bought some cigars, put his purse into his pocket, containing a ten pound note of Stacey's Bank at Bristol, five sovereigns, half a sovereign, and about seven or eight shillings in silver. He stated it was when he got into the Strand. Policeman, F 20, saw Stack pick the pocket of the prosecutor, but could not catch him, as he immediately ran away. Policeman, F 119, proved that Forcroft had followed him in Seven Dials, and told him that he was with Stack when he picked the gentleman's pocket, and that he had only given him £1. They were both taken into custody, and Stack appeared in a new suit of clothes, purchased by the proceeds of the robbery. Forcroft confessed to the magistrate that a Jew named Rolph, in Monmouth-street, had bought the note, and the Jew was fetched up, but nothing could be proved against him to warrant his detention. The two prisoners were fully committed for trial.

THE WILLS' FORGERIES.—We learn from a source on which we place reliance, that MR. DOREY, one of the parties charged with being an active agent in the extensive conspiracy by which large sums were obtained by means of these forgeries and fraudulent personations, has made a full confession; and that the document is in the hands of the authorities. We presume that the effect of such confession will have been made was the cause of MR. DOREY'S solicitor taking no part in the last examination of the parties before the Lord Mayor, beyond requesting that the unfortunate woman should be allowed to remain in the Compter until the eve of the session.

RIOT AND ASSAULT AT WINDSOR.—Downes and Wansell, two of the men in custody at Windsor on a charge of riot and assault, have been committed to the Reading gaol for trial for highway robbery; and Tucker, Large, and Thomas, also implicated, have been committed to the Borough gaol, on a charge of riot and assault.

SUICIDE AT BLACKFRIARS BRIDGE.—About half-past two o'clock yesterday morning, a respectably-dressed woman, about twenty-five years of age, was observed by the policeman on duty to be lingering about the bridge as if waiting for some one. She was seen at the above time by City police constable, 199, who, having passed her about twenty yards, saw her deliberately mount the parapet of the bridge near the centre, on the east side, plunge into the river, and before he could reach her she had sunk.

PREVIOUS OCCUPATIONS OF CELEBRATED VOCALISTS.

Rubini was a tailor, Tamburini a coursier, Naldi an advocate. We believe he had studied the law with a view to the bar, and was obliged to leave the state in which he practised. He was a clever amateur in music, which he afterwards made his profession. The manner of his death is well known. Viewing the great festival in Westminster Abbey with his white apron on. He was also lay vicar of the abbey.

THE RIGHT OF ALL.

There is no man so indigent or wretched but he may demand a supply sufficient for all the necessaries of life. BLACKSTONE.

ADDITIONS TO THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

CAPTAIN ROSS', DISCOVERIES IN THE SOUTHERN AND ANTARCTIC SEAS.

ALL the natural history collections made by the officers of her Majesty's ships Erebus and Terror, under the superintendence of Capt. Ross, during the four years' voyage of these ships in various parts of the world, have lately been unpacked, and examined by the different scientific men, preparatory to their being published and deposited in the British Museum. Already, the zoological galleries of this national depository are by far the largest and best arranged in Europe; and their attraction will be very materially increased by the addition of a great number of specimens of birds, seals, &c., from Captain Ross's collection. We have, accordingly, anticipated the interest these novelties will afford to the public, by engraving the rarest specimens of the larger animals; the zoophytes and marine cryptogamia being obviously too minute for our pages, although they are of infinite moment to scientific zoologists.

Of Captain James Ross, the intrepid commander of the Expedition, a portrait, with a précis of his voyage, has already appeared in No. 77 of our journal; but it may be as well to refresh the reader's memory with another brief resumé of the important results.

The collection, then, whence these specimens have been selected, is the largest that has been brought home by any naval expedition since the time of Cook and Banks; which is more highly creditable to Captain Ross and the officers under his command, when we consider that the expedition was chiefly dispatched for observing magnetic phenomena. The collection consists of an immense number of marine animals of all classes and orders, from seals and fish, to the most minute animalcule, chiefly procured from the shores of the islands of the Antarctic Ocean, Terra del Fuego, the Falkland Islands, New Zealand, and from all parts of the Southern and Antarctic Seas, between the latitudes of 40 degrees to 78 degrees south; for the great extent of the ocean traversed by these ships during the three successive voyages, gave them ample opportunities of capturing the numerous pelagic animals which swarm in those seas. To procure the animals, the towing net was used, from the latitude of England to 78 degrees south, twice through the tropics, and thrice across the whole breadth of the Atlantic Ocean, between America and Africa. The dredge was continually used in the Antarctic Circle, in depths varying from 50 to 400 fathoms; and on many occasions in the harbours of Falkland and Hermit Islands, at Cape Horn, Lord Auckland and Campbell's Islands, Kerguelen's Land, New Zealand, and in many places within the tropics, as the banks of Cape Frio and the Brazils. Hence has been produced results of the greatest importance, in thus bearing on the most interesting geological problems. During the stay of the several vessels in the various harbours, great attention was paid to the collection of plants and land animals of all kinds. Thus, the unexplored islands to the south of New Zealand, Kerguelen's and Graham's Land, offered a rich store of varieties to the botanist, and the long stay of the vessels at Van Diemen's Land and New Zealand, enabled them to complete the fauna and flora of these very interesting colonies: the botanical collections alone consist of upwards of 3,000 species, many of which are quite new to science, or were only before known by the specimens brought by Banks and Solander. The collection is altogether curious, as showing the great general similarity of the animal productions of the two Poles: this is especially the case with the marine crustacea; but, though the species are similar in general character, they are all still distinct as species from those of the Arctic seas. The same may be said with regard to the lepidopterous insects of New Zealand and the British islands.

BLACK-BILLED SHEATH-BILL (CHIONIS MINOR).

RING PENGUIN (APENODYTES P. ACHON.CA).

STERNORHYNCHUS HOMEI.

SKULL OF CRAB-EATING SEAL.

YOUNG CRAB-EATING SEAL.

CRAB-EATING SEAL (PHOCA CARCINOPHAGA.)

SEA LION (OTARIA JUBATA.)

We now proceed to the specimens illustrated.—1. The black-billed sheath-bill (chionis minor), a rare and interesting bird from Kerguelen's Land. Its distinguishing peculiarity is a sheath by which its nostrils are partially protected against the action of cold during its predatory excursions on the solidifying waters of the Antarctic Ocean.

2.—The king penguin, (apenodytes patachonica.) This bird, of which our engraving represents a fine specimen, has been by most writers confounded with the great auk, (alca impennis.) The young only has, we believe, been hitherto exhibited; Captain Ross being the first to present to us the perfect bird. Mr. G. Bennett, in describing an ornithological visit to Macquarrie Island, says, the number of these birds collected together in this spot is immense; but it would be almost impossible to guess at it with any approach to truth, as, during the whole day and night, 30,000 or 40,000 of them are continually landing, and an equal number going to sea. Captain Ross found them in great numbers in the course of his voyage; and they became, from the uncouthness of their figures, a source of much merriment to the sailors, who, however, turned them to good account in the manufacture of what, in the South Seas, was not an unsavoury variety of pasty. Auk-pie to an Antarctic appetite, is, we are told, a very delicious affair. The height of our specimen is four feet; its colours, blue, yellow, grey, and black, beautifully disposed, and harmoniously contrasted; its general plumage is close and compact, and in some cases horny; it is waterproof, an admirable adaptation of external covering to a severe climate, and suited also to a sea-bird. By the way, if we remember rightly, a row of penguins, with their light breasts, have been oddly likened to a line of children in their pinafores.

The remaining illustrations show specimens of various seals, Capt. Ross having in his collection perfected the history of these singular creatures. Of the individuals here figured, are the sternorhynchus homei, a native of the South Shetlands. Next are the crab-eating seal (phoca carcinophaga), and the sea-lion (otaria jubata). The latter species is found in the Falkland Islands. Sometimes the rocks along the shore are covered with multitudes of these animals; when fired at, they throw themselves into the sea; the old males snort and roar like mad bulls or lions, the females bleat exactly like calves, and the young cubs like lambs. When some of the herd are killed, the rest fly, and females often carry off a cub in their mouths. When undisturbed, they may be seen caressing each other most tenderly, and their snouts often meet together as if they were kissing.

The next specimen (arctocephalus ursinus) is the size of a large bear, seven feet long, and is covered with brown fur; it is also called the sea bear and the ursine seal. It is found on the islands on the north-west point of America. These seals are migratory, and live in families, each of which, amounting to 100 or 120, lives separately, though they crowd the shore to such an extent as often to compel the traveller to quit it and scale the neighbouring rocks. Both male and female are very affectionate to their young, and fierce in their defence, but the males are often tyrannically cruel to the females. They swim very swiftly, and are as great a terror to other seals as the sea lion is to them. The skins of the young are highly prized for clothing. The other species, monunga probosciden, is, in the male only, distinguished by its proboscis.

The crab-eating seal is, however, probably the greatest novelty in this class of the collection; and, in addition to the entire figure of the animal, we have shown in the cut of its skull the admirable construction of its pronged teeth for crushing its peculiar prey.

We consider that a more interesting addition than the present has not been made for some years to the zoological wealth of the British Museum. The Government have already recognised the national advantages of thus contributing to public enlightenment, and have been, consequently, liberal in grants for purchases, &c. Under the direction of the Lords of the Admiralty, Mr. J. E. Gray, the obliging and able curator of the zoological department of the Museum, has arranged the whole of the animal specimens brought home by Captain Ross, in a natural classification, to be published by Mr. Murray; and Dr. Hooker has made a series of nearly 1000 beautiful drawings of the more delicate marine specimens, for the plates which are to accompany the work. The publication will be at the expense of the Admiralty; a plan which, in France, has been followed by admirable scientific results. In our country, if we mistake not, Dr. Richardson's "Fauna Americana Borealis" is the only work of its class paid for by the Government.

ARCTOCEPHALUS URSINUS, AND MONUNGA PROBOSCIDEA (FEMALE).

In a more popular point of view, these accessions to the British Museum are extremely gratifying, in proving the readiness of the trustees to extend, by the best possible means, the rational recreations of the people; and, at the same time, to aid the spread of science; for Captain Ross's collection is alike interesting to the holiday throng and important to the studious naturalist.

HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF THE BELGIANS.

This very successful portrait, like its predecessor in the series, has been engraved from a drawing by M. Baugniet, the distinguished Belgian artist, whose portraits of the crowned heads of Europe have already obtained for him high and deserved fame. In the present specimen of his talents, the likeness is especially striking, and has all the force of ressemblance.

A biographical memoir of Leopold, King of the Belgians, will be found in No. 61 of our journal, by reference to which it will be seen that his Majesty is in his fifty-fourth year, and the thirteenth year of his reign as Sovereign of Belgium.

His Majesty was younger brother to the Duke of Saxe Coburg Gotha, recently deceased; and the circumstances under which the King received the mournful intelligence were peculiarly afflicting. It appears that on the evening of Jan. 31, the Court had a second ball in the palace at Brussels, at which about 1000 persons were present. The dancing was very animated, and the King was conversing with different persons in the Great Drawing-room, when General d'Hane came in and told his Majesty that an officer had arrived express from the Court of Saxe Coburg with important despatches. The King immediately went to the apartment where the officer was waiting, and there he heard the afflicting news of the sudden death of his elder brother, the reigning Duke of Saxe Coburg Gotha. His Majesty, overcome with grief, directly retired to his private apartments. Unwilling, however, that the ball should be broken up, he sent word to the Queen that a slight indisposition hindered him from joining the company. The melancholy and unexpected news, however, soon became known to a part of the company, and threw a damp over the whole, and many ladies and gentlemen declined dancing any more. The Queen did not leave the ball till just one o'clock, when she was first informed of the death of her brother-in-law, whom she highly esteemed. It is probable that there will be no more fêtes at Court during the whole winter.

Mr. J. Emerson Tennent, M.P., in his clever work on Belgium, thus glances at the character of King Leopold.—"One thing, in Belgium, I cannot but allude to as characteristic—the unrestrained freedom with which every individual discusses politics, and the unreserved candour and frankness with which each details his views and strictures. This is the more remarkable, because the universal tenor of opinion is, if not directly to complain, at least, to admit the existence of much cause for complaint. I never met with less bigotted politicians, and I have not seen a single individual whom I would designate a party-man, in the English acceptation of the term, that is, one who finds all right, or all wrong, precisely as the party with whom he sympathises be censured or lauded by the inference. But the fact is, there are no 'optimists' in Belgium as yet, and there is so much that is unsatisfactory in every department, that the consciousness of it forces itself upon the conviction, if not the admission, of every individual. The press, too, is equally unreserved, and in the shops of the booksellers we found numbers of publications devoted to the exposure of the present condition of the country."

"Still, no creature, not even the most violent partisan of the house of Nassau, whom I have met with, includes King Leopold in the scope of his censures. The revolution itself, its immediate agents, and its consequences, are the objects of their condemnation; but no one of the results from which they suffer is ascribed to the influence or interference of the King. Those who regret the expulsion of the King of Holland, look upon King Leopold merely as his involuntary successor; and, whilst they condemn the incapacity of his ministers and the violence of the party in the house and in the country by whom they are controlled, all seemed to regard the King as only borne upon a tide of circumstances, which he is equally unable with them to resist or direct. His fondness for locomotion, his frequent visits to England and journeys to Paris, were the subject of good-humoured badinage, and have procured him the titles of 'Le Roi Voyageur,' and 'L'Estafette Nomade.' 'Il s'amuse,' said an intelligent Belgian, when I asked him what share the King took in politics; 'he goes out of the way to Wiesbaden, and leaves things very much to themselves, or, what is nearly the same thing, to his ministers.'"

Again, Mr. Tennent, after enumerating the embarrassments of Belgium, observes:—"Under these circumstances, the position of King Leopold must be anything but an easy one, if his ambition extends to the foundation of a royal dynasty for his descendants. The religious grievances of the nation are, it is too much to be feared, beyond his reach to correct; and the evils which beset and endanger its internal prosperity, arising out of the circumscribed resources of the nation, must look in vain to them for redress. The fundamental defect is the want of an adequate consumption for the produce of the national industry; and for this the ingenuity of the Government has been ineffectually tortured to discover a remedy. It is idle to look to Germany or England for commercial treaties which would afford an opening for Belgian manufactures in competition with their own. Important concessions have been made to France, by the reduction of duties upon her produce, when imported into Belgium, but no reciprocal advantages have been obtained in return. On the contrary, ever since 1815, when the Netherlands were taken from her to be given to Holland, she has exhibited a waspish impatience to embarrass and undermine her prosperity. Prospects of colonization have been discussed, and even proposals made to other states for permission to attempt settlements on their distant territory; and where these have failed, commercial expeditions have been despatched to Algiers, to Egypt, to Brazil, to Bolivia, and Peru, all with a view to open a trading intercourse with the natives; but each and all have proved hopelessly unsuccessful.

ROYAL PORTRAITS.—II.

HIS MAJESTY LEOPOLD, KING OF THE BELGIANS.

THE JANUS STEAM-FRIGATE.

This noble vessel has just been launched from Chatham Dockyard, and has attracted much attention from her peculiar construction, designed by Vice-Admiral the Earl of Dundonald, who, as Lord Cochrane, is universally known in the service. The form of her body, which nearly resembles that of a wedge towards the extremities, is precisely similar at both ends, and is, consequently, capable of moving in either direction with equal facility; her capabilities of advancing and retreating in narrow channels, for the purpose of offensive warfare, are thereby made perfect. The following are her particular dimensions:—

	Feet.	In.
Length between the perpendiculars	180	0
Length of keel for tonnage	149	1
Breadth, extreme	30	0
Breadth, moulded	29	4
Depth in hold	19	1
Tonnage, old measurement, 761 53 94
Intended load draught of water, with 260 tons of coals	21	2
When launched her draught of water (with 40 tons of ballast on board), was—Forward	7	5
Abaft	7	2

The Janus is fitted with a rudder at each extremity, but on ordinary occasions one only will remain in place. The tillers work on deck. She has two capstans, and is provided with a pair of hawser-holes abaft as well as forward, but only one pair of riding bitts and one pair of catheads. Her armament will consist of a 10-inch gun at each extremity, throwing hollow shot of 86 lb. weight, and she will also be capable of mounting two 42-pounder guns. The engine by which this vessel is to be propelled is an invention of the gallant earl who designed her. It is to be a rotatory engine, which, it is said, will not occupy more than one-sixth of the space required for the common reciprocating engine. It may be placed so low as to be out of reach of gun-shot: it will have no beams, cranks, side rods, parallel motions, levers, &c.; and it may be fixed in less than a quarter of the time now required for fixing marine engines. While its first cost is considerably cheaper, it may be more easily kept in repair, in the opinion of the projector, than the steam machinery now in use on board vessels of war.

By the Parliamentary report, we perceive that on Tuesday last, Dr. Cochrane presented to the House of Commons a petition from the Earl of Dundonald, praying for an extension of 14 years for his patent for the above invention.

THE NEW GOVERNMENT STEAM-FRIGATE "JANUS."

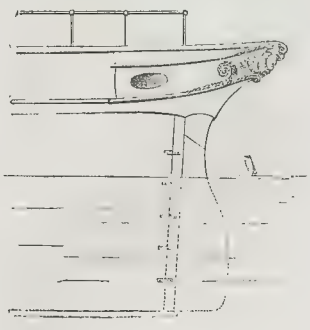

FIGURE-HEAD OF THE "JANUS."

LITERATURE.

The English Universities: from the German of V. A. Huber, Professor of Western Literature at Marburg. An Abridged Translation, edited by Francis W. Newman, Professor of the Greek and Latin Classics at Manchester New College, and formerly Fellow of Baliol College, Oxford. 3 vols. London: Pickering, 1843.

This is a truly philosophical, able, and impartial performance, and worthy the notice and acceptance not only of every one who has received his education at either of our great seminaries of learning, but also of the general reader who is desirous of knowing to what and to whom his country is indebted for that bright and dignified position in the scale of intellectual and moral greatness, which he feels assured she holds when compared with the pretensions of other neighbouring nations. But while we must, for the most part, emphatically commend the matter and spirit of these volumes, we cannot praise their "getting up," disfigured as it is by a series of trumpery lithographic portraits and prints; only look, for instance, at the portrait of Sir Isaac Newton, and observe his hand. This, however, is not the worst feature in the "publishing department" of so excellent a work. The editor, Mr. Newman, is, throughout, more or less at variance with his author, and he employs thirty-six pages of prefatory matter, for the most part, in explaining the reasons of this difference. It will be readily granted that a work thus ushered forth to the notice of Englishmen, must labour under considerable disadvantages: we could have wished, therefore, that Mr. Newman had declined the editorship, and that Mr. Heywood, the proprietor, had committed his publication to the superintendence of some more congenial and concurrent spirit. What could have induced the present editor, except it be for the sake of some passing notoriety, to give currency to views and opinions which he disapproves? It is not improbable, however, that some good may result from such collision of sentiment. University reforms may spring out of it, which otherwise had not been thought of. We cannot deny, indeed, that the editor manifests in his occasional antagonistic remarks considerable ability and acquaintance with his subject; but we doubt if the mode he has adopted of displaying them be a judicious one, and persuaded we are that they are not always justified by the state of circumstances, nor always consistent with the truth of facts.

The voluminous notes which the author has appended to the work, and of which the last volume wholly consists, are, in our estimation, as valuable as the text itself. The illustration facing the title-page to Vol. I. represents the introduction of the Senior Wrangler to the Vice-Chancellor, in January, 1842; and in Vol. II., page 354, the same Senior Wrangler is represented at the next stage of the ceremony, when he kneels before the Vice-Chancellor, and is admitted "ad respondendum quæstioni," which is a formality previous to graduation as a B.A. The Oxford ceremonies for degrees are seen in Vol. II., page 300, and Vol. II., part ii., page 516. Examination scenes at Oxford, Cambridge, Durham, and London, are also given in the second part of the Second Volume; and there are two plates on the tests in pages 672 and 678 of the same volume. The system of tests is different in Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin. No ecclesiastical tests are required for the university degrees in Dublin; none are required for matriculation at Cambridge; but a signature to the Thirty-nine Articles is still required at matriculation at Oxford. The two English universities have tests for degrees, which vary again from each other. Cambridge requires a Bachelor of Arts to subscribe himself a bonâ fide member of the Church of England: Oxford expects him to sign the Thirty-nine Articles; and, for higher degrees, both universities require a signature to the Thirty-nine Articles.

The author, in his introductory chapter, presents us with some interesting and instructive sections on the growth of continental universities in the twelfth century, in which he arrives at conclusions essentially different from those of Meiners, and others, who maintain that the universities were originally independent of the church. On the contrary, our author contends, with truth, that most of the continental universities originated in entire dependence on the church, making no reference, meanwhile, to the Italian universities, nor to mere isolated cases, such as Bologna and Salerno, the oldest and most considerable, which had not an ecclesiastical origin. In fact, both positive testimony and general probabilities warrant us, that the new intellectual impulse sprang up, not only on the domain and under the guidance of the church, but out of ecclesiastical schools. In the second chapter of the work we learn the state and position of the English universities previous to the thirteenth century, their great antiquity of Oxford as a seat of learning in Saxon times, and probably in Alfred's reign and the early state of Cambridge. The author proceeds, in the next chapter, to give some amusing details concerning these seminaries of learning during the twelfth and fourteenth centuries, or what may be called the Middle Age. There can be no question that during this period the English universities were distinguished far more than ever afterwards by energy and variety of intellect. Later times cannot produce a concentration of men eminent in all learning and science of the age, such as Oxford and Cambridge then poured forth, mightily influencing the intellectual development of all Western Christendom.

The system of "Nations" sprung up in the English, as well as in the continental universities, as an order of things congenial to the wants of the age. Little or nothing is known of their constitution, rights, and laws, except that they were recognised as corporations up to the end of the fourteenth century, and that at the beginning of the seventeenth they were becoming gradually obsolete. They were known by the names of Northermen and Southermen. The importance of the colleges contributed to break up the system, where, in fact, so great a fusion of the north and south of England had taken place, that no materials existed for the distinction of two "nations" at the university.

M. Huber gives us one section on the contrast of genius between northern and southern England, and others upon the sympathy between the English nation and the universities, the riots of the thirteenth century, and the direct political factions, at Oxford; whence he traces how these movements were connected with the reformation. And after giving us a chapter on the English universities in their relations toward the town corporations in the middle ages, and some general remarks on these seats of learning from the middle of the fourteenth century to the reformation, he very interestingly describes the foundation and organization of the different colleges, and the several of classical studies in the universities. It was indeed to the renewed study of the classics that the colleges owed their elevation; and the grander foundations were, in fact, a result of the stimulus given by the same cause to the nobler spirits of the nation.

The last chapter of the first volume describes the state of the English universities during the Reformation to the end of Elizabeth's reign: one section of it is employed in detailing the university reform of 1549, and another its unsatisfactory results. With regard to the essential difference in the tendency of the two universities, Cambridge may be said to have gained a very perceptible start of her elder sister; partly by her freer movements, partly by her stricter demands, both in and out of the colleges. The intellectual distance between the two became still more remarkable after the end of the seventeenth century; and up to the most modern times it has never been completely adjusted. The peculiarities of the Cambridge reform consisted chiefly in the colleges getting into their hands the last fortress of democracy—the choice of the two proctors. Another section is devoted to the influence of the gentry upon the universities. Of the evidence concerning the domestic education of the gentry of that day, we may learn something from unexceptionable contemporaneous witnesses, such as Peacham, in his "Complete Gentleman," as quoted by Drake, in his "Shakspeare and his Times;" and Aschalm, in his "Schoolmaster."

The second volume commences with the account—the external and internal history of the universities from the death of Elizabeth to the Revolution. The author then proceeds, in the eleventh chapter, to discuss their exterior aspects and material resources, and their intellectual and moral state after the Restoration, and through the eighteenth century; and thence arrives at their condition in modern recent times. One division of this chapter is devoted to the discussion of the question of the comparative morality of English and German university life; and we are glad to find that Professor Huber handles this subject with a degree of fairness and impartiality not often seen in a foreign writer, when contrasting any of the institutions of his own country with those of England. He doubtless displays on this point much greater candour, as well as infinitely more information, than we find in some late works on the same subject. Moreover, on the actual prospects and present condition of the universities, we have some very interesting remarks. First, on their unpopularity; secondly, on their modern reforms; and thirdly, we are gratified by so just a comparison of English and German Universities, as to the intellectual results on the students.

With respect to "philosophy," M. Huber has some very just and judicious remarks. He denies that the Germans, as a nation, deserve, in regard to philosophy, the opinion bestowed upon them by their neighbours, either in a good or a bad sense. The summits reached by the Masters of German philosophy are attainable to but very few; and there is room to fear that the stimulus which brought ripeness to the masters, is generating rottenness in the scholars, and is threatening to break up all positive, and thereby all living and life-giving knowledge. It appears to be almighty reason in religious, moral, political, and scientific cultivation into an utter negation of everything beyond "self;" and this, the more effectually, the more confidently it pretends to replace or supersede them by greater unity. Professor Huber proceeds to compare the present and past state of learning in the English universities, then to a defence of the universities, and next to describe the reforming movements of a minority within the universities. In short, the last dozen sections of this volume are most conspicuously worthy the attention of all who take an interest in the welfare of our grand national institutions of learning and religion, or in that, more particularly, of their own Alma Mater.

Notwithstanding all "the appliances and means to boot," so loudly trumpeted forth by many a self-contaminated Englishman, as available and actually made use of in Germany for the furtherance of all branches of a liberal education, and that almost gratuitously, Professor Huber thus speaks of the effects and results of the two systems, with which quotation we must conclude our notice of this most able, profound, judicious, and praiseworthy publication, so far at least as its author is concerned; and we can only wish that he had found a more congenial English editor.

If (says he) we judge of this part of our public education by our pompous pretensions, by the sign-boards of our Gymnasia, by the praises of modern Liberalism, the jargon of speculation, and the insipid oratory of our public functionaries, we shall appear to stand infinitely higher, in every point of universal preparatory education, than any other nation whatever. What a rich abundance of subjects for instruction and examination—of matters which are scarcely known by name elsewhere! What variety, what freedom, what activity of intellect, what an inspiration for all that is beautiful and noble in the whole sphere of European civilisation, what disgust of all petty, mechanical, and professional studies, must we not naturally presume to those who flock, from year to year, to the Universities! However, I must declare my conviction, and give my testimony, that all true and living results decrease in proportion as the means and the pretensions increase in ostentation, artifice, and complication. In spite of all the lecture-lists of schools and universities with us, in spite of all our "matriculity" regulations and examinations, History, Modern Languages and their Literature, the History of Literature, and even Geography and Natural History, are studied less generally, less zealously, and less successfully, than in the corresponding academic spheres in England, where all is left to voluntary love of knowledge and self-inclinement!!!

The Boy's Treasury of Sports, Pastimes, and Recreations; with 400 Engravings, by S. Williams. D. Bogue.

This is a new book of games for boys, with a few sports and recreations, physical and mental, that delight also the "children of a larger growth." The work truly begins at the beginning, with nursery toys, and proceeds to the tops, marbles, and balls of the play-ground. Then we have a batch of parlour pastimes; and the scene shifts to invigorating out-door sports, followed by quoits, gymnastics, swimming, and skating; archery, fencing, and riding follow—the latter a novelty in a book of this class. Keeping animals fills several pages, in which kindness to the little creatures is bespoken, in the remark that "humanity is a jewel, which every boy should be proud to wear in his breast." Draughts, chess, dominoes, and bagatelle are next explained in brief, but comprehensive treatises; and are followed by amusements in arithmetic and legerdemain. Sections of recreations in chemistry, optics, electricity, and magnetism succeed; with toy balloons, paper fire-works, and modelling in card-board and cork. Puzzles and paradoxes, enigmas and riddles, are next served up; and a chapter of amusing miscellanies concludes the volume. In the preface, we are assured that the work contains many new games that have never before been printed in a book of the kind; the old games are described afresh, and thus, it is altogether a new book. It is embellished with upwards of 400 engravings by Samuel Williams: many of these are extremely picturesque, and the head and tail-pieces are so many pretty bits of emblematic art. Altogether, "The Boy's Treasury" is a fascinating present for youth, produced in good taste, and, accordingly, worthy of extensive patronage.

The Albanian. By J. C. Collins. W. Strange.

This is a metrical tale of Grecian Independence, in part founded upon a prose tale which appeared in the Athenæum for 1829. The struggle lies between the Albanian (Carlo), and the Pacha; the former is slain by a spahi, and the tale closes with a touching picture of his inamorata, the fair Helen," at his untimely fall. The poem has in it many passages of true pathos, besides some germs of higher promise.

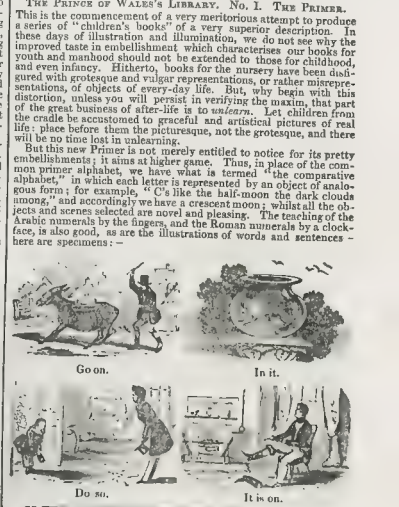
Travels in Ireland (Reisen in Ireland). By J. G. Köhl.

The Author of this work is already known to the English reader, by his travels in Russia and the Austrian dominions; and the present work is the first of a series to be devoted to the United Kingdom and part of France, with illustrations of their social condition and comparative progress. However hasty a traveller's sketches, however imperfect a man's views, every nation gains by the observation of an intelligent mind. A good book, reflectively and dispassionately written, is as honest a monitor as a mirror—which shows, with equal truth, the charms of beauty and the wrinkles of age. No country can possibly claim more attention, none so earnestly for it as Ireland—whose political condition is an anomaly; whose social condition is a crime. Into the discussion of the cause of this it is needless to enter: its just solution will be obtained only by laying aside party spirit, and by extending information among all classes; for the right government of a people should be, not the ambition or the interest of a class, but the common end and the general aim of all. Towards this—a fair and unprejudiced view of the present state of Ireland—Mr. Köhl's work will greatly tend. He observed, far and wide, the same desolating blight of ignorance, party hate, of superstition, and poverty; and yet, amid this, he has not failed to point out the first ray of light which should herald the coming of a more blessed dawn of hope, and of further progressive good. After visiting the Edgeworths, he proceeded to Edenvale, travelling through the most barren part of the county of Clare, and obtaining much useful information upon the country, the peasantry, the laws of landlord and tenant, the relative number of the Catholics and Protestants, and the statistics derived from the extensive system of education now adopted, and, more particularly, the moral resurrection of the people, by the Temperance movement of its apostle, Father Mathew. The aspect of this is in part cheering; yet sadly, painfully depressing. "I have seen, in Hungary," says Mr. Köhl, "and elsewhere, dwellings wretched enough; but, scarcely in any land have I beheld such miserable hovels as I have here seen here, and to say, in many other parts of Ireland." He is no less descriptive, almost interesting so, upon the dress of the beggars, or rather rags; and introduces a curious comparison between the costume of the labourers and those of other lands. The chapter on the Round Towers, and the learning of the Kerry men, will repay perusal; although, it is hardly requisite to say, nothing new has been added relative to the origin of the first, and that the second is proved to be as imaginative a fiction as any other in daily circulation. In his locomotive particulars Mr. Köhl is difficult to please: it is an even question upon which side the balance of his dislike sways, or which to him is most distressing—the outside seat of a coach, or the more expensive one inside. Next to his portraits of Father Mathew, Tom Steele, and Daniel O'Connell, are the sketches of his drivers, and Temperance guides. The Infant Schools at Wexford is an interesting sketch: we hardly remember one to which we could more particularly direct attention. Of the broad and grand features of Irish scenery we expected more, much more, forcible description. Mr. Köhl either does not feel, or cannot portray, scenery; and exhibits, in this respect, the painful accuracy of the countryman, who seems to see more pleasure in counting the pebbles on the roadside, than to impress upon their readers the rich luxuriance of nature, and magic contrasts of light and shade which she presents. Mr. Köhl has described the Giant's Causeway geologically, Glendalough exegetically, and Killarney quietly—but truly in every respect. His style is, throughout, pleasing and animated; his information well condensed, and carefully obtained; where he condemns, he does so in a becoming spirit; and his praise never degenerates into adulation. That he has made upon many points not to be expected, that in a translation some parts would bear suppression (those, for instance, on the "Superstitions of the Peasantry," Vol. II., pp. 206, 207), will be readily conceded; but that he has added much information to our knowledge of Ireland—of the dreadful sufferings of the vast mass of the people—of the cause and object of the great question of Repeal, which now casts its shadow o'er the land—and that he has done this in an unprejudiced, educated, and feeling manner—will not be denied. Believing that a correct knowledge of many points, upon which he has written, to be of the greatest importance at any time, but imperatively necessary now, we recommend this work to our readers—convinced that Mr. Köhl will please all dispassionate people, whether as an author or a witness.

The Prince of Wales's Library. No. I. The Primer.

This is the commencement of a very meritorious attempt to produce a series of "children's books" of a very superior description. In these days of illustration and illumination, we do not see why the improved taste in embellishment which characterises our books for youth and manhood should not be extended to those for childhood, and even infancy. Hitherto, books for the nursery have been disfigured with grotesque and vulgar representations, or rather misrepresentations, of objects of every-day life. But, why begin with this distortion, unless you will persist in verifying the maxim, that part of the great business of after-life is to unlearn. Let children from the cradle be accustomed to graceful and artistical pictures of real life: place before them the picturesque, not the grotesque, and there will be no time lost in unlearning.

But this new Primer is not merely entitled to notice for its pretty embellishments; it aims at higher game. Thus, in place of the common primer alphabet, we have what is termed "the comparative alphabet," in which each letter is represented by an object of analogous form; for example, "C's like the half-moon the dark clouds among," and accordingly we have a crescent moon; whilst all the objects and scenes selected are moral and pleasing. The teaching of the Arabic numerals by the fingers, and the Roman numerals by a clock-face, is also good, as are the illustrations of words and sentences—here are specimens:—



The reading lessons of monosyllables are nicely penned; and, in place of the inanity of the old horn-book, or "Reading Made Easy," we have sound, healthy sentiments, and reverend precepts.

The Primer contains a sheet of little wood-cuts, besides a set of pictures, cleverly drawn and engraved: the entire number of illustrations must exceed 300. The frontispiece, printed in blue, gold, and crimson, is a very pretty composition—the young Prince of Wales in his goat chaise at Windsor, the triple-plume, and a group of toys, such as delight children of every rank, from the heir to a throne to the shoeless cottager. There is, likewise, an heraldic dedicatory page, of purple, gold, and crimson; and the cover is resplendent with sheet gold, relieved with a medallion portrait of the young Prince of Wales. The whole affair will, we think, be universally admired by parents, and received with ecstacy by the little folk.

NEW MUSIC.

The Woodman. An Emigrant (? Emigrant's) Song; the poetry by T. W. Borthwick, Esq.; the Music by T. German Reed. Reed and Addison.

As we always read the words of a song before we can in any way judge of how far the music is consonant to it, we accordingly perused those of the present production, and confess ourselves quite at a loss to understand the following non-sequitur:—

Though flow'rs again o'er meadows spring,
And the hedge rows all look gay;
Though the blackbirds chaunt and the thrushes sing,
'Tis the merry, merry month of May.

This objection, however, is more applicable to the composer of the music than to the author of the words, for he uses false punctuation in his phrases, and comes to a full stop in his melody when the verbal sense is suspended. The pedale crudities are too sour for our palate.

The new opera, "The Bohemian Girl." The words by Alfred Bunn, Esq.; the music by M. W. Balfe. Chappell, New Bond-street.

Many have been the cavillings against Balfe by illiberal, envious, and, for the most part, ignorant critics; but still he is a public favourite here, or wherever he goes, and therefore may be perfectly indifferent to their private opinion. What though he be not a Mozart, a Beethoven, or a Rossini—he is a composer of no ordinary genius, and well deserves the popularity he has obtained.

Consultus juris, et actor
Causarum mediocris abest virtute diserti
Messalæ, nec scit quantum Cascellius Aulus;
Sed tamen in pretio est, and although an absolute originality may not be pleaded for him, he, occasionally, indeed often, exhibits proofs that he possesses the power of creating new melodies, or combinations of harmony quite his own, or so re-modelling those of others, that he imparts a new grace to them. Nobody complains of Virgil's copying Homer, or of Lavy pilfering whole books, verbatim, from Polybius: yet every little musical snarler will bark if we find but half a phrase which resembles something he had heard before. We allow that Balfe had his faults, but he abounds in beauties too, and ought to be the motto inscribed upon every generous critic's standard, instead of ill nature and jealousy.

Ubi plura nitent in carmine, non ego paucis
Offendari maculis,

The beauties of Balfe's music, which we gladly advert to first, are clearness of design in its dramatic effects, appropriateness of character with the incidents of its story, and the thorough knowledge or artistical skill by which the orchestral arrangements are made to support and enrich the vocal department. Construction, phrenologically speaking, is another of his virtues; but in this very essential requisite for a dramatic composer, he has not quite attended to the saying that virtus est vitium fugere; for often, for the sake of what is called "figure," he produces raw and crude harmonies. Another thing: he does not always bear in mind that beautiful line,

Strong without rage—without o'erflowing, full!

But this perhaps is more the vice of the age than his peculiar fault. Rossini introduced the thunder-and-lightning style of filling up a partition, and no composer now-a-days think he can command the attention of an audience unless he make some attempt at being a Jupiter tonans, although his combustibles are in the ratio of a single squib to a powder magazine compared to his—

Who set a bright, but bad example.

Modern music of every kind is over-instrumented. There are occasions, to be sure, when we should like to hear a full "celestial quire" sound forth its countless diapason;—such as in that passage of Belgiant musician's chorus, "For unto us," where the word "wonderful" occurs, the perfect utterance of which requires the philosophical dream of the Samian to be realized, that we might have the "concentum cœli" of the orbal minstrelsy to perform it with the gigantic strength in which it was imagined. But, on the other hand, we do not like to be opinionated incessantly through three long acts of an opera. A modern poet agrees with us on this point:—

Where the bee's hum
Of drowsy melody,
Should gently come
How can we see
That tuneless noise usurps its place
And brings on Music's arc disgrace!
In sermons
That should be play'd,
Or sung, as soft as roses' singing
A trumpeter
Will make a stir
"Wad mak' ye think the war' was dying!"
What would the lady's father say
If he could hear such roundelay!
He surely would quid-nunc for poaching
Or Gunman like shoot in the dark
At any noisy, stout-lung'd spark
Upon his premises encroaching!

The overture to this opera, for the greater part, consists of a medley of the airs which are subsequently executed by the vocalists; but, unlike those of Weber's "Der Freyschütz" they are deficient in abstract dignity, and therefore impart but little delight. It is not every melody that can be sung and played with equal effect. The point from the "Don Giovanni" overture is too often repeated, but still there is considerable ingenuity exhibited throughout this composition. The Gipsy chorus is effective—we like it all with the exception of the introduction of the unmeaning Italian interjection of Ah! Ah! and the third bar of the music to its expression, which we rejoiced to see was omitted by the scrupulous Moscheles in his most brilliant fantasias on subjects from the opera; we shall have to find fault of noticing these presently. The quintett, "Tho'ev'ry hope be fled," is highly dramatic, in the Italian Carione style, and breaks into chorus very effectively. The concerted music throughout is admirable, particularly the trio, "Through the sword will thou fly, love?" which is a charming composition, full of feeling and elegance. Of the three duets, we prefer "The Secret of Her Birth"—the motifs are brilliant, and the accompaniments kept in most excellent figure. Although Miss Rainforth continues to make "I Dreamt that I Dwelt in Marble Halls" the gem of the piece, it is by no means the best composition amongst the songs: we could find its phrases in several sources. The ballad, "Then You'll Remember Me," is extremely simple, and more in the manner of some former popular ballads, by the same composer. In the ballad, "'Tis Sad to Leave our Father-land," between bars 3 and 4 of the melody, there is a false progression, which we have elsewhere noticed in Balfe's music. In the ballad of the "Heart Bowed Down," there are some delicate touches of the accomplished musician. The galop and the waltz are spirited and graceful: in the latter, however, at pages four and five, there is a most pertinacious preservation of figure, which is not altogether considered secundum artem. Taking this opera as a whole, it is a work highly creditable to the genius that inspired it. We may be truly proud of Balfe.

No. 1.—Brilliant Fantasia, on select subjects from Balfe's opera, "The Bohemian Girl," for the piano-forte, composed and dedicated to Mrs. J. Andrew, by J. Moscheles.

No. 2. Grand Fantasia, on favourite subjects from ditto, composed and dedicated to Miss Meeke, by ditto. Chappell, New Bond-street.

We are at a loss to know which of these productions to prefer; although one of them is said to be on "select" subjects, and the other upon "favourite," the master-hand of Moscheles has, with his wonted grace and fascinating beauty and interest to each of them. They cannot fail to be popular with all pianists of taste and judgment.

Favourite airs, in M. W. Balfe's opera of "The Bohemian Girl," arranged for the pianoforte, with an ad. lib. accompaniment for the flute, in three books, by J. F. Burrowes. Chappell, New Bond-street. Arranged in Mr Burrowes' best style, with taste and fidelity to the vocal pieces. The ad. lib. flute accompaniment is at once unobtrusive and effective.

Music for the Million—Vocal and Instrumental. (Davidson).

"This work," says the title-page, "is intended to foster the growing taste for musical attainment, by publication of standard and classical music at the lowest price consistent with editorial accuracy and elegance of typography!"

The purpose is certainly a laudable one, and has been carried out by the publisher most excellently, as far as the "typographical elegance" and "low price;" but here must end our approbation.

In the first place, nothing can be more out of place than florid instrumental accompaniments to any composition originally intended for merely vocal, and the pianoforte accompaniments are taken from the vocal one, might be allowed, for the sake of facilitating the progress of those who cannot sing at sight, and then dispensed with as soon as possible. In the next place, the publication of standard and classical music at the lowest price consistent with editorial accuracy and elegance, &c., in this work, are beneath criticism. We only request any musician to look at those daubed over the following exquisite musical paintings.—Danby's "Fair Flora," King's "Witches" (here they are quite luminous), and the admirable accompaniment that is appended to the splendid old round of "Care thou canker." Let him look to these, we say, and then wonder why the terms "editorial accuracy" have been used or abused! This may be "Music for the Million," but it will not suit the few select!

An den Mond (to the Moon). Song, translated from Goëthe, by W. Bartholomew, Esq., the music by W. J. Tomaschek. Ollivier, New Bond-street.

This song to the moon was written by no lunatic—he was quite in his senses, as was also the translator of Goëthe's words; but still we would advise the composer to study a little more the quidnuncs he ought to be observed amongst chords; for instance, between the bars 21 and 22 there is an awkward and rude progression; the ', unceremoniously proceeding to a new fundamental, which, if not precisely a heinous crime, is a breach of good manners in harmony.

Forget Thee. Ballad. The words by the Rev. John Moultrie, the melody by C. F. D., Esq.; symphonies and accompaniments by George E Hay. Ollivier, New Bond-street

This is a very charming melody, and is elegantly harmonized. The words, however, are not new to us; for they are inserted in the Album of Departed wit, a song of other days" that "floats on our memory like half-forgotten dreams;" it is not fair to make mincepies of the old plum-puddings of our ancestors. The song, per se, is very beautiful, and we again repeat the correct good taste and fine feeling exhibited in Mr. Hay's symphonies and accompaniments.

Chatsworth Quadrilles. Composed by Charles Coote, Pianist to his Grace the Duke of Devonshire. Ollivier, New Bond-street. The great merit of this set consists in being original there are no desecrations of vocal melodies—no twistings and curtailments to fit a popular melody to the "lascivious pleasings" of a waltz, or even quadrille. But, although the melodies are original, the harmonies are still more so! On the title-page there is a most exquisite lithograph of Chatsworth, executed in the very perfection of art.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

Mr. Bunn is certainly a "prime one in the field" of catership for public amusement; nobody seems to feel the pulse of the multitude with more instinctive sagacity than he. The present lessee has had the tact to discover the taste of public opinion, and to administer to it with liberality, judgment, and such consequent effect, as not only to secure the generous support of his enormous outlay. A great deal has been said about non-encouragement of native talent; but we would ask who has fostered it more than Mr. Bunn? If people will not go to see tragedies badly acted, that is not his fault; he even avails himself of the only tragedine genius in the country, which argues a devotion to Melpomene; but he finds that other stater muses are more friendly to his cause, and he would be wanting in judgment if he did not avail himself of their succour. Last season he produced one of the most enchanting danseuses in the world, Carlotta Grisi, and this time he presents to us another, whose merits can scarcely be defined. Maulle. Fanny, who in the "redolence of spring and beauty!" has not been surpassed upon any stage.

The ballet of "the Maid of Ghent" is formed upon the visionary school—the Veronese—the Koulantze the —the Fanny school! Reality is laughed at—probability is rejected —but still there is enough for sense to enjoy and imagination to associate with. The story is of no great importance as relates to novelty; but in its present form it gives ample opportunity to some artistes to display some original graces; and foremost we will mention Maulle. Fleury, as Diana, confessing at the same time that, unlike Horace, we are not capable

Diane
Decere laudes.

Mademoiselle's appearance as the Goddess was one of the most elegant personations we ever witnessed. M. Vestris is a graceful dancer. educated, we presume, in the French school, and one who never sacrifices case to agility. The pantomime, or rather the genuine acting of Albert, was superb, particularly in the desperate combating scene. Nothing could have been more truth-like. The scenery is magnificent, and reflects the highest credit upon the Greves, who may be styled the most genuine scene-painters of this or any other day, seeing that they pay their whole and sole devotion to the stage, and do not flatter their talent away. "The Maid of Ghent" is a splendid spectacle, helped to the utmost by beautiful, graceful music, the composition of Adolphe Adam, and will no doubt realize the expectations of its liberal speculators by a long and glorious run. One word at parting concerning Fleury. She seemed to be the realisation of our classic dreams; "taller than her attendant nymphs she stood," and in a triform attitude

Terret, lustrat, agit, Proserpina, Luna, Diana
Ima, superna, feras, sceptro, fulgore, sagitta.

We advise all lovers of beauty, grace, and art, to witness this magnificent spectacle.

IRELAND.

Repeal Association.—The usual weekly meeting of the Loyal National Repeal Association took place on Monday at the Conciliation Hall. The attendance was numerous. Mr. Steele was called to the chair. Mr. Clements handed in £70 from Manchester, and the Secretary read the sum of £50 from Ireland, and £20 from Newry. Mr. Smith O'Brien, M.P., then brought forward the petition of which he had given notice on the last day of meeting. In doing so he congratulated the Association upon the altered tone of Ministers with respect to Ireland, as evinced in the debate in progress in the House of Commons. If the prayer of that petition be conceded, and a full enquiry granted into the circumstances connected with the trial, it would be impossible for the Crown to bring the convicted traversers up for judgment; but if it were not, and from his experience of the manner in which Ireland and Irish affairs were treated in the Imperial Parliament he feared it would not—he would afford another proof, if proof were required—of the necessity of Repeal. Mr. O'Neill Daunt seconded the adoption of the petition, which was carried by acclamation. Some other business was transacted, and the meeting adjourned. The rent for the week was upwards of £500.

The Evening Post states, on the authority of a letter from Clifton, county Galway, that the trial of three persons of that county, for the murder of Mr. O'Connell was known, the two Government steamers in the bay fired five rounds each as a mode of rejoicing for the news.

Leonard Dobbin, Esq., formerly Representative for the city of Armagh, departed this life at his residence in Armagh on the 19th inst. Mr. Dobbin was a firm supporter of Liberal principles, and took an active part in the proceeding of the Volunteer convention at Dungannon.

A meeting of the leading Irish Whigs is to be held at Claremont House for the purpose of nominating a deputation to present a memorial to the Queen, in reference to the present condition of Ireland. It is said that the memorial will be the length of entreating her Majesty to take measures for holding occasional Parliaments in Dublin.

Hydropathy in France.—Upon an application being made to the French Government for permission to open an hydropathic establishment in Paris, the Government referred the subject to the French Academy for their opinion. The following are the conclusions to which the Academy arrived after mature consideration—1. That hydropathy is a dangerous therapeutical method, which does not rest on facts; 2, that its theory is illusionary; 3, that it is condemned with our chemical and pathological doctrines; 4, that the Academy cannot in any way approve of it; 5, that the use of cold water has been long in the domain of medicine, and submitted to rules.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange.—Friday.—We had about an average supply of English wheat on sale to-day. Fine qualities were in demand at Monday's quotations, but all other kinds were a heavy sale, and prices were with difficulty supported. In fore gn wheat exceedingly little was doing, at unaltered currencies. The quantity of barley on show was large, while the sale was very limited, and at barely stationary prices. The trade was very dull, at late rates, beans, peas, and flour ruled se last quoted Arrivals—English: Wheat, 3390 quarters; barley, 9880; oats, 3670 quarters Irish barley, 760; oats, 14370, quarters. Foreign wheat, 600 quarters. Flour, 4770 sacks. Malt, 2740 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 52s to 56s, ditto white, 58s to 65s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 44s to 54s; ditto white, 48s to 58s, rye, 32s to 36s, grinding barley, 22s to 32s distilling ditto 26s to 28s, malting ditto, 32s to 36s; Lincoln, Yorkshire, and Scotch brown ditto, 25s to 28s; Kingston and Ware, 60s to 63s, Chevalier, 65s, Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 21s to 22s, potato ditto, 22s to 24s; Scotch and Irish ditto, 19s; ditto white, 19s to 20s, tick beans, new, 26s to 34s, ditto, old, 34s to 38s, grey peas, 1s to 33s, maple, 31s to 33s, white, 32s to 36s, boilers, 36s to 39s, new quarter Tewkesbury flour, 40s to 45s; Suffolk, ~ to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 38s to 40s, per 28 lbs Foreign.—Free wheat, 48s to 50s, Dantzig, red,50s to 62s; white, 60s to 66s. In Bond.—Barley, 19s to 20s, oats, new, 12s to 14s, ditto old, 15s to 18s; beans, 24s to 28s, peas, 28s to 30s, per quarter. Flour, America, 21s to 23s, Baltic, 21s to 23s, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—For linseed, the demand has ruled steady, at full prices; but, in other kinds of seeds very little has been doing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 50s to 56s; Baltic crushing, 35s to 37. Mediterranean and Odessa, 36s to 38s; bombay, 28s to 33s per quarter; coriander, 13s to 20s per cwt; brown mustard seed, 12s to 18s, white ditto, 10s to 14s, tares, 24s to 28s per quarter, trefoil, 20s to 30s; Lincoln and Essex cake, £6 5s to £6 10s per ton; canary, 58s to 61s per quarter.

Bread.—The prices of the wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 8½d to 9½d, of household ditto, 6½d to 8d per 4lb loaf

Imperial Weekly Average Wheat, 53s 6d; barley, 32s 6d; oats, 18s 6d; rye, 32s 3d; beans 30s 6d; peas, 31s, 1d

The Sugar Market and Queen's Duty.—Wheat, 52s 2d, barley, 33s 4d; oats, 19s 6d, rye, 32s 11d; beans, 29s 1d; peas, 30s 9d.

Duties. Wheat, 18s; barley, 5s., oats, 7s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 11s 6d; peas, 10s 6d

Fine.—Public sales of 37,711 packages have been held this week. These auctions have passed off well about 15 000 chests having found buyers, and prices have in some instances had an upward tendency. Privately, a good business is doing at full rates.

Sugar.—Publicly, as well as by private contract, a good business has been doing in all kinds of sugar; very little, however, of the supplies in warehouse now remaining is other than were those at the corresponding period in 1843.

Coffee.—Clean sorts of B P. coffee are scarce, and in request at full quotations. Coylons are more enquired for, and large parcels of good ordinary have been taken at 80s 6d to 87s. Fore-gn coffee is selling readily, and the rates have an upward tendency.

Cocoa.—This article is in somewhat active inquiry at late quotations.

Spirits.—Rum is still in brisk demand at improved rates. Brandy is rather dull. Corn spirits 10s to 10s 2d per gallon.

Oils.—138 hogsheads, 5 puncheons cocoa-nut oil at public sale went at £28 10s to £31 7s 6d per tun, for middling to good quality. Other descriptions are quite as dear

Tallow.—The market is flat. Small sales of P.Y.C. made at 45s 9d to 47s per cwt. Town tal ow, 42s net cash.

Provisions.—Very large arrivals of Irish butter have again taken place, and which have depressed the demand The best parcels are, however, worth 64s to 72s per cwt. Foreign butter dull of sale, but not lower. Fine Dutch is selling in small parcels at 80s to 102s per cwt. Lard is se...ng freely, at an advance of from 1s to 2s per cwt. In hams but little doing. Bacon is in per cwt demand.

Cork.—Hebburn's Mess, 105s; Wylax 103s 6d; Heaton, 103s 6d; Killingworth, 1Os, New March, 103s 6d, Braddyll's Heaton, 103s 6d, Lambton, 103s 6d; Carradoc 102s per ton.

Hops.—For Weald of Kent pockets we have a very active sale, at an advance of 2s per cwt. In all other kinds of hops a good business is doing at full prices. Weald of Kent pockets, £6 5s to £6 15s; Mid Kent do., £6 12s to £6 18s; East Kent do. £6 5s to £6 15s; Choice do., £6 10 to £11 11s, Sussex do. £6 to £6 15s; Farnham's, £8 15s to £11 10s. Mid Kent bags, £6 12s to £8 10s.

Wool.—The imports this week have been trifling. The demand, for most descriptions, is steady, at full prices

Potatoes.—About 2000 tons of potatoes have reached the Pool, since our last, which move off slowly, at from £2 10s to £4 per ton.

Smithfield.—Notwithstanding the supply of beasts on sale here to-day was very small, we were again to report a dull enquire for that description of stock, at barely Monday's reduced prices Prime old downs being unusually scarce, commanded in some instances, an advance of 2d per 8lb. In other breeds of sheep we noticed no alteration. Calves and pigs were a heavy sale, at late currencies.

Monday.—The market is flat. Small sales of P.Y.C. made at 45s 9d to 47s per cwt. Town tal ow, 42s net cash.

Provisions.—Very large arrivals of Irish butter have again taken place, and which have depressed the demand The best parce s are, however, worth 64s to 72s per cwt. Foreign butter dull of sale, but not lower. Fine Dutch is selling in small parcels at 80s to 102s per cwt. Lard is se...ng freely, at an advance of from 1s to 2s per cwt. In hams but little doing. Bacon is in per cwt demand.

Cork.—Hebburn's Mess, 105s; Wylax 103s 6d; Heaton, 103s 6d; Killingworth, 1Os, New March, 103s 6d, Braddyll's Heaton, 103s 6d, Lambton, 103s 6d; Carradoc 102s per ton.

Hops.—For Weald of Kent pockets we have a very active sale, at an advance of 2s per cwt. In all other kinds of hops a good business is doing at full prices. Weald of Kent pockets, £6 5s to £6 15s; Mid Kent do., £6 12s to £6 18s; East Kent do. £6 5s to £6 15s; Choice do., £10 to £11 11s, Sussex do. £6 to £6 15s; Farnham's, £8 15s to £11 10s. Mid Kent bags, £6 12s to £8 10s.

Wool.—The imports this week have been trifling. The demand, for most descriptions, is steady, at full prices

Potatoes.—About 2000 tons of potatoes have reached the Pool, since our last, which move off slowly, at from £2 10s to £4 per ton.

Smithfield.—Notwithstanding the supply of beasts on sale here to-day was very small, we were again to report a dull enquire for that description of stock, at barely Monday's reduced prices Prime old downs being unusually scarce, commanded in some instances, an advance of 2d per 8lb. In other breeds of sheep we noticed no alteration. Calves and pigs were a heavy sale, at late currencies.

The amount of floating stock now on the English Stock Exchange, is weekly becoming smaller, and to purchase even a small sum of any description of the British funds with immediate delivery is a matter of difficulty. Consequently, the Consols are again rather above our last quotations, and many expect that they will arrive at par before the close of the current year. Bank Stock has risen from 175 to 181; and as the renewal of the Bank Charter is certain it is probable that the Exchequer will have the assistance of this great extra... It is the endeavour to reduce the Three-and-a-Half per Cents into a stock bearing a moderate rate of annual dividend. India Stock feels the pressure from without, and every effort to invest money in it causes an advance in its value. The healthy state of our fine go export trade, in the meant me, is adding to the amount of money and capital, for on the Royal Exchange, last past day, there were more sellers than buyers of bills drawn on foreign nations, and a proportionable improvement in the rates of the foreign exchanges was the necessary consequence. This must be the reason of our foreign trade continue to be remitted to our merchants in the precious metals, for sometime to come as all events.

British Funds.—Three per Cent. Consols, 97¾ ⅞ per Cent. Reduced, 98¾ ⅞ per Cent. Reduced 103¾; 3½ per Cent. Annuities, 102¾. Bank of England Stock, 180 to 182, ¾ per Cents, 132 to 134, East India Stock, 278 to 280; India Bonds 36s. premium, Exchequer Bills, 74s. premium; Consols for Account, 97¾ to 98, Spanish Actives, 29¾ to 30; Spanish Passives, 5¾; Dutch 2½ per Cents, 59¾; Dutch Fives, 103¾; Belgian, 105 to 107, Austrian, 113 to 117; Russian, 117 to 118, Danish, 87¾ to 88; Neapolitan, 105 to 106, Portuguese, 43¾; Mexican Bonds, 34¾; Columbian, 14 to 14¼; Venezuela, 6¾, Peruvian 33 to 33¾, Chilian, 104 to 105; Brazils, 79 to 80; Belgium, 106 to 107, Austrian, 113 to 117; Russian, 117 to 118, Danish, 87¾ to 88; Neapolitan, 105 to 106, Dutch 2½ per Cents, 59¾; Dutch Fives, 103¾; Buenos, 46¼; Greek, ex. the Coupon, 13¾ to 14

Share List Prices.—London and Birmingham, 230 to 235; South Western, 77 to 78; Brighton, 43¾; Blackwall, 6¾; Greenwich, 8¾; Croydon, 16, Manchester and Leeds, 113 to 115; Manchester and Birmingham, 90 to 91; Birmingham and Derby, 95¾ to 95 to 97, Midland Counties, 88 to 87½; North Midland, 86 to 87, Edinburgh and Glasgow, 98 to 98½; Great Western, 165 to 168; South Eastern and Dover, 38 to 37, Eastern Counties, 10¾ ⅞; Northern and Eastern, 21¾ to 22; Paris and Orleans, 32¾ to 33; Paris and Rouen, 30¾; Rouen and Havre, 8 premium, Yarmouth and Norwich, 22 to 23; York and North Mid.and, 18¾ to 19¾, Guildford 40s per share paid, 7¾ to 8; Northern and Eastern, 3¾, Newcastle and Darlington, 100 to 101, Lancaster, 94 to 95, Edinburgh and Berwick, 1 to 2 premium, Great North of England, 93 to 95; Hull and Selby ... to 60; Bristol and Exeter, 67 to 68.

THE LONDON GAZETTE.

Tuesday, Feb 20.

BANKRUPTS & DIVIDENDS [illegible] Hanover square, grocer.—E. [illegible] ... wine merchant.—I. LUMLEY [illegible] ... Bond-street, tailor.—T. BRYSON, Adelaide-street, City, commission agent.—J. C. PETRIE, Bedington, Durham, miller.—J. STEVENSON, Bradford, Yorkshire, manufacturer.—J. GLAZEBROOK, Birmingham carpenter.—E. DAVENPORT, jun., Birmingham, plumber.

SCOTCH SEQUESTRATIONS.—J. ALEXANDER, Montrose, manufacturer.—J. and R. D. THOMSON, Edinburgh.—R. MARSHALL, Glasgow, tea merchant.—D. GRAHAM, Kilmarnock, skinner.—W. CRAWFORD, Largs, Ayrshire, cattle dealer.

Friday, Feb. 23.

17th Light Dragoons. Second class Staff Surgeon J. S. Gibson, M.D., to be Surgeon, vice Pilkington.

3rd Regiment of Foot Guards.—The Hon. J. W. Fortescue to be Ensign and Lieutenant, vice Robertson.

1st Regiment of Foot Ensign F. Carter to be Lieutenant, vice Lyons, w. H. S. Sharpe to be Ensign, vice Carter. 2nd Major C. E. Burns to be Major, vice Barr. 3rd Lieut. and Capt. W. Frith to be Captain, vice Brock; Ensign J. R. Jackson to be Lieutenant, vice Frith, J. E. Deane to be Ensign, vice Jackson. 6th Lieut. Parmenter G. H. Essex-vice Peyton, promoted, vice Jean. 7th Capt. Captain D. R. Smith to be Major, vice W. Raban; Lieutenant W. B Kelly to be Captain, vice Smith. 12th Lieut. H. T. Walker to be Adjutant, vice Preston, 13th Lieut. Edward Rawdon to be Adjutant, vice Jones. 14th Lieut. Charles [illegible] Capt. F. Adams to be Major, vice Parker; Capt. G. K. Cannon to be Captain, vice M'Murdo. Lieut. E. Loosed to be Captain, vice Adams, Ensign J. A. Macdougall to be Lieutenant, vice Mac Lachlan 29th Major M. Barr to be Major, vice Balson 39th Ensign C. D. Oliver to be Lieutenant, vice Broome; Ensign A. Lindesay to be Ensign, vice [illegible] 40th Lieut. Roberts to be Captain, vice Roberts. 49th W. E. H. Vere to be Ensign, vice Poisonby. 50th Lieut. R. E. De Montmorency, to be Lieutenant vice Clarke. 55th Lieut. H. Edwards to be Captain, vice De Havilland; T. R Hickson to be Lieutenant, [illegible] W. J. [illegible] ... Edwards. To be Ensigns without purchase [illegible] ... Hume ... Lieut.-J Percy Smith, vice Ensign Wolfe, vice Hume. 56th R. C. Stanhope to be Ensign. [illegible] ... Ensign C. Somers to be Ensign, vice Macdougall.—60th: W. Simpson, M.D., to be Assistant Surgeon, vice Grogan. 67th Lieut. F. W. Lane to be Captain, vice Vance Capt. R. Hare to be Captain, vice G. A. Curtis, Lieut. H. Collette to be Captain, vice Hare, Ensign R. Jones to be Lieutenant, vice Collette; J. M. Murray to be Ensign, vice Jones.—85th: Major-gen Sir E. Gibbs, K.C.B., to be Colonel, vice Lieut.-Gen. Sir W. Johnson, K.C.B. 70th Major R. J. White to be Lieutenant-Colonel, vice J. Kelsall Capt. W. Kelly to be Major, vice White; Lieut. J. P. Costobadie to be Captain, vice Taylor; Ensign J. W. Fi dey to be Lieutenant, vice Costobadie. F. W. Downe, Gent., to be Ensign, vice Kelly. 72nd Lieut.-Col. Capt. W. M. C. M'Murdo to be Captain, vice Gardiner. 73rd Lieut. Hon. A. Hepburn Scott to be Captain, vice Lord Langford 93rd: Ensign S. H. H. Edwards to be Lieutenant; G. B. Brownrigg to be Ensign, vice Wilson. 97th Ensign A. M'Neill to be Adjutant, vice Stewart.

2d West India Regiment. Captain C. B. Vane to be Cap tain, vice Lane

Cape Mounted Riflemen: Ensign J. C. Somerset to be Lieutenant, vice Le Touzel; Ensign R. G. G. Cumming to be Ensign, vice Russell; J. S. Francis to be Ensign, vice Borrow

Royal Newfoundland Companies: W. J. Coon to be Ensign, vice Cumming

Rifle Brigade: Captain J. Hare to be Major to the Army

Hospital Staff, Inspector-General of Hospitals H. Reid, M.D. to be Inspector-General of Hospitals; Staff Surg. of the Second Class J. Gibson, M.D. to be Staff Surg. of the First Class, vice Bartley.

BANKRUPTS.—R. R. LEE and J. HADDOCK, printers, Craven-yard, Drury-lane.—J. CONYERS, tailor, Bishopsgate-street, Gray's-inn-lane.—E. ARNATT, baker, Oxford.—W. GOLDING, innkeeper, Glemsford Suffolk.—R. PENNY, draper, Coxsermoulk.—W. JACKSON, baker, Longtown.—J. HUGHES, painter, Liverpool.—J. MALLALIEU, woollen manufacturer, Saddeworth, Yorkshire.

BIRTHS.

At Pisa, on the 14th inst, Regnet's-park Mrs. Augustus Lee, of a daughter.—At Pisa, the lady of Dr. H. G. Bode, R.N., of a daughter.—At Brighton, the lady of John B. Lousada, Esq., of Dashes-lodge, Surrey, of a son.—At Ryde, the lady of the Rev. Albert Sawyer, of a son.—At Oxford, the lady of S. S. Treacher, Esq., of a son.—At the Parsonage, Lambourne in Oxford, the lady of the Rev. John Bacon, of a son.—At Derby Farm, Twickenham, Mrs. Woodlands, Berks, the lady of the Rev. John Bacon, of a son.—At 19, Michael's-place, Brompton, Mrs. William Moore, of a daughter.—At Florence, the lady of Charles Brew Esq., of a son.—At Wyndham-place, Bryanston-square, the lady of Thos. E. H. Kavenh.ll, of a daughter.—At Heston hall, Heston, the lady of John Ryder Hogarth, Esq., of a daughter.—At Hampton Court, the lady of Charles Wigsell, of a daughter.—At Portsmouth, Portman-square, the lady of John Dodd, Esq., of a son.—At Leggatts, the lady of Thomas Kemble, Esq., of a son.—At Walton, Lord Monteagle, of a daughter.—At Upper Gower-street, the lady of Charles Ferns, Esq., of a son.—At Ashbrook-place, Vauxhall, Mrs. Leopold Dreesten, of a daughter.—In Addington-place, Camberwell, Mrs. Thomas Lee, of a son.—At Bayswater, the lady of Lieut.-Col. Sir John Jarnet, of a son.—At 3, Storey's-gate, St. James's park, the lady of J. Wright, Esq., M.D., of a daughter.—At 19, St. Helen's-place, Bishopsgate, Mrs. Hasket, of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

At Meriden, Charles Marshall, Esq., of London, to Anne Maria, eldest daughter of James Greenwood, Esq., M.D.—At St. Andrew's Church, Cornwall, the Rev. Le Touzel Guernsey, to Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the late Thomas Frances Rance, Esq., surgeon, of the City-road.—At the British Embassy, Paris, Charles Worsley, Esq., of Hovingham, to Mary Jane, eldest daughter of the late William Comerford Clarkson, Esq., of Doctors' Commons, London.—At Beaumont, Windsor, the seat of Viscount Ashbrook, Henry Percy, Esq., to Lady Jane, daughter of the late Earl of Robsmen, Ireland, and relict of George Fowdey, Esq. At St. George's, Hanover-square, Captain Whitelocke, Non Kent Light Infantry, to Anne, second daughter of the late A. F. Rose, Esq., of Purley park, Berks, and great niece of the late Earl of Carysfort.—At St. Mary's, Bryanston-square, Thomas James Welsh, Esq., to Emma Ann, only daughter of Thomas Wilson, R.N.—At St. Peter's, Cranesbrook-street, Thomas R. Wheeler, Esq., to Maria Anne, eldest daughter of Charles West Wheeler, Esq., M.D., of Shirley-lodge, Hants —At St. George's, Hanover-square, William Wing Drake, Esq., of Shardeloes, to Elizabeth Frances, third daughter of the late Mr. Coleman, of Mitchenghy, Surrey —At Bexley, Kent, Thomas Hall, Esq., M.D.—At St. Mary's Church, Cornwall, the Rev. Henry Wynter, of Chasham, to Ann Griffith, eldest daughter of the late Thomas Frances Rance, Esq., surgeon, of the City-road.—At the British Embassy, Paris, Charles Worsley, Esq., of Hovingham, to Mary Jane, eldest daughter of the late William Comerford Clarkson, Esq., of Doctors' Commons, London.—At Beaumont, Windsor, the seat of Viscount Ashbrook, Henry Percy, Esq., to Lady Jane, daughter of the late Earl of Robsmen, Ireland, and relict of George Fowdey, Esq. At St. George's, Hanover-square, Captain Whitelocke, Non Kent Light Infantry, to Anne, second daughter of the late A. F. Rose, Esq., of Purley park, Berks, and great niece of the late Earl of Carysfort.—At St. Mary's, Bryanston-square, Thomas James Welsh, Esq., to Emma Ann, only daughter of Thomas Wilson, R.N.—At St. Peter's, Cranesbrook-street, Thomas R. Wheeler, Esq., to Maria Anne, eldest daughter of Charles West Wheeler, Esq., M.D., of Shirley-lodge, Hants

ROYAL ARTILLERY BALL.

THE HON. ARTILLERY COMPANY'S MILITARY BALL.

This splendid réunion of the members of the Hon. Artillery Company and their friends took place on Monday evening, in the large room of the Armoury House, Finsbury. The Company's band was stationed in the vestibule, where also were drawn out their pieces of ordnance; the walls were likewise hung with cuirasses, and some portions of the ancient costume of the corps, as caps and helmets, besides pikes and other arms. Upon the staircase leading to the ball-room was placed a handsome transparency of the Company's arms; and, at the entrance to the salon de danse, after the arrival of the more distinguished guests, the band removed from the hall, and played alternately with Adams's quadrille band.

